V. 12—14. It is probable the apostle had been informed, that the Philippians feared lest his imprisonment should check the progress of the Gospel, and intimidate others from preaching or embracing it; and, no doubt, Satan and his servants expected this effect from it. He however would have his friends to know, that his sufferings had rather conduced to promote the cause of Christianity, through the interposition of God; and that the restraint put upon his personal ministry had been more than counterbalanced by other circumstances. So that his bonds for Christ's sake, and his constancy in them, the doctrine for which he was confined, and which he preached even in that situation, had become openly known even in Nero's palace among his courtiers, and in all other parts of Rome; which had excited a general attention to the Gospel through that immense city, whence the report would circulate almost throughout the earth. Moreover, many Christians, who were appointed to the ministry, and qualified for it, but who had before been timorous, perceiving how the apostle was protected, comforted, and prospered in his imprisonment, were greatly emboldened to preach, without fear of persecution, in the most open and useful manner; by whose labours the knowledge of the Gospel was rapidly diffused.

V. 15—18. Indeed, while some preached Christ of good-will, there were others, who were actuated by envy of Paul's reputation, success, or measure of liberty, and who aimed to cause divisions, even by preaching the Gospel of peace! Probably, these were Judaizers, who concealed part of their sentiments, and preached the substance of the Gospel, in order to form a party under their influence, and in opposition to the apostle and his friends; that so they might gradually impose the Mosaic law on the Gentile converts. The designing, ambitious, and selfish conduct of these men proved them insincere in what they preached, and that they only wanted to excite contentions, which would not only have added affliction to the apostle's mind during his imprisonment, but, as they supposed, would also increase the virulence of his persecutors. Others, however, acted from love to him, for the sake of Christ; knowing that he was appointed, as the apostle of the Gentiles, to defend as a bulwark the pure Gospel, against all that opposed or perverted it; and that he was now lodged in prison in the metropolis, not only as a witness for the truth, concerning justification and Christian liberty, against Judaizers; but also to bear testimony before senators, prætors, and courtiers, nay, perhaps, before the emperor himself, concerning the holy doctrine of salvation through Christ Jesus. But, though some aimed to oppose, grieve, or expose him the more, yet, as Christ was preached by that means, either in a pretended or a sincere zeal for his honour, among great numbers that had hitherto been strangers to the Gospel, who might in due time be more fully instructed in the faith, the apostle rejoiced, and he determined to do so, whatever consequences might ensue. Not sincerely. (16.) Or, purely. 'Not indeed, with a pure mind, though otherwise their 'doctrine was pure.' (Beza.) It is not certain who these preachers were, or whether they meant to excite divisions between the Jewish and Gentile converts, or to stir up the persecuting rage of idolaters against the apostle, for boldly propagating a doctrine subversive of idolatry; or that of the emperor and statesmen against him, for "preaching another King, one Jesus." But the whole tenour of his writings and conduct shows, that had the doctrine which they taught been materially erroneous, he would have opposed them, instead of rejoicing in their success.

shall be ashamed, but that [i] with all boldness, as always, so now also, [k] Christ shall be magnified in my body, [l] whether it be by life, or by death.

21 For to me [m] to live is Christ, and [n] to die is gain.

22 But if I [o] live in the flesh, [p] this is the fruit of my labour: yet what I shall choose [q] I wot not.

23 For I am [r] in a strait betwixt two, having [s] a desire to depart, and to be [t] with Christ; which is [u] far better:

24 Nevertheless, [x] to abide in the flesh is more needful for you.

25 And, having [y] this confidence, I know that I shall abide and continue with you all, [z] for your furtherance and [a] joy of faith;

26 That [b] your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ for me, by my coming to you again.

27 Only [c] let your conversation be as it becometh [d] the gospel of Christ, that [e] whether I come and see you, or else be absent, [f] I may hear of your affairs, [g] that ye stand fast [h] in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for [i] the faith of the gospel;

28 And [k] in nothing terrified by your adversaries: which is to them [l] an evident token of perdition, [m] but to you of salvation, [n] and that of God.

29 For unto you [o] it is given in the behalf of Christ, [p] not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake:

30 Having [q] the same conflict [r] which ye saw in me, and [s] now hear to be in me.

V. 19, 20. The apostle knew that these afflictive dispensations, however aggravated, would help forward his final salvation, through the prayer of his brethren, and the communication of the Spirit of Christ to his soul, to promote his humility, spirituality, and meetness for heaven. This satisfied him, as to his personal concern, as he was willing to endure any abasement or suffering, for the honour of Christ. And indeed he earnestly expected a happy event of his trials; as one who with out-stretched neck eagerly looks for the coming of some beloved friend, and he confidently hoped that he should not be made ashamed in any thing, by the disappointment of his expectations or endeavours: but that, as in all former instances, he had boldly and successfully stood his ground, in this present case, also, he should be strengthened, and inspired with courage, that Christ might be magnified in and by his frail body; whether his life were spared that he might again labour in spreading the Gospel, or whether he should be called to shed his blood in confirmation of his testimony. Salvation. The connexion between salvation, and "the "supply of the Spirit of Christ," fully proves, that eternal salvation, and not temporal deliverance, was meant.

V. 21—26. With peculiar animation, the apostle here declared the happy frame of his mind, in his perilous situation. As Christ was the Author and Support of his spiritual life, so was he the End and Object of his life on earth. He had no other business, interest, honour, or pleasure, for which to live, but Christ and his glory, service, and favour, and therefore he knew that to die would be his greatest gain; as he should then be enabled more perfectly to know, love, serve, and enjoy the favour of his gracious Lord; and have done with sin, temptation, and suffering for ever. Yet, if he continued to live in the flesh, and to endure hardship a little longer, it would be worth his while, as his labour would be fruitful of good to himself, as well as to others. So that he knew not which he should choose, if it were left to him, being in a strait between two, and drawn both ways, by the reasons which he had to desire life on the one hand, and death on the other. Indeed, he had a most vehement longing to depart from this world of sin and sorrow, that he might immediately go and be with Christ, exchanging the life of faith, hope, and feeble love, for that of sight, fruition, and perfect holiness; as this was incomparably more desirable, than any thing which could be possessed or enjoyed on earth. Nevertheless, his continuance here being the more needful for the benefit of his beloved people, he was willing to postpone the completion of his own happiness for their advantage. And indeed, having this confidence respecting his own concerns, he was also assured, by intimations from the Lord, that he should abide some time longer, to promote their growth and establishment in the faith, and the joy or glorying in God connected with it; and that, being permitted to come and renew his labours among them, he should be an instrument of increasing their abundant rejoicing in Christ. "Christ is gain "to me, living and dying." (21.) Thus Beza and many others translate and understand the words; but the antithesis between the two parts of the verse is destroyed; the meaning is comparatively cold, nay, selfish; and, though I would speak diffidently, after such eminently learned critics, the original seems incapable of this construction. Far better. (23.) 'The original is the highest superlative which it is possible to form in any language.' (Macknight.) 'Better beyond expression.' (Doddridge.) 'Could St. Paul think a state of insensibility much better than a life tending so much, as his did, to the glory of God, to the propagation of the Gospel, and to the furtherance of the joy of Christians?' (Whitby.) The doctrine of the soul's immediate happiness, with Christ in glory, is here declared beyond almost the possibility of doubt, except as men disbelieve the apostle's testimony.

CHAP. II.

The apostle earnestly, and by the most affecting topics, exhorts his brethren to humble, condescending, and self-denying, love, 1—4; after the example of Christ, in his incarnation, humiliation, and death on the cross; as terminating in his glorious exaltation, 5—11. He exhorts them to diligence, in working out their own salvation, as depending on the grace of God, 12, 13; and to profess the gospel, and adorn it, among their neighbours, by a harmless and blameless example, in such a manner, that he might rejoice with them at the day of Christ, in the success of his labours, 12—16; and assuring them that he should joyfully become a martyr for their sakes; and exhorting them to re-

V. 27—30. None of the events before referred to, nor any other, could harm the Philippians, if they only took heed to have their conversation becoming the Gospel, which they had embraced. (Note, Eph. iv. 1—8.) The original word, rendered conversation, denotes the conduct of citizens, when it accords to their privileges, and tends to the credit, safety, peace, and prosperity of the city. Thus the Philippians, being graciously made citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, ought to act suitably to that high character, and to seek the honour of the Gospel and the welfare of the Church in all their actions. Then it would be well with them, and gladden the apostle's heart, whether he came to see them, or only heard of their affairs, that they stood firm in the profession of the faith, and in obedience to Christ, amidst surrounding temptations and bad examples; avoiding all dissentions; continuing as one body actuated by one spirit; being of one heart and mind in the great concerns of religion; not striving one against another, either about their temporal interests or reputation, or about any things of subordinate importance in religion, in which they did not exactly agree; but, as one compact phalanx, striving with united force against the common enemy, to exclude false teachers, to prevent abuses, to bear up under persecution, and by every means to promote the cause of Christianity. In attending to these things, they ought in no wise to be intimidated by the number, power, menaces, or cruelties, of their adversaries, whose malignant rage against such excellent persons proved them enemies to God and holiness, and in the way of perdition: while the meek and patient conduct of those who suffered for Christ's sake, united to the holiness of their characters, was an additional evidence that they were the friends of God, and partakers of that salvation, which he wrought in the hearts of his people, (Note, 1 Pet. iv. 12—16.) For indeed they were called to an additional honour and privilege; in that it was given to them, not only to believe in Christ for salvation, but to be distinguished among his disciples by a nearer conformity to him in suffering, for which their reward would be great in heaven; (Note, Matt. v. 10—12;) as they were then enduring that same honourable conflict, which they had seen the apostle engaged in, when scourged and imprisoned at Philippi; and which they heard that he was at that time sustaining, by his confinement at Rome. Many expositors are very exact, in this and other passages, in distinguishing between the persecutions, which the apostle and the churches were exposed to, from the Jews, and those which they endured from the Gentiles. But this rather embarrasses than clears the interpretation; and the practical instruction, if not thus lost sight of, is the same in either case. No doubt the Jews excited most of the persecutions, to which the apostle was exposed; and his zeal for the admission of the Gentiles into the Church, without circumcision or regard to the ritual law, rendered him peculiarly obnoxious to them. But it is also evident, that zeal for idolatry and for local customs, and fear of innovations and insurrections, as well as enmity against God and holiness, disposed the Gentiles generally to concur, and often to take the lead in persecution.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those servants of Christ, who most resemble their Lord, will thank God on every remembrance of the congregations among whom they have laboured, when they know that ministers and people, in their proper places, attend to their several duties, in such a manner as evinces them to have fellowship with Christ, and to share the blessings of his Gospel. But, alas! how often are faithful pastors constrained to make request with tears, instead of joy, for those in whom they once were confident, but for whom they now tremble! We may, however, be always confident that God will perform his good work in every soul, in which he hath really begun it by regeneration: though we should warn men not to trust in superficial appearances, sudden emotions, external reformation, change of sect or sentiment, or in any thing short of a new creation unto holiness. But it is meet for us to hope the best of those who profess the truth, and do not disgrace it; and greatly to desire the spiritual welfare of those who have showed us kindness for the Lord's sake, sympathized in our sorrows, and helped us in our labours for the defence and confirmation of the Gospel, as we may well conclude that they are really partakers of divine grace. We should "long after them in the bowels of Jesus Christ;" and pour out our prayers for them, when incapable of doing them other service. We cannot in general pray for ourselves, and in behalf of those who possess that faith which worketh by love, in a better manner, than by copying the example before us; and requesting that our love may abound yet more and more, and be exercised in knowledge and in all judgment; that we and they may discern between things that differ, and know how to choose the good and refuse the evil; that we may be sincere and diligent disciples, preserved from all scandals and offences, and "filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are "through Christ, to the praise and glory of God." For those things, which most honour God, will eventually most benefit us: we should not therefore leave it dubious, joice with him, 17, 18. He hopes to send Timothy to them shortly, whom he highly commends, 19—23; as he does also Epaphroditus, their messenger to him; who had been sick, and was grieved that they had heard it; and, as God had mercifully restored him, longed to return to them, 24—27; The apostle therefore sends him back; exhorts them highly to value him, and such as he, seeing he had disregarded his life, to supply their lack of service, 28—30.

whether any good fruit be found on us, or not; a small measure of love, knowledge, judgment, spirituality, and fruitfulness, should not satisfy us: but we ought to long and pray to be filled with all good fruits; as aiming at great things, and nobly aspiring to do much good, and to be holy as God is holy.

V. 12—20.

The consideration, that the Lord "worketh all things "after the counsel of his own will," should reconcile us to those afflictive dispensations, which seem to preclude us from usefulness. Whatever Satan or wicked men may intend or expect, our God can further the success of his Gospel, by the very events which arise from men's endeavours to stop its progress. He often works by apparent contraries; and his most able ministers have been immured in prisons, that their bonds in Christ might bring the knowledge of his truth into the courts of justice, nay, even into the palaces of princes; and the blood of the martyrs hath more abundantly made fruitful the good seed of the word of God. Nay, the extremest sufferings and cruel deaths of his saints, instead of intimidating, have infused courage into their brethren, while they witnessed the triumphant consolations of the happy sufferers. Indeed, Satan will endeavour to prevent these blessed effects, even by stirring up men to preach the Gospel from unworthy motives: and not only have ambition and avarice moved vast numbers to take this sacred office upon them; but envy, malice, and contention, have done the same: and Christ and his truth have often been preached, in order to grieve, perplex, or expose his faithful suffering servants! So varied are the effects of human depravity! We should, indeed, grieve to see tares sown in the Lord's field, and the souls of men deceived by damnable heresies; but when the substance of the truth is preached among ignorant persons, we should neither so much regard our own reputation, or that of our party, nor be so concerned about the motives of the persons employed, as not to rejoice, if, by such men and means, sinners are brought acquainted with the all gracious Saviour. The mortifying circumstances, which sometimes attend these transactions, will turn to our salvation, if we bear them in a proper manner, through the supply of the Spirit of Christ, granted in answer to the prayers made for us and by us. Our earnest expectation and hope should not be to be honoured by men, or to escape the cross; but to be so upheld amidst contempt and affliction, that we may not be put to shame, or disgrace the cause of God; and that we may act with such boldness and constancy amidst dangers and enemies, that Christ may be magnified in our bodies, whether by our laborious services, or by the honourable conclusion of our work and warfare.

V. 21—30.

We have not made that progress in the divine life which holy Paul had; yet, if we are true believers, we habitually consider Christ as our Life. Our main interest, work, honour, and comfort, in this world are centered in him; and his glory is the great end to which we desire to direct all our conduct. In proportion to the depth of our experience in this respect should be our well-grounded assurance, that to "die will be our gain." If we have this earnest of our inheritance, death can take us away from nothing but what is vain, vexatious, defiling, ensnaring, and utterly insufficient for our felicity: and it will convey us to the fountain-head of those holy joys, which here we relished and sometimes tasted, but were never able to participate without alloy or interruption: and what a blessedness must that be, which can render death the richest gain, and make us long earnestly for the approach of the king of terrors, as the messenger of our Father, to put us in possession of our eternal inheritance! And how cold and heartless, compared with this, are philosophy's antidotes against the fear of death! We should, however, be willing to live in this evil world, if the Lord see good: this will retard, but it will also increase, our complete felicity, if our days be spent in diligent labours and patient sufferings for Christ's sake. We need not wish to choose in this respect; for we should not know what choice to make. It is blessed indeed to be in that strait between two which the apostle described; to "have a longing desire to depart and be with Christ, "which is far better;" and yet to be willing to abide in the flesh, in order, if the Lord pleases, to be helpful to the faith and holy joy of our brethren. Yet it can hardly be expected, that believers should generally be found thus superior to the love of life, and the fear of death; and thus willing to live and suffer, from love to their brethren, when assured of their own salvation. Nor should we despise the day of small things, either in ourselves or others; though we should press forward to this full assurance of hope, and this entire submission to the Lord's will. But nothing can harm us, if we "only let "our conversation be as it becometh the Gospel of "Christ." In that case, all changes, personal or relative, in the Church or in the world, will be working together for our good. This then should be our primary personal concern; and all the company of believers, however divided and subdivided, should consider themselves as one great army, and endeavour to "stand fast in one Spirit, with "one mind, striving together for the faith of the Gospel;" and to recommend the salvation of Christ to all around them. In such a cause, we should not allow ourselves to be terrified by any adversaries; for their reproaches and menaces against such as thus serve Christ, is a manifest proof that they are in the broad road to destruction, as they hate the truth and image of God in his people. This enmity of ungodly men against us for Christ's sake, when we love, and are beloved by the brethren, is an evident token to us, that we partake of salvation by the grace of God, as both friends and foes discern his seal upon us; and to us "it is given in the behalf of Christ," to believe the same truths, to love and suffer for the same holy cause, and to endure the same conflict which prophets, apostles, and martyrs, have believed and maintained before us.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—4. (Note, i. 27—30.) The apostle evidently deemed harmony among Christians essential to a conversation becoming the Gospel. He therefore speaks, as it were, to this effect: 'By all the consolation and animating motives derived from Christ; from the pardon of your sins, and your deliverance from the bondage of corruption; from the love of Christ and communion with him; from the fellowship of the sanctifying Spirit; from the favour of God and the hopes and anticipations of heaven; by all the sweet comforts arising from the very exercise of love; I beseech and exhort you: if the Lord has manifested his tender compassions towards you; if you have any feeling for your spiritual father, now also a prisoner for your sakes; or any for your brethren in Christ, redeemed by the same Saviour, heirs of the same heaven, and sufferers from the same trials and conflicts with yourselves; "Fulfil ye my joy," 'the joy that I felt at your conversion, by living together in entire peace and harmony.' 'If any force of exhortation, in the name 'of Christ.' (Whitby.) The original word signifies exhortation, as well as consolation, or rather an encouraging, animating exhortation. The authority of Christ, speaking by his apostle, as well as the consolation derived from him, seems implied. (Marg. Ref.) The expressions that follow are varied, to include all that can be imagined in the most cordial amity, unity, and sympathy. Let them live together as members of one body, animated by one soul: let their common love to Christ, and delight in his holy service, unite them in love to each other: let them be of one accord in every undertaking to promote the common cause; and let them seek, in behalf of themselves and each other, that degree of spiritual illumination, which might make them of one judgment, and of the same sentiments, as much as possible. But as differences in some things might take place, and even in the concerns of the church, some would judge more favourably of persons or measures than others, of which Satan would take advantage, in order to disturb their harmony, let them all watch themselves, that they did nothing from self-will, a contentious temper, or an ambitious desire of obtaining applause, influence, or superiority. On the other hand, let them see to it, that they were actuated by a humble spirit, and that, from a consciousness of the evils in their heart and conduct, which others could not observe, and from candour to their brethren, they were ever ready to deem others more deserving esteem than themselves. In many cases this could not be done, in respect of talents or spiritual gifts, though self-flattery and vain-glory in these things also would readily and dangerously intrude; but if the endowments, and the obligations connected with them, were properly estimated, they would rather tend to humble than to exalt them, even as the apostle spake of his knowledge in the mystery of Christ, when he deemed himself less than the least of all saints. (Note, Eph. iii. 4—8.) They ought not therefore to regard either their own attainments or interests, alone or principally, but, in humble, self-denying love, to recede from every personal concern, for the benefit of the brethren, and the peace of the church. 'Be as ready to 'assist and help others, as if you were their subjects and 'inferiors: so the example of Christ requires, and so the 'precept runs, that he who is the greatest should be the 'servant to others.' (Whitby.)

V. 5—8. To illustrate and enforce in the most effectual manner that conduct which he had recommended, the apostle here called on them to cultivate and manifest the same judgment and disposition which had been so conspicuous in Christ Jesus. He had been "in the form of

"God;" he appeared in divine majesty and glory, as the Creator and Lord of all, in the heaven of heavens, and all the angels worshipped him as God, One with and coequal to the Father. He had manifested himself, as JEHOVAH, to patriarchs, prophets, and the Church of Israel, through successive ages; and had not thought it a robbery to be equal with God, and to receive divine adoration from men. To this he was conscious of having a full right, without in the least interfering with the honour due to the eternal Father. Nevertheless, he emptied, or impoverished, himself; he divested himself of his divine glory, that he might appear on earth like one of no dignity or reputation: as princes travel without the insignia of royalty, and are not known from private persons. He did not come down from heaven "in the form of God," as when he gave the law from mount Sinai; he appeared, not like himself, "the Lord of glory," but "in the form of a servant," even of the lowest servant. As he was really a Servant to the Father, when in the form of a servant, so was he really God, when in the form of God. By this voluntary susception of a new character, in order to man's salvation, "he was made in the likeness of men;" he assumed our nature, and became like us in all things but sin. Thus the only begotten of the Father tabernacled here on earth "in fashion as a man," being truly man, but more than man at the same time: and he was pleased still more to abase himself, by submitting to the most indigent circumstances, and the most accumulated hardships for our good; especially he became obedient to the whole divine law, as our Surety, and fulfilled all righteousness, amidst inconceivable difficulties and temptations. In this he persevered to the end, and, his voluntary obligations requiring it of him, he submitted to suffer death; even that of crucifixion, the most ignominious and tormenting, and accursed kind of execution, to which the vilest of malefactors were condemned: and he was most perfectly resigned and obedient to the Father, through all the inward agony, and multiplied indignities and cruelties which he endured. Thus low he voluntarily stooped from "that "glory, which he had with the Father before the world "was." He not only abased himself to become man; but he denied and humbled himself as man, to the very depth of suffering and shame, from love to worthless hell-deserving rebels and enemies! The example can never be done justice to by human language; and all our imitation must necessarily fall infinitely short of it. In this view of the subject, how important and energetic is the apostle's argument! How striking is the illustration!—But many persons have laboured to prove, that the apostle only meant that 'the man Jesus, though he acted as the Ambassador and Representative of God, did not think of robbing him of his glory, by claiming equality with God!' And this would sink the meaning not only into insipidity, but absurdity; for it would propose, as an example of the most perfect self-denial and humility, a bare exemption from the most horrible impiety and ambition imaginable! as certainly it must be such, for any mere creature, in any circumstances, to harbour a thought of equality in honour and majesty with the infinite God. Indeed, this sense cannot be consistent with our Lord's frequent and most express declarations concerning himself. (John v. 17, 18. 23. viii. 58. x. 30—33. xiv. 9.) Nay, the whole interpretation of the passage must be forced and unnatural; the reality of our Lord's human nature, "in the likeness of man," and "in fashion as a man," might as justly be questioned, as the reality of his Deity "was in the form of God;" and his taking upon him the form of a servant, and becoming obedient, are unmeaning words upon the Socinian interpretation, but exceeding emphatical upon that before proposed. But. (7.) Or, Yet, or Nevertheless, or Notwithstanding. See the following passages, among many others, comparing the translation with the original. (Mark xiv. 29. 36. John xi. 15. xvi. 7. Rom. v. 14. 1 Cor. ix. 12. xiv. 20. Gal. iv. 30. 2 Tim. i. 12. Rev. ii. 4. 14.) On a portion of Scripture which is of so great importance, both in respect of its general import, and also in the argument concerning our Lord's Deity, and which, at the same time, has been perplexed by discordant interpretations, more than most other passages, a few additional quotations may be properly adduced, which indeed may be omitted, when read in a family.—'Who does not perceive that Paul declares what Christ was, before he assumed the form of a servant? Christ himself, when he was God, and consequently in that glory and majesty which belong to God alone, and when he did not think that he usurped any thing not belonging to him; yet, as laying aside this glory, abased himself even so far as to become such as the servants of God are, that is, to become man: yea, and then also he conducted himself towards the Father, not as towards his equal, but his Lord; so that he voluntarily submitted to undergo the most ignominious death! And shall not we mortal and mean slaves be ashamed of our arrogance, in acting as if we excelled our brethren! This I say, is Paul's argument, than which nothing can be more weighty and forcible.' "He thought it no "robbery." 'Or, as a most learned interpreter renders it, "He did not think it prey to be seized on." 'For he refers that which follows to the manifestation made in the flesh; that this should be the meaning. Christ, as God, possessed of eternal glory and majesty, knew, indeed, that it was just and lawful for him to appear, not in humble flesh, but with a dignity worthy of God: but he chose rather to abase himself. 'But I think that this also belongs to the pristine glory of Christ, which he mentions, (John xvii. 5.) and that this is the meaning; Christ, when possessed of that eternal glory of Deity, was not ignorant, that in this thing, (that is, in being coequal with God the Father,) he did no

'injury to any one, but used his own right; nevertheless 'he, as it were, receded from his right, when he reduced 'himself even to nothing, by taking on him the form of 'a servant, &c.' (Beza.) The word, rendered robbery, is not found in any other place in the New Testament, and but very seldom in other writers, but the derivation of it fixes it to the meaning given to it in our translation. The word, rendered equal, is ισα, not ισον, and many have argued from this circumstance, that similitude, not equality, is meant; but the learned bishop Pearson has shown, that ισα, especially used with ειναι, may express equality as well as ισον. Socinus inquires, 'How can God be said to be 'equal to himself?' To this it may be answered, that the Son may be equal to the Father, in the unity of the Godhead, which is all that the apostle's language implies, and all that Trinitarians contend for; nor can this be denied without begging the question, and denying that there is any distinction of Persons in the unity of the Godhead. 'He emptied himself, taking the form of a ser'vant, being made in the likeness of men.' Thus bishop Pearson literally translates the seventh verse. If any man doubt how Christ emptied himself, the text will satisfy him, by "taking on him the form of a servant;" and if any still question how he "took on him the form of a "servant," he has the apostle's answer, by "being made "in the likeness of men." Here it may be observed, that if Christ had originally been a creature of God, he must have also been his servant before his incarnation; and this concludes against the Arians, as well as the Socinians. So afterwards, "Being found in fashion as a man, "he humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death, "even the death of the cross." As therefore his humiliation consisted in his obedience unto death, so his emptying himself consisted in the assumption of the form of a servant, and that in the nature of man. The clauses are connected, (in the original,) not by way of conjunction, in which there might be some diversity, but by way of opposition, which signifieth a clear identity. The grand point, in order to understand the passage, is this, to determine in what sense Christ "was in the form of "God," and how "he emptied himself;" and the above remarks, suggested by bishop Pearson's learned and able disquisitions on the passage, and sometimes in his words, give, as it appears to me, the most complete satisfaction. —The passage indeed is full to the point as to our Lord's Deity, and all who oppose this construction of it are evidently baffled in the argument; so that, after all their efforts, it stands unmoved, as the deep rooted rock amidst the raging billows. But, had some deeper impression been made on it, the Bible would still afford the humble believer abundant proof of this "great Mystery of godli"ness," on which every well-grounded human hope must be established.

V. 9—11. When the eternal Word and Son of God had fulfilled his engagements as our incarnate Surety, God the Father most highly exalted him, in our nature, by advancing him to the mediatorial throne. For the two circumstances, that it is Christ, as Man, who is thus exalted, and that he is exalted as Mediator, render this perfectly consistent with his eternal glory and dominion, as "God over all, blessed for evermore." The absolute kingdom of the Creator, and the mediatorial kingdom of the Redeemer, established for the benefit and salvation of rebels against the Creator, who are condemned by his law, must be distinguished. (Note, 1 Cor. xv. 24—28.) It was in consequence of the engagements of the eternal Son, that the dispensation of mercy was introduced. It was "for this joy set before him, that he endured the "cross, &c." Nothing could be deducted from his authority, as God, nor any thing added to it; but it did not consist with the honour of the divine law and justice to deal with men, except through a Mediator, who was one with the Father and one with them, their Surety, Sacrifice, and Intercessor. The mediatorial kingdom alone was given to Christ, and given to him as man; but had he not been God also, and possessed of all divine perfections, how could he possibly have administered it? (Note, Matt. xxviii. 18.) Thus God the Father gave him a name, and a degree of honour and authority, above that of every other name, so that no created being ever was, or could be, so honoured as he was, who had been the Man of sorrows, and crucified between two thieves! Insomuch, that at the name of Jesus, the name given to a poor Babe, born in a stable and laid in the manger, (because that Babe was Emmanuel, "God with us," that Child born was the "mighty God,") every knee should bow, in submission and adoration. That is, all rational creatures shall either willingly adore him, or be punished as the enemies of God and his kingdom. This includes angels and saints in heaven, men on earth, the bodies of the dead who are under the earth, and indeed all the principalities and powers of darkness. In short, every tongue shall confess, every creature must, one way or another, acknowledge, that Jesus Christ is Lord of all, the Lord of glory, yea, JEHOVAH the Saviour; and this will be so far from interfering with the honour of God the Father, (as Anti-trinitarians object,) that it will be to his glory. For Christ and the Father are One, and the whole Deity is more displayed and glorified in his Person and Redemption before the whole universe, than by all his other works: so that all the honour and worship which is rendered to the Person of the Son, as "God manifest in the "flesh," is virtually rendered to the Godhead, through the medium of his humanity, by which alone sinners can know, approach unto, or worship, the infinite God. V. 12, 13. As the Philippians, whom the apostle addressed in the language of cordial love, had so endearing and encouraging an example before their eyes, let them continue to act as they had hitherto done. They had always been prompt to obey the will of Christ made known by his apostle, not merely while he abode among them, but even with increasing attention when he had left them; and he desired that they should now, in his absence, labour diligently in all the means of grace, and in the performance of every duty, to obtain more complete deliverance from the power of sin, by the renewal of their souls to holiness. Thus they should work earnestly in the great concern of their own salvation, "with fear and trembling;" lest any of them should seem to come short of the pomised rest, and be proved to have no root in themselves, by falling away in the hour of temptation; lest by negligence they should lose their comfort, and subject themselves to darkness and terror at the approach of death; or lest they should dishonour God, and prejudice men against the Gospel by falling into scandalous sins. 'The phrase, ("with fear and trembling,") 'in other places of these 'books, seems to imply, not only lowliness of mind, but 'diligence, and caution, and solicitude, and fear of displeasing.' (Hammond.) (Marg. Ref.) 'Though we 'are freely saved in Christ alone, apprehended by faith, 'yet we must press forward unto salvation in the way of 'righteousness, seeing that the sons of God are led by the 'Spirit of him, by whom they are justified, that they 'may walk in good works.' (Beza.) Salvation here signifies, not justification, either exclusively or primarily, but deliverance from sin and all its consequences, which must be and will be diligently and vigilantly laboured for by all the regenerate, so long as any sin remaineth, and which will not be in all things completed, till death shall be swallowed up in victory. The righteousness, atonement, and mediation of Christ, have made all things ready for our salvation, the Gospel calls us to partake of it, the regenerating Spirit of Christ quickens us when dead in sin, and brings us to repentance and faith. Thus excited and animated, we first diligently seek an interest in Christ, then to "make our calling and and election sure," and then for the full assurance of hope unto the end. In this way of diligence we also receive daily more and more of salvation itself, by liberty from sin, victory over it, peace and communion with God, and the earnests of heavenly felicity; and at the same time we glorify God, adorn the Gospel, are useful to our brethren, and shine as lights in the world. In doing these things, the Philippians should consider that God was even then working in them that willingness to repent, believe, and obey, of which they were conscious, and that ability to reduce their good desires to effect, which their past conduct evinced. In this he had acted according to his sovereign purpose of goodwill to men, and what they had experienced in this matter should animate them to more vigorous exertions, and direct them to depend wholly on God to enable them for every good work. To will, &c. 'We are not therefore 'stocks, but are willing in doing well; not that God 'helps the imbecility of our will, but that from being evil 'he makes it good, and that wholly of his grace.' "And "to do." 'He does not say, that we may have the faculty of willing and doing well, if we will; but he says, 'that the efficacious gift of willing and doing well is bestowed on us.' (Beza.) This shows the nature of divine influences upon the mind, according to the constitution of rational nature, and not against it, by producing in us a willing mind to use all means of obtaining help and deliverance, and not by driving or constraining us against our will. By the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit, the mind and heart are prepared to discern and love truth and holiness; the Gospel sets objects before us, and proposes them to us, suited to this new state of mind and heart, and we accordingly choose them, without the least infringement of our liberty. We feel no force, we are perfectly voluntary, we act according to our present feelings and desires, as if the whole were from ourselves; and perhaps it is not till long after, that we learn from what Author and Source the revolution in our judgment and affections, which led to newness of life, originated; nay, numbers cannot clearly discern this during their subsequent earthly course. In short, "the carnal mind "is enmity against God;" all are by nature carnally minded; none are of themselves willing to repent and believe the Gospel, according to the word of God; none can be compelled to do this against their will; but "God works "in us to will and to do of his good pleasure," (Marg. Ref.) 'the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may 'have a good will, and working with us, when we have 'that good will.' (Art. x.) If the opposers of the doctrine, improperly called Calvinistic, in former and latter times, had been willing and able to understand those against whom they contend, it would have saved them immense labour, in combating sentiments, which few indeed maintain in the sense which they seem to suppose. One of them, however, has repeatedly quoted, "operatur in no"bis velle," as one of Calvin's dreadful dogmas, when it is exactly the vulgate translation of St. Paul's words, which we render, "works in us to will!"

V. 14—18. In all their concerns, whether secular or religious, the Philippians were exhorted to avoid every kind of murmuring against the appointments of God, and grudging of one another; and all angry controversies, or ambitious competitions for pre-eminence. Thus they would be blameless, and not liable to be accused by their neighbours, as contentious, selfish, deceitful, or injurious; their whole conduct would be harmless and inoffensive, as well as benevolent; and they would appear to be the children of God, by the purity, equity, and love, exhibited in their characters. They would escape the reproach and censure of observers; and their bold profession of the Gospel in the face of persecutors, joined with their holy conversation and spiritual worship, would cause them to shine, amidst their immoral, idolatrous, and licentious countrymen, as "lights in the world." The words may be rendered as the imperative, "Shine ye, &c." The nation indeed, to which they belonged, was crooked, deceitful, injurious, and perverse; which appeared in their conduct towards one another, as well as in their persecution of the Christians: but the doctrine and example of consistent believers would tend to enlighten them, and to direct their way to Christ and holiness; even as the light-house warns the mariners to avoid the rocks, and directs their course into the harbour. This must be attempted, not only by holding fast the truth, but by "hold-" ing forth the word of life," in their profession, discourse, public ordinances, and holy actions. In this manner they would certainly be saved themselves, and be instruments of saving others; and the good work, begun among them, would be diffused and perpetuated to other generations. This would enable the apostle to anticipate the joy reserved for him in the day of Christ, when it would appear that his labours at Philippi had not been fruitless, and that he had not run as one that loses the race. And, provided their faith, and its blessed fruits, were thus presented in Christ Jesus, as an acceptable and honourable sacrifice and service to God; if he should be offered on that sacrifice, by the shedding of his blood, as a martyr in the glorious cause, as the drink offerings were poured upon the sacrifices; (Marg. Ref.) he would be so far from regretting this event, that he would rejoice at thus suffering for the confirmation of their faith, and congratulate them, yea, share their happiness, even while enduring the agonies of death. He would not therefore have them be troubled on his account; but rather rejoice with him and for him as a very happy man, even in his imprisonment, and in the prospect of a violent death! Nothing can exceed the genuine magnanimity and disinterested love, expressed in this most beautiful passage.

V. 19—23. The apostle did not, it seems, suppose, that he was at that time to suffer death: he "trusted in " the Lord Jesus," in whose hand all hearts and events were, that he should be enabled shortly to send Timothy, to inquire into the state of their souls and of the Church, the result of which, he was persuaded, would conduce to his comfort. He had selected him for this service, because he had at that time no one with him of so excellent a spirit as Timothy, and so entirely coincident with himself in his views and aims; or who would be concerned for their welfare, with so prudent, tender, and assiduous an affection, like the natural love of parents to their children. For all too much sought their own ease, safety, interest, credit, or indulgence, which often interfered with the work, honour, and cause of Christ. Probably, this was wholly the case with several, who had offered their assistance to Paul, but had declined difficult and perilous services: others perhaps had rendered themselves suspected by the same selfish conduct; and most concerned had given the apostle cause for dissatisfaction, by preferring easier and more secure services to those of far greater importance, but connected with more self-denial, labour, and peril. It may be supposed that several of his most approved helpers were absent on other services, and others might be fully employed at Rome: but, after all deductions and limitations, the apostle's complaint must stand as a lamentable testimony to the selfishness of human nature. The Philippians, however, had already had experimental proof of Timothy; and they well knew, that he had imbibed the very mind of the apostle, as his genuine son in the faith: and that he was ever ready to enter into his views, to concur in his measures, to observe his directions, to consult his comfort, and to labour, venture, and suffer in the cause of Christ; and in serving with him in spreading the Gospel, as a son with his father. But he deemed it better not to send him, till he knew how his own cause would be decided, which he continually expected to come on before the Emperor's tribunal. The words, "trust in " the Lord Jesus, &c." as introduced with reference to a providential concern, and not any thing immediately relating to his salvation and grace, should not pass unnoticed. Perhaps the most satisfactory assurance of our Lord's Deity may be obtained, by carefully noting such words, as seem to drop, without design, from the pen of the sacred writer, and which are seldom noticed in the controversy; but which can in no other way be reconciled to 24 But [q] I trust in the Lord that I also myself shall come shortly.

25 Yet I supposed it necessary to send to you [r] Epaphroditus, [s] my brother, [t] and companion in labour, [u] and fellow-soldier, [x] but your messenger, [y] and he that ministered to my wants.

other scriptures. (Marg. Ref.) Proof, &c. (22.) This shows that Timothy was at Philippi with the apostle; yet the history does not expressly mention it: but, by carefully comparing one part of the narrative with another, this appears evidently to have been the case. (Marg. Ref.) Undesigned coincidences of this kind, between the history and the Epistles, prove that both are genuine; and if genuine, then inspired.

V. 24—30. The apostle was satisfied, confiding in the Lord that he should speedily regain his liberty, and be enabled to pay the Philippians another visit. But before he could either spare Timothy or come himself, he deemed it expedient to send Epaphroditus, whom he owned as a brother, and whom they had sent as their messenger, to bring him a supply to his urgent necessities. Probably, Epaphroditus was a pastor of the Church at Philippi; and, being absent from his stated charge, he longed after them, and his labours of love among them: especially he was in heaviness, because they had heard of his sickness, and the thoughts of their sorrow on his account were more painful to him than his own sickness! What a beautiful and admirable instance of genuine sensibility and affection is here! In what book, except the Scriptures, do we meet with such? Indeed, Epaphroditus had been dangerously ill; but God had graciously restored him for further usefulness: and in this he had shown mercy to the apostle also; to whom it would have been an additional sorrow, if so excellent a person had lost his life by ministering to him in his bonds. It does not appear that any miracle was wrought in this case; and we may thence infer that the gift of miracles could only be exercised on particular occasions, of which those endued with them had some previous intimation. This is clearly intimated; and it shows that the apostle was as ready to own his want of power, when truth required it, as to speak of his miracles when needful. On account therefore of the late sickness of Epaphroditus, the apostle had been the more careful to send him back, that the joy of the Philippians might be increased by seeing their beloved minister in health again; for the very thought of that joy would alleviate his sorrows, though at a distance from them; and though by the loss of Epaphroditus' assistance and company. He would, therefore, have them to receive him, for the Lord's sake, with all expressions of thankful joy; and to esteem and highly honour such affectionate laborious ministers: for indeed the sickness of Epaphroditus had been the effect of his excess of diligence in the work of Christ; as he had not even regarded his life, that, in the place of the absent Philippians, he might render every possible service to the apostle, both in his personal concerns, and in those relating to the propagation of the Gospel. As Philippi lay at a great distance from Rome, Epaphroditus must have continued with the apostle a long time; or the report of his sickness at Rome could not have reached Philippi, and that of their sorrow have reached Rome, before Epaphroditus left that city, and consequently the epistle must have been written towards the close of the apostle's two years imprisonment. Messenger. (25.) The original is apostle. The marginal references, distinguished by Gr. will show the reader the different ways in which that word is used by the sacred writers; and impartiality requires me to observe, that it does not appear, in any one instance, to be used for bishop, in the general acceptation of the word.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

All our consolations, hopes, and experience, in the fellowship of the Spirit, and the bowels and mercies of God our Saviour, as well as all our regard to our own peace, should engage us to be of one mind with our brethren, and so to fulfil the joy of all wise ministers and Christians. Nothing so honours Christ, defeats the machinations of his enemies, or fills the soul with consolation, as this holy love: but envy, contention, and ambition, not only disturb the peace of the Church, but torture the soul that entertains them. Neither inward nor outward peace can be enjoyed, except in proportion as "in lowliness of mind "we esteem others better than ourselves, and look at the "things of others as well as at our own." These are hard lessons to the proud and carnal heart of man. Many have learned the doctrines of the Gospel very accurately, who have not "thus learned Christ." We cannot study this subject successfully, except by continually looking unto Jesus; but whilst faith penetrates the veil of sensible objects, and contemplates the Saviour "in the form of "God, and thinking it no robbery to be equal with God;" yet "making himself of no reputation," assuming the form of a servant and the nature of man; appearing as an infant in the stable, as a poor carpenter at Nazareth, as an indigent and despised preacher in Galilee and Judea; as obedient to the law during his life, and as an insulted criminal at his death upon the cross; when these things are contemplated, and the height of his essential glory is contrasted with the depth of his voluntary abasement, and with the motives and effects of this stupendous transaction, we see such obligations and encouragements to self-denying love, as the whole universe besides can never supply; and " beholding, as in a glass, this glory of our Lord, we " are gradually changed into his image." And whilst we contemplate his subsequent exaltation, and the name given to this lowly Sufferer above every name, we learn to abase ourselves, that we may be exalted, to serve others in order to our own best interest, and to labour and suffer reproach, that we may ensure glory, honour, and immortality. But, as every knee must bow to Christ, as every tongue must confess him to be " Lord, to the glory of God the Father," let us examine whether we do indeed thus reverence, love, obey, and worship, the incarnate Son of God, or whether we are yet among those enemies, who must be bruised under his feet shortly.

CHAP. III.

The apostle exhorts to joy in the Lord; and gives cautions against false teachers, 1, 2: shows that Christians are the true circumcision, 3; and that he had better grounds of carnal confidence than most had, who trusted in the law, 4—6; but that he counted this, and all other things, as loss and dung, compared to the knowledge of Christ, and the righteousness of God by faith in him, 7—9; desiring also to know the power of his resurrection, and to be conformed to him, even in suffering and death; if so be he might attain to the resurrection of the just, 10, 11. He owns, that he was not yet perfected; but that he anxiously and earnestly sought this prize of his calling, 12—14. He exhorts to an imitation of his example, 15—17; as many professing Christianity, walked after the flesh, in the way of destruction, 18, 19; with whom he contrasts true christians, their heavenly conversation, and their expectation of Christ, to raise their vile body, like to his glorified body, 20, 21.

◆

Even those professed Christians, of whom we have the most favourable opinion, should be exhorted not only to be obedient, as in the presence of their pastors, but to increase in circumspection, when removed from under their faithful care. Thus ought we all to " work out our own " salvation" with jealous fear and humble caution; waiting for the full assurance of hope, and the renewal of our souls to holiness, in the way of simple dependence, diligent obedience, and serious attendance on the ordinances of God; thanking him for working in us the willing mind, and calling upon him for grace to perform the duties incumbent on us. Surely, some zealous advocates for evangelical truths have never read this chapter, for they can do nothing " without murmurings and disputings!" These are their element; these are the unhallowed weapons of their warfare. How can they be " blameless and harmless," on this plan, when envy and strife are inseparable from " confusion and every evil work?" And how can they think themselves the children of God, who in so many features bear the express image of Satan? But let us pray to be made peaceable, humble, unambitious, and inoffensive, both in the Church and in the community, that " by well " doing we may put to silence" the calumnies of ungodly men; and that we may be without rebuke in the midst of this our nation; which, alas! is proved to be crooked and perverse, by the prevalence of infidelity, impiety, and every kind of immorality, under a Christian profession, and abundant means of religious instruction. Let us then endeavour to shine among our neighbours as lights in the world, and to hold forth the word of life in our families and circle, by an open profession of evangelical truth, connected with a holy conversation. Then the ministers who have preached the Gospel will anticipate their rejoicings in the day of Christ, assured that it will then appear that " they did not run nor labour in vain," and hoping that far more extensive and permanent good was done than they lived to witness. In such a prospect, a zealous servant of Christ would be animated to a readiness for death in his Master's cause; whilst the exultation of faith and grace would conquer nature's reluctance to suffering; and certainly they, who have been thus offered upon the sacrifice of their brethren's faith, are to be considered as objects of peculiar congratulation, for they have almost universally died rejoicing, and triumphant.

V. 19—30.

Alas! in the best times how few are like-minded with the apostle, and naturally care for the state of the Church and of their fellow-christians! For while numbers evidently and wholly seek their own interest, reputation, ease, or indulgence, " and not the things of Jesus Christ," we are all too attentive to personal concerns, and sometimes allow them to interfere with our usefulness. So that a man who is ready to engage even in a service of great importance, where no emolument or credit can be expected, and in which losses, hardships, perils, sufferings, must be encountered, is deemed a prodigy, and rather an object of astonishment than of imitation. But let us seek deliverance from this mean regard to our own accommodation, by increasing zeal for the glory of God and love to the souls of men; that they who best know the proof of us may perceive, that we should have been ready to have served with Paul in all his self-denying labours, like dutiful sons with an honoured father. Thus young ministers should attach themselves to the most faithful, zealous, and useful of their seniors: to learn, as it were, the spiritual warfare under such veteran and experienced soldiers; and thus aged ministers should communicate their views to their younger brethren, and endeavour also to instil those principles of activity, by which they have been excited to self-denying, disinterested diligence in the work of the Lord; that they may be able to introduce them into useful services, as their companions in labour, and approved fellow-soldiers. What an ingenuous spirit doth the Gospel inspire! The most eminent ministers, who most simply trust the Lord Jesus for every thing, will yet frankly acknowledge their obligations for temporal assistance to those who owe their salvation to their labours of love. The affectionate pastor will be more full of heaviness for the grief of his people on his account, than for his own pain and sickness; and he will long after them, and to renew his labours among them, as a tender mother doth after her beloved infant. The Lord often afflicts such men, to manifest the excellency of their disposition; but he will have mercy upon them, and not let them have sorrow upon sorrow; and they will readily put themselves to inconveniences to remove the grief, or increase the comfort, of their brethren; rejoicing, though at a distance, in the thoughts of their joy, as an alleviation of their own sorrow. Such ministers as thus spend their strength, and disregard even life and health in his cause, and to supply the lack of service of those who are incapable of performing it, should be peculiarly honoured by the Church, and by every Christian; yet none should, without necessity, be kept from the people of their peculiar charge.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—7. The apostle deemed it needful to close the preceding practical exhortations by calling on the Philippians to rejoice in the Lord Jesus, and in their relation to him as their Glory and Salvation. This he had often inculcated by various methods, and it was not difficult for him to repeat the same instruction; but it was safe for them, and suited to their afflicted circumstances. Some think he meant that it was easy for him, but safe for them, to write the same things to them which he had done to other Churches. He also warned them to "beware of dogs." The Jews contemptuously called the Gentiles dogs; but the bigoted selfish Judaizing teachers are supposed to be here intended by that emblem, as they could fawn on those that favoured them, yet were greedy, snarling, and ready to bite or devour such as opposed them. Perhaps apostates from Christianity are meant. (Marg. Ref. Note, Is. lvi. 9—12.) The evil workers may also include those teachers and professors who abused the doctrines of grace, and indulged themselves in sin as a part of their Christian liberty. The Philippians, however, were especially cautioned to "beware of the concision," or the cutting off: the Judaizers laid much stress on cutting off the foreskin, though they did not mortify the deeds of the body; they wanted to cut off the Gentiles from the Church, but they cut off themselves and others from salvation by their dependence on the works of the law. The honourable title of the circumcision did not therefore belong to them. That ancient rite was no longer of any value; Christians were the true circumcision, the covenant-people of God, the spiritual seed of Abraham; "the "righteousness of faith" was sealed to them by the circumcision of the heart, of which baptism was the outward sign. They worshipped God, not so much according to external forms as spiritually, and under the teaching of the Holy Spirit, (Note, John iv. 23, 24;) and they rejoiced and gloried in Jesus Christ, the Subject of all the prophecies, and the Substance of all the shadows of the old dispensation. The apostle did not thus put himself on a level with the Gentile converts, because he had nothing of a carnal or external nature to depend on; for if any man supposed himself to have distinctions of this kind to glory in, he could evince that he had more. He had been circumcised on the eighth day, according to the law and custom; he could trace back his genealogy to Israel and Abraham; he was of the tribe of Benjamin, which was descended from Rachel, the wife of Jacob's choice; and which never apostatized from the worship of God at the temple, as most of the other tribes had done. Both his parents were Hebrews; so that he was neither born nor educated a Hellenist Jew, who might be supposed less exact in the law. As a Pharisee, he had been peculiarly strict, both in the Mosaic ceremonies and the traditions of the elders; his persecution of the Church proved his zeal for that kind of religion; and his whole conduct, was externally so conformable to the letter of the law, that in respect of that kind of righteousness, no one could lay any thing to his charge. But all those things, which he once deemed most advantageous to him, and conducive to his acceptance with God, as well as to his reputation and preferment, he at length learned to account loss for Christ; being assured, that if he depended on them, or cleaved to them, they would prevent his salvation by Christ. He had therefore willingly renounced them all, as the merchant, in a storm, casts overboard his most valuable property, lest it should occasion the loss of his life. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8—11. 'The present time is to be noted; so that 'the apostle, as to what relates to justification before God, 'excludes all works; those which follow, as well as those 'which precede, faith.' (Beza.) The apostle not only had judged, at his first conversion, that his legal righteousness, and his worldly prospects, were loss to him, compared with Christ; but after many years spent in successfully preaching the Gospel with apostolical authority, miraculous gifts, immense labour, multiplied sufferings, and most exemplary holiness, he decidedly deemed all these things to be loss, in comparison of the most excellent knowledge of Christ by faith, in the glory of his Person and redemption. For his sake, whom he rejoiced to call his Lord, he had suffered the loss of his worldly friends, prospects, interests; and his strength of mind, his superior talents, his learning, and his connexion with the great, seemed to promise great prosperity. But he had renounced all; even his country and liberty; and he continually expected that he should be called to lay down his life in this cause; yet he accounted all these likewise to be most worthless in comparison of Christ, as the ground of his hope of acceptance with God, and of eternal salvation. He therefore gladly parted with them, in order to win "the Pearl of great price," which alone could make him rich, honourable, and happy for ever. For his great desire was "to be found in Christ," in the hour of death, and at the day of judgment; as Noah was in the ark, when the deluge swept away an unbelieving world: and to stand before God, not having, as his plea or title to life, "his own righteousness," which, having reference to the law, as its measure, could only condemn him; but "that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteous-"ness which is of God by faith;" even that righteousness, which God bestows on and imputes to the believing sinner; namely, the perfect obedience unto death of his incarnate Son, which alone can answer the demands of the law, and render a transgressor's salvation consistent with the perfect justice of God. (Notes, Rom. iii. iv. v. 2 Cor. v. 21.) All things else the apostle deemed worthless, compared with this knowledge of Christ, and that joyful, transforming view of his glory, and experience of his grace, which resulted from saving faith: that he might know more of the power of his resurrection, by the new creation of his soul to holiness; that he might have fellowship with him in his sufferings, both by the mortification of his sinful nature, and by enduring patiently the enmity of the world for his sake: "Being made con-"formable to his death;" both by dying to sin that he might live to God, and by laying down his life when called to it in the service of his beloved Saviour: and that so, by any means, at any rate, by making any sacrifice, or bearing any afflictions, he might attain to that perfect felicity to which the saints will be admitted at the resurrection, and of which their preceding joys are an anticipation. The apostle did not mean that he doubted of this happy event of his labours, (i. 21:) but he showed what that great object was which he pursued, and for which he renounced all other hopes and prospects, and endured such complicated trials; and he instructed others in the way of possessing an assured hope. It is evident, that the apostle speaks, not of the resurrection in general, for this will be both "of the just and of the unjust," but of "the "resurrection to eternal life," in that glorious view of it which is afterwards given. (Note, 20, 21.) When the sinner believes in Christ, he is immediately "justified by "faith, and has peace with God:" yet he, "through the "Spirit, waits for the hope of righteousness by faith;" for at the day of judgment, when living faith will be distinguished by its fruits from dead faith, the sentence of justification will not only be confirmed, but proclaimed to the whole assembled world.

V. 12—14. The apostle did not mention his simple dependence and earnestness of soul, as a proof that he had attained the prize, or was already perfected in his Saviour's image. On the contrary, he continued still pursuing, and aiming, by further labours, and progress in holiness, to finish his course and obtain the prize, for which he had been graciously arrested by the Lord Jesus, at the time when he was a malignant persecutor. He disregarded all past attainments and services; as the racer, in the Isthmian games, seemed to forget the ground over which he had run, and the competitors whom he had left behind; and he reached forth to further labours, and increased conformity to Christ, without loitering or weariness; as the racer exerted all his vigour and agility to outstrip those before him, and to pass over the remainder of his course. One thing engaged his attention, to the exclusion of all interfering considerations: thus he pressed forward to the mark with unremitting speed, that he might receive the prize of heavenly glory, which God had called on him, by Jesus Christ, to aspire after; even as the racer urged his course to the goal, keeping the victor's crown full in view, and animated by the acclamations of those, who excited him so to run that he might obtain. (Note, 1 Cor. ix. 24—27.)—The word rendered "were perfect," (12,) is different from that translated perfect in the fifteenth verse. It is the preterite passive of the verb, which is often translated accomplish or accomplished; and it is the same word which St. John uses concerning our Saviour, and which is rendered, "It is finished;" except that here it is in the first person singular, and there in the third. Whereas the word in the next verse is an adjective, derived indeed from the verb, but often used in a rather different meaning.

V. 15, 16. The apostle here exhorted all those that were perfect to be like-minded with him in these things, counting all but loss for Christ, deeming present attainments inconsiderable, and pressing forward to the mark. The very exhortation, (Note, 12—14.) implies that the temper and conduct, before described, form the Christian's highest perfection in this world. The word here used may signify the sound character of the established believer: the man who is matured in judgment and experience, and hath made most progress in Christianity. It is used in the Greek authors, for men of full age, (about thirty,) as distinguished from boys and young men; and the apostle conveys a similar idea by it in other passages, (1 Cor. ii. 6. xiv. 20. Eph. iv. 13. Heb. v. 14. Gr.) which seems to be the meaning of it in this place. In this way the Philippians would best wait for further instruction; and if any of them were otherwise minded than their brethren, or than the apostle, and under any mistake or misapprehension, in thus avoiding disputation, and diligently practising what they knew, from evangelical principles, they might hope that God would make known to them those things, of which they still remained ignorant: and their stronger brethren should bear with their prejudices, till they were in this manner obviated. Nevertheless, they all ought to be careful, not to decline from that measure of faith, diligence, constancy, and holiness, to which they had attained: but that, by walking according to the same rule of divine truth, and minding the same means of improvement, in which they had hitherto proceeded, they might keep the ground that they had gained, and make further progress; not growing slack in one part of their duty by zeal in another!

V. 17—19. With full confidence that he acted with propriety, the apostle called on his children at Philippi to imitate him; and to observe and copy such Christians as followed his example, and that of Timothy and Silas, in these respects: for alas! many walked in a very different manner. He had often spoken to them against their contagious principles and examples; and he now mentioned them, not with acrimony of resentment, but with tears of compassion for their souls, and of grief for the dishonour which they brought upon the Gospel. For in fact, they were the most dangerous enemies to the cross of Christ. They did not enter into, nay, they hated, the holy import of that instructive transaction, which was the grand display of the divine holiness, of the excellency of the law, and of the evil of sin; and their licentious lives more disgraced the doctrine of the cross, than all the obloquy and opposition of avowed enemies. The end of their vain profession, if persisted in, would certainly be final perdition; as "their god was their belly," the indulgence of their appetites was the end which they proposed to themselves, and the chief satisfaction which they sought: to this base end they sacrificed the most important interests, and from it they expected their happiness, instead of seeking it from the Lord. At the same time, 20 For [t] our conversation is in [u] heaven; [x] from whence also [y] we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ; they gloried in their licentious doctrines, practices, and success in making proselytes, and corrupting others; of which they ought to have been ashamed, and which would certainly terminate in their deep disgrace. For they were carnally minded, and, not savouring heavenly things, they regarded only their worldly pleasures and interests. Some expositors explain this almost exclusively of the Judaizing teachers and their followers, and some suppose the Gnostics to be especially meant; and doubtless many of each of these were of this stamp. Yet there were others who perverted the Gospel; and the apostle's words point out at least equally licentious Antinomian professors, whether Jews or Gentiles; of which we cannot doubt but many sprang up in every part of the church. Nor is it prudent to represent all the danger to lie on one side, when the opposite extreme is equally fatal.

V. 20, 21. In opposition to the base and grovelling characters before described, the apostle here showed that true Christians were citizens of heaven, where their hearts and treasures were lodged, and whence their hopes and comforts were derived: so that their judgment, affections, and conduct, would be of a heavenly nature. Thence also all true believers expected the coming of Christ to be their judge, and were continually preparing to meet him. Instead of idolizing animal gratifications, they deemed the body itself at present to be vile, and in a humiliating condition; being the seat of ensnaring appetites, the instrument of sins, the encumbrance of the soul in duty, liable to manifold loathsome diseases, and condemned to return to corruption and dust. But they expected that Christ, at his second coming, would change their bodies, fashioning them into a complete conformity to his glorified body, rendering them incorruptible and spiritual, and thus preparing them to participate and improve the holy felicity of the immortal soul to all eternity. This the Saviour would effect by his omnipotent operation, according to that divine power, by which he is able to subdue all things to himself, and so give them final deliverance from death, their last enemy. The contrast between "the body of our humiliation," and "the body of his glory," into which Jesus will change our bodies, is remarkable. There seems to be a reference to the transfiguration. If omnipotence is an incommunicable divine perfection, the apostle's language doubtless attests his Deity in the most emphatical language.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

◆

We should be zealous of good works, but we must rejoice in the Lord Jesus alone. Repetitions on such important subjects, though easy to the teacher, are safe to the hearers, and must not be deemed superfluous; being often more useful than the most original, ingenious, and learned disquisitions. We cannot too earnestly guard men against those who either oppose or abuse the doctrine of free salvation. Many of them are greedy of their own interest, fierce against their opposers, and ready to rend in pieces the church, in order to propagate their own peculiar notions or observances. The true Christian will be aware of them; he "worships God in the Spirit, glories in Christ "Jesus," has the circumcision of the heart, and confides in nothing of which unregenerate men are capable. But how far short do many, who have confidence in the flesh, come of the attainments of Saul the persecutor! Their birth of Christian parents, early baptism, and form of godliness, can scarcely be imagined superior to his distinctions of a similar nature: but where is their strictness, their zeal, their morality, and their blameless conduct? Yet they trust in their poor scanty worthless forms and duties, and deem them too valuable to be exchanged for Christ and his salvation! But, if they ever "come to them-"selves," and become acquainted with God, his law, and their own characters, they will count all their gain to be "loss for Christ:" and if, in consequence of their conversion, they should lose all outward things, and endure all kinds of persecutions in the Lord's service; if they should labour more abundantly, and walk more holily than their brethren; they will still count even all these things but loss and "dung, for the excellency of the knowledge of "Christ:" they will renounce all dependence on their best services, and esteem all worldly objects worthless, compared with the hope of winning Christ, and being found in him. They will deprecate, as sure destruction, having their eternal state in any measure decided according to their own righteousness: they will desire above all things to have the gift of righteousness by the faith of Christ. They will see that no additions need be made to his unsearchable riches, no security added to his sure refuge, no appendages to his robe of righteousness. Thus they will account themselves rich, safe, and happy, in proportion to their assurance of being "found in Christ," and "made the right-"eousness of God in him;" but, in seeking for this assurance, as well as in order to glorify so bounteous a Friend, they will also earnestly desire and aim at a more transforming knowledge of Christ, a deeper experience of the power of his resurrection, and a nearer conformity to him in his sufferings and death, by dying to sin, and crucifying the flesh, with its affections and lusts. And, at the same time, the love of Christ will constrain them, if called to it, to suffer, yea, to die with him, that they may be also glorified together.

V. 12—21.

◆

Thousands and ten thousands have testified, that the above is the judgment and experience of true Christians: nor can any measure of personal holiness, or self-denying labours, satisfy the man, who "counts all but loss that he "may win Christ," and be justified by faith in him alone. He still "counts not himself to have attained;" he is continually humbled for his manifold defects and defile-

CHAP. IV.

The apostle affectionately exhorts and encourages the Philippians to steadfastness in the faith, concord among themselves, and joy in the Lord, 1—4; and to moderation, confidence in God, constant prayer and thanksgiving, and universal good behaviour, 5—9. He declares his joy in the Lord, on account of their renewed care of him, in sending by Epaphroditus a supply for his wants, 10; for, though he had learned, and was able, through Christ strengthening him, to be content in any station; they had done well in communicating with him in his affliction, 11—14. Indeed, they alone had formerly thus communicated with him: and he rejoiced that they were thus fruitful; as it would redound to their own profit; being a spiritual sacrifice peculiarly acceptable to God through Christ, who would abundantly supply all their wants, 15—19. To him he ascribes eternal glory, 20; and concludes with salutations and benedictions, 21—23.

[a] THEREFORE, my brethren, dearly beloved [b] and longed for, [c] my joy and crown, [d] so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved.

ments; he still follows after, in hope of attaining to that prize for which he was apprehended, when a careless sinner, a wretched sensualist, or a proud formalist, by the Saviour's preventing grace. In his Christian course "he "forgets the things which are behind, and reaches forth "to those that are before;" and "presses forward to the "mark, for the prize of his high calling in Christ Jesus." In these respects there are indeed vast disparities among real Christians; but all know something of these things. They who are most perfected in the life of faith and grace, need exhortations to be thus minded: they who are newly set out should be called on to emulate such honourable examples: and while they judge and act in this manner, as to these grand concerns, the Lord will guide them into the further knowledge of his truth and will. For satisfactory views of divine things are far better acquired, by peaceable meditation and diligent obedience, than by noisy disputations. We should, however, be very careful not to grow remiss and languid, in those things to which we have already attained; but still continue to "walk by "the same rule, and mind the same things," that we may make a perpetual progress in the divine life, and secure, as it were, every post, of which we have got possession. Let us then study to walk after the example of apostles and evangelists, that our conduct may be meet for others to copy with advantage: for, alas! in every age there are professors of the Gospel, of whom the humble zealous Christian can scarcely think or speak without sorrow and weeping. Of these, ministers must tell their flocks in tender love; seeing "their end is destruction;" sensual indulgence is their filthy deity; they glory in their shameful abuse of the Gospel; and mind earthly things under a religious profession. But let us, as citizens of heaven, have our conversation of a contrary nature: may we continually prepare for the coming of our Judge, "that we may be found of him in peace, without spot, "and blameless:" may we expect confidently to have our vile bodies changed by his almighty power into the fashion of his glorified body: and, in this prospect, may we apply to him daily to new-create our souls unto holiness; to deliver us from our enemies, to bruise Satan under our feet, and to employ both our bodies and souls as instruments of righteousness, in his service on earth, till he shall come to receive us to his heavenly kingdom!

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. This verse evidently relates to the subject with which the former chapter concluded. Seeing the Philippians had such hopes and so powerful a Friend, let them stand fast in faith and obedience, amidst all enemies and temptations; as they had hitherto done, and as had been recommended to them. The verse is principally remarkable for the variety of expressions, in which the apostle poured out the affection of his heart towards his brethren, or rather children, at Philippi. They were indeed dearly beloved; with them he longed to commune; and he earnestly desired to be still more useful to them. He counted them "his joy and crown," amidst all his sorrow and disgrace; and he expected that they would be so in the day of Christ.

V. 2, 3. It is probable that Euodias and Syntyche were women of note at Philippi, who on some account had disagreed; this both impeded their usefulness, and tended to cause divisions in the church. The apostle therefore entreated them to accommodate their differences, by mutual concessions and forgiveness; that so they might be of one mind in Christ, for his sake, and in seeking the peace and welfare of his church. The "true-"yoke-fellow," or genuine associate in the work of Christ, whom the apostle addressed without naming, was doubtless well known at Philippi; though our conjectures respecting him must be precarious. The word is masculine in the original, and some think that the person intended was husband to one of the women above-mentioned; others that he was some eminent minister at Philippi. The apostle, however, entreated him to use his influence in bringing those women to a cordial agreement, and in helping them to accomplish all their good designs. for the honour of Christ, and the promulgation of the Gospel: for they had formerly laboured, by their private endeavours, to promote the success of his public ministry; as Clement also had done, and several others, whom he acknowledged as his fellow-labourers; and whose zeal and love emboldened him to say, that their names were enrolled in the book of life, among the elect of God and the heirs of heaven. (Marg. Ref.) It is not certain that this was Clemens Romanus, an epistle of whose writing is yet extant: but it is generally supposed that the apostle meant him.

V. 4. The apostle again exhorted the Philippians to "rejoice in the Lord alway:" even in the midst of persecutions, afflictions, and temptations; though they should be poor, bereaved, sick, imprisoned, or in danger of death: yea, notwithstanding their manifold sins, and their present lamented imperfections and defilements, the deplorable evils which they must witness among professed Christians, and the wretched state of the world around them. For the favour, mercy, salvation, protection, and consolation of their all-sufficient and almighty Lord; the honour of their relation to him, the felicity of communion with him, and the eternal glory which he had purchased for them, comprised a joy which might more than counterbalance all the causes of their sorrow, and which would satisfy and sanctify their hearts, and fortify them for self-denial, suffering, and death. Nor were they to consider this exhortation as given, without due consideration of their inward and outward impediments: lest they should suppose this to be the case, he would again call upon them to rejoice; for he knew, that if they lived up to their privileges, they could never want cause for joy, and would generally be enabled to rejoice.

V. 5—7. In connexion with the holy joy above inculcated, and in order to it, the apostle exhorted his beloved brethren to manifest an indifference concerning those worldly possessions, distinctions, and enjoyments, about which men in general contend and quarrel: that so the meekness of their disposition might be known to all men, even to their enemies; who would perceive how moderate they were, as to the acquisition and use of outward things; and how composedly they suffered the loss or want of them, or any of those hardships, to which the injustice of their persecutors exposed them. This they should aim at, under a realizing assurance that the Lord was at hand: the present life, with all its trials or enjoyments, was speedily vanishing; the Lord would soon come to receive the souls of his people to glory, and to terminate the prosperity of his enemies; nay, the day of final retribution would speedily arrive, with complete redemption to believers, and perdition to ungodly men. Whatever then was taken from them, or wanting to them; whatever discouraged or distressed them, in their own concerns or those of their brethren, they ought to watch against unbelieving anxiety and an useless solicitude about events: and let them in every case, by prayer and supplication for themselves and others, make their requests known unto God; pouring out their hearts before him, and joining their fervent prayers with thanksgivings for mercies already received. In thus seeking to God, under a consciousness of their indigence, dependence, and unworthiness, and in believing reliance on his mercy, power, truth, and grace; they would find, that the peace which he alone could bestow, consisting of an inward thankful admiring sense of his forgiving love, an acquiescence in his will, a confidence in his help, and a serene composure of soul, would be vouchsafed to them. This peace indeed could not be understood by those who did not experience it, nor could any words give them an adequate idea of it; nay, even true believers could not fully explain its nature and excellency; but they would find their affections, and all the powers of their souls, possessed and garrisoned by it, to the exclusion of anxious cares and harassing temptations, through the merits of Christ, the supply of his Spirit, and the exercise of faith in him. The word rendered "moderation," or the substantive of nearly the same import, is translated clemency, (Acts xxiv. 4;) gentleness, (2 Cor. x. 1;) patient, (1 Tim. iii. 3;) and gentle, (Tit. iii. 2. Jam. iii. 17. 1 Pet. ii. 18.) 'It means, 'meekness under provocation, readiness to forgive injuries, equity in the management of business, candour in 'judging characters and actions, sweetness of disposition, 'and the entire government of the passions.' (Macknight.) 'Equity; a mind moderate as to the things of this life, 'and by no means strictly exacting what is justly due.' (Beza.) "The Lord is at hand," (5;) or near. Some understand the clause of his being a present Help in trouble, &c. Others suppose that the apostle meant, that the Lord would speedily come to destroy Jerusalem, and deprive the Jews of that power and influence, by which they became the general instigators of persecution. This interpretation was probably adopted, lest it should be inferred that the apostle erroneously supposed the day of judgment to be near at hand; but it is by no means satisfactory. It is, however, the manner of the sacred writers, to consider all temporal things as short, and the "end of them as at hand," and "the Judge as at the "door:" and, seeing death is the same, in a great measure, to individuals, as judgment will be to the world at large; their language is in this respect highly suitable and proper. "With thanksgiving." (6.) 'Thus David, very often 'beginning with lamentations and tears, concludes with 'thanksgiving.' (Beza.) Keep, &c. (7.) The mind and heart are distinguished. The peace of God, and the happy experience of it, fortifies and garrisons the intellectual faculties, against the cavils, objections, and vain rea-sonings of infidels, skeptics, philosophers, and heretics; and the affections against the allurements and terrors of worldly objects.

V. 8, 9. The substance of the practical exhortations, which the apostle had further to give, might be comprised in few words. Whatsoever tempers, words, or actions, in any way expressed truth, candour, sincerity, or fidelity: whatsoever appeared grave, venerable, or respectable; whatsoever was just and upright, stamped with probity and integrity; whatsoever evinced purity, chastity, and temperance; whatsoever was amiable, or friendly; whatsoever was justly of good report, and approved as virtuous or commendable among men: let them continually think of such things, form a due estimate of the value of each, adopt such as were really good, and endeavour to manifest them in every part of their conduct. In short, let them practise what he had taught them, and what they had received as teachable scholars; what they had heard from him, and witnessed in his example: and then he could confidently assure them of the comforting and protecting presence of their reconciled God, (as the Author of inward and outward peace,) with their souls and in their assemblies.

V. 10—13. The apostle would not conclude the epistle, without a special acknowledgment of the kindness shown him by the Philippians. It had indeed "greatly "rejoiced him in the Lord," with reference to his providence, will, and glory, that, after a considerable time, their care of him had flourished again, as a tree shoots forth its buds in the spring. 'You have made your care 'of me to flourish again.' (Hammond.) This not only excited him to thank God, for putting it into their hearts to supply his urgent necessities; but it made him glad, as it evinced the prosperous state of their souls. Indeed, he then was satisfied, that they had all along been careful for him, and desired to help him; but they had wanted the opportunity or ability of doing it so soon as they had intended: yet perhaps his godly jealousy over them might make him fear, lest they were become disaffected or remiss. He did not speak this with respect to the want which he had suffered, as if that were an intolerable evil; for he had learned in the school of experience, under the tuition of Christ, to be content and well satisfied with the appointments of God, in whatever situation he was placed. He knew how to be abased by the deepest poverty, labouring hard for a mean subsistence, neglected and despised; without repining, or using any dishonourable means of obtaining relief: and he was able to abound, without deviating from the strictest rules of temperance and humility, and without growing reluctant to the most self-denying and afflictive labours. In every respect, and in all things, he was initiated into the mysterious life of faith, and communion with God, as the Source of consolation: so that he knew how to be full, and able to impart to others, without being betrayed into inexpedient indulgence, pride, or love of worldly things; or to be hungry, and destitute of bare necessaries for himself, without being discomposed or unfitted for his place and work. Thus he found, by experience, that he could do all things, in this respect, and in whatever was connected with his duty: not by his natural ability, nor yet by the grace which he had already received; but through the strength communicated to him from Christ, whose power rested upon him, and enabled him for every service and situation to which he called him. He seems to have learned these things, by a deep sense of his own unworthiness, and his obligations to the Lord; by continually contemplating the poverty, abasement, and sufferings of Christ; by a believing confidence in the wisdom, faithfulness, and love of God, who ordered all such matters in the best manner possible; by a lively hope of immortal felicity; and an ardent desire, by any labours or sufferings, to promote the cause of Christ in the world. It appears wonderful, that the apostle, in so affluent a city as Rome, where a flourishing church of Christ had been for a considerable time established, and even after his imprisonment for the Gospel had excited general attention, should want the necessaries or comforts of life. But the Gentiles, in general, were little in the habit of giving to the poor, or contributing to the support of the ministers of religion: and the apostle, like Elisha in respect of Naaman, would be extremely careful not to excite their prejudices, or interrupt the success of the Gospel, by his own concerns; so that, probably, it was not generally known that he was in want.

14 Notwithstanding [a] ye have well done, that [b] ye did communicate with my affliction.

15 Now, ye Philippians, know also, that [c] in the beginning of the gospel, when [d] I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me, as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only.

16 For even [e] in Thessalonica ye sent [f] once and again unto my necessity.

17 Not [g] because I desire a gift: but I desire [h] fruit that may abound [i] to your account.

18 But * I have all, and [k] abound: I am full, having received of [l] Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, [m] an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice [n] acceptable, well-pleasing to God.

19 But [o] my God shall [p] supply all your need, [q] according to his [r] riches in glory by Christ Jesus.

20 Now [s] unto God and our Father be glory for ever and ever. [t] Amen.

21 [u] Salute every [x] saint in Christ Jesus. [y] The brethren which are with me greet you.

22 All [z] the saints salute you, chiefly [a] they that are of Cesar's household.

23 The [b] grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

The Christians at Rome, as in other places, were, it may be supposed, chiefly of the lower orders; and they had already to provide for their own pastors, the poor, and the expenses of their religious worship. Yet, after all these considerations have been allowed their full weight, not only the disinterestedness of the apostle, but the inattention, to say no more, of the Christians, must excite our astonishment. Abased. (12.) 'He who is poor is 'despised by most men, how much soever he may be 'adorned with the excellent gifts of God.' (Beza.) (Note, Ec. ix. 13—18.)

V. 14—20. Though the apostle could well have endured his poverty without murmuring, yet he was not on that account, by any means, the less entitled to assistance; and the Philippians had done a good work in communicating with him in his affliction, by straitening themselves to relieve him. This renewed instance of their liberal affection made it proper for him to mention, what they indeed knew, that at the beginning of the Gospel being preached among them, when he was departing from Macedonia; no church, except that at Philippi, had maintained Christian fellowship with him, by giving him a supply for his urgent wants, and by his receiving it from them. Even when he was successfully preaching at Thessalonica, and labouring with his own hands for a maintenance, they had repeatedly sent him presents. This demanded his grateful remembrance; not because he desired a gift for its own sake, or coveted the property of his hearers; but because he desired to see them fruitful in those good works, which would conduce to their present comfort and future felicity: whereas, no doubt, it grieved him to see professed Christians tenacious of their worldly goods, and leaving their ministers to struggle with deep poverty. But, in every respect, he had all he could wish for; he was fully satisfied with their conduct and with his own circumstances, having received from Epaphroditus the supply which they had sent. This he knew to be far more acceptable to God than the most fragrant incense, being a spiritual sacrifice, well pleasing to him, as the genuine fruit of faith in the Lord Jesus, and love to him, (Eph. v. 2.) The apostle indeed could not make them the return which he wished; but his God and Father, "whose "he was, and whom he served," would surely supply all their wants of every kind, according to the riches of his all-sufficiency and bounty; especially by bringing them to his eternal glory through Christ Jesus. To him therefore, as the common Father of the whole family, he ascribed the glory of all that was done in them, for them, and by them; and of all his manifested perfections, and wonderful works, which he desired might be universally adored for ever and ever. Amen. Nothing could more fully show the peculiar confidence which the apostle had, concerning the Christians at Philippi, (as well as his fervent prayer for them,) than this conduct. Thessalonica was indeed a larger city than Philippi, but, probably, the converts to Christianity were poorer; and perhaps they had not been so fully proved, when he was driven from them, as the Philippians had been. (Note, 2 Cor. viii. 1—3.) As Thessalonica was the chief city of Macedonia, at which St. Paul continued some time, it has been supposed that the clause, "when I departed from Macedonia," relates to a supply sent to him, after he was gone into Achaia, distinct from what had been sent to him in Thessalonica.

V. 21, 22. The brethren, may here either mean the ministers at Rome, or such of the apostle's friends as were come from other parts to be with him. There were true saints even in Nero's household, who kept their places, and served Christ, in that most perilous and ensnaring situation! It is probable, that they were generally in inferior stations. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

◆

Affectionate ministers, like tender parents, can scarcely find words emphatical enough to express their love, and fervent desires after the felicity of those whom they regard as their present joy and their future crown. They greatly long after their steadfastness in the faith, and constant devotedness to God, amidst the temptations and allurements of the world: and their good conduct for a season makes them the more earnest with them, to acquit themselves in like manner for the future. They so love the blessed office of peace-makers, that they will even supplicate by name their own children, to be of one mind in the Lord: and they so much desire the success of every good work, that they use all their influence to excite every one to help all those who labour in any way to promote the Gospel, and thus give assurance that their names are written in the book of life. Believers have always ground of rejoicing in the Lord, though they are not always able to rejoice: the perfection of their duty, and the full enjoyment of their privilege, are precisely the same: their disconsolations arise from weakness of faith and grace, and they should be called upon to "rejoice in the Lord "alway," though they be not able to come up to the standard that they may aim high; for the nearer they come to it, the more will the Lord be glorified in and by them. Living upon these holy, satisfying, and substantial joys, we should make it appear that we are not of this world. Let the carnal and selfish grasp at, and contend about, the possessions and parade of a day; our moderation about temporal things, and our composure amidst injuries and losses, should be manifest to all men. The Lord is at hand; the hour of death, and the day of judgment, will speedily arrive. The transient joys and sorrows of the present scene are not worth our solicitude; all our temporal and eternal interests are in the Lord's hands; we should therefore be careful for nothing, except to know the state of our souls, and the path of duty.—In all our sorrows, fears, or wants, we should make our requests known unto God: for, though he knows them beforehand, he loves to hear them from us. Whatever our difficulties may be, we have always cause to unite grateful praises with our prayers and supplications; and in this way we shall find an inward satisfaction, and experience that peace of God which passeth all understanding; so that our hearts and minds will be preserved in serenity, whatever storms may rage around us. All our privileges and salvation originate wholly from the free mercy of God; yet the actual enjoyment of them is intimately connected with our holy conversation. Therefore, whatsoever things are true, respectable, just, pure, loving, lovely, or of good report; whatsoever is virtuous and commendable; whatsoever prophets, apostles, or martyrs, have exemplified; whatsoever excellency we have heard, and read of, or witnessed, in the conduct of the saints; nay, whatever things the world, on good grounds, regards and approves as virtuous; these we should continually think of, and diligently practise; and in this way we may hope for the presence and blessing of the God of peace and love.

V. 10—23.

Even they, who prosper in religion, have their winter, as well as their spring seasons: sometimes their zeal and love seem to languish, and then again at last they flourish more abundantly. Yet they often lack opportunity, when they perhaps are judged inattentive; and faithful ministers may sometimes suspect or mourn over them, when if they knew all, they might be rejoicing greatly in the Lord for them. We should, however, confide in God alone; for human friendship is precarious. It is a great and difficult attainment, to "learn in whatever state we "are, therewith to be content." Pride, unbelief, a vain hankering after something unpossessed, a fickle disrelish to present things, and the tedious repetition of the same actions and scenes which no longer give pleasure, render men naturally discontented in the most favourable circumstances; and their continual shiftings, from one thing to another, resemble the tossing to and fro of a man in a fever, who imputes his restlessness to his posture, rather than to his disease. It requires much humility, spirituality, faith, and resignation, to render us contented in our appointed situations. Probably, few Christians, who enjoy liberty and plenty, can sincerely and unreservedly adopt the language of Paul, the indigent prisoner of Jesus Christ. We ought, however, to study this important lesson; we should pray continually for patient submission and hope, when we are abased; for humility and a heavenly mind, when exalted; and to be initiated into the practical mystery of temperate, self-denying, liberal, lowly abundance; or that of cheerful, contented, and honourable indigence, even if called to suffer hunger and extreme want. We can indeed of ourselves do nothing; but we may do all things through Christ, who inwardly strengthens his people, in proportion as they simply depend upon him. He can teach and enable his ministers to live in poverty among the affluent, without grudging, envying, coveting, or repining; even when they have an equitable claim upon them for a portion of their abundance. Indeed, we should peculiarly aim at this, if we would be examples to the flock, and convince the wealthy that we "seek not theirs, "but them." Notwithstanding this, the people should be taught, that they do well in communicating to the wants of their faithful pastors, who are justly entitled to liberal assistance, in proportion as they are willing to endure all things, rather than hinder the Gospel of Christ. And they who distinguish themselves in such services, from pure motives, shall be "had in everlasting remembrance;" for their most secret good works shall be published at the last day, if not before. The affectionate servant of Christ will not "desire a gift;" nay, on some occasions, he will firmly refuse it, whatever his straits may be: yet he cannot but long to see his people fruitful in such things as will abound to their own account: and though he be willing to suffer want, yet he must grieve, when they neglect their bounden duty, and so bring their state into question, or prevent their own comfort. We should not be reluctant, on proper occasions, to acknowledge our obligations to those who have ministered to our necessities; and to commend their fruits of faith and love, as "an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-"pleasing unto God." What we cannot repay, we may trust that he will, according to his riches in Christ Jesus, supplying all the wants of those who thus straiten themselves, and bringing them to his heavenly kingdom, that glory may be to him, our God and Father, for evermore. Whether saints reside in palaces, cottages, or dungeons, communion should be maintained among them by mutual prayers, salutations, and kindnesses. The Lord will have some to honour him in every situation; and he can preserve them unhurt in their proper places, however perilous, by the power which protected the three young men in the fiery furnace; for the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ will be with all his people, wherever dispersed, or however distinguished, and prove eventually sufficient for them.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE
TO THE COLOSSIANS.

Colosse was a populous city of Phrygia, in Asia Minor, near to Laodicea and Hierapolis. It is not recorded, that St. Paul had been there; and the general testimony of antiquity favours the opinion, that Epaphras, or some other evangelist, sent by the apostle from Ephesus, founded the church at Colosse. This opinion, however, has of late been much controverted. It does not indeed appear to be a matter of much consequence to us; and I am not disposed to enter on so uninteresting a controversy: yet, I must give my decided opinion, that the evidence against the apostle's having been at Colosse, is far stronger, than any which has been adduced on the affirmative side of the question. There is a great similarity between this epistle, and that to the Ephesians; and it is generally supposed, that they were written about the same time, and sent by the same messenger, even Tychicus: though Onesimus, being a Colossian, who accompanied Tychicus, is not mentioned in the epistle to the Ephesians. It is probable, that the apostle had heard of some teachers; who, grafting heathen philosophy along with the tradition of the Pharisees, on the ritual law of Moses, had corrupted the Gospel by this heterogeneous mixture; and were attempting to draw aside the Colossians. He therefore particularly warned them against these deceivers, and against all who, either by superstitious observances, or philosophy, attempted to draw them aside from the simplicity of Christ; in whom alone, they were complete, and had every thing which they could possibly want or conceive of. These cautions and exhortations are introduced, and connected with the most exalted views of the personal and mediatorial dignity of Christ; and the fulness and freeness of his salvation, which many suppose to have been directed against some of those heretical sects, that sprang up at an early period in the church, the leaders of which sought to exalt themselves, by derogating from the glory of the divine Saviour. It appears, however, that the church at Colosse was, on the whole, in a very flourishing state: and accordingly the epistle abounds more in thanksgivings to God, commendations, and animating exhortations, than in reproofs and warnings.—Epaphras was, probably, when the apostle wrote, confined as a prisoner at Rome. (Philem. 23.)

CHAP. I.

The apostle salutes the saints at Colosse, 1, 2; thanks God for the good account which he had heard from Epaphras, of their faith and love, 3—8; shows how he prayed for their increasing knowledge, holiness, patience, joy, and gratitude for redeeming love, 9—14; declares in exalted terms the personal and mediatorial glory of Christ, 15—20; by whom they, who were once enemies, were now reconciled, and would be eternally saved, if they continued in the faith of the gospel, of which Paul was made a minister, 21—23; who rejoiced in all his labours and sufferings, for their sakes, as the apostle of the Gentiles, 24–29.

CHAPTER I.

PAUL, [a] an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the will of God, and [b] Timotheus our brother,

2 To [c] the saints and faithful brethren in Christ, which are at Colosse: [d] Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 We [e] give thanks to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, [f] praying always for you,

4 Since [g] we heard of your [h] faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints;

5 For [i] the hope which is [k] laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before in [l] the word of the truth of the gospel;

6 Which [m] is come unto you, as it is in all the world; [n] and bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you, since the day ye heard of it, and [o] knew the grace of God in truth:

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Rom. i. 1—7. 1 Cor. i. 1—3.) ‘Colosse was situated in Phrygia, not far from Hierapolis and Laodicea, in that part which borders on Lycia and Pamphylia.’ (Beza.) ‘I cannot think they are called holy and faithful brethren, on account of their adhering to the purity of the Christian faith, in opposition to those that urged the necessity of observing the Jewish law. This was indeed one instance of their fidelity; but I think it greatly impoverishes and debases the sense of such an extensive phrase, to reduce it within such narrow bounds. Many scores of criticisms of some modern commentators of reputation are liable to the same exception.’ (Doddridge.) The author quotes this passage, as exactly conveying his opinion on several learned expositions, both before and since the time of the pious Doddridge. They give you a bucket of water, and speak as if they had emptied the well.

V. 3—8. The apostle began the epistle, as usual, by assuring the Colossians, that he gave thanks "to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus," for his grace bestowed on them, and prayed for the perfection of that good work in them. This he and his friends had done, ever since they heard of their faith and love, (Eph. i. 15;) blessing God, who had called them from the delusive pursuit of earthly things, to hope for happiness in himself. The object of this hope was laid up in heaven, the place of perfect purity and joy, out of the reach of the vicissitudes of this lower world. It was treasured up for them, and no enemy could deprive them of it. They had heard of it, in the word of truth, even the glad tidings of salvation which had been sent to them. It was intended, that these should be published throughout the world: they had made a very rapid progress among the nations, (Marg. Ref.) and, having been attended by a divine power, they had brought forth fruit in every place, in the conversion of multitudes to the holy service and spiritual worship of God, by faith in Christ Jesus. The same blessed fruits had been produced in the hearts and lives of the Colossians since the time when they first had heard the Gospel, and had truly and experimentally believed it, and been really made partakers of Christ and his salvation. These things they had learned from Epaphras, whom the apostle owned as a dear fellow-servant in the work of Christ, and a faithful minister, appointed specially to labour for the good of the Colossians, as their stated pastor. Moreover, he had assured the apostle of their love to Christ, and to him for Christ's sake, which they exercised "in the Spirit," under his influences, and in a spiritual manner; and this made him so confident in respect of their interest in the heavenly hope before-mentioned. We give thanks, &c. (3.) ‘From this note, that the good Shepherd should not only feed his flock, but pray continually for them, and give thanks for the spiritual blessings conferred on them.’ "The God and the Father." "The God of Israel," ‘was the characteristic of the true God to the Jewish nation:—"God, who is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," is the characteristic of the same God to Christians, who worship him under that title, as being "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," and in him our Father: we being the sons of God through faith in him, and deriving all our blessings from the Father through him.’ "Love in the Spirit," (8.) ‘Wrought in you by that Spirit, whose fruit is love.’ (Whitby.)

V. 9—14. Since the time that the apostle had heard concerning the professed Christians at Colosse, that they evidently showed their faith in Christ, and faithfulness to him, (2.) he and his friends had not ceased to pray for them. He especially requested that they might be filled, or completely endued with, the knowledge of the will of God, both in respect of his method of saving sinners, and their duties to him and to all men, as his redeemed servants; that they might understand the import and spiritual extent of his commandments, and how to obey them in the several relations, situations, and offices, which they sustained in the church and in the community, and in the improvement of their different talents. That they might know how to apply general rules to their own particular cases, and so do the work of Christ assigned to each of them, in the best manner, from the purest motives, and with the happiest effect. Thus they would proceed "in all wisdom and spiritual understanding;" with sagacity and prudent discernment of seasons and opportunities; distinguishing between real excellency and all deceitful appearances; wisely attending to their duties in the most inoffensive and engaging manner, without affording their enemies any advantage, or losing opportunities of usefulness out of timidity, or failing of success through want of caution and discretion. He was desirous of this especially, that they might habitually behave in a manner worthy of that glorious and holy Lord, whose servants and worshippers they were; not dishonouring him or his cause by any inconsistency or impropriety of conduct, but acting as became persons so highly favoured and divinely instructed; and that their conduct might in all respects be well-pleasing to him; while fruitfulness in every kind of good work was connected with a still further increase in the knowledge of God, and of the glory and harmony of his perfections, and a happy experience of his consolations. (Note, Phil. i. 9—11.) The apostle and his helpers prayed also that the Colossians might be most abundantly strengthened in all the graces of the new nature, with an energy suited to their utmost need, according to the glorious power of God, by which he converted, upheld, and comforted believers, that so they might be enabled to bear all their tribulations and persecutions with patient submission, persevering constancy, meekness of long-suffering, and joy in the Lord; whilst, amidst all trials, they gave thanks to the Father of our Lord Jesus, whose special grace had made them meet to partake of the inheritance provided for the saints, in the world of perfect light, knowledge, holiness, and happiness; at a distance from all ignorance, error, sin, temptation, fear, and sorrow. As believers, they were even then called "to walk in the light;" and, compared with the condition of unconverted men, their situation might well be thus distinguished: yet, when the state of glory was spoken of, into which the spirits of their departed brethren had already entered, they were still in comparative darkness. They had, however, obtained a lot in that blessed inheritance; and their holy desires, spiritual affections, and capacity for delighting in the work and worship of God, especially their love to the Lord Jesus Christ, and his glorious salvation, constituted a meetness for that inheritance, and all its joys and employments, and a sure evidence that God intended to bring them to it. For, in order to effect this change in them, he had rescued them from the "power of darkness," the empire of Satan, the prince of darkness, whose blind and abject slaves they had formerly been; and he had translated them into the kingdom of righteousness, of liberty, of light, and comfort, which he had constituted under his dear Son, or the "Son "of his love;" (Marg. Ref.) by faith in whom they enjoyed this redemption, as the purchase of his atoning blood; by which forgiveness of sins, and all other spiritual blessings, were vouchsafed to them. (Notes, Acts xxvi. 17, 18. Eph. i. 7—11. 13. 15—18.) The apostle joined himself and the Jewish converts along with the Gentiles in these things; and doubtless all are the subjects of the prince of darkness, of whatever nominal religion they are, till inward conversion translates them into the kingdom of Christ. And to restrict the interpretation to the deliverance of the Gentile converts, and to the happy state of the Jewish converts, as "the saints in light," is totally to enervate the passage, which is highly animated, and to make it inconsistent with itself: for how could the apostle speak of himself as one of these benighted idolaters? The "glorious power," here spoken of, is sometimes ascribed to God, absolutely, sometimes to the Holy Spirit, and frequently to Christ. "For these Three are One." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15—17. Having mentioned Christ as the well beloved Son of God, the apostle here explained more fully the import of that expression. He declared him to be "the image of the invisible God." (Marg. Ref. Note, 18 And [g] he is the Head of the body, the church: who is [h] the Beginning, [i] the First-born from the dead; [k] that * in all things he might have the pre-eminence.

Heb. i. 1—4.) Being possessed of all divine perfections, as One with the Father, he appeared on earth, displaying those perfections, and performing all divine operations, through the medium of the human nature. Thus, he made the invisible God known to mankind, as his express Image: he represented the Father, and manifested his glory. In and through him, as God manifest in the flesh, sinners might know, approach, trust, and worship God with acceptance; which otherwise they could not have done. It seems evident that Christ is not called the Image of God, in respect of his divine nature, as many, especially the ancient expositors, supposed; and so, by their illustrations, weakened or perplexed the argument for his real Deity: for the divine essence is no more visible in the Person of the Son, than in that of the Father: and therefore the one cannot be the Image, or visible representation, of the other. But the Person of Christ, as God in human nature, is the visible, or sensible, discovery of the invisible God; and "he that hath seen him hath seen the Father."—The apostle further declared Christ to be "the First-born of the whole creation;" (for so the words may be literally rendered.) Christ is often called the First-begotten, or Only begotten, of the Father; and it hath been shown, that these expressions must be understood of the mysterious union in the sacred Trinity, and the relation of the second Person to the first in the divine subsistence: for the grand display of the love of God to the world consisted in "giving his own Son" to become man, in order to die for our sins, rather than in giving him when incarnate to death for us. The expression here used seems to be of the same import: he was qualified to be the Image of the invisible God to men, by reason of his original and essential glory. (Note, John. i. 14—18.) Existing, as the co-eternal Son of the Father before the creation of the world, he appeared as the First-begotten Son of God, to be the heir of all things when they were called into existence, as the First-born is the heir of the estate or kingdom. The reason or proof, adduced by the apostle, demonstrates, that he meant the words in some such sense; "for," says he, "by him all things were created." He then proceeds to mention all creatures in heaven and earth, and by the figurative terms of "thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers," clearly including the highest created dignity and exaltation, he evidently intended to declare that every creature of God, however distinguished, was created by Christ, as one in Deity and operation with the Father and the Holy Spirit. Nay, he added, that they were all "created for him," for the display of his glory, and to do him service, (Prov. xvi. 4:) that "he was before all things;" yea, that "all things by him consist," or are preserved in being and order; so that, without his sustaining power, they must fall into confusion or non-existence. (Marg. Ref.) It is perhaps impossible to use stronger language, to express creating and upholding Power, universal Sovereignty, and real Deity, than is here employed. To which the Socinians can only say, that it is all figurative, and means no more than the introduction of the Gospel-dispensation as a kind of new creation; than which nothing can be more absurd. Or they may say, that the apostle was mistaken! And to such obstinate infidelity we oppose the demonstrative evidences of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures. In fact, we find similar language in every epistle, and in almost every part of the New Testament.—It should also be observed, that however we may interpret the expression, "The First-born of every creature," no man can infer from it, that Christ is a sort of supra-angelic creature, (according to the inconsistent opinion of the Arians,) without expressly opposing St. Paul's inference from his own doctrine, or rather the argument by which he confirms it; in which he evidently shows, that he meant that Christ was before, above, and distinct from, all creatures; yea, the Author, Proprietor, and Support, of all ranks and orders of them in the universe.—First-born. (16.)—By using this word, (πρωτοτοκος,) and not First-created, (πρωτοκτιστος;) the apostle marks the distinction between the eternal Son of God, and the most exalted of those creatures which derived their existence from him.

V. 18—20. The same glorious Person, of whose original majesty such sublime language had been employed, was next declared to be the "Head of the body, the Church." This manifestly related to his mediatorial character, which he voluntarily assumed and sustained in human nature. He is also the Beginning, the Author and Source, of spiritual and eternal life to man, the Resurrection and the Life, both of his body and soul: and "the First-born from the dead;" the first who rose to die no more; the First-fruits of his people, who rose to inherit the mediatorial throne, as their Surety, and for their benefit. So that it was evidently intended, that in "all things he should have the pre-eminence," over all worlds, and in all respects; as to creation, providence, redemption, essential dignity, universal sovereignty, assumed and delegated authority, personal excellency, and the display of Omnipotence; as the Conqueror of "death, and of him that had the power of death;" both in the world and in the Church; above all creatures visible and invisible; during time and to eternity. For "it pleased," or seemed good, to the Father, "that all fulness should dwell in him:" that all the plentitude of divine power, authority, wisdom, knowledge, holiness, justice, truth, mercy, grace, even all "the fulness of God," should dwell in the Person of Christ, and be exercised and communicated through his human nature, by virtue of the union of the Deity and humanity in his mysterious Person; that from his fulness all those might receive, who became One with him by faith. Thus it "pleased all Fulness;" the original, infinite, inexhaustible Fulness of Being and perfection, or the Deity, to dwell in Christ, for the benefit of his Church; that, "having made peace," or laid the foundation of an honorable reconciliation of sinners to himself, "by the blood of his cross," and the satisfaction there made to divine justice, he might effectuate that reconciliation, both in respect of "things in heaven, and "things on earth." The spirits of just men in heaven owed their reconciliation to Christ's undertaking for them; and all on earth, whether Jews or Gentiles, who believed in Christ, were reconciled unto God through their union with him, and their interest in the atonement of his blood. Thus the whole became one Church and one body in him: and they all will at length be translated to heaven, there to continue for ever in a state of perfect reconciliation to God, and friendship with him and each other. This seems to be what is meant by "all things in heaven and "earth:" for though holy angels become one family through Christ with redeemed sinners, yet they cannot be said to be reconciled unto God, as they never were in a state of enmity against him. (Notes, &c. Rom. v. 9, 10. 2 Cor. v. 17—21. Eph. ii. 13—17.)—Some commentators would wholly confine the meaning to man's being reconciled to God and his service; others explain it wholly of God's being reconciled to his offending creatures; but why should not both be included? For the atonement of Christ procured for all believers both pardon of sin and new-creating grace, that they might walk with God in a state of mutual peace and reciprocal friendship and love.

V. 21—23. The Colossians, among others, were called to share these blessings. They had been alienated from God and his service, yea, "enemies to him in their "minds," which had been manifested by their wicked works; so that they had justly merited to be treated as enemies; yet, by his rich mercy in Christ Jesus, they were now brought into a state of reconciliation. This had been effected "in the body of his flesh," in the body which he assumed of our nature, that he might be capable of sufferings and death, as a Sacrifice to divine justice for the sins of men. In consequence of this, the Gospel had been preached to them, and they were enabled to believe it: thus they were freely justified, and brought to love and serve God, as at peace with him, by a mutual and cordial reconciliation: the intent of which was, that they should at length be presented before God so perfectly holy, as to be unblameable and unreproveable even in his sight; their sanctification being at length rendered as complete, as their justification had been when they believed. (Note, Eph. v. 25—27.) This would certainly be the case with every one, who continued in the profession and exercise of faith, like a building that is grounded and settled on a firm foundation, and so was not, by any carnal fear, delusion, or expectation, or by any temptation, moved away from the hope of eternal life, according to the truth of the Gospel, which they had heard. The Lord had commanded that it should be preached to every creature under heaven, and it had actually been published very widely among Jews and Gentiles, without distinction of nation, or previous character; and of this Gospel St. Paul had been made a minister and an apostle. He uses a general term, commonly employed on similar occasions, the import of which must be learned from other places. (Marg. Ref.)—This last verse may be rendered, "Since "ye continue, &c.;" implying a confidence of the sincerity of the Colossians, as evidenced by their steadfastness. But our translation is good sense and sound doctrine; for many promising professors are moved away from the hope of the Gospel, "having no root in themselves;" fear of coming short is one grand means of the true believer's perseverance; and it was frequently the apostle's manner, by such intimations, to caution his readers to beware of deceiving themselves.—Mind, &c. (21.) This word denotes the higher faculties of the soul, the intellectual or reasoning powers; yet in these, man is an enemy to God; so vain is the notion, that the opposition of reason to the sensual appetites is the conflict between flesh and spirit, of which the apostle elsewhere discourses.

V. 24. The sufferings of the apostle came upon him, chiefly, by preaching to the Gentiles; but the blessed effects of his ministry among them, and that of those who concurred with him in it, caused him to rejoice in all that he endured for their sakes: for he thus "filled up that which "was behind of the sufferings of Christ." The sufferings of Christ perfectly sufficed for the redemption of his body the Church; nor could those of the apostle in any measure make up the deficiency, if there had been any. But the atonement of Christ must be applied; that application is made by faith; faith comes by hearing; hearing by preaching; and preaching was then inseparable from suffering; so that the apostle's sufferings in his flesh, for the benefit of the Church, were necessary in their place, and could not be dispensed with. By them he filled up what was behind of the afflictions of Christ; as the sufferings of martyrs, confessors, and believers in general, form one aggregate of pain and distress, with those of the Head of the Church, the whole of which is conducive and necessary, in different ways, to the complete salvation of the whole body. But the apostle might with the more propriety say this, as he suffered in the same cause, from the same persons, in the same meek and patient manner, and from the same spirit of zeal and love, with his divine Master; so that his afflictions resembled Christ's in every thing, except that Christ's alone were expiatory. Christ is also represented as sympathizing in the sufferings of his disciples; and many think the apostle had in view the words with which the Lord addressed him, in the way to Damascus; "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou "me?" In this sense the sufferings of every part of the Lord's mystical body are his sufferings; yet the former sense appears more suitable to the tenour of the passage.

V. 25—27. St. Paul had been made a minister of the Gospel, according to the sovereign appointment of God in his gracious dealings with him, that he might fulfil the prophecies of the Scripture, in preaching to the Gentiles, and bringing them into the Church; thus he was employed to make known that mystery, which had been hidden from men, during all preceding dispensations and ages of the world, but was at length manifestly revealed to the holy followers of Christ. (Notes, Eph. iii. 1—9.) For to them it had pleased God to make known the immense abundance of his mercy and grace, as well as the glory of all his perfections, in this mystery among the Gentiles. Not only was Christ, the promised Messiah, preached among the Gentiles; not only did he reign among them, but he actually dwelt in the hearts of true believers, in the hearts of multitudes of them, by faith, and the power of his Spirit, implanting his love, renewing his image, and writing his law, which fully sealed and warranted their hope of eternal glory. Indeed, it cannot be made intelligible, how Christ among them could give individuals a warrantable hope of glory.

V. 28, 29. This precious Saviour was the great subject of the apostle's preaching, and that of his faithful brethren, who warned every man to flee from the wrath to come, and from every other confidence, to this Refuge, and to beware of delusion in so important a matter; and they instructed every man with all wisdom, and in every thing that could render them wise unto salvation, or wise to serve God in their several places. For they desired and aimed to present every man, who attended on their ministry, complete in Christ, perfectly justified, and at length perfectly sanctified. In this the apostle laboured with unwearied diligence, striving by every means to bring sinners to Christ, and believers to establishment and holiness; yet this assiduity and earnestness were not of himself, but according to the working of a divine power on his soul, which wrought mightily in him, exciting fervent desires after God, and the salvation of souls, communicating vigour to all holy affections, raising him above all low and selfish aims, and supporting him in constancy, patience, and cheerful fortitude, amidst all difficulties and persecutions. Some would explain this power to mean the miracles which the apostle wrought; but every one must perceive, that this wholly destroys the energy, and darkens the meaning of the passage.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

All spiritual blessings, "from God the Father and our "Lord Jesus Christ," belong to the saints and faithful brethren in Christ, wherever they are dispersed; may we be found of that number! We should thank God for those who show their faith in Christ by love to all his saints, and also pray heartily for them, (though they be not personally known to us,) when we hear a good account of them, for in these things 'the communion 'of the saints' principally consists. The hope of real Christians is laid up for them in heaven, out of the reach of enemies and disappointments; they have been called to partake of it by "the word of the truth of the Gospel;" and, blessed be God, the joyful message is come to us in this far distant region! If we have known the grace of God in truth, it bringeth forth fruit in our holy lives and spiritual worship; but if it has in no degree this effect on us, it will only aggravate our condemnation. This may be learned from all the fellow-servants of our common Lord, who faithfully minister in different parts of his Church; for they all declare, that "love in the Spirit," of Christ, of holiness, and of the people, ordinances, and commandments of God, is inseparable from saving faith.

CHAP. II.

The apostle shows how earnestly he prayed for the Colossians, and the churches which had not seen him; that they might be united in love, and so comforted; and that they might attain a clear and satisfactory knowledge of the mysteries of Christ, and not be seduced by deceivers, 1—4. He rejoices, as if he saw their order, and the steadfastness of their faith; and exhorts them to perseverance and thankfulness, 5—7; warning them against vain philosophy and human traditions; and showing that they were complete in Christ, 8—10; having in Him the new circumcision, of which baptism was the external sign, 11—13. For God had quickened them with Christ, having forgiven their sins, and abolished the law of ordinances, by his cross, 14; on which he triumphed over principalities and powers, 15. They ought not then to submit to legal impositions, which were shadows of Christ, 16, 17; nor be induced, by vain pretences, to worship angels, or to any other observances of voluntary humility, will-worship, and self-imposed austerity, 18—23.

V. 9—14.

It is not enough, that we know the grand outlines of divine truth, but we should also pray for one another, that we may be "perfected in the knowledge of the "Lord's will, in all wisdom and spiritual unerstanding," in order that we may walk worthy of our vocation, please God in every part of our conduct, and produce every kind of holy fruit in abundance. Thus we shall likewise increase in the knowledge of God; for a humble, upright, teachable, and spiritual mind exceedingly helps the exercise of a sound judgment, in investigating the nature and perfections of God, and experience confirms the knowledge which faith receives from divine revelation. This again tends to increasing simplicity in dependence on God, which brings strength into the soul, that, being invigorated with all might "according to his glorious power," the believer may be able to exercise "patience and long-suffering with "joyfulness," under the severest trials and provocations. Indeed, we may well be thankful to the Father, if we have the witness in ourselves, that "we are made meet "for the inheritance of the saints in light," having acquired a relish for those contemplations, and that holy worship, in which the blessed spirits before the throne are incessantly employed. Alas! the whole world lieth under "the power of darkness," except as divine grace rescues some from this destructive bondage, by "translating them "into the kingdom of the beloved Son of God;" that these could not have been saved, had they not been redeemed from merited wrath by the blood of Christ, through whom their sins are all freely pardoned; the subjects of these two kingdoms, with their respective rulers, will shortly be removed to an eternal and unchangeable state; Christ and his people being collected together in heavenly felicity, Satan and his slaves being cast into outer darkness and despair. Now, when these things are duly considered; we shall deem it so vast a favour, to be delivered from the kingdom of the Devil, and translated into that of Christ; that we shall know ourselves to have unspeakable cause for gratitude, in the deepest scenes of adversity, and the sharpest conflicts of temptation. For these trials will soon terminate, and we shall speedily find ourselves among "those, that are come out of great tribulations," and are singing his praises, "who has washed them from their "sins in his own blood."

V. 15—20.

When admitted into heaven, and not before, we shall have some adequate conceptions of "the great mystery of "godliness;" and shall understand the import of the apostle's energetic language concerning the Lord Jesus; "the "Image of the invisible God," the First-born of the whole creation; the universal Creator, Sustainer, Proprietor, and Lord of heaven and earth, of men and angels, of the visible and invisible world, and of all the hierarchies of cherubim and seraphim before the throne of God; all which "were created by him and for him, and he is be-"fore all things, and by him all things consist." Let us then at present adore these mysteries in humble faith: and, instead of wanting material images of the invisible God, or framing gross notions of him in our creative imagination, or vain speculations; let us contemplate the glory of the Lord in Christ Jesus, the express Image of his essential excellency. Here we may learn humble confidence, reverential fear, and filial love; and be prepared for spiritual worship, joyful communion with God, and growing conformity to his holiness; as dwelling in our nature, reconciling the world unto himself, the Beginning of our life, the First-born from the dead; "that in all things he "might have the pre-eminence." Here we may become acquainted with the character of our God; and may approach him, and have fellowship with him, notwithstanding our exceeding guilt and pollution. For it hath pleased the infinitely glorious God, that all fulness should dwell in Christ, both to relieve our weak apprehensions and our guilty consciences; in our discoveries of his glorious majesty and holiness, through so encouraging a medium, as the Person of Emmanuel; making peace by the blood of his cross; and reconciling all things in heaven and on earth, to himself and to each other, in this most gracious and astonishing manner.

V. 21—29.

If we be convinced, that once we were "alienated from "God, and enemies in our minds by wicked works;" and are now reconciled to him, by the incarnation, sacrifice, and grace of Christ; we shall not attempt to explain away, or presumptuously expect to comprehend these deep mysteries: but we shall see a glory and suitableness in this plan of redemption, as uniting the honour of the divine law and government with the hope of guilty perishing sinners: though much yet remains far above and out of the reach of our low capacities; and while we long to be "presented holy, unblameable, and unreproveable, in the sight of God," it will be impossible for us to abuse the doctrine of his grace, to encourage ourselves in sin. Many things indeed must try the faith of professed Christians; but every trial which we stand, and every temptation which we resist, without "being moved away from the hope of the Gospel," and every event which shows that we "continue in the faith grounded and settled," tends to assure us that we shall soon "be presented faultless before our God with exceeding joy." May this Gospel then be "successfully preached to every creature that is under heaven." May numbers of ministers, like St. Paul, be raised up and sent forth, who may even rejoice in their sufferings for the cause of Christ, and after his example; and may we all remember that our afflictions, when properly supported, conduce to the glory of God, our own salvation, and the benefit of the body of Christ.—Let us be thankful, that God hath revealed to us those mysteries which were hid from ages and generations, and hath shown the riches of his glory among us Gentiles.—But let it be observed, that these things can yet be known only by his saints. "The secret of the LORD is still with them that fear him;" and we need not wonder to hear learned, ingenious, and able men, betray their ignorance of these mysteries, when we reflect on their pride, carnal mind, and evident contempt of the humbling doctrine of the cross; nay, their enmity against it. As Christ is preached among us, let us seriously inquire whether he dwells and reigns in us, which alone can warrant our assured hope of his glory. This all ministers should "preach, warning every man, and instructing every man in all wisdom, that they may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus." May we then every one of us thus labour with all earnestness, and by every method endeavour to promote the cause of Christ; and be careful to "strive according to that working, which worketh mightily" in those who simply depend on it and pray for it, and who go forth in that strength, to do the work and seek the glory of the Lord.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—4. The apostle was desirous that the Colossians should know what earnest longings he had experienced, and what vigorous endeavours and fervent prayers he had been engaged in, for them and the Christians of Laodicea, (a neighbouring city,) and all others who had never seen him, in order to promote their spiritual welfare. He especially wrestled most earnestly with God in prayer, (iv. 12,) that their hearts might be encouraged, by divine consolations, in every part of their duty: and that, in order to this, they might be united together in the most perfect love of one another; that so all envies, resentment, suspicions, and competition, might be excluded, which would otherwise certainly burden their consciences, inflame their passions, grieve the Holy Spirit, and interrupt their comfort. In this most cordial union, he prayed that they might attain and possess all those spiritual riches, which were to be found in the distinct and complete understanding of the Gospel of Christ, as connected with the full assurance of faith and hope; that so they might confidently acknowledge, and profess their belief of, the mystery of God, even of the Father, and of Christ his beloved Son, as One with him, according to "the great mystery of godliness, God manifest in the flesh;" in whom, or in which mystery, were treasured up all the riches of wisdom and knowledge. These were indeed hidden from the eyes of proud unbelievers: but the infinite wisdom and knowledge of God were more displayed in the Person and redemption of Christ, than in all his other works: all true wisdom and knowledge consisted in a believing and practical experimental understanding of these mysteries, and such instructions as were deducible from them: yea, from this treasury all true wisdom and knowledge must be derived, by faith and prayer; and all science or philosophy contrary to this were worthless. This the apostle insisted on, lest any man should beguile them into some specious delusion, by enticing words or persuasive reasonings, such as plausible orators often use, to impose on the judgment by addressing the passions; or by assuming as true, what is specious indeed, but false: as if either heathen sages, or Jewish scribes, could teach any wisdom, distinct from and preferable to the mysteries of the Gospel. 'It grieved the apostle, to think how incapable he was rendered of serving them, otherwise than by his letters and prayers. Oh! that such language might inspire every minister, who reads it, with a desire to use his liberty to the best of purposes, and to exert himself, as under such confinement he would wish he had done.' (Doddridge.) All the treasures, &c. (3.) 'Let this be the firmest argument against cavillers, that without Christ there is no true wisdom.' (Beza.) The language of the first verse renders it at least highly probable that the apostle had not been at Colosse: and that construction of it, which consists with the contrary supposition, is not very obvious or natural.

V. 5—7. The apostle, when absent in body, was present in spirit with the Colossians; he greatly interested himself in their concerns, and realized to his mind the prosperous state of their church, as made known to him by Epaphras. Some think, that he had an immediate revelation concerning it; as Elisha had of Gehazi's conduct in following Naaman. By that view, however, which he had of their prosperous state, he was filled with joy and complacency; as if he had witnessed the orderly management both of their private concerns, and of those of the church; as to the external regularity and discipline maintained in it; and the constancy of their faith in Christ, notwithstanding the terrors of persecution, and the artifices of false teachers. As therefore they had by faith received Christ Jesus to be their Lord and Saviour, according to the several offices which he sustained for the benefit of his church; let them continue in habitual dependence on him, and obedience to him; let them seek all their wisdom, strength, hope, holiness, and comfort from him, and aim in all things to serve and glorify him. Thus, being rooted in him as trees in a fruitful soil, and builded upon him as a house upon a firm foundation; and being established by living faith in him, according to the doctrine which they had been taught; they would abound more and more in faith, and proceed in their course with fervent thanksgiving to God for all his benefits. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8, 9. It was especially requisite for the Colossians to be upon their guard, that no man might rob them, (as victorious armies plunder the vanquished,) of their hope or comfort, or turn them aside from Christ, by any philosophical subtilties, and vain delusive speculations, which were opposed to the simple belief of the gospel. These were human traditions, which were delivered from the heads of the several sects of philosophers, and so handed down from age to age: and they formed the elements, or first principles, of a supposed wisdom, suited to the proud, curious, and carnal temper of the world; but which was totally incompatible with the doctrine of Christ. The Judaizing teachers seem to have blended their system, with speculations borrowed from the Pagans, and their different sects of philosophers: thus the traditions of the sages, and those of the Pharisees, were incorporated; and the worldly elements of heathen superstition or philosophy, were blended with legal and other external observances. Unless something of this kind be supposed, it will be found difficult to understand the apostle's discourse: for he spoke of philosophical delusions and legal ceremonies at the same time; he argued against both of them at once, but he levelled his reasonings chiefly against the Judaizing teachers. To what he had before advanced, he here added, that "in Christ all the fulness of the God-"head dwelleth bodily." In the temple the Lord discovered his presence by the Shechinah, or visible glory; yet, this was only an emblem or shadow of his gracious presence: but, in Christ the fulness of the Deity dwells substantially; and all the divine perfections are exercised by Christ, as God manifested in the flesh, by virtue of the mysterious Union of the divine and human nature in one Person. When the apostle spoke of believers being "filled "with all the fulness of God;" he evidently meant it of their receiving a rich abundance of all divine communications from God; and his in-dwelling in his people refers to his gracious and powerful presence with them. But "all the fulness of the Godhead dwelling bodily" in Christ, is language unspeakably stronger, and evidently refers to his being constituted the repository of all spiritual blessings, from whose fulness all believers receive. (Note, John, i. 14—16.) For God dwelling in human nature, as in a temple, exercises all his perfections, performs all divine operations, and communicates all benefits to man, through that medium. (Marg. Ref.) 'Christ is not 'here said to be "filled with all the fulness of God:" 'but the whole fulness of the Godhead is said to reside in 'him. Now θειοτης and το θειον never signify the gifts of 'God, or the doctrine of the gospel; but the divine nature 'only; nor can the will, or revelation, of God be said to "dwell bodily" 'in any person.' (Whitby.) If the union of Deity and Manhood in one person can be expressed in human language, without doubt this verse does express it.

V. 10. As Christ was completely qualified for his mediatorial work, by "all the fulness of the Godhead "dwelling in him bodily:" so believers are completely supplied with all that they want, by their mystical union with him. Being "in him," as members of his mystical body, and as quickened by his Spirit, he is their "Wisdom, "Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption:" all their instruction, acceptance, holiness, deliverance, liberty, victory, and happiness, are derived from him by faith, in the use of his appointed means. As he is also "the "Head of all principality and power." (Marg. Ref.;) all angels being his willing servants, and the whole creation being in one way or another subjected to him: so Christians have no cause to fear any creatures, or reason to seek help from them. The Judaizing teachers seem to have imbibed, and new-modelled, the Pagan notions of subordinate deities, and, applying it to the scriptural doctrine of angels, to have introduced the mediatorial worship of them, with which they at an early period attempted to corrupt the Christian church, and not wholly without success. To this the apostle here evidently refers, as well as in what is said afterwards. But Christians could have no occasion to pay homage of any kind to those creatures, who, however exalted, were subjected to Christ, their Lord and Redeemer.

V. 11, 12. The disciples of Jesus did not want the external seal of circumcision, in order to their acceptance or complete salvation; for in Christ, and by their union with him, they had the true circumcision, which was not performed on their bodies by the hands of men, but on their hearts by the Holy Spirit, in consequence of whose regenerating work, they were daily employed in "putting "off the body of the sins of the flesh." Thus they renounced and watched against all the sins, to which their natural corrupt propensities excited them; and they had crucified the old man, as propagated from Adam, whence all these evil lustings originated. This is the true circumcision, which Christ himself performs on the hearts of his people, by his Holy Spirit; (Note, Rom. ii. 28, 29.) For "the circumcision of Christ," seems rather to signify his work in the believer's soul, than his own personal circumcision; though that was a part of his mediatorial humiliation, by which the true circumcision was procured for them, and in which they are rendered conformable to him. Instead of the outward sign of circumcision, baptism had been substituted; (which some suppose to be meant by the circumcision of Christ:) this represented that death and burial with him from former confidences, and sinful and worldly pursuits, which true Christians experience, in order to their being made conformable to him in his resurrection. (Notes, &c. Rom. vi. 1—11.) The baptism of Jews and Gentiles, when converted to Christianity, implied their 'death unto sin and new birth unto righteousness;' their entrance into the Church and kingdom of Christ; the washing away of the guilt and pollution of their sins; and their dedication to the service of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, in whose name, as the God of their salvation, they were baptized. The same inward change had been signified by circumcision, which was administered to adult proselytes, and then to their infant offspring; so that no argument can hence be deduced against the baptism of infants. (Notes, Gen. xvii. Matt. xxviii. 19 20.) This conformity to the crucified and risen Saviour was effected, "through the faith of the operation of God, "who raised him from the dead;" or by a believing reliance on the effectual saving power of God, as revealed in the Gospel of Christ. It is, no doubt, an important scriptural truth, that the faith, by which we receive all other blessings, is itself the gift and work of God; and this has induced some expositors, and very many preachers, to explain the clause to mean, "the faith which God has "wrought in the heart." This was the author's view, when he wrote the first edition of this work, and, indeed, till he came to revise it for this edition. But a careful examination of the subject has convinced him, that this is rather imposing a sense on the apostle's words, than inquiring after the true meaning of them. The ablest Grecians are decided, that the idiom of the language will not admit of that construction; and certainly there is no instance in the New Testament, in which a similar mode of expression can fairly be thus interpreted. (Mark xi. 22. Acts iii. 16. Rom. iii. 22. 26. Gal. ii. 16. 20. iii. 22. Eph. iii. 12. Phil. i. 27. iii. 9. 2 Thes. ii. 13. Jam. ii. 2. Rev. ii. 13. xiv. 12. Gr.) But it should be observed, that, though the clause does not affirm faith to be the work and gift of God, it neither teaches nor implies any thing to the contrary. Indeed, this is clearly taught in the subsequent verse. (Marg. Ref.) Buried. (Notes, Rom. vi. 1—3.)

V. 13—15. The Colossians, being chiefly converts from idolatry, had been "dead in their sins," and in that carnal state, of which the uncircumcision of their flesh was an outward token; but God had quickened them together with Christ, by virtue of his resurrection, having in his death provided for the forgiveness of all their transgressions, to the full benefit of which he had thus admitted them. (Notes, Eph. ii. 1—11.) For Christ had blotted out the hand-writing of ordinances, the ceremonial law, which was, as it were, the bond of the ancient church, for payment of the debt of sin contracted by violation of the moral law, but which Christ, the Surety, had paid in behalf of all believers, and so blotted out the debt. This was against the Jews, and contrary to them, as well as to the Gentiles; for it is observable that the apostle changed the person, when he came to speak on this subject, saying us, instead of you. Not only was it a heavy yoke for them to bear, but all its sacrifices and ablutions testified that they were guilty and polluted, yet could they not take away sins. So that the bond could never have been discharged, except as Christ came and made payment of it, and unbelievers among the Jews were under condemnation, by the testimony even of the ceremonial law, as well as for the additional sins which the multiplying of precepts necessarily occasioned. At the same time the Gentiles, who had not so much as these typical expiations, were under condemnation as transgressors, and were excluded by them even from the visible Church. But Christ not only blotted out the debt, but removed the bond out of the way, and nailed it as a cancelled deed to his cross, that it might no more appear against his people. The ceremonial law, therefore, and the whole Mosaic dispensation, having received its intended accomplishment in Christ, were of no more force or value than a cancelled bond; and the Gentiles, being admitted into the church by faith in Christ, and his institution of baptism, had no need of circumcision, or of any legal observances, and ought not to pay any regard to them. Moreover, Christ had at the same time virtually deprived the principalities and powers of darkness of their usurped dominion, and made way for the subversion of their kingdom, which was before universally established throughout the Gentile world. For, by satisfying the justice of God for sin, he had removed the cause of fallen man's subjection to Satan, and made way for the preaching of the Gospel to the nations, with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven to make it successful. So that he vanquished those enemies when he hung upon the cross; when he arose and ascended, he led them captive; and he made an open show of his victory, and manifested the triumphs of his cross, when, by the preaching of his Gospel, he proceeded to destroy Satan's strong-holds, and to rescue his captives in the different nations of the earth. (Eph. iv. 8—10.) Against us, (14.) 'Circumcision publicly testified innate depravity; the purifications, the pollutions 'of sin, and the sacrifices, that its guilt deserved death, 'to which the remarkable saying of Augustine refers; 'in those ceremonies there was rather the confession, than 'the removal, of sin.' (Beza.) The silencing of the heathen oracles, and the gradual, yet rapid, subversion of the Grecian and Roman idolatry, in consequence of the death of Christ, are fixed on, by some commentators, as almost the exclusive meaning of the clause, "triumphing "over them in it;" but these, however important, constituted only a small part of that victory over the powers of darkness, which Christ obtained on the cross, and of his subsequent triumphs; of which the salvation of the dying thief may be considered as an earnest. (Note, Gen. iii. 15.)

V. 16, 17. Seeing, therefore, that Christ had cancelled the ceremonial law, let no man venture to judge and condemn the Gentile believers as guilty, or as no part of the Church, because they disregarded it; and let no Christian disquiet himself about such censorious judgments, which related to the distinction between clean and unclean meats, or the use of, or abstinence from, this or the other drink, or the neglect of the Jewish festivals and solemnities, the new-moons and sabbaths. Doubtless, this last related principally to the weekly sabbath, which, as observed on the seventh day, was now become a part of the abrogated Jewish law. For the sabbath under the Mosaic dispensation, was a ceremonial and a judicial, as well as a moral, requirement; the morality of it had no necessary connexion with the seventh day, in preference to all others, save as that was for the time appointed; but the appropriation of a part of our time for the worship and service of God, is of moral and essentially immutable obligation. (Note, Ex. xx. 8—10.) The first day of the week, the Lord's day, was the time kept holy by Christians, in remembrance of Christ's resurrection; and the sabbath, in the New Testament, always signifies the seventh day, the observance of which the Judaizing teachers wanted to impose upon the Gentile converts. These things in general were shadows of evangelical blessings; but the truth, reality, and substance of them were found in Christ, resulting from his Person, work, and salvation, and consisting in the holiness, peace, communion with God, and heavenly rest, which he vouchsafes to believers. 'In the 'law no kind of drink was forbidden, except to the Nazarites. Now, it is not improbable that the elders, who 'pretended to have received from Moses and the prophets, 'by tradition, many precepts not written in the law, 'might enjoin abstinence from wine and strong drink, to 'such of their disciples as aimed at superior holiness.' (Macknight.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18, 19. As Christ was "the Head of all prin"cipalities and powers," the apostle warned the Colossians not to allow any man to rob them of that glorious prize, for which they were candidates, by giving them wrong directions, or turning them out of their course. The original word seems to be taken from the office of those who presided in the Olympic games, and decided to whom the prize belonged. Now, if any man usurped such an authority among Christians, he would mislead all who willingly submitted to him, as well as domineer over their consciences. This would be attempted by certain persons, who were induced, by an uncommanded and self-imposed humility, to worship angels; pretending that it was improper for mean sinful creatures to come to God immediately with their prayers, and that it was therefore expedient to solicit the mediatory good offices of holy angels; and they aimed to persuade others to the practice. Thus, they ascribed divine honours to created beings, as if ever present with men in all places, and acquainted with the sincerity and the desires of their hearts: nay, they seemed to intimate, that they were more compassionate and kind than the Lord himself. This might be called humility, and indeed it was a voluntary degradation, to which a rational creature ought not to submit: yet, in fact, it originated from pride, and a most presumptuous intrusion into the supposed state of the invisible world: it substituted man's arrogant conjectures and speculations in the place of divine revelation; and it was the genuine offspring of that self-wisdom, with which the carnal mind is so prone to be puffed up. By thus exalting angels to the office of mediators, and worshipping them in that capacity, they especially dishonoured Christ, the One Mediator between God and man, to whom, as God manifested in the flesh, such worship ought to be appropriated. They did not therefore adhere to Christ the Head, or hold communion with him; but, in fact, they departed from the grand principles of the Gospel, by choosing and worshipping other mediators: and as no sinner can approach God, or be accepted, but in and by Christ, so this error tended directly to ruin their souls. For all true believers are united to him, and receive all grace from him, they are compacted together into one body by their union with him and with each other, and by thus filling up their proper places, and performing their proper functions in his Church; as the human body is made up of many members compacted together, by joints, tendons, veins, &c. united to one head. Thus Christians, derive spiritual nourishment from Christ, through his ordinances; and being knit together, they increase in knowledge and holiness, by the power of God, and grow up into nearer conformity to him. (Eph. iv. 15, 16.)—It hath before been intimated, that the Jews seem to have borrowed some of the Pagan notions, and applied them to the scriptural doctrine of angels; by these means the Judaizing teachers had begun to corrupt Christianity with a new and refined species of idolatry. To what lengths the same principles afterwards carried professed Christians, in the worship of departed saints, real or imaginary, and the worship of images, as well as that of angels, especially in the Church of Rome, is well known. But the whole was done in direct defiance to the apostle's testimony, which sufficiently proves all such practices to be as contrary to the honour of Christ in the Gospel, as more direct or acknowledged idolatry is to the honour of God in the law.—Many expositors bestow great pains, while commenting on this chapter, in showing what heretics, or heretical teachers, the apostle had in view; and what sects of the philosophers had supplied, so to speak, the materials for these corruptions of the Gospel. But it appears to me, that if Cerinthus, or the Gnostics, or any other heretics, had been then known as avowing antichristian tenets, the apostle would no more have scrupled to name them, than he did to name Hymeneus and Philetus; unless he had thought, that by naming some he should be supposed to exculpate others, who, with some shades of difference, were equally corrupting the Gospel. In like manner, the Stoics and Epicureans are named by the sacred historian in the same way as the Pharisees and Sadducees are; and if Christianity had been corrupted, exclusively, by the speculations of Pythagoreans or Platonists, it does not appear why the apostle should omit to protest against them. But if all the sects of the philosophers held notions suited to corrupt Christianity, then the reason is evident why he apostle names no one; and it is equally strong against our interpreting his words of any one exclusively. In fact, it is of immensely more importance for us to know what, than whom, he opposed; for if our attention be engrossed by the danger of ancient Christians, from this or the other sect, either of heretics or philosophers, we shall probably be led to forget our own danger from Papists, Socinians, philosophising infidels, rational Christians, (as some call themselves,) and all the varieties of superstitious and enthusiastical deceivers; against all of whom the apostle's words, as explained in an enlarged sense, most solemnly warn us.

V. 20—23. If the Colossians were indeed become dead with Christ to the ceremonial law, which is elsewhere called the rudiments or elements of this world, (Marg. Ref.) Christ having discharged and cancelled that bond, why did they act as if they were still living in the world, under a carnal dispensation, and strangers to a more spiritual worship and service? And why did any of them submit to those who dogmatically imposed legal observances and human traditions of any kind on them? The Judaizing teachers, having imbibed also the notions of the heathen philosophers, had crept in at Colosse, and with great eagerness inculcated their principles, and seem to have met with countenance from some professed Christians. They called on them, in a dogmatical and authoritative manner, not "to touch," or to eat such food as was legally unclean, and not so much as to taste it, nor yet to handle any thing which might pollute them; probably requiring them also to refrain from marriage. (1 Cor. vii. 1.) The next words are differently interpreted.—Some suppose them to be the words of the false

CHAP. III.

The apostle exhorts Christians to seek, and set their affections on things above; and being risen with Christ, and following him to heaven, 1—4: to mortify carnal lusts, to put away malice, and to seek conformity to Christ in holiness, 5—11; especially in love of each other, readiness to forgive injuries, and gratitude to God, 12—15: to keep close to the word of truth, to abound in grateful praises, and to do all in the name of Christ, 16, 17. The duties of wives and husbands, 18, 19; of children and parents, 20, 21; and of servants, 22—25.

teachers, forbidding the use of all food, which caused the destruction of life.—'Whatever things tend to the destruction of life, in the using.' (Macknight.) But though the words may bear this translation, yet, as there is nothing in the original for of life, and as whatever is used as food is destroyed by that use, the interpretation seems inadmissible.—'All which things tend to the corruption 'of that excellent religion, into which you are intitiated.' (Doddrige.) This supposes the word φθορα to be used in a moral sense, of which many instances may be given. But the more general, and, as it appears to me, the best founded interpretation, supposes the apostle to refer to our Lord's words concerning the traditions of the Pharisees, (Matt. xv. 17.) and implies, that abstaining from such things, when not divinely prohibited, as supported the body by perishing themselves, could do nothing towards the salvation of the soul. (Notes, Matt. xv. 1—20. 1 Cor. vi. 12—20.) Whereas all such things perish with the using, and could communicate no real defilement. Typical instructions had in former ages been conveyed by the ritual law, but its obligation had now ceased, and it was of no more authority than the other doctrines and commandments of human invention, which the false teachers added to it. The worship of angels and the distinctions of meats had a show of wisdom, which might impose on the injudicious. To add voluntarily to the rule of duty, and thus to render it more strict, had a semblance of great devotion and extraordinary sanctity; but it implied that God had given a defective rule, and that he would be pleased with what he had never commanded. It might also appear very humble to worship angels, yet this arose from abominable pride and unbelief. The abstaining from meats, with various self-imposed austerities, might have a show of extraordinary spirituality, by which the body was neglected, from a pretended superiority to animal indulgence, and willingness for mortification and suffering; yet all this was not "in any honour" to God, or any thing valuable in itself; nay, the whole tended to satisfy, in a dishonourable manner, the propensities of the flesh, of the carnal mind, by gratifying his self-will, self-wisdom, self-righteousness, bigotry, and contempt of others.—The word rendered "will-worship," is not elsewhere used in the New Testament, but it may be so naturally formed out of two words found in the eighteenth verse, and rendered "voluntary "worshipping," that its meaning is by no means doubtful. The last clause is differently interpreted,—'Nor are 'they of any value, as they regard those things by which 'the flesh is gratified, (or pampered.)' (Beza.) By "the "flesh," he means the carnal mind, which is gratified with every thing that affords fuel for pride, self-preference, and contempt of others. "Not by any provision 'for satisfying the flesh: τιμη, 'sometimes in scripture 'signifies the food and clothing necessary for the body.— 'Thus the provision of the necessaries and conveniences 'of life, made for parents, elders, and widows, is called 'τιμη, (1 Tim. v. 17.) The body is as real a part of our 'nature, as the soul, and ought to have such food and 'recreation as are necessary to its health and vigour. 'The wisdom which teaches the "neglecting of the body, "is not wisdom, but folly." (Macknight.) 'Not yielding that due respect and care to the body, which were 'meet for the moderate and fit sustentation of it.' (Bp. Hall.) 'Forbidding marriage, which "is honourable, "(τιμιος,) in all," 'and allowing no honourable means 'of satisfying those desires, which are implanted by 'nature, brought them all to dishonourable lusts.' (Hammond.) If this meaning could be clearly made out and firmly established, it would very well suit the context. For it can hardly be doubted, that the Holy Spirit led the apostle to speak against the corruptions, which certain Judaizing and speculating teachers, grafting the heathen philosopher, so to speak, on the superstitious Pharisee, attempted to corrupt the Church, in language strictly prophetical of the subsequent corruptions of the "man of "sin," the papal antichrist. It may, however, be questioned, whether the words translated "satisfying the flesh," which seems to imply full gratification, even to repletion and satiety, would have been used by the apostle in this connexion: so that, on the whole, the first interpretation appears to me the most satisfactory.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

They who know the worth of souls, will seek and pray for the salvation of sinners all over the earth; and such as greatly love their brethren, will earnestly strive for the establishment and progress, even of those whom they have not seen; and when they can do nothing else, they may wrestle with God in prayer for them. The hearts of Christians are commonly comforted and animated, in proportion as they are "knit together in love;" and there are riches, in the full assurance of understanding of the Gospel, with which believers in general are but little acquainted. Indeed, there is an inexhaustible mine of most precious treasure in the word of God; from which men are enriched, in proportion to the simplicity, diligence, and perseverance, with which they seek it. We cannot comprehend the mystery of God; even of the Father and of Christ; but we may believe, acknowledge, contemplate, and adore it. Thus we shall derive, from the treasures laid up in our Emmanuel, supplies of wisdom and knowledge, far more valuable than all man's boasted science and philosophy; but these treasures are hidden from the proud and unbelieving, and can be discovered and appropriated only by faith. We have peculiar need to insist on these things at present, when so many are employed in beguiling men with enticing words; extolling the powers of human reason, and depreciating revelation, deriding theology, and idolizing philosophy; boasting of demonstration and experiment in natural science; rejecting unanswerable evidences of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, and treating all experience of the power of divine grace in the heart with the most sovereign contempt! Whilst multitudes of frivolous and superficial speculators are thus beguiled into infidelity, skepticism, or destructive perversions of Christianity, it must rejoice every established believer and every zealous minister, to know that there is yet a remnant to be found dispersed through the land, who walk orderly accordingly to the obedience and worship of the Gospel, and are steadfast in the faith of Christ; with these he will find his heart united; and, if he hath opportunity, he will exhort them to walk in Christ, even as they have received him to be their Prophet, Priest, and King; that being rooted in, and built upon, him, they may be steadfast in the faith, and fruitful in every good work, "abounding therein with "thanksgiving."

V. 8—17.

Let young persons, and inquirers after the truth, especially beware lest any man spoil them through philosophy. They may depend upon it, that all the boasted knowledge, which is opposed to the mysteries of the Person and redemption of Christ, is a vain deceit, a worldly wisdom, like that of Jewish scribes, who crucified Christ, or that of heathen philosophers, who counted the preaching of the cross to be foolishness. Men cannot follow such vain delusions, and be the disciples of Christ; for "in him "dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." All true Christians glory in this "great mystery of godliness," and all who oppose it are strangers to the life of faith and the way to the Father. (John xiv. 6.) Without union and communion with Christ, and with the Father through him, by the supply of his Spirit, we can do nothing; but true Christians are complete in him: they derive all they want from his fulness, and they are safe in his keeping, who is the Head of all principality and power. If we enter into the Spirit of genuine Christianity, we do not want either Jewish exploded ceremonies, or newly invented superstitions. The circumcision of the heart, the crucifixion of the flesh, the death and burial to sin and the world, and the resurrection to newness of life implied in baptism, and connected with faith of the operation of God, sufficiently prove that our sins are forgiven, our debt is blotted out and cancelled, and that we are fully delivered from the curse of the law. He who triumphed upon the cross over the principalities and powers of darkness, will also, from his glorious throne, defend us from all their assaults and stratagems, till he hath made us more than conquerors. We want no other wisdom, righteousness, strength, holiness, liberty, or victory, than what Christ bestows. We need not regard those who judge us in respect of meats, and drinks, and holy-days, or other human traditions, which are not so much as a shadow of things to come, as Jewish ceremonies once were; but we enjoy the substance in Christ, and by walking in his ordinances and commandments.

V. 18—23.

Having One all-sufficient Advocate with the Father, we have no occasion for any other mediator, and need not abase ourselves to worship fellow-servants, to the great dishonour of our common Lord. Such voluntary self-degradation is real pride, which refuses submission to the teaching, righteousness, and authority of God; and it is the genuine effect of a carnal mind, puffed up with imagined knowledge, and vainly intruding into those things which are not seen. The Church has long enough been corrupted, and souls deceived, with such gross delusions, with human inventions, will-worship, and self-imposed austerities; men have long enough been misled by those who said, "Touch not, taste not, handle not," concerning such things as perish with the using. But whatever show there may be of wisdom, sanctity, or mortification, in these devices, they certainly are worthless in themselves, they neither honour nor please God; and they gratify the proud self-preference, the domineering bigotry, and the persecuting temper of the carnal heart of man.—Let us then not depart from the simplicity of our dependence on the Lord Jesus, and obedience to him: He is our Head of authortiy and influence, "from whom the "whole body, by joints and bands, having nourishment "ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the in-"crease of God." As dead with him to the world, and its wisdom and maxims, let us willingly bear his yoke, and steadily assert our liberty from human impositions.—What he hath left indifferent, let us regard as such, and leave others to the like freedom; and, remembering the transient nature of earthly things, let us endeavour to glorify God in our use of them.

deed risen with Christ, as their baptism and profession implied, it behooved them to evidence it, by seeking "those "things which are above." (Marg. Ref.) Perfect knowledge, holiness, and felicity, in the immediate presence of God, and in his service and love, are evidently intended. The assured hope, and the happy earnests and first-fruits of these, they ought to seek, in preference to all worldly interests or pleasures, and in the diligent use of all appointed means. Thus they should follow Christ their Fore-runner; that, as they were dead to sin and alive to God, in conformity to his death and resurrection, so they might be conformed to him in his ascension into heaven, where, as their Surety, he was exalted on the mediatorial throne, at the right hand of the Father, to appear in his presence, and to prepare a place for them. By faith beholding his glory, and aspiring in hope to this heavenly inheritance, they ought to value, choose, savour, pursue, and delight in, spiritual things, and not earthly. (Notes, Rom. viii. 4—9.) For, according to their profession, and the apostle's confidence respecting them, they were already dead to their former hopes, interests, motives, and pursuits, "and their life was hid with Christ." The spring of that eternal life which abode in them, and from which all their present comforts, hopes, and activity, were derived, was in Christ and his fulness; the streams of this living water flowed into their souls, by the influences of the Holy Spirit, through faith; thus they were united to Christ and had communion with him, and wisdom, strength, grace, and comfort, were derived from him; he lived and ruled in them, and they lived in him, by him, and to him. The Fountain of their life, and the nature, supports, and principles of it, were hidden, from carnal men, who could not understand what were the secret springs of their active diligence and joyful patience, in opposition to all temporal interests and satisfactions. This life was likewise secured, as a hidden treasure, from wicked men and fallen spirits, who could by no means deprive them of it; nor was it in their own keeping, but in that of Christ, by whom it was sustained, and who was himself the unfailing Source of it. Thus it was "with Christ in God," through the union of the Deity with his human nature; and so the immutable power, faithfulness, wisdom, and love of God secured it for them. When, therefore, Christ their life should appear to raise the dead and judge the world, then would every one of them, who thus lived by him, appear with him in glory, being made completely like him both in body and soul, that they might all be glorified together with him; and their comforts on earth, and the previous felicity of their departed spirits, would be an anticipation of this perfect and eternal glory reserved for them. (Note, Gal. ii. 20.)

V. 5, 6. The exhortations here given are similar to those that have been already considered; (Notes, Eph. iv. 17—32. v. 1—6.) The "members which are upon earth" signify the various lusts of man's carnal nature, the members of the old man, the body of sin. In the regenerate "the flesh is crucified with its affections and lusts;" yet there is still life in it. It must therefore be daily mortified; a continual opposition must be made to all its corrupt workings; the supplies of its life must be, as it were, cut off; no provision must be made for its indulgence; temptations, and occasions of sin must be avoided; and even lawful inclinations must be habituated to brook denial. Thus the members of the carnal nature, which affects earthly things and disrelishes heavenly, must be continually enfeebled, and put to death by a lingering unrelenting execution. In the detail of particulars here adduced, we may observe, that inordinate affection, may relate to inexpedient and excessive desires after even lawful indulgences of any kind: though some understand it of unnatural crimes. Evil concupiscence, signifies the sensuality of the heart, and imagination, which must be mortified, or gross crimes will follow. But several expositors explain the word rendered covetousness, as denoting rather the excessive desire of sensual gratification, than the love of riches. This appears a very dangerous misconstruction: for by this means, sensuality is supposed to be forbidden with a needless redundancy of words, and covetousness escapes without the least rebuke: whereas the love of money is the root of all kinds of evil, and both the scripture and matter of fact show it to be one of the greatest possible hinderances to man's salvation, and the greatest of all snares to the professors of the gospel; nor can any vice so properly be called idolatry, as avarice. The original word literally signifies having more, or have more, implying the hankering after still more and more, which is evidently the disease of the avaricious. It is but seldom used in the Greek writers for any thing but covetousness; though a few instances may be found of its being applied to an insatiable greediness in other respects. The general meaning of the word in the New Testament may be understood, from most of the passages in which it is used, where its import cannot be doubted. (Marg. Ref. Gr.) 'There 'being in us naturally "the old man," (9.) 'and the 'body of sin: the inordinate affections and lustings of it 'are styled the members of that body; partly because they 'exert themselves by the members of the natural body; 'and partly, because as the members of the body are 'employed to accomplish the desires of the natural body; 'so these affections are employed to gratify the desires of 'the body of sin. As heathens place confidence in their 'idols, so the avaricious man doth place his confidence in 'gold and silver. The covetous person doth not indeed 'believe his riches to be a god; yet by so loving and 'trusting in them, as God alone ought to be loved and 'trusted, he is as truly guilty of idolatry, as if he so 'believed.' (Whitby.) By "the children of disobedience," some understand wicked men in general; and others seem to confine the interpretation to idolaters. But the word rendered disobedience often signifies unbelief; and 'the "children of disobedience," are doubtless all those, however distinguished, who do not believe and obey the Gospel; while the most profligate and abandoned, believing and obeying the Gospel, become the "children of obedience." (Marg. Ref.) The rites of Bacchus and Cybele were peculiarly observed at Colosse, the chief city of Phrygia, and conduced exceedingly to deprave the morals of the inhabitants, in many of the things here spoken of: but, alas! the case of multitudes even in professed Christian countries requires the same warnings and exhortations.

V. 7—11. The Colossians had once habitually practised some or other of the above-mentioned vices; when they lived among those who were of the same character, and when they had no experience or expectation of nobler interests or satisfactions. But now they must not only mortify these gross, carnal propensities, which had acquired strength by habit; but they must lay aside, as a cast-off garment, all evil practices, especially those which are next recapitulated. The word translated blasphemy, may signify slanders and revilings, as well as profane speeches respecting God and holy things. These, as well as all polluting discourse, and falsehood of every kind, must be renounced: seeing "they had put off the old man with "his deeds," by the mortification of the carnal nature, and by ceasing from the allowed practice of all sin. They ought therefore to avoid whatever was in the least degree inconsistent with their profession. And as they "had put "on the new man," and professed their conformity to Christ; and as this renewal of the soul after the holy image of him who had at first created it, and who had thus new-created it, was in knowledge, or by the transforming knowledge of the glory of God in Christ; so they ought to act like men who were of one mind and judgment with the Lord, "hating iniquity and loving righteousness" in their whole conduct. For they were fully admitted to all the privileges of God's people, and should therefore act in character. They were now members of the Christian church, in which all other distinctions were abolished. Greeks and Jews, circumcised and uncircumcised, illiterate persons of the most barbarous nations, the uncivilized Scythians, and the meanest slaves, as well as free men, were all equally made the children and heirs of God by faith in Christ; their relation to him was alone requisite for their acceptance, and admission to these privileges; and he dwelt in them all, by the power of his Spirit transforming them into his own holy image; by which they were distinguished from all other persons.

V. 12—15. As the elect of God, who had been freely beloved and chosen in Christ, and called to be saints, or holy persons, let the Christians at Colosse put on, and manifest in their whole conduct, a tender, compassionate, kind, lowly, unambitious, meek, and patient spirit; bearing with each other and forgiving one another, if any dispute or cause of complaint arose among them, after the example of Christ's love to them. Over all these let them put on charity, or active liberal love; this would be as the bond of union to all their other graces, and form their characters consistent. It would compact them into one body, and produce the most perfect state of the church on earth; as indeed it is the very bond which unites God and all holy beings, in the perfect happiness and holiness of heaven. (Notes, 1 Cor. xiii.) And as the peace of God, in their hearts and consciences, was the source of all their comforts; that peace ought to rule within them, as the umpire of all their differences; that they might be influenced by so endearing an example to live peaceably with all men. Especially this should teach them "to keep the "unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace:" because they had been called into a state of peace with God, "in one "body," as united in Christ their Head; for which it behooved them to be thankful, and to show their gratitude in this manner, and in every other way which they could, 16 Let [f] the word of Christ [g] dwell in you [h] richly in [i] all wisdom; [k] teaching and admonishing one another, [l] in psalms, and hymns, [m] and spiritual songs, [n] singing with grace in your hearts [o] to the Lord.

17 And [p] whatsoever ye do [q] in word or deed, do all [r] in the name of the Lord Jesus, [s] giving thanks to [t] God and the Father by him.

18 Wives, [u] submit yourselves unto your own husbands, [x] as it is fit in the Lord.

19 Husbands, [y] love your wives, and be not [z] bitter against them.

20 Children, [a] obey your parents [b] in all things: for this is [c] well-pleasing unto the Lord.

21 Fathers, [d] provoke not your children to anger, lest they be discouraged.

22 Servants, [e] obey in all things your masters according to the flesh; not with eye-service, as [f] men-pleasers; but [g] in singleness of heart, [h] fearing God:

23 And [i] whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, [k] as to the Lord, and not unto men;

V. 16, 17. (Note, Eph. v. 18—20.) By the word of Christ, the whole of the sacred scripture seems to be meant; which was all from him, as "the Light of the "world," and the personal Word of God; and which, in one way or another, all related to him. It was very important, that the Colossians should, by diligent study and meditation, store their memories and understandings with the instructions of scripture; that it might thus abundantly dwell within them; and that so their judgments might be formed upon it, their hearts cast into the mould of it, and their consciences directed by it. Thus they would be enriched in all spiritual wisdom and knowledge; (ii. 2, 3;) and would learn to act wisely in their whole conduct; or they would be influenced to use their knowledge in all wisdom, by reducing it to practice. This would enable them, with readiness and pertinency, to teach, caution, exhort, reprove, or encourage one another: while those psalms and sacred poems, which they sang together with holy affections, under the influence of divine grace in their hearts, to the glory of the Lord, would furnish them with words suited to such mutual admonitions. Their idolatrous neighbours had laid up in their memories songs in praise of their base deities and corrupt practices, which they used on every festive occasion, and when they met together for social intercourse, nay, for amusement and recreation when alone. This, in fact, has always been the case in every country; and the popular songs have an immense, but, generally, a most pernicious effect on the people. They are learned in early life, and not soon forgotten, and often are considered as proverbial or oracular. Let then Christians, excluding those polluting vanities, labour to get their memories and minds richly replenished with hymns and songs of praise to God, and of every kind which are suited to prepare them for the worship of heaven, and to anticipate its joys; and let them use these hymns and songs constantly, not on public occasions alone, but in social meetings also; and even when alone, in their houses, or journeying, and indeed in any other situation. This will also render them edifying and animating companions to their fellow-christians. In general, whatever they are employed about, whether in conversation, in social worship, in their secular or domestic concerns, or in any work of piety, or charity, let them "do all in the name of the Lord Jesus;" in a believing dependence on his merits and grace, out of love to him, in obedience to his precepts, and for the honour of his name, giving thanks to God, even the Father, by him; for such services can be accepted from sinners only through his intercession.

V. 18, 19. (Notes, Eph. v. 22—33. 1 Pet. iii. 1—7.) "Fit in the Lord;" or agreeable to his commandment, honourable to his Gospel, and not contrary to the rule of obeying God rather than man. Christian wives would, at that time, in many cases, be required to obey idolatrous husbands; and Christian husbands to love heathen wives. Be not bitter. 'Thou art not a lord, but a husband; thou 'hast not got a maid-servant, but a wife; God would have 'thee the ruler of the inferior sex, not the tyrant.' (Ambrose.) 'In this precept, fidelity to the marriage-covenant 'is enjoined, as well as care to provide for the wife such 'conveniences, as may be necessary to her happiness, agree'ably to the husband's station.' (Macknight.)

V. 20, 21. (Note, Eph. vi. 1—4.) Discouraged. When parents are continually finding fault with their children, and confounding the distinction between wilful offences, or obstinate disobedience, or immoral conduct, and the heedlessness or inadvertencies of youth; and when they sharply reprove even the defects of their endeavours to obey, without commending what is right; children imbibe the notion that it is impossible to please their parents, and so discouragement renders them careless. They then count their parents harsh and unfriendly, they shun their company; and in consequence are exposed to numberless temptations.

CHAP. IV.

Exhortations to masters to behave properly to their servants, 1: to perseverance in prayer, 2—4; to prudence and edifying speech, 5, 6. The apostle commends Tychicus and Onesimus, by whom he sent the epistle, 7—9; and concludes with salutations, admonitions, and directions, 10—18.

V. 22—25. (Notes, Eph. v. 8. Marg. Ref.) Singleness, &c. That is, singly aiming to obey and honour God in all they do; doing it to the best of their ability, as serving a good, merciful, and bountiful God, even in doing the work of a tyrannical, iniquitous, and idolatrous master. This would render the meanest employment a service acceptable, well-pleasing unto God: and, however they might fail of pleasing their unreasonable masters, they would certainly receive an abundant, though gracious, reward from God, especially in the heavenly inheritance. —Serve the Lord Christ. 'We are,' (says Schlictlingius, a Socinian,) 'to serve Christ as our heavenly Lord, which, 'saith he, comprehends faith in him, obedience to him, 'and worship and adoration of him.' (Whitby.) He that doeth wrong, &c. (25.) The misconduct of the servant would not excuse the cruelty and injustice of the master; and the idolatry, wickedness, or severity of the master, would not exempt the slothful, dishonest, or disobedient servant from punishment. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The sincerity of our professed faith and love must be evidenced by a consistent temper and conduct: and we should prove that we are spiritually alive through our risen Saviour, by seeking and delighting in those things which are above, where he sitteth at the right hand of God. Thus we shall know our interest in his atonement, by the life which we have derived from him; and may be assured that "When Christ, who is our Life, shall appear, then "shall we also appear with him in glory;" though this life of faith, and experienced communion with an unseen Saviour, must be hid from ungodly men, and frequently derided by them. Having such hopes and comforts, we should daily employ ourselves in mortifying every carnal affection, and in seeking a more entire deliverance, not only from hankering after forbidden gratifications, but from all inordinate affection, and every desire of sensual indulgence, and from that idolatrous "covetousness, which "God abhorreth:" for "because of these things cometh "the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience." In such practices and pursuits we might have been left to perish: for whether we once walked in them or not, we were by nature prone to them, and should have lived and died among the children of disobedience, if we had been left to ourselves. Let us then also put off anger, malice, slander, revilings, irreverent words concerning God, polluting discourse, and all kinds and degrees of insincerity: for a Christian should no more allow himself in any of these, than a courtier should dishonour his prince, and bemean himself, by wearing squalid and ragged garments. Having therefore put off the old man and his deeds, and put on Christ, and being renewed in knowledge after his image: let us study to copy his example, and to act consistently with our rank and character.

V. 12—25.

As to all other distinctions, we may well be indifferent about them, seeing "Christ is all, and in all:" but we should be earnestly desirous of evidencing ourselves to be the elect of God, holy and beloved, by cultivating every benign, friendly, humble, and gentle temper; by copying the forgiveness through which we are saved; and by putting on that love which is the bond of perfectness, that it may above all appear in every part of our conduct, whilst we follow peace with all men, and are of one mind with those who belong to the Lord's body. We should also seek to be enriched in divine knowledge and wisdom, by a comprehensive acquaintance with the word of Christ; that, being familiarly versed in the Holy Scriptures, we may be thoroughly furnished unto every good work. From this sacred treasury we may deduce instructions for mutual admonition, while we unite in the worship of God, and in praising him with grace in our hearts: and so we shall be habitually led to do every "thing in the name of the "Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God, even the Father, by "him." By these means, our ordinary employments and relative conduct will be sanctified, and made a spiritual sacrifice. Thus the disobedient and disobliging behaviour of wives, and the bitter words and harsh conduct of husbands, will alike be precluded; because such things are not meet for those who are devoted to the Lord. Children will thus learn obedience to their parents, because this is well-pleasing to the Lord: and from the same motives, parents will learn to exercise their authority with prudence and gentleness; not exasperating their children by violent anger or durable resentment, nor discouraging them by disapproving of their endeavours to please. Thus servants will learn to be faithful, diligent, and conscientious in obeying their masters, from fear of God: and regard to his authority and all-seeing eye upon them. In short, true religion will teach every man to do the work of his station heartily, to the best of his ability, and with cheerful diligence, "as unto the Lord, and not to men:" expecting from him the gracious reward of the heavenly inheritance, as the servant of Christ, in obedient faith; and fearing, (when tempted,) to do wrong, lest he should come short of that inheritance, or expose himself to the displeasure of God, who is no Respecter of persons. These principles, and these alone, will render men universally conscientious, in all places and circumstances, from love to Christ, zeal for his glory, a desire of recommending his Gospel, and of possessing the assurance that they are interested in its blessings. But that evangelical profession, which leaves men regardless of relative duties, and gives those, with whom they are connected, just cause for complaint, is very suspicious: and the misconduct in the several relations of life, of some who are zealous for the Gospel, is so evidently and habitually wrong, that there can be no doubt but they deceive themselves, as well as disgrace the cause. Let us then earnestly pray for grace, to enable us to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, in these and in all other things; that the sincerity of our love may be evidenced beyond all reasonable ground of suspicion.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. (Note, Eph. vi. 9.) The concluding admonition of the preceding chapter related to masters, as well as to servants. The former were here exhorted to give their servants that support, and recompense for their labours, which were just and equitable, implying care of them in sickness, provision in old age, and proportionable rewards for extraordinary fidelity and exertions. Thus they should in all things act towards them in a considerate and reasonable manner; not abusing their authority, but remembering their accountableness to their Master in heaven. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2—4. (Notes, Eph. vi. 18—20. Phil. iv. 4—7.) In order to the suitable performance of all the before-mentioned duties, the apostle exhorted the Colossians to persist steadily in prayer; watching against all indisposition and impediments; persevering notwithstanding delays and discouragements; and joining thanksgivings for mercies continually received. He also desired them to pray for him and his brethren in the ministry; that God would give them opportunity and boldness to speak the mystery of Christ; (i. 27;) for which the apostle was then a prisoner; that, both when thus circumstanced, and when set at liberty he might fully manifest the counsel of God, concerning the way of salvation, and the calling of the Gentiles, as he ought to do; without fearing what man could do unto him.

V. 5, 6. (Note, Eph. iv. 29. v. 15—17.) "Wisdom "towards them that were without," might include a prudent caution not to expose themselves needlessly to their persecutors, to which some expositors in a great measure restrict it. But the words contain a general rule of vast extent and importance: implying such habitual propriety, circumspection, and discretion in the whole conduct, as may preserve Christians from being ensnared or drawn into sin by their unconverted neighbours, and from giving them any unfavourable impressions of the Gospel; and such an evident excellency of character, as may silence calumny, soften prejudice, and win upon the beholders to examine into those religious principles, which produce such happy effects. Thus the Colossians ought to "redeem their "time," in acquiring and exercising this heavenly wisdom, to the honour of God and the good of mankind: in order that their conversation might not only be inoffensive, but "always with grace," the genuine language of piety, purity, wisdom, and love; savouring of heavenly things, as meat is preserved and made relishing by being seasoned with salt. (Matt. v. 13.) By attention to these rules, they would know how they ought to answer every man, whether he asked a reason of their hope, and seriously inquired into the nature of Christianity; or whether he desired a solution of some doubt or difficulty; or whether he were disposed to object, cavil, dispute, or revile: for the meekness of heavenly wisdom would dictate a pertinent answer on every occasion, and preserve them from disgraceful contentions. Salt. The wit, smartness, and ingenuity, often accompanied with polluting or profane illusions, which were customary and admired, among the Greeks, was called Attic salt. Probably, the apostle refers to this, but shows his readers a far more excellent way.

V. 9—14. Onesimus, of whom we shall read hereafter, (Philem.) and whom the apostle sent with Tychicus, was formerly an inhabitant of Colosse: the language used concerning him shows how high he now stood in the apostle's estimation. Aristarchus continued with Paul during his imprisonment; (Marg. Ref.) but whether this was voluntary, or whether he was confined with him for the sake of the Gospel, is not certain; the latter, however, is probable. Marcus, or John Mark, nephew to Barnabas, (Marg. Ref) was before this fully reconciled to the apostle; and Paul's unfavourable opinion of him was completely erased, by his subsequent good conduct. Probably, the Colossians had formerly received some injunction from the apostle not to countenance Mark as a minister: but he now reversed it; for he and Aristarchus, with one called Jesus, (a common name among the Jews, and surnamed Justus because of his integrity,) were the only ministers of the circumcision, who had cordially united with him in preaching the kingdom of God among the Gentiles, and who had been a comfort to him. This is generally and justly urged, as absolutely conclusive against the tradition of the papists, that the apostle Peter was at this time bishop of Rome, where he resided twenty-five years. It also renders it highly probable, that Luke was not a Jew, or a circumcised proselyte. Epaphras, a Colossian, a pastor of the Church, and probably its founder, sent his salutations to them. He could not then attend his labours among them, being confined as a prisoner; (Philemon, 23;) but he continually prayed for them so fervently, that he even laboured, or agonized, or wrestled, with God for them; that they might be established in the faith, be steadfast and upright disciples of Christ, and complete in the knowledge and practice of the whole will of God. For the apostle could testify to the greatness of his zeal for the spiritual welfare of the Colossians, and of those other neighbouring churches with which he had been connected. Luke had long been Paul's beloved companion, in travel and in sufferings; he had been educated a physician, but he seems to have been an evangelist, or preacher of the Gospel in the various cities to which he went. With him Demas sent his salutations, of whom we afterwards read an unfavourable account. (2 Tim. iv. 10.)

V. 15, 16. Nymphas seems to have been an eminent Christian at Laodicea, whose well ordered family might properly be called a Christian Church, or a society by whom the Lord was statedly worshipped. The apostle directed this epistle to be read in the neighbouring Church of Laodicea, as it was suited for general instruction; and that an epistle, which they would receive from Laodicea, should be publicly read among them. This direction hath given rise to various conjectures; but probably the apostle had written to the Laodiceans, though the epistle was not preserved. 'For all the epistles which the apostles ever 'wrote are not preserved, any more than all the words 'and actions of our blessed Lord.' (Doddridge.) Some think, that the epistle to the Ephesians was intended to be a kind of circular letter; and that, by private direction, a copy of it was sent to Laodicea, to be thence forwarded to Colosse. Indeed, that epistle contains so little peculiar to the Church at Ephesus, and so much important instruction of general concernment, that this opinion is not improbable.

V. 17. Some suppose Archippus to have been the bishop of Colosse. 'That he should have been then 'bishop of Colosse, and that St. Paul should not write 'one word, or send one salutation, to him, but send to the 'people of Colosse to admonish him of his duty, is not 'very credible.' (Whitby.) 'Archippus being old and 'infirm, received this encouragement from the apostle 'to strengthen him.' (Bengelius.) It is far more probable, that he had been newly appointed to the ministry; and showed some symptoms of timidity or negligence: the apostle therefore sent a message to him in particular, charging him to take heed to his sacred ministry; and to perform fully the several duties of it, with diligence, faithfulness boldness, and zealous affection; for the edification of believers and the conversion of sinners, by sound doctrine, a holy example, fervent prayers, unwearied labours, and every means in his power. For he had "received it "from the Lord," being accountable to him for his conduct in it, entitled to his assistance in his endeavours to act by his authority, and bound to seek his glory, in a decided preference to his own ease, security, interest, reputation, or accommodation.

V. 18. The apostle wrote the salutation with his own hand, as usual: and he called on the Colossians to "remember his bonds," and long-continued suffering for their sake, as Gentile converts: this would confirm them in the faith, render them constant in enduring persecutions for the same cause, and induce them to pay the more entire regard to his admonitions: and he concluded with praying that the grace of God might be with them. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

There is no respect of persons with the Lord; and his ministers must act with similar impartiality, and exhort masters as well as servants, the rich as well as the poor, to the duties of their several stations; and to render to their inferiors "what is just and equal, knowing that they "also have a master in heaven." None of these duties can be performed aright, except we persevere in fervent "prayer, and watch unto it with thanksgiving;" and it is just and equal that masters, professing godliness, should pray for and with their servants, and give them suitable instructions for their souls, as well as a comfortable provision for their temporal life. They who love the Gospel, should always remember faithful ministers in their prayers, beseeching the Lord to assist and prosper all their labours, and to enable them, with suitable plainness and boldness, to declare the mystery of Christ: and they who are exposed to peculiar dangers or sufferings, in the cause of the Gospel, should be especially remembered in the supplications of their brethren. Great wisdom and circumspection are required in all our conduct towards "those that are with-"out;" with whom we are often connected in relative life, and engaged in secular concerns. They will certainly watch and scrutinize our whole behaviour: they will sometimes artfully endeavour to persuade, entice, or provoke us into sin, that they may charge the blame on our religious principles: they will make little allowance for our faults; and even our indiscretions may produce an abiding prejudice against the truth. On the other hand, a sober, discreet, upright, faithful, and friendly conduct, will frequently win upon them, and be greatly instrumental to their good. We ought then to redeem time, that we may employ it in seeking wisdom from the word and Spirit of God, as well as in employing it for the benefit of mankind. We should indeed store our hearts with good treasure, and season them with wisdom and grace, that our speech may always be instructive, and suited to the persons with whom we converse; and that we may know how we ought to answer every man.

V. 7—18.

Christians should desire to know one another's state; and mutual visits or friendly correspondence among faithful ministers and fellow-servants of Christ, may help forward this 'communion of the saints,' excite their prayers for each other, and tend to the comfort of their hearts. What amazing changes doth divine grace make in men's characters! Faithless servants thus become faithful and beloved brethren. Often "the first becomes last, and the "last first," in the visible church: our fears of some who have misbehaved are removed, and they become fellow-workers that are a comfort to us; while our hopes of others are grievously disappointed. But "the Lord knoweth them "that are his:" and we should always "labour fervently "in prayer" for those connected with us, "that they may "stand perfect and complete in the whole will of God;" in this manner testifying our zeal for them, when unable to render them other help. Ministers, especially when they first enter upon their office, or when they seem wavering in it, should be seriously and affectionately exhorted, "to take heed to their ministry, which they have "received of the Lord, that they fulfil it." For the smiles, flatteries, or frowns of the world; the spirit of error, and the various workings of self-love, turn many aside, or lead them into such a style of preaching and living, as comes far short of fulfilling their ministry. Thus their own souls are endangered; their flocks are soothed into a formal profession, or deluded into error; and the promising hopes, that had been entertained of their usefulness, are lamentably disappointed. Let such persons then take heed to themselves and to their doctrine, as those who serve the Lord Jesus; let them remember the counsel of Paul, his bonds for Christ, and his laborious, self-denying faithfulness even unto death: for in preaching his doctrine, imbibing his spirit, and copying his example, we may expect that the favour and blessing of God will be with our souls, and prosper all the labours of our hands.

THE

THESSALONIANS.

In the notes on the concise narrative of the apostle's labours at Thessalonica, it has been shown to be, at least, highly probable, that he continued there a considerable time, preaching to the Gentiles, beyond the three sabbath-days, on which he reasoned with the Jews in the synagogue; and that he was peculiarly successful. (Notes, Acts xvii. 1—15.) He was, however, at length constrained by the persecution of the zealots for the Mosaic law, and the zealots for idolatry, who had formed a most unnatural coalition against him, to leave the newly planted church, under heavy trials, and destitute of many advantages: for, though it seems clear, that pastors had been appointed over them; yet, the pastors themselves must have been new and inexperienced converts. (Note, v. 12—15.) The apostle was, on this account, peculiarly solicitous about them; and Timothy having come to him at Athens, according to his appointment, he chose to be left alone in that city, that he might send this his faithful coadjutor to Thessalonica. But Timothy, returning to him at Corinth, brought him so good an account of them, that he was filled by it with joy and gratitude. He indeed exceedingly longed to visit them: but, having been repeatedly disappointed in his plans for that purpose, he at length wrote this epistle; which breathes a peculiar spirit of paternal love and affection, and shows that he considered the Christians at Thessalonica as equal, or superior, in faith and holiness, to those of any church to which he wrote. It is clear from these particulars, that this epistle was written from Corinth, and not from Athens, according to the spurious postscript; but, probably, soon after the apostle arrived at that city. This is supposed by some expositors to have been as early as A. D. 51; and by others A. D. 54: but, for reasons before given, a rather later date is here assigned to it. (Notes, Acts xv. 1—5. Preface to 1 Corinthians, Gal. ii. 1—5.) It is, however, generally agreed, that it was written before any other of the apostolical epistles; and some think, probably without sufficient reason, before any other part of the New Testament. It was evidently, the leading design of the apostle, in writing to the Thessalonians, to confirm them in the faith, and to animate them to a courageous profession of the Gospel, and the practice of all the duties of Christianity, notwithstanding the persecutions and trials to which they were exposed. In pursuance of his grand object, he was led to mention, with high approbation, the manner in which they had received the Gospel from him; and this almost unavoidably led him to speak of his ministry and conduct among them, in a way peculiarly instructive to the ministers of the Gospel in every age and place. 'It is remarkable, with how much address he improves all the influence, 'which his zeal and fidelity in their service must naturally give him, to inculcate upon them the precepts of the 'Gospel, and persuade them to act agreeably to their sacred character. This was the grand point he always 'kept in view, and to which every thing else was made subservient. Nothing appears, in any part of his 'writings, like a design to establish his own reputation, or to make use of his ascendency over his Christian 'friends, to answer any secular purposes of his own. On the contrary, he discovers a most generous disinterested 'regard for their welfare. The discovery of so excellent a temper, must be allowed to carry with it a strong 'presumptive argument in favour of the doctrines he taught And indeed, whoever reads St Paul's epistles 'with attention, and enters into the spirit with which they were written, will discern such intrinsic characters of 'their genuineness, and the divine authority of the doctrines they contain, as will perhaps produce in him a 'stronger conviction, than all the external evidence with which they are attended.' (Doddridge.) These remarks are well grounded and important; but to suppose, with Dr. Macknight, that the apostle intended, as his main object, to prove the divine authority of Christianity, by a chain of regular arguments, in which he answered the several objections that the heathen philosopers are supposed to have advanced against him, seems quite foreign to the nature of the epistle; and also to be grounded on a mistaken notion, that the philosophers designed at so early a period to enter into a regular disputation with the Christians; when, in fact, they derided them as enthusiasts, and their doctrine as foolishness. It is remarkable, that the apostle, in writing this first epistle, found very much to commend, which he does unreservedly, and scarcely any thing to blame; though he saw it needful to intermix cautions and warnings with his exhortations. The exact, though manifestly undesigned, coincidence of this epistle, with the history contained in the Acts of the apostles, which it tends to elucidate and confirm, is worthy of notice, and may be clearly seen by consulting the marginal references. It appears, that afterward the apostle visited Thessalonica; (Note, Acts xx. 1—5:) but nothing further is found in scripture concerning this flourishing church, except the second epistle which the apostle wrote to it. Thessalonica is now called Salonica or Salonici, and is under the dominion of the Turks, and the inhabitants are generally Mahometans. 'Our epistle concludes with a direction, that it should be publicly 'read in the church to which it was addressed. The existence of this clause, is an evidence of its authenticity: 'because to produce a letter, purporting to have been publicly read in the church at Thessalonica, when no such 'letter had been read or heard of in that church, would be to produce an imposture destructive of itself. Either 'the epistle was publicly read in the church of Thessalonica, during St. Paul's life-time, or it was not. If it 'was, no publication could be more authentic, no species of notoriety more unquestionable, no method of preserv'ing the integrity of the copy more secure. If it was not, the clause—would remain a standing condemnation 'of the forgery, and one would suppose, an invincible impediment to its success.' (Paley.) It may also be added, that the circumstance of this injunction being given, in the first epistle which the apostle wrote, implied a strong and avowed claim to the character of an inspired writer; as, in fact, it placed his writings on the same ground with those of Moses and the ancient prophets.

A. D. 55. CHAP. I. A. D. 55.

The apostle salutes the Christians at Thessalonica, 1; and shows how he thanked God on their behalf, and prayed for them; remembering the fruits of their faith, love, and hope, as evidences of their election. 2—4. He speaks more particularly concerning the happy effects of his success among them; for "receiving the word in much affliction," copying the example of their teachers, and setting good examples to others; their conversion from idols to the service of the true God, and their patient waiting for Jesus, the Deliverer from the wrath to come, soon become known in every place, 6—10.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1—4. Silas, or Silvanus, did not come to the apostle, when driven from Thessalonica and Berea, till after his arrival at Corinth, nor did Timothy return to him; so that the epistle could not be written from Athens. (Acts xvii. 14, 15. xviii. 5) St. Paul joined these two faithful fellow-labourers with himself in this address, to express his affection for the Thessalonians, to whom they were well known. After his usual salutation and introduction, he observed, that he constantly remembered, and mentioned before God in his prayers, their "work "of faith." They professed to believe in Christ, and their active obedience showed that their faith was living, "wrought by love" of Christ and his ministers, truth, and cause; and that this powerful affection induced them to labour strenuously, in all things connected with the honour of Christ, and the benefit and comfort of their brethren. They professed to hope in the promises of God, and to expect eternal life, as his gift in Christ Jesus; and this living hope rendered them patient, and constant in their adherence to him, amidst tribulations and persecutions. These graces and duties they attended to, as "in the sight "of God," even their reconciled Father; and the apostle was satisfied, from what he had witnessed, that they were his brethren beloved, and the elect of God in Jesus Christ. This he did not speak as a matter of immediate revelation; but his favourable conclusion respecting them was drawn, by tracing back the effects of divine grace, in their conversion, to the source of them in their election. The purpose of God, in calling the Gentiles collectively, could not be known in this manner, and indeed some of the Thessalonians were Jewish converts. And in what sense a remnant of Thessalonians, (that is, of the inhabitants of one city,) could prove the national election of the Macedonians, they who adopt this opinion would do well to inform us. Some explain the words to mean election to external privileges, as Israel had been chosen: but an external profession of Christianity was sufficient to prove this; whereas the apostle grounds his confidence respecting the Thessalonians on "their work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope," "things which," no doubt, "accompany "salvation." He had once indeed had his fears of them; but subsequent tidings from them had fully satisfied him; (iii. 5—7:) yet, if any individuals did not show the same 'active faith, laborious love, and patient hope,' as the rest did, they were exceptions also to the apostle's general confidence, respecting the professed Christians at Thessalonica.

V. 5—8. The Gospel, which the apostle and his associates preached, had come to the Thessalonians "not in "word only:" it had not been left to its natural efficacy, or the power of arguments and persuasion on their minds. Numbers had thus heard it in many places, who nevertheless continued to live in idolatry and iniquity; but it had come "with power and with the Holy Ghost," that is, with the power of the Holy Spirit. This cannot relate to miracles exclusively; for many saw miracles, and yet remained unbelievers; but the new-creating power of the Holy Spirit, accompanying the word of God, had produced such a full conviction of its nature and importance, and such an assurance of faith and hope, as had induced the Thessalonians at all events to embrace and profess the Gospel; even as a ship is carried, by a full tide and a fair wind, over every obstacle, into the haven. For they knew and observed what manner of men the preachers of Christianity were among them for their sakes; while they witnessed their patience, self-denial, diligence, holiness, and love; and that they laboured with their own hands for a maintenance, that they might not be burdensome to the converts: and this induced them to attend to their doctrine, so that they joined themselves to these despised servants of a crucified Saviour; they associated themselves with them in divine worship; they copied their examples; and, in doing so, became imitators of the Lord himself. Thus they received the word into their hearts, amidst great afflictions in their circumstances, and from their persecutors: yet had they such joy from the Holy Spirit, as made them ample amends. (Marg. Ref.) In this manner they became examples, not only to their idolatrous neighbours, but even to believers in other parts of Macedonia, and in Achaia: for the Gospel was soon spread from Thessalonica into those regions, by persons who went out for that purpose. In all places whither the apostle travelled, the report of the conversion and good conduct of the Thessalonians had arrived before him: and they who came to him from other parts declared the same.

V. 9, 10. In every city the apostle met with those, who joyfully mentioned his prosperous entrance with the Gospel among the Thessalonians; and how they had been converted from the worship of idols, either dead men, or imaginary beings, or evil spirits, to serve and worship "the one living and true God," by faith in Christ; and to wait for the Saviour's coming from heaven to raise the dead and judge the world, in believing and patient hope, diligent preparation, and universal conscientiousness. For they were fully assured, that God the Father had raised him from the dead, and advanced him to the mediatorial throne, to reign at his right hand, till all enemies should be put

CHAP. II.

The apostle reminds the Thessalonians of his affectionate faithful labours and holy manner of life among them, 1—12. He expresses his satisfaction, as to the manner in which they had received the gospel; and their constancy amid persecution, 13, 14: and speaks of the guilt and ruin of the unbelieving Jews, 15, 16. He shows his joy on their account, his desire of seeing them again, and his hope of a joyful meeting at the coming of Christ, 17—20.

under his feet. Him therefore they looked and waited for, as their great Deliverer from "the wrath to come." To this wrath, both Jews and Gentiles had been justly exposed for their sins; and under this they must all have finally perished, if the Son of God had not become incarnate, performed his suretyship obedience to the law, laid down his life as a vicarious Sacrifice, risen as the First-fruits of the resurrection, ascended into heaven to be the Advocate of sinners, sent forth his Gospel to call men to partake of this salvation, and accompanied it by the power of his Spirit, to overcome the proud and carnal opposition of their hearts. Thus he had delivered them from the merited wrath of God, which is coming, and will for ever be coming, upon all impenitent and unbelieving sinners: of this deliverance their conversion was the sure evidence, and, having this earnest and pledge of final salvation, they waited in joyful hope for that solemn season, which will complete the felicity of believers, and the destruction of the wicked.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It gives cordial joy and fervent gratitude to faithful ministers, when they witness "the work of faith, and "labour of love, and patience of hope in the Lord Jesus," of those among whom they have preached the Gospel. This puts vigour into their prayers and praises for them; as evidencing, that they are "in God the Father and our Lord Jesus "Christ;" partakers of "mercy, grace, and peace;" "beloved brethren," and "the elect of God." But faith which worketh not obedience, professed love that declines self-denying labour, and hope which is separated from "patient continuance in well-doing," can never prove a man's "election." All other ways of proving it than that here prescribed are vain and delusory; and this scriptural medium is not capable of being abused. Alas! even the Gospel which the apostle preached often comes in word only; and thus men continue impenitent, and slaves to sin, or at most, become only notional formalists and mere professors. This should excite all who preach, and all who love the Gospel, to pray without ceasing, that it may every where, and at all times, be attended by the divine power of the Holy Spirit; producing in the minds and hearts of men that full assurance of its truth and importance, which alone will prevail with them to break through all hinderances, and make all sacrifices, that they may follow Christ, and be partakers of his salvation. This is the work of God; but he works by means: and when ministers evidently set before the people an edifying example, so that by imitating them they follow Christ also, it is very conducive to their conviction and conversion. When this happy change is effected, and sinners join themselves to those who walk as Christ walked: they are often enabled to receive the word, amidst poverty, contempt, and manifold afflictions, with abundant joy in the Holy Ghost. Thus they become good examples to their families and neighbours, and even to their fellow-christians; the word of God sounds forth from them to others; and they zealously embrace every opportunity of diffusing this heavenly light. And when great numbers of careless, ignorant, and immoral persons are turned from their idols and iniquities, their worldly pursuits and connexions, to serve the living and true God; to believe in and obey the Lord Jesus; to "deny ungodliness and "worldly lusts; to live soberly, righteously, and godly in "this present world;" and to "wait for the Lord Jesus from heaven," as "believing that he will come to be their "Judge," and hoping 'to be numbered with his saints in 'glory everlasting;' the fact speaks for itself: there needs little pains to spread the report, for it is a work of God, that will be sure to be known, and rendered conspicuous by its own light. May he then send forth ministers into all parts of the world, attended by his power, and thus made abundantly successful, in the conversion of the nations to the worship of the living God, and the obedience of faith in his Son! But let us remember, "that "the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all "ungodliness and unrighteousness of men." All temporal miseries, terminating in death, are the effects of that wrath: Jesus did not come to deliver us from these sufferings, but from "the wrath to come," the everlasting misery of hell. None but Jesus can deliver any man from this merited condemnation: all, who believe in him with an obedient faith, are delivered from it, and all others are exposed to it, "for the wrath of God abideth on them:" for if all true Christians once were exposed to this wrath, all they whom Jesus has not delivered must be still exposed to it. Let us then examine this most important matter with proportionable seriousness; let us give diligence to make our calling and election sure; if we have obtained this assurance, let us remember the price which our deliverance cost the great Redeemer, that humble love may constrain us devotedly to obey him, and cheerfully to suffer for him. But, if any are conscious that they have not experienced this deliverance, let them take warning, without delay "to flee from the wrath to come," and to seek refuge in Christ and his salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—8. The Thessalonians well knew, that the apostle and his fellow-labourers did not come among them with empty speculations, or in an inefficacious manner: but they were sensible, that it was a well-grounded testimony, and not a vague report, which had been spread abroad concerning them. (i. 9.) Having been, by immediate revelation, directed to go into Macedonia, they had not yielded to discouraging fears, when they suffered the most severe, ignominious, and iniquitous usage at Philippi; (Notes, Acts xvi:) but, as soon as they were set at liberty, they came to Thessalonica; and there boldly, in dependence on God and from zeal for his glory, they preached that Gospel of which he was the Author. This they did with great earnestness of spirit, and strong desires of their conversion; and with the most constant perseverance, notwithstanding the opposition of the Jews, the disputings which they were constrained to maintain with them, and the persecutions which awaited them. For their exhortations were not suited to beguile men, either into false notions, or licentious practices; nor had they any sinister or selfish motives. On the contrary, they were most fully assured of the divine authority and excellency of the doctrine which they taught, and conscious of the utmost integrity, purity, and sincerity, in their endeavours to propagate it. For as they had been approved by God himself, and marked out to be "stewards of his mysteries," and intrusted with the Gospel: so they had spoken with the most simple and sincere desire of approving themselves faithful to him, and meeting with his acceptance; knowing that he would scrutinize and prove the secret intentions of every heart. They had not indeed at all sought to please men, for the sake of their own ease, interest, reputation, or accommodation; or in any way, except as conducive to their edification. (Note, 1 Cor. iv. 1—5. Gal. i. 10.) They had never, on any occasion, employed flattering words, to soothe their hearers into a delusive opinion of their good estate or character, to palliate their sins, or to compliment their endowments or virtues. This the Thessalonians knew; being sensible that they addressed them in the plainest and most convincing language; and God himself was witness, that they had never made religion, or their ministry, a cloak to cover any avaricious designs. Nor had they courted applause, or aspired at authority, or honour, among them, or any other Christians; on the contrary, they even receded from their due, and would not burden them by requiring a maintenance. This was a mark of respect, which the other apostles generally received from the churches, and Paul had as just a claim to it as they: but he did not insist upon it, either for himself or his companions; because he was aware that it would have been burdensome to the people, as they were in low circumstances. In this, and in all other respects, they had imitated the gentleness of a nursing mother to her beloved infant, whom she deems it a pleasure to suckle and attend on, and has the desired recompense of her disinterested assiduity, when it thrives and is in health. Thus, being affectionately desirous of their spiritual growth and prosperity, they were not only willing to impart the Gospel to them; but the tenderest feelings of their hearts accompanied their labours. They readily spent their strength, employed all their knowledge and ability, exhausted their spirits, and even ventured their lives for them, because they were dear to them; and they desired no other recompense, than the "furtherance, and joy of faith" of their beloved people.

13 ¶ For this cause also [l] thank we God without ceasing, [m] because, when ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but (as it is in truth,) [n] the word of God, which [o] effectually worketh also in you that believe.

14 For ye, brethren, [p] became followers of [q] the churches of God, which in Judea [r] are in Christ Jesus: for [s] ye also have suffered like things of your own countrymen, [t] even as they have of the Jews;

15 Who both [u] killed the Lord Jesus, and their own prophets, and have * persecuted us; and they [x] please not God, and are [y] contrary to all men:

16 [z] Forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles, [a] that they might be saved, [b] to fill up their sins alway: [c] for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost.

V. 9—12. The Thessalonians could well remember the disinterested labour and fatiguing toil of the apostle and his associates: for they not only employed the day in the various parts of their ministerial duty, or in working hard for a subsistence, but they bereaved themselves of rest, spending the whole, or a considerable part of the night, in the same manner: lest, by being chargeable to any of their hearers, they should prevent their own success. Thus they faithfully preached to them the Gospel of God: and the Thessalonians could witness, (as the Lord himself also would,) in what a holy, upright, and blameless manner they behaved themselves; not only in those things which unbelievers might have noticed, but also in their most retired and intimate behaviour, among such as believed the Gospel; so that none of them had seen any thing, but what evinced the greatest purity, probity, sincerity, and holy love. They had also exhorted and animated them with every consolatory topic, and charged them with authority, as testifying the will of God concerning them, to copy their example. And as a wise and affectionate father uses arguments, persuasions, encouragements, and commands, in directing the conduct of his children: so they had used the same means, of inducing them to walk worthy of the holy perfections of that God whom they worshipped, and who had so graciously called them from the power of darkness into the kingdom of his Son, that they might be trained up on earth, for the eternal glory and holy felicity of heaven. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13—16. The apostle and his friends thanked God continually, because the Thessalonians had not treated "the word of hearing of God;" or the word of God, which they had heard from them, as "the word of man:" which may be disputed against, rejected, or even derided, without material criminality or detriment, however plausible or ingenious it may be. On the contrary, they had received it "as the word of God," (which it certainly was;) and had accordingly reverenced it, believed it, and obeyed it. Thus it had effectually wrought in their hearts, repentance of sin, hatred of idolatry, faith in Christ, love to him and his cause, delight in the worship and service of God, a supreme valuation of his favour, and a realizing view of eternal things. In this manner, they became imitators of the Christian churches in Judea, in doctrine, worship, and holy obedience: and they adhered to the truth and will of Christ, patiently and cheerfully, amidst the persecutions which they endured from their neighbours, who were instigated by the unbelieving Jews; even as the Christians in Judea were hated and persecuted by those of their own nation. Nor should this excite any astonishment; seeing the Jews, though professed worshippers of God, had murdered the promised Messiah, (as their ancestors had done the prophets;) and they persecuted the apostles and disciples of Christ, from a proud and blind zeal for the law, and the glosses and traditions of the elders. In this they were far from pleasing God, nay, they exceedingly provoked him: and they were contrary to all men, and opposed as much as possible the salvation both of Jews and Gentiles. Especially, as they prohibited, and did all in their power to hinder, the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles; as if they could not endure that they should be saved. Thus, with ceaseless efforts, they filled up the measure of their personal and national iniquities, for which the wrath of God was, even then, about to come upon them to the uttermost; in the destruction of their city and temple; the slaughter of immense multitudes of their nation; the scattering, enslaving, and abject miseries of the survivors; and the most unheard of calamities of every kind, pursuing them into every region of the earth, throughout numerous successive generations. (Notes, Matt. xxiii. 34—39. xxiv. Marg. Ref.) The morose and unsocial bigotry of the Jews, respecting all Gentiles, from the time when they ceased to copy their idolatries, is largely insisted on by commentators in general; and the testimony of Gentiles is adduced in proof of it. This evidence, however, is not much to be regarded: for if the Jews had shown the most compassionate, liberal, and friendly attention to idolaters in temporal things, while they steadily adhered to the divine law, by separating from them in all things relating to religion, the clamour of the Gentiles against their bigotry would not have been silenced, if it had been even abated. The steady refusal, of what some have called an intercommunity of deities and religious rites, would have sufficed to keep up the prejudice against Jews, and the disdain of them, among the proud Greeks and Romans; for the same reasons, that no philanthropy or liberality can exempt those from contempt and reproach, even among professed Christians, who unreservedly avow their attachment to the doctrines of the Gospel, as their rule of faith, and the precepts of Christ, as their rule of conduct. The Jews were, however, in this respect, very faulty; and so are many Christians: but the grand point which here demands consideration, is this; that the determined opposition of the Jewish nation to the preaching of the Gospel among the Gentiles was the immediate cause of wrath coming on them to the uttermost. Let Britain, let every Briton, tremble at the thought of opposing the cause of missions among the heathen, as too many are disposed to do, lest wrath come upon us also to the uttermost. 'They who obstruct the 'progress of the Gospel, and persecute the promoters of 'it, are the ministers of Satan, and therefore bear his 'name.' (18.) (Whitby.)

V. 17—20. The apostle had been forced from the Thessalonians, but his affections were still with them. The separation (for he had left them with as much reluctance as a parent parts with his children, whom he leaves as orphans in this evil world,) was only for a short season, or for the space of one hour, 'for the apostle's mind was 'full of the ideas of eternity, which did, as it were, an'nihilate any period of mortal life.' (Doddridge.) He had, however, been exceedingly desirous of returning to them, which he had attempted with abundant earnestness: (for in this he spake of himself, as Timothy had visited them again, and perhaps Silvanus also;) but Satan, by exciting disturbances and opposition to him at Berea, and in other places, had hindered him from effecting his purpose, as he could not have come with propriety. Otherwise, they might be sure, that he gladly would have come, and that he would embrace the first opportunity of so doing. For what, did they suppose, was the object of his hope in the work of the ministry, but such success as he had met with among them? Or, what was his joy and crown of exultation in that respect, but to see numbers of such affectionate converts to Christ as they were; whom he could look upon, as those in whom he should rejoice before the Lord Jesus, when he would come to judge the world? For indeed he and his brethren did not glory, or rejoice, in their gifts, popularity, or excellency of speech; but in being prospered by God, as his instruments in the conversion of sinners, and in encouraging believers to a holy walk and conversation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

Confidence in God, zeal for his glory, love to the souls of men, and conscious integrity, will support faithful ministers amidst manifold hardships and sufferings: and when they have been shamefully used in one place, they will not decline further labours and perils, but will be courageous in speaking the Gospel of God in another situation. Even when their ministry excites the opposition of unbelievers, and constrains them to engage in argument, and to contend earnestly for the truth, though they love peace, and hate disputatious contests, they must persevere in their testimony, for they cannot but speak the things which they have heard and known. All ministers should be careful, that their preaching be free from fallacy, deceit, and a licentious tendency; and that their motives be equally pure from all artful designs of advancing, enriching, and indulging themselves, by means of their ministry. For such discoveries have been made, respecting priests of different religions, that men are very apt to suspect some fraud, or corrupt intention, to be lurking under a great appearance of zeal and devotion. It is in vain to oppose arguments to this deep-rooted suspicion, except they are corroborated by manifest facts. We should consider ourselves, as "allowed of God to be put in trust "with the Gospel;" and recollect that this is of all others the most important stewardship: our faithfulness in it will produce the happiest consequences; but unfaithfulness will constitute the most aggravated guilt, and ensure the deepest condemnation. We should therefore by no means seek to please men; but simply study to approve ourselves to God, who trieth the hearts. Even the approbation of godly men may be fallacious, and may interfere with our simplicity, in aiming to please the Lord by faithfulness to our trust. A man may indeed, by harshness and severity in his manner of stating the truth, prevent his own usefulness; but selfish principles will far more generally lead men to temporize, to palliate, and to speak smooth things. This puts hearers into a good humour with themselves, and that makes them friendly to the preacher; which may be very conducive to his secular advantage, and for a time even add to his reputation. It is therefore a very great thing indeed, for a minister to be able on good grounds to say, "Neither at any time used we flattering words, as "ye know, nor a cloak of covetousness, God is witness; "nor of men sought we glory:" and to be able to appeal both to the Lord and to men, that he hath constantly receded even from his equitable claims, out of love to the souls of his hearers, and lest he should be burdensome to them. But when this decided faithfulness, this unambitious, disinterested, and self-denying plainness of speech, on all occasions, unites with equal tenderness and affection, so that the same persons can say, "We were gentle "among you, even as a nursing mother cherisheth her "children: so, being affectionately desirous of you, we "were willing to have imparted unto you, not the Gospel "of God only, but also our own souls, because ye were "dear unto us:" then the servants of Christ come as near to the mind of their Lord, as can be conceived attainable by mortal men. There are, however, but few, who are not warped one way or the other, by constitution, habit, or circumstances: it behooves us therefore to search out our spirits, to be open to conviction, and to guard against our own peculiar weakness. If we are desirous of the character of able, faithful, and affectionate ministers of Christ, we should not shrink from labour and toil, day or night; we should cheerfully endure hardship, both in preaching the Gospel, and also in diligent endeavours to avoid being chargeable to those who are unable, or unwilling, to assist us: and we should have a noble ambition of being able to appeal to men, as well as unto God, that we have behaved ourselves with purity and equity, and in a blameless manner, among them, with whom we were most conversant. This will give energy to our words, whilst we exhort, encourage, and charge our people, "to walk worthy of "God, who hath called them to his kingdom and glory." Indeed, we ought always to have their welfare at heart, as a father hath that of his children; and to seek it with the same affectionate and assiduous earnestness, from the most disinterested motives.

V. 13—20.

We should give thanks to God without ceasing, in behalf of those who receive the Gospel from us, not as the opinion of fallible men, but as the "sure testimony of the "Lord, which giveth wisdom to the simple." This it certainly is, as far as any man preaches according to the scriptures, however unlearned, obscure, or frail, the preacher may be. When thus received with reverent faith and obedient attention, it works effectually an entire change in the judgment, disposition, and characters of men: they become followers, not of this or the other leader of a sect, but of the primitive Christians; and may expect to be reviled and persecuted by their neighbours, (as far as outward circumstances will admit,) even as they were of the Jews. For the same nature is in men of every age and clime, which was in those who killed the Lord Jesus and the holy prophets, and who persecuted the apostles and disciples of the Saviour; and Satan, who "worketh in the "children of disobedience," hates the pure Gospel of Christ, and the faithful preaching of it to sinners of all descriptions, as much as he did of old. But they who would forbid us thus to preach to the chief of sinners, and to those who are dead in sin, and to evangelize the heathen, that they may be saved, do not in this please God, and they are contrary to all men. The object and motives of those in general, who would hinder the preaching of the Gospel, in any part of the world, are manifest; but it is grievous to think, that some apparently pious men, misled by an undue attachment to system, should countenance the conduct of those who, in every age, are actuated by the same proud and bigoted selfish spirit, which influenced the Jews of old, when filling up the measure of their sins, till wrath came upon them to the uttermost. The affectionate and faithful ministers of Christ, may be forced from those with whom their hearts are most united; and they may be frustrated, through the devices of Satan, in their most earnest desires and endeavours of coming to them again; yet their separation will be only for a short space. Their hope and joy are intimately connected with the spiritual growth and fruitfulness of those who have profited by their labours. They are now "their crown of rejoicing," far more than all possible commendation from other men. And they will meet them, in the presence of the Lord Jesus, at his coming, as their glory and joy; and then all the pangs of their partings and separations will be richly and eternally compensated.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—5. (Notes, Acts xvii. 15. xviii. 1—6.) Timothy came from Berea to Athens, whilst Paul was there, but it seems that Silas did not. The apostle, being anxious about the new converts at Thessalonica, could not endure to remain any longer in suspense, or to act as if he were unconcerned for their welfare: he therefore chose to be left alone at Athens, though that must have been very inconvenient to him: and he sent back Timothy to Thessalonica, to establish the Christians of that city in the faith by suitable instructions, which he was eminently qualified to give them; and to exhort and encourage them to hold fast

6 But now, [o] when Timotheus came from you unto us, [p] and brought us good tidings of your [q] faith and charity, [r] and that ye have good remembrance of us always, [s] desiring greatly to see us, as we also to see you:

their profession, whatever opposition they met with, by assuring them of peculiar protection, consolation, and reward. This was intended to prevent any of them from being moved to renounce or disguise their faith, by means of the afflictions to which it exposed them; for they could not but know, if they understood the nature of their profession, that the disciples of Christ were appointed to have fellowship with him in his sufferings. Their situation amidst the enemies of God, and their doctrine and character, would render contempt and enmity unavoidable: Satan would certainly stir up persecutions as far as he could: and it pleased the Lord to appoint them a certain measure of suffering, for the trial of their faith, the progress of their sanctification, and the honour of the powerful and excellent effects of his grace in them. This the apostle had plainly and confidently predicted, and warned them to expect, when he was with them, even before the persecution had begun: he had never allowed them to be deluded by any expectation of peace or prosperity; but had taught them to look for tribulations from without, and for inward consolations. Accordingly it had come to pass; he and his associates had been driven from them by furious persecutions; and as he had left them in the midst of this fiery trial, he had sent to see how they had stood it, and whether their faith had thus been proved genuine; for he could not wholly divest himself of solicitude, lest the tempter, even Satan, should have prevailed against them, by his manifold artifices, to renounce the faith, and comply with the idolatry of their neighbours; and lest thus his unwearied labours for their good should prove in vain.—(Note i. 1—4.) Some would explain what the apostle here speaks of persecution, exclusively of himself and the other apostles and evangelists; as if the enemies of Christianity used this circumstance for an argument against its divine original; and as if the danger of the Thessalonians arose, not from any persecutions to which they themselves were exposed, but from the vain reasonings of their heathen neighbours, respecting those which the apostle endured, and his leaving Thessalonica on account of them. But the Thessalonians were themselves exposed to persecution; as all must expect to be, "who live godly in "Christ Jesus;" and what they suffered or dreaded would be, at least, as likely to "move them," as any reasonings of their enemies. The apostle continued to speak in the plural number, though the context evinces that he meant it only of himself. This he seems to have done in some other places; but it was from modesty, as only one of many ministers who were of the same mind, and not from any affectation of dignity.

V. 6—10. During Timothy's absence, Paul departed from Athens to Corinth; whither Timothy returned to him, and Silas also. The tidings which he received from Thessalonica, concerning the faith and love of the brethren in that city, and their affectionate remembrance of him, and earnest reciprocal desire to see him, were so satisfactory, that they not only relieved his mind from anxiety, but abundantly compensated for all his other trials and distresses, and filled his benevolent heart with consolation. For indeed he seemed to enjoy life with great relish, and to live to some purpose, when his spiritual children stood fast in the faith, hope, love, and obedience of the Gospel. Nor could he find language to express the gratitude he owed to God, and the thanks which he now again was excited to render him, on their account, and for that overflowing joy, with which this inspired his heart before God; whilst night and day he poured out his unremitted prayers, that he might have the satisfaction of once again seeing them, and of perfecting what was wanting in their faith, whether in respect of knowledge in the truths and promises of God, or the vigour of their believing dependence on them. 'The apostle here gives an excellent 'pattern to all the bishops and pastors of the church, to 'be continually solicitous to know of the welfare of their flock; incessantly praying for it, blessing God daily for it; and looking upon it as the very felicity of their own lives.' (Whitby.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11—13. The apostle closed the expressions of his affectionate and pious fervour of holy exultation, by writing down the requests of his heart for the Christians at Thessalonica. He earnestly besought "God, even our "Father, and our Lord Jesus," as the incarnate Son, the Head over all things to his church, to direct, and make plain his way unto them, by removing all those providential hinderances which had hitherto prevented him ; and he entreated the Lord Jesus, (for as the former clause is an undeniable act of divine worship rendered to Christ as One with the Father, so this also seems to have been addressed to him ;) that by further communications from his fulness, he would cause them to increase in love of one another, and of all men, not excepting their persecutors ; according to the various exercises of that holy affection required by the commandments of God ; and to abound in every one of them, according to the nature and measure of the apostle's fervent, spiritual, and enlarged love of them.—This he desired, in order to the establishment of their hearts in holiness ; and that their affections, tempers, and conduct, might be unblameable, in every part of their various duties to God, towards each other, and towards all men, in the several relations of life ; and that it might be manifested that they were so, as in the presence of their holy and heart-searching God and Father, in that decisive day, when the Lord Jesus should come with all his holy ones, whether angels or redeemed sinners, to judge the quick and dead. (Col. i. 22.) For the souls of the redeemed, who died in the Lord, will descend with him from heaven, to be reunited to their glorified bodies ; and the saints on earth will be changed, and meet the Lord in the air. 'This invocation of Christ must suppose him omniscient, 'omnipresent, and the Searcher of all hearts ; and these 'are the properties of God alone.' (Whitby.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The love which the zealous ministers of Christ bear to their people, and the longing desires after their salvation which they feel, cannot wholly be separated from painful solicitude on their account. This often disposes them to renounce their own conveniency, and to endure fatigue, in order to obtain satisfaction concerning them, and to promote their spiritual benefit. And it is a great advantage for such as are engaged at a distance from those, of whom they are thus affectionately desirous to have faithful fellow-labourers, whom they may employ in establishing and comforting them concerning their faith. In the most peaceful times, every Christian should count his cost, and remember that the followers of Christ are appointed to suffer affliction ; and ministers should not shun to forewarn their hearers, that they may be prepared for the cross, and meet every trial with watchfulness, and prayer ; as in this manner they will best be preserved constant and steadfast in the faith. For the tempter hath many artful devices : he knows how to suit his suggestions to men's dispositions, and to avail himself of their circumstances ; and he will be sure to work on their hopes, fears, desires, or aversions, by the most subtle methods imaginable. So many, who have for a time made a creditable profession of the Gospel, have been overcome in the day of trial, that the experienced minister will generally feel a degree of anxiety ; and he will not fail to caution the people to be on their guard, lest by some means "the tempter should tempt "them, and his labour should be in vain." But in proportion to these solicitudes will be his rejoicing, when he finds that his beloved children stand fast in the faith, and walk in love ; and that their remembrance of him, and affection to him, correspond with his feelings towards them. In proportion as he has the mind of St. Paul, he will be "comforted over them in all his affliction and distress by "their faith :" the pleasure of his life will greatly consist in seeing them stand fast in the Lord, walking in his ordinances and commandments blameless, and in no degree moved by the reproaches of their enemies. He will feel, that he can never sufficiently thank God, for all the joy which de derives from them, and the testimony of the acceptance of his labours, which their conversion implies ; and if he be absent from them, such good tidings of them will draw out his soul in more fervent prayers to God continually ; that he may again enjoy the comfort of their beloved society, and perfect what is lacking in their faith, to whatever hardships or perils this may expose him. Thus will he beseech God, even our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, to direct his way unto them ; that he may again on earth meet with those whom he so tenderly loves ; and that especially, the Lord would make them to "increase, "and abound in love one towards another, and towards all "men ;" and thus, (for love is the fulfilling of the law,) "establish their hearts unblameable in holiness, before "God our Father, at the coming of the Lord Jesus, with "all his saints ;" when all such desires and prayers will fully be accomplished. May the Lord make all, who are called the ministers of Christ, partakers of this faithful, loving, diligent, and disinterested spirit ; and may he prosper all their labonrs, and comfort their hearts, with numbers of converts like these Thessalonians !

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—5. It only remained for the apostle to entreat the Thessalonians, with the most affectionate persuasions, and to exhort them, with earnestness and authority, to abound more and more in the practice of all those duties, concerning which he had before instructed them. They had received these instructions in an obedient and teachable manner; and thus had learned how they ought to order their whole conduct, that they might please God in all their actions; and he now called upon them to be still more zealous in every good work, and assiduous in cultivating every holy disposition. It was indeed unnecessary for him to enter into an exact detail of particulars, as they knew what commandments he had given them in the name, and by the authority, of the Lord Jesus, for their sanctification, or entire separation from all evil, and consecration to God; the complete mortification of the old corrupt nature, and the renewal of their souls to the divine image, by the influences of the Holy Spirit, through faith, constituted the will of God respecting them. It was especially incumbent upon them to abstain from fornication, (as well as from adultery and other vile abominations, which were generally practised among the Gentiles,) that so every one of them might understand in what manner to possess his body, the receptacle of his rational soul, in a sanctified and honourable use of all its members. as instruments of righteousness unto God, and in an exact government of every sense and appetite, according to the divine law, and the ends intended by the all-wise Creator. Thus every man would act honourably, as a rational creature, and a worshipper of God; whereas all the defilements of the imagination and affections, and every kind of inordinate or forbidden indulgence, according to "the lust of concupiscence," would be exceedingly disgraceful to a Christian, being an imitation of the vile practices of the Gentiles, the worshippers of impure deities, and strangers to the holy character, law, and truth of God.

V. 6—8. In like manner the apostle warned the Thessalonians not to over-reach, or defraud, their brethren or neighbours, in any transaction, either by taking advantage of their ignorance, necessity, or credulity, by exacting immoderate profits, or by any of those tricks and subterfuges, which selfishness devises to impose upon the unwary, without blasting men's credit, or incurring punishment by human laws. Such persons might not be detected, or could not be called to account by men: but the Lord would not suffer their hypocrisy and injustice to escape with impunity, being himself the Avenger of all such clandestine frauds and impositions. Of this the apostle had before warned them, when he was with them, and he had testified that these practices should not escape the vengeance of God. For the Lord had not called them into his family, in order to give them a license to live in an unholy manner, either by gratifying their sensual appetites, or their avarice, but that they might be taught, inclined, and enabled to walk before him in holiness. The word "uncleanness," here used, has led many learned expositors to explain the sixth verse of clandestine adultery. But, if fornication were forbidden, adultery must be of course; for even the Gentiles condemned the latter, whilst they connived at the former; nay, in fact publicly sanctioned it, when committed only with slaves and courtezans, as it is evident from the writings of Demosthenes, Cicero, and others. This interpretation is far from the most obvious meaning of the passage; dishonesty is as inconsistent with Christianity as lewdness; and, in this over-reaching, fraudulent manner, perhaps even more common; and the word uncleanness may either be referred to what went before, or be understood as a general word for wickedness, all which is filthiness in the sight of God. (Marg. Ref.) Notwithstanding the excellent state of the Thessalonian Church, there might some creep in among them, who would speak of the doctrines and comforts of Christianity, and yet affect to despise these practical exhortations, as inconsistent with the grace and liberty of the Gospel; but the apostle reminded them. that, in so doing, they did not despise him, Silvanus, or Timothy, but God himself, who had given them his Holy Spirit, by whose inspiration these exhortations had been written. 'In 'this passage St. Paul asserts his own inspiration, in the 'strongest terms, and with the greatest solemnity.' (Macknight.)

11 And [f] that ye [g] study to be quiet, [h] and to do your own business, and [i] to work with your own hands, as we commanded you;

12 That [k] ye may walk honestly towards [l] them that are without, and that ye may have lack of * nothing.

13 ¶ But [m] I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them [n] which are asleep, that [o] ye sorrow not even as others [p] which have no hope.

14 For [q] if we believe that Jesus died, and rose again, even so them also which [r] sleep in Jesus will [s] God bring with him.

V. 9—12. As to the new commandment, which Christ had given his disciples, of loving one another, the apostle need not write to them concerning the reasons, nature, exercises, fruits, and blessed effects of it; for they were inwardly taught of God, by the illumination of the Holy Spirit, thus to do; it was an essential disposition of the new man, which counteracted and overpowered the selfishness of their old nature. (Marg. Ref.) Indeed, they did exercise that holy affection, not only among one another, but towards all the Christians of the several churches in Macedonia; yet he would exhort them to increase more and more in the fervency of their love, and in all the fruits of it. And while men in general aspired to eminence, reputation, or authority, by an intermeddling and turbulent conduct, it should be their ambition, (so the original literally signifies,) to behave quietly, peaceably, and contentedly, in their own situations, however low and obscure; and to attend diligently to their proper work, in the community, in the Church, and in relative life. And as most of them were poor, they ought to be industrious in their manual labour, as the apostle had commanded them, at the same time that he laboured for his bread among them. Thus they would be enabled to act honestly and creditably among their unbelieving neighbours; paying all their dues, maintaining their families decently, and being preserved from seeking relief by any dishonourable services or compliances, as not having any want of things suited to their station, or requisite in order to relieve one another in their distresses.

V. 13—18. (Notes, 1 Cor. xv. 23. 50—54.) Perhaps the apostle heard, that some of the Thessalonian believers had lately died: and that their relatives and brethren were greatly dejected about them, as not duly attending to the consolations suggested by the Gospel. He therefore would not have them to be ignorant concerning those who were fallen asleep in Christ, that they were in a safe and happy estate; as it was not proper for them to sorrow on such occasions in so disconsolate a manner, or with such outward expressions of violent grief, as they who had no hope respecting their deceased friends, or expectation of meeting them again, were used to do. For since they believed that Jesus died for their sins, and "rose again for their justification," they might thence assuredly infer, that God would raise again incorruptible the bodies of those who slept in Jesus, that they might be produced with him, and presented by him, at the last day. Death was become only a sleep through Jesus, as the body felt no pain, and the soul was present with the Lord in holiness and felicity. He must therefore inform them, by immediate revelation from the Lord, that such of the whole multitude of believers, as should be found alive at his coming, would not enter into the full enjoyment of heavenly felicity, in body and soul, before their brethren who had previously died, and been buried. For at that solemn period, the Lord Jesus will be seen to descend from heaven, with the acclamations of attending angels, and the voice of an arch-angel, who will be appointed to lead the hierarchies of heaven on this illustrious occasion, and with the trumpet of God, sounding in a manner similar to what it did from mount Sinai, but far more loud and tremendous. Then, all that are in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of Man, and shall come forth, but the dead in Christ shall rise first, and be rendered incorruptible, even before their brethren who never died shall be changed. Immediately after, these will be changed, and their bodies become immortal and spiritual; and thus will they be suddenly taken up together into the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; that, being approved as heirs of the kingdom, the whole company may be his assessors in judgment, and then re-enter heaven with him triumphantly; and so will they be for ever with the Lord. Wherefore the apostle exhorted the Thessalonians to comfort and encourage themselves and each other with these animating topics, under the loss of their brethren, the prospect of death, and all their trials and sorrows. Some suppose that the apostle expected to

CHAP. V.

As the coming of Christ will be sudden, and bring inevitable destruction on the wicked, "the children of light" should prepare for it, in vigilance and sobriety, with faith, and love, and hope, 1—10. Various exhortations, admonitions, and encouragements, 11—25. Concluding prayers and salutations, 26—28.

live till the day of judgment, because he spoke in the first person plural of those that should be alive at that time; but he elsewhere spoke of being absent from the body, and of being raised up with Jesus. (Marg. Ref.) He was one who remained alive after others had been removed, his faith and hope annihilated, as it were, the intervening space, his love made him consider the cause of the whole multitude as his own, and it is evident that he did not speak it personally of himself; for when the Thessalonians imagined that the day of judgment was at hand, he diligently set himself to rectify that mistake; (2 Thes. ii.) And, as the apostle expressly declares that he spake "by "the word of the Lord," or by divine inspiration, the consequences of allowing him to be mistaken in what he said, should very seriously be considered. Similar expressions may be found in other parts of Scripture. (Ps. lxvi. 6. lxxxi. 5. Hos. xii. 4.) Some suppose that Christ himself was meant, by the arch-angel being the ruler of all angels; but as we must understand the words, "The Lord," of him; so it seems not natural to explain another term in the same sentence of him likewise; and many intimations are given of different ranks and orders among the holy angels. The resurrection of believers is exclusively meant, as every attentive reader must perceive, and therefore all speculations concerning the bodies with which the wicked shall arise, (a subject on which the Scripture observes a profound silence,) must be wholly foreign to the subject. The notions which prevailed among the Gentiles left them totally destitute of a firm, well-grounded, and animating hope of again meeting their deceased friends in a state of happiness; and so do the notions on these subjects of merely nominal Christians. Some expositors have said, that the expression, "so shall "ye be for ever with the Lord," implies, that the souls of believers are not previously, at least not permanently, with him; but has not the apostle expressly assured us of the contrary? (2 Cor. v. 8. Phil. i. 23, 24.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The ministers of the Gospel must not only instruct their hearers in the great doctrines and promises of the Gospel, but also in every part of their duty, that they may "know "how they ought to walk and please God;" and Christians should as readily receive these instructions, as they do the most encouraging declarations of free grace and everlasting love. They should also take in good part the earnest, repeated, affectionate, and authoritative exhortations of their pastors; when they "beseech and charge" them to abound more and more in every good work, according to the commandments given them in the name of the Lord Jesus. For as all men come short of perfection, so zealous ministers cannot be fully satisfied with the present measure of the people's fruitfulness, any more than humble Christians are with their own attainments. The will of God, as revealed in his holy law and in his precious promises, implies his purpose of their complete sanctification; we should therefore diligently follow after perfect holiness; and it may encourage those who long for more entire sanctification, to reflect, that in this respect, their will and that of God are now coincident. In aspiring after this renewal of the soul unto holiness, the strictest restraints must be imposed upon the appetites and senses of the body, and upon all those thoughts and inclinations of the mind which are connected with them; that not only fornication and gross transgressions may be abstained from, but that every one may learn to "possess "his vessel in sanctification and honour," at a distance from the lust of concupiscence, which so degrades numbers of those who know not God. It is a disgrace to a rational creature to be a slave to his animal inclinations, and to act contrary to his better judgment, his true interest, or the welfare of his neighbour, for the sake of gratifications, of which the beasts are equally capable; but it is far more dishonourable for a spiritual man, a child of God, a member of Christ, a temple of the Holy Spirit, and an heir of heaven, to have his mind and body polluted, or unfitted for communion with God, by unlawful or inexpedient gratifications, or even by improper thoughts and desires. Yet in many cases this will not be avoided, without watchfulness and prayer, without diligence in every means of grace, and a constant care to shun all temptations, or occasions of evil. It is equally inconsistent with the character of a Christian to go beyond or defraud his brother in any matter, or to injure him in his property, reputation, or connexions. This too calls for the most diligent care, and the most impartial scrutiny into every part of our conduct; for self-love, habit, and the customs of the world, will otherwise lead us, without reflection, in some measure to violate the golden rule of "doing to "others as we would they should do unto us." If a believer be led to commit offences of this kind, the Lord will surely chastise him, and thus bring him to repent and forsake them; but if any cloak such allowed dishonesty with specious appearances of piety, or zeal for doctrines, they will dreadfully find, that the Lord is the Avenger of all such, and their present impunity will only tend to their heavier condemnation at last. Of this the great champion for the doctrines of grace forewarned his new converts, his beloved Thessalonians, testifying that nothing could induce the Lord to connive at the want of strict honesty in the dealings of men with each other. For God hath not called us into a state of peace with him, that we may go on in the polluting practice of worldly lusts; but that, depending on his promises, "we may cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting "holiness in the fear of his name." And let it be remembered, that he, who despiseth such admonitions, doth not so much despise him that enforces them from the pulpit or the press, as that God, by whose Spirit they were originally dictated; yea, he as much despises God, as that man does who contemns the message of free salvation.

V. 9—18.

All true believers are taught of God to love one another for his sake; they remember the instructions, which they have received on that subject, which is so congenial to their new nature: by practice they acquire habits of kindness, compassion, forbearance, and forgiveness; they love their brethren, wheresoever they meet with them, and they feel an expansive benevolence to all mankind; yet they too, may properly be exhorted to increase in these things more and more. It should also be the height of their ambition, to behave quietly and peaceably, avoiding all interference in other men's matters, diligently attending to their own duty; being willing to labour, working with their own hands in any honest calling, and to be active in every service, which their station in the Church or the community requires of them. When Christians are thus industrious, and contented in obscure situations, submitting to many difficulties in order to pay every one his due, decently maintaining their families, devising by every means to live within the bounds of their income, having no need to raise contributions, in order to supply deficiencies occasioned by improvidence or extravagance, and being ready to spare a little for the relief of their more indigent brethren and neighbours, they will be respectable themselves, and an honour to the profession of the Gospel. And should disappointments and afflictions, at any time, render them incapable of acting according to their plan, they may expect candid allowance and cheerful assistance, as they will have a testimony in every one's conscience, that it is a real and unavoidable necessity. Christianity does not forbid, nor does grace extinguish, our natural affections, but we are thereby taught to regulate and moderate them. It therefore behooves believers to mourn with resignation even for such relatives, as they cannot think of without discouragement, in respect of their eternal state; but it is peculiarly improper for them to indulge grief and sorrow, as men without hope, for those who sleep in Jesus, whose souls are at rest with him, and whose bodies also shall be raised again, to attend the triumph of their once crucified and risen Redeemer. Our own loss, on such occasions, we must feel and mourn for, with submission to the will of God; but the separation will be short, the re-union rapturous, and the subsequent felicity uninterrupted, unalloyed, and eternal. Nor shall such of us, as endure the stroke of death, be eventually less favoured and happy than those, who shall be found alive at the coming of the Lord, that great event to which we should continually look forward. For when the incarnate Lord of all worlds shall appear, in "his own glory, "and in that of the Father, with all his holy angels," at his summons, attended with the voice of the arch-angel, and the trump of God, the dead in Christ shall rise first; and, being joined by their brethren, then living on the earth, they shall meet their Lord in the air with unutterable joy, and be for ever with him in the regions of perfect felicity. May we, by realizing faith and hope, continually anticipate that solemn joyful period, and comfort ourselves and each other with these words of truth and love!

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—3. The apostle did not think it needful to write any thing to the Thessalonians, concerning the precise time of Christ's coming, or the seasons appointed by God for the accomplishment of his promises and predictions. This was not a matter of revelation, and it did not belong to him, or them, to inquire into it, from an unavailing presumptuous curiosity. (Marg. Ref.) In general, they perfectly knew, from his former instructions, that "the day of the Lord was coming as a thief in the "night." (Luke xii. 39, 40.) The thief breaks into the house, while the family is asleep, and unprepared for resistance, and thus excites great terror, and plunders or murders, as he pleases: thus the day of the Lord is coming on the ignorant, the careless, the secure, and unbelieving, when they do not expect it; it will excite the most distressing consternation, and will plunge them into the most tremendous destruction. As the hour of death is the same to each person, that judgment will be to mankind in general, so the same remarks and illustrations equally answer to both cases; and when sinners are flattering themselves with the hope of peace and safety, then sudden destruction will come upon them. This is further illustrated by another most striking similitude; as the woman with child, (often when she is thinking of something else,) is suddenly seized with her travailing pangs, which will unavoidably increase upon her, so ungodly men have abundant reason to look forward with terror to death and judgment; yet they are employed and amused by so many other matters, that they are suddenly surprised with those solemn events, when they least expect them; and this first astonishment will be followed with increasing misery, from which it will be impossible for them ever to escape. The former chapter ends with a special revelation, concerning the Lord's coming to judgment; and to explain the beginning of this, as if it related to other events of a widely different nature, (which some do,) is palpably absurd.

5 Ye are all [l] the children of light, and the children of the day: we are not of the night, nor of darkness.

6 Therefore [m] let us not sleep, as do others; but let us [n] watch and be [o] sober.

7 For [p] they that sleep, sleep in the night; and [q] they that be drunken, are drunken in the night.

8 But let us, [r] who are of the day, be sober, putting on [s] the breast-plate of faith and love; and for an helmet, [t] the hope of salvation:

9 For God hath [u] not appointed us to wrath, but to [x] obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ,

10 Who [y] died for us, that, [z] whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him.

11 [a] Wherefore, * comfort yourselves together, [b] and edify one another, [c] even as also ye do.

12 ¶ And we beseech you, brethren, [d] to know them which [e] labour among you, [f] and are over you in the Lord, [g] and admonish you;

13 And to [h] esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake. [i] And be at peace among yourselves.

14 Now we † exhort [k] you, brethren, [l] warn them [m] that are ‡ unruly, [n] comfort the feeble-minded, [o] support the weak, [p] be patient toward all men.

15 [q] See that [r] none render evil for evil unto any man; but [s] ever follow that which is good, both among yourselves, [t] and to all men.

V. 4—11. The apostle judged it needful to give these warnings, for the benefit of such persons as were negligent in preparing for the coming of the Lord; yet, he was well satisfied as to the Thessalonians in general. They not only enjoyed the outward light of the Gospel, and professed to believe and walk in it, but he was persuaded, that they were really delivered from the power of darkness, and the ignorance and wickedness of their heathen state. They were not, therefore, in danger of being overtaken by the day of the Lord, when unprepared, as the thief surprises those that are asleep. They were all, according to their profession, nay, his confidence in them, "the children of light, and of the day." (Note, Eph. v. 8—14;) for none of Christ's true disciples were "of the "night, or of darkness." They neither continued in ignorance, nor lived in wickedness, nor wanted concealment for their secret practices; but, being delivered from the thick darkness of heathenism, or the comparative darkness of Judaism, they enjoyed, and walked according to, the clear light of the Gospel. It behooved them, therefore, to act up to their privileges; and not to be supine, indolent, careless, and unwatchful, as others were: but to be vigilant, circumspect, upon their guard against the assaults and stratagems of their enemies, and attentive to every opportunity of duty; and to be serious, considerate, moderate in every thing of a secular nature, and indifferent to all animal indulgences. In general, men chose to sleep during the quiet of the night; and to be drunken or riotous when others were asleep, that their excess might be the less noticed. In like manner, all sloth, unwatchfulness, intemperance, or excessive worldly pursuits, were more consistent with the condition of benighted heathens, than with that of Christians; who would, as it were, turn the day into night, if they were betrayed into such practices. As therefore they enjoyed the full light of "the Sun "of righteousness," they ought to be sober and vigilant; for they had not only a great work to do, but an arduous warfare to maintain, against numerous, potent, active, and subtle enemies: (Notes, Eph. vi. 10—19.) They ought therefore to stand armed like soldiers, and be vigilant as centinels: while faith in Christ, and a firm belief of the divine word, with reliance on the promises, with love to God, to Christ Jesus, to holiness, to each other, and to all men, constituted a breast-plate to defend their heart and affections from mortal wounds; and a well-grounded, realizing hope of eternal happiness and complete salvation, was like a helmet, to cover their heads in the day of battle, to defend them from the fear of the most cruel persecutors. This hope they were warranted to entertain; as their conversion proved, that God had not appointed them to endure the severity of his wrath, which their sins had deserved; but that he had chosen them to obtain salvation of his free mercy, through Jesus Christ; who had willingly suffered death, to atone for their sins, and to ransom their souls; that "whether they waked or slept," whether they lived or died, or however they were found at death, or at the coming of their Lord, they might live together with him in glory. They ought therefore to comfort themselves and each other, when they met together, by mutual exhortations and encouragements; while every individual endeavoured to animate his brethren, and especially his most intimate friend and companion; and thus to instruct and edify one another in faith and holiness, as they had already begun to do.

V. 12—15. It is evident that the apostle, either personally, or by Timothy, Titus, and others of his fellow-labourers, was used to "ordain elders in every city," (Acts xiv. 23. xx. 17. 28. 1 Tim. v. 22. Tit. 1—5 :) and though no mention is made of this, in the brief history of his labours at Thessalonica, nor in the opening of the epistle, there can be no reasonable doubt that he had appointed elders over the Church in that city. It was their office to labour among the people, in preaching the word of God, and in every means of promoting their edification, and the conversion of sinners; to preside in the regulation and conduct of public worship, and in the management of their spiritual concerns, as placed over them in the Lord; to act by his authority and in his name; and to admonish, reprove, and warn, such persons as acted wrong, or were likely to be drawn aside. The apostle therefore exhorted the people to be observant of these teachers, to acknowledge them as the Lord's stewards, and to regard their admonitions; and they were not only directed to love them as Christians, but to esteem them "more abundantly in "love," for their work's sake; and to show them all respect and kindness, in return for the benefit which they derived from their faithful labours; that, under their guidance and instruction, they might live in entire harmony with each other. The apostle likewise exhorted the pastors, and others in conjunction with them, to warn, reprove, and censure such persons, as were unruly, and acted like soldiers who quit their ranks. They should also comfort those, who were weak in the faith, timorous, discouraged through temptation, and harassed by perplexities, fears, and misapprehensions; and support, by proper instructions and every encouraging topic, such as were ready to stumble, or were of a weak and feeble capacity; as well as support and provide for those that were sick, and unable to maintain themselves, (Marg. Ref.) and they should also exercise patience and long-suffering towards persons of all kinds, behaving with tenderness and meekness even to those who acted in the most ungrateful or perverse manner. Nor might they in any case render to any man evil for evil; but they ought steadily to persevere in all those things, which were kind, benevolent, beneficent, and useful, both among themselves and towards all men, without excepting even their virulent persecutors, (Notes, &c. Rom. xii. 14. 17—21.) This may also imply an instruction to the pastors, and other Christians, to watch over their brethren: and if they perceived any indications of a bitter and vindictive spirit against their persecutors, to repress it by every suitable means, and with all their influence.

V. 16—22. The substance of these exhortations has before been considered. (Notes on the passages referred to in the margin.) The Christians at Thessalonica were exhorted to consider it as their duty, as well as privilege, to be "always rejoicing" in the Lord: they were directed to pray incessantly, at stated seasons, occasionally, and with frequent ejaculations; and to watch against every thing which could put them out of frame for this important privilege and duty. In every circumstance, they were to give thanks, as all their mercies were unmerited, and all their trials would prove beneficial; so that this constant spirit of gratitude was the will of God concerning them, as his children in Christ Jesus. Many have explained "quenching the Spirit," of restraining the exercise of spiritual gifts in themselves or others; but doubtless it relates principally to the sanctifying and comforting influences of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of believers; not excluding his strivings and convictions in the hearts and consciences of sinners. (Marg. Ref.) These tend to kindle a flame of sacred love in the soul: but they may be quenched by evil tempers, by procrastination, by worldly cares, by inexpedient indulgences, by trifling company, or by negligence, even as fire may be quenched with water, and will go out, if it be not supplied with fuel, if it want air, or be choked with ashes. Thus convictions are often finally extinguished, and the Holy Spirit will no more strive with men: and thus believers often greatly damp the holy ardour of their souls, mar their own comfort, and impede their growth in grace, by not giving themselves up without delay to those spiritual affections, which are excited in their hearts by the Holy Spirit, and by quenching them in the manner before mentioned. The apostle also warned his brethren, "not to despise prophesyings," or those instructions and intimations of the divine will, which were given them by the prophets, either in explaining the scriptures, or from immediate suggestions of the Spirit. (Notes, 1 Cor. xiv.) The exhortation may also fairly include the more ordinary preaching of God's word. Yet, as there would be many false teachers, and erroneous doctrines propagated by them, they must be careful to prove, or try, both the teachers and their instructions by the word of God; that they might reject what was spurious, and adhere to what was good and excellent. And, not only were they exhorted to abstain from evident evil, but from every thing which appeared to be sinful, either in their own judgment, or in that of others; and to do nothing, concerning the lawfulness of which they doubted, or which might appear suspicious to those around them, and so prejudice them against the truth. No doubt cases often arise, in which we are required to do those things, which appear evil to misinformed, prejudiced, and unreasonable men, in order to obey the commands of God, and to follow the clear dictates of our own consciences. But these are exceptions to the general rule, which could not be particularized in so compendious an exhortation: and they seem to be the only exceptions: for it is better to avoid what appears evil to others, though lawful in itself, if it can be done with a safe conscience, than, by an uncharitable exercise of our Christian liberty, to cause our weak brother to offend, or to prejudice others against the Gospel. The Spirit. (19.) 'That is, the afflatus, and light of God 'shining into our minds. But, some one will say, if 'that be never extinguished in the elect, this is com'manded in vain. This, however, I strenuously deny. 'Nay, for this reason it is not extinguished in the elect, 'because they cherish it; and they are induced by these 'exhortations to cherish it. For he, who hath determined 'never wholly to extinguish his Spirit in the elect, hath 'also made known by what means he will cherish it, 'namely, by the progress of his people in piety.' (Beza.) —Prove, &c. (21.) 'The apostle gives an injunction, 'common to all Christians, having "their senses exercised "to discern good and evil," 'to all, who are obliged "to "hold fast that which is good," 'and not to believe false 'prophets; which is a strong argument for the perspicuity 'and sufficiency of the scripture, and against the neces'sity of a living judge. For he that must try all things, 'must first try the doctrine of this living judge. For 'these words plainly teach, that what we must hold fast 'must first be tried. Hearers, says St. Basil, who are in'structed in the scriptures, ought to try the things spoken 'by their teachers; and receive those things which are 'consonant, and reject those things which are alien from, 'the holy scriptures.' (Whitby.)

V. 23—28. The apostle subjoined to his exhortations, his fervent prayers to God, knowing that his efficacious grace alone could produce the will and power to do all these things. He besought the God of peace himself, as reconciled to believers in Christ Jesus, and the Author of all their inward and outward peace, that he would sanctify the Thessalonians in respect of their whole nature, as consisting of a rational and immortal soul, an animal life, with its various sensitive appetites, and a material body; that every sense, member, organ, and faculty, might be completely purified, and devoted to the service of God, and that thus they might be preserved blameless till the coming of Christ.—He was confident that the Thessalonians in general were true believers: and as he was assured of the Lord's faithfulness to his promises and covenant-engagements to his people, whom he had called by his grace, so he was satisfied that he would fully grant his prayer for them. Having therefore desired them also to pray for him, and solemnly charged them, by the authority of the Lord Jesus, to let this epistle be read to all the holy brethren, the saints that formed their church, he concluded with his usual salutations and benedictions. Charge you, &c. (27.) It seems evident that this was addressed to the pastors of the Church, and not to believers in general: else the persons charged, and they for whose benefit the charge was given, would have been precisely the same. The original is, "I adjure you." (Marg. Ref.) This shows, both that oaths and adjurations are in some cases lawful; (Note, Matt. xxvi. 63—68;) and that the subject, concerning which the apostle wrote, was considered by him, as peculiarly important. This is worthy of the most serious consideration of all those, even among protestants, who do not make the reading of the scriptures a part of the service, when they meet in the worship of God; and of those who read them in so careless and indistinct a manner, that the congregation cannot hear or understand them. The advantage to illiterate people, to the multitude who cannot read, or, who can read but imperfectly, of an audible, distinct, and emphatical reading of the scriptures in public, can scarcely be calculated. It will soon render even the best preaching more fully understood; and it will, in some degree, supply the deficiency in other cases.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

Curious inquiries about times and seasons are commonly unprofitable and vain. "Behold, now is the accepted "time;" the present time we ought to redeem, the present season of making our peace with God, and of doing his will, we ought to embrace: and then we shall be safe and happy at all events. But, if we regard the scripture, we know perfectly, "that the day of the Lord cometh as "a thief in the night;" and that when sinners are presumptuously, or carelessly, saying "peace and safety, "then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail "upon a woman with child, which they shall not escape." No man is sure that death and judgment will not thus surprise him, unless he continually expect and prepare for those approaching events: 'Numbers, at this very hour, 'are speaking peace and safety to themselves, over whose 'heads instantaneous destruction is hovering.' (Doddridge.) And how dreadful will be the astonishment and consternation of the scornful infidel, the careless profligate, the proud Pharisee, or the hardened hypocrite, when sudden destruction shall thus seize upon him, and no possible method of escape can be found! As yet we are in the land of light, of prayer, of forgiveness, though we might before this have been cast into outer darkness. Nor are we enveloped with Pagan, Mahometan, or Antichristian darkness and delusion; we have the light of the Gospel, and the holy scriptures, afforded us; we have been led to pay some attention to them: if then we are yet in darkness, that the day of the Lord should overtake us as a thief, our guilt must be peculiarly aggravated. Let us therefore seriously inquire whether we really be the children of the light and of the day, by divine illumination, and by an obedient faith ? Let us seek to render this evident, as well as to act consistently with our profession, by casting off the works of darkness, and shaking off indolence and carelessness, that we may not sleep as others do, but may “ watch and be sober.” Let us leave sloth, self-indulgence, ungodliness, and worldly lusts, to “ the children of the night and of darkness ;” but let us, who profess to be of the day, be sober, vigilant, awake, and armed with the breast-plate of faith and love, and with hope as the helmet of salvation. Thus our evidence will continually increase, that God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by the Lord Jesus ; and that, “ whether we wake or sleep,” we shall surely live together with him. And when we remember that he purchased our deliverance from the wrath to come, by dying on the cross as a sacrifice for our sins, we shall not only be directed how to comfort ourselves together, and to edify one another in all holy affections, but we shall feel the constraining power of grateful love, and learn how to live to him, with whom we hope to live for ever in glory.

V. 11—22.

The office of a minister calls a man to labour for the salvation of souls with unwearied assiduity, as well as to preside over them in the Lord ; nor ought the spiritual authority ever to be separated from the labouring in the “ word and doctrine.” Faithful pastors should carefully be distinguished from slothful, ambitious, or mercenary men, who have the name and garb of ministers : they should be owned and attended to, and their admonitions should be valued and obeyed, and they ought to be esteemed very highly in love, not because of the name and office which they bear, but “ for their work’s sake,” and in proportion to their skill, faithfulness, and diligence in it. They therefore are highly culpable, who despise the admonitions, reject the authority, and refuse respect and affection to the persons of faithful ministers : but such as expect the reputation, esteem, authority, or emolument of the ministry, without a diligent attention to its various and laborious duties, are even still more criminal. Outward respect may indeed be paid them ; but it is impossible for intelligent Christians “ to esteem them very highly in love “ for their work’s sake,” though they will compassionately mourn over and pray for them. Our love of peace among ourselves must not induce us to connive at sin ; but we must, according to our several relations in the church, in domestic life, or in society, warn, reprove, and censure the unruly, as well as tenderly soothe, and comfort the feeble-minded, and support the weak in body or soul. We should also learn patience towards all men, especially towards persons of weak capacities or little faith, who are often very wearying with their complaints, scruples, doubts, mistakes, and infirmities, and yet give no reason at all to suspect their sincerity, but rather call for compassion, as harassed with sore temptations, which perhaps have an effect for the time upon their tempers.—Even when we are injured in the most atrocious manner, we must see to it, that we on no account render evil for evil to any man ; but must learn to follow, with persevering constancy, that which is good and friendly, both among ourselves, and to all men, as knowing what patience and mercy we have experienced from God. His glory is concerned in our “ always rejoicing :” this will be greatly promoted, if we “ pray without ceasing ;” and in “ every thing give thanks,” according to the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning us. To make progress in this life of communion with God, we must be careful not “ to quench the Spirit,” by refusing compliance with his holy suggestions, or postponing the good works to which his influences tend to excite us. We should also learn to pay a reverent attention to every message delivered to us by his ministers ; and thus we shall grow in grace, and abound in consolation. Yet, as Satan’s ministers are transformed into the ministers of righteousness, whilst we “ despise not prophesyings,” we must learn to prove and assay men and doctrines, that we may distinguish between truth and specious error, and so choose and cleave to that which is good and right ; and that, for the honour of the Gospel, we may “ abstain from all appearance of evil.”

V. 23—28.

The exhortations, above given, show us what we ought to be and to do : but we must remember, that our hearts are naturally opposite to them ; nor can any inward and abiding change be wrought in us, save by a divine power. As therefore ministers should pray for, as well as exhort, their people, every individual should turn the precepts and promises of God into prayers for himself and his brethren ; and whilst he uses every other means of grace, and vigilantly shuns all hinderances and temptation, he should still beseech “ the God of peace himself to sanctify him “ wholly, in spirit, and soul, and body, and to preserve “ him blameless until the coming of the Lord Jesus.” If these be our earnest desires, fervent prayers, and diligent endeavours, the promises and covenant of our God, his power and love, and his immutable faithfulness, authorize our fullest assurance, that, having called us by his grace, he will keep us by the same unto complete and everlasting salvation, whatever immense inward or outward difficulties may seem to render it impracticable. The most eminent servants of Christ want and value the prayers of their weakest brethren. Let us be thankful that these excellent epistles are preserved for our perusal also : and while we rememember that the apostle charged the Thessalonians, by the authority of the Lord Jesus, to let them be read to all the holy brethren, some of whom might not be able to read them all for themselves, we may be sure that Antichrist alone would forbid the laity to read the scriptures, lest they should lead them into heresy. We shall also learn the propriety of reading them in our public congregations ; and we shall be stirred up to study them with more humble diligence and obedient faith, that thus the grace of the Lord Jesus may be with us also.

THE

THESSALONIANS.

This epistle is commonly supposed to have been written from Corinth, not very long after the foregoing, because Silvanus and Timothy still continued with St. Paul; but the evidence is not very conclusive, and some difficulties attend this opinion. (Note, i. 3, 4.) It is, however, certain that it was not sent from Athens, according to the spurious postscript. The main object of the epistle seems to have been, to prevent mistakes, which the Thessalonians were about to fall into, concerning the near approach of the day of judgment; grounded in part on a misconstruction of some expressions in his former epistle, and of what he had spoken when at Thessalonica; but supported also by some person, or persons, pretending to inspiration, and, as some think, by a forged epistle. As this opinion was of a very injurious tendency, the apostle strenuously opposed it. (Notes, ii. 1—4.) He had also heard of some individuals, who on religious pretences neglected their secular employments, and walked disorderly; whom he exhorted them to censure and shun, yet so as to seek their good. Amidst a number of instructive warnings, exhortations, and encouragements, it contains a most remarkable prophecy, (Notes, ii. 2—12,) the exact fulfilment of which is a full demonstration of the divine inspiration, by which the apostle wrote his epistles. 'Besides the 'general marks of its genuineness and divine authority, which it bears in common with the rest of the 'epistles, it has one peculiar to itself, from the exact representation it contains of the papal power, under the characters of "the man of sin," and "the mystery of iniquity." For, considering how directly 'opposite the principles, here described, were to the genius of Christianity, it must appear, at the time when 'this epistle was written, highly improbable, that they should ever prevail in the Christian church: and consequently a prediction like this, which answers in every particular so exactly to the event, must be allowed to 'carry its own evidence with it, and to prove that the author of it wrote under a divine influence.' (Doddridge.)

CHAP. I.

The apostle salutes the Thessalonians, 1, 2; thanks God for their growth in faith and love; encourages their perseverance under persecutions, by the prospect of the coming of Christ; and shows how glorious he will then appear in the destruction of all unbelievers, and the complete salvation of his people, 3—10. He prays for their complete sanctification and meetness for heavenly felicity, by the grace, and for the glory, of God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ, 11, 12.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. (Marg. Ref. and notes on the scriptures referred to.)

V. 3, 4. The apostle had received such further good accounts of the Thessalonians, that he deemed himself bound to return continual thanks to God in their behalf.

3 We [c] are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, [d] as it is meet, because that [e] your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all towards each other aboundeth:

4 So that we ourselves [f] glory in you in the churches of God, for [g] your patience and faith in all your [h] persecutions and tribulations that ye endure:

5 Which is [i] a manifest token of the [k] righteous judgment of God, that ye [l] may be counted worthy of the kingdom of God, [m] for which ye also suffer:

6 Seeing [n] it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you;

7 And to you [o] who are troubled, rest with us, [p] when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his * mighty angels,

8 In [q] flaming fire † taking [r] vengeance on them that [s] know not God, [t] and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ:

9 Who shall [u] be punished with everlasting destruction [x] from the presence of the Lord, and from [y] the glory of his power;

10 When he shall come [z] to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe, (because [a] our testimony among you was believed,) [b] in that day.

this was meet and right: seeing that, in answer to his prayers, and by means of his epistolary exhortations, they became more fully acquainted with divine truth, and grew stronger in faith, by an exceedingly rapid progress: and the love of every one of them towards all the rest abounded, in all its manifold exercises and beneficial effects: so that he rejoiced and gloried in them in the churches of God, showing them what flourishing Christians the Thessalonians were, and what a blessed seal God had given to his ministry in their conversion. This may induce a doubt, whether the epistle were written from Corinth or not: for on that supposition Paul had visited no other churches, since he wrote the former epistle, except such as were planted in that vicinity: and we can hardly suppose, that he only referred to what Timothy or Silvanus had said of them, if they had left him for a season to visit other churches, and then returned. However, he and his fellow-labourers gloried in them; because they endured various persecutions and afflictions, with exemplary patience and constant faith. We are not informed of the particulars relative to these persecutions; but they seem to have exposed the Thessalonians to very great hardships and dangers.

V. 5—10. The patience of the Thessalonians, in suffering in the cause of Christ, and for conscience' sake, was a manifest token or demonstration, of the righteous judgment of God: it fully proved, that he would judge the world in righteousness, and rectify all the apparent disorders of the present scene; seeing he left his blameless and zealous worshippers to endure persecutions and tribulations, and his enemies to prosper in their impious and iniquitous opposition to his cause and people. Indeed, he permitted his servants to be afflicted, in order to prove and manifest their faith and grace, and to increase in them all holy dispositions; that they might at length be counted meet and proper persons to inherit that kingdom of heavenly glory, which God hath prepared for them that love him: in hope of which they so patiently suffered, as well as from love to his kingdom of grace established upon earth, as introductory to the kingdom of glory in heaven. Seeing, by these means, it would be manifestly shown to be perfectly just and righteous in God, to recompense with tribulation and anguish those, who troubled his harmless and holy friends and worshippers by their cruel enmity and persecution, because of their relation and conformity to him; as they would evidently be proved to be his inveterate enemies. On the other hand, it would appear honourable to his justice, as well as his mercy, to bestow rest and felicity in heaven on those, who willingly endured tribulation in his cause, for his sake, from his enemies, and according to his will: and, indeed, having given promises to this effect, his equity required the fulfilment of them. This righteous judgment of God will take place, when "the Lord Jesus shall be revealed," as visibly descending from heaven, attended by "the angels of his "power;" his creatures, worshippers, and servants, who shall then act as the ministers of his authority, in showing mercy and in executing vengeance. (Marg. Ref.) Then he will appear "in flaming fire," to burn up this visible creation, and this will be an emblem of his awful avenging justice: for he will take vengeance on all; not only on idolatrous Gentiles, persecuting Jews, and men of scandalous and abandoned characters; but on all who continue strangers and enemies to the true God, and his holy worship and service; who have not so known him, as to fear, love, trust, and serve him; and on all, who obey not the Gospel of the Lord Jesus, by receiving him, relying on him, and submitting to him, as their Saviour and King. All these persons, however numerous, or distinguished by rank, accomplishments, or splendid actions, will be punished with eternal destruction, being banished, as accursed, from the presence of the Lord, in which alone felicity can be found, (Marg. Ref.) and finding his avenging frown, like lightning, to appal and torture their inmost souls, and the glory of his power irresistibly forcing them with dreadful consternation into the place of torment. This will take place, when he shall appear with divine majesty in human nature, to be glorified by his saints; as the riches of his love, the preciousness of his redemption, the efficacy of his grace, the power of his arm, and his faithfulness to his promises, will be most gloriously displayed by their complete salvation. And not only will he then be admired by those, that now believe in him, who will then find their largest expectations far exceeded, and who will not think it possible, sufficiently to adore and praise such a glorious Benefactor; but he will be admired in them, likewise, by all the inhabitants of heaven, who will celebrate the wonders wrought by him, in thus saving and exalting such polluted rebels and enemies. This the apostle was confident would be the case of the Christians at Thessalonica, because his testimony concerning Christ had been credited by them, and their faith manifested by its genuine effects.

V. 11, 12. In the prospect of this decisive season, the apostle and his brethren prayed continually for the Thessalonians, that the Lord would vouchsafe them whatever was wanting to make them meet for this felicity, to which the Gospel called them; that he would adjudge them to be entitled to it, according to the grace of the new Covenant in Christ; and that he would accomplish that work of complete sanctification, and prepare them for that glory, to which the sovereign good pleasure of his goodness and love had appointed them, and which he had great complacency and delight in conferring on them: that so he would finish the work by his almighty power, which he was carrying on in their souls through faith, till at length it should be perfected in vision and enjoyment. This they prayed for, in order that the name of Christ might be glorified in them, both by their present bold profession of his truth, and their holy conduct, and zealous labours to spread the Gospel; and in the sight of the whole world, and to all eternity: and that they might also be glorified in Christ, by perfectly bearing his image, enjoying his love, being owned as his brethren, and sharing, as it were, all his honour, according to the infinite riches of the mercy and grace of God the Father, and the Lord Jesus. The context shows, that the word calling must here mean the inheritance to which they were called. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They who have already distinguished themselves by "the work of faith, and the labour of love, and the "patience of hope," are capable of growing exceedingly in all these things: for the highest attainments of saints on earth fall far beneath real perfection. When Christians thus grow in grace and abound in all the exercises of mutual love, the hearts of faithful ministers will rejoice: and they will deem themselves bound to give thanks to God always for them, as it is meet; and to speak of them in the churches of God, to excite their thanksgiving also, and to animate them to a holy emulation. The patient sufferings of exemplary Christians, and the prosperity of ungodly men and cruel persecutors, fully demonstrate a future judgment, when all shall "discern between the "righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth "God, and him that serveth him not." This helps to explain those mysteries of providence which would otherwise greatly perplex us; and we perceive that the devoted worshippers and beloved children of God are proved and purified in the fiery furnace of tribulation, "that they "may be accounted worthy of that kingdom for which "they suffer;" and that wicked men are permitted to prosper, that their rancorous enmity against God may be manifested, and the measure of their crimes filled up, and that all may see the glory of that justice, which consigns them to the punishment intended for them. It must indeed at length appear evident to all rational creatures, that it is righteous in God to recompense tribulation to those, who trouble his people from hatred to his holy truth and service; and that it is honourable to all his perfections to give rest and felicity to those, who have been troubled for his sake, and for their love to his cause and worship. Faith, anticipating the grand decisive day, is enabled by the light of revelation to read, and, in a measure, to understand, the book of providence; and thus to wait with composure and comfort for the coming of the Lord.—That will be indeed "a day of wrath, and of the revelation "of the righteous judgment of God:" then the Saviour, once a Man of sorrows, and generally despised, rejected, and disobeyed, will "be revealed, with his mighty angels, "in flaming fire, taking vengeance," not only on cruel oppressors, persecutors, and murderers, or on scandalous profligates and depredators, but "on all who knew not "God, and obeyed not the Gospel of his Son;" whether infidels, Pharisees, scoffers, hypocrites, enthusiasts, or Antinomians, or however they might otherwise be denominated or distinguished. All these shall be punished with "an everlasting destruction from the presence of the "Lord;" the majesty of that countenance, which was once defiled with blood and spitting, and the glory of his power, who was once crucified in apparent weakness, shall be intolerable to all the multitudes of the wicked; and they will be wholly incapable of making the least resistance, when with a tremendous frown he shall say to them, "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the "Devil and his angels!" But at that awful season, he will come especially to be glorified in his saints, who have here believed the testimony of his apostles concerning him, and thus learned to trust, love, obey, and rejoice in him, whom they have not yet seen, and to know and worship God the Father in and through him. No words can possibly express the admiring and adoring gratitude and love, which will unite with the exulting joy and triumph of that

CHAP. II.

The apostle warns the Thessalonians, against groundlessly supposing that the day of Christ was at hand, 1, 2; and shows, that it must be preceded by a great apostacy; in which "the man of sin," by his blasphemies, usurpations, and impostures, would cause the destruction of numbers, and then sink himself into perdition, 3—12. He thanks God for his special grace shown to the Thessalonians, 13, 14; exhorts them to steadfastness, 15; and prays, that they may be comforted, and established in every good word and work, 16, 17.

NOW [a] we beseech you, brethren, [b] by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, [c] and by our gathering together unto him,

2 That ye be not soon [d] shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither [e] by spirit, nor by word, [f] nor by letter, as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand.

3 Let [g] no man deceive you by any means: for that day shall not come, [h] except there come a falling away first, and that [i] man of sin be revealed, [k] the son of perdition;

4 Who opposeth [l] and exalteth himself above all that is [m] called God, or that is worshipped; so that he, as God, [n] sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God.

happy period. All hopes and imaginations must fall immensely beneath those unutterable glories, and the holy affections with which they will be contemplated and adored. But every believer will then reflect, display, and increase, the manifested glory of the divine Saviour, and enhance the praises of all the inhabitants of heaven "to the Lamb "that was slain, and hath redeemed them to God with his "blood." May we then pray always for ourselves and each other, that "our God may count us worthy of this "calling, and fulfil in us all the good pleasure of his "goodness, and the work of faith with power; that so "the name of our Lord Jesus may be" finally "glorified "in us" and our salvation, "and that we may be glori-"fied in and with him, according to the grace of our "God, and the Lord Jesus Christ." May we diligently seek to obtain and possess the full assurance, that this shall be our felicity, when "the wicked shall be turned into "hell, and all the people that forget God;" and may we now do all in our power to promote and recommend the Gospel, and to do good to our fellow-sinners and fellow-christians; that, glorifying him on earth, we may be sure of being for ever glorified with him in heaven!

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. Having encouraged the faith and patience of the persecuted Thessalonians, by the prospect of Christ's coming to perfect their salvation, the apostle exhorted them concerning that great event; and as they hoped to be gathered together unto Christ in glory, he besought them not to allow themselves to be easily deluded into the opinion that the day of Christ was at hand, whether that opinion were propagated by men professing to speak by the Spirit of God, or whether it were grounded on something which he had spoken among them, or on a misconstruction of some expressions in his former epistle. For such an erroneous expectation would disquiet their minds, and create in them needless troubles and apprehensions: and when they found themselves disappointed in it, they might be tempted to question the truth of the Gospel itself. It would at least take them off from the duties of their several callings in society; and their conduct, expectations, and disappointments, might render them the derision of their unbelieving neighbours. By the coming, &c. (1.) This is generally explained, as a solemn charge or adjuration; which indeed agrees very well with the apostle's general manner: but the preposition (ὑπὲρ,) here used, seems not to admit of that interpretation.—Several learned men would explain this, of our Lord's coming in providence to destroy Jerusalem, and terminate the persecutions excited by the Jews: but that coming was very near; and the apostle earnestly warned his readers against supposing, that the coming of which he spake was at hand. If, however, this had not been the case, what could there be, in the near approach of divine judgments on Judea, to excite any extraordinary commotion among the Gentile converts at Thessalonica?

V. 3, 4. The apostle again most earnestly exhorted them to let no man deceive them, by any artful device or pretence whatever, into so injurious an expectation: and it is evident that this caution was not unnecessary; for, notwithstanding it, many of the early Christians expected the day of judgment speedily to come, which betrayed them into various practical mistakes. But St. Paul, by the Spirit of prophecy, assured them, that Christ would not come for this purpose, till a falling away, or an apostacy, of a great body of professed Christians from the true Gospel of Christ had previously taken place. Doubtless many apostacies occurred in the primitive ages under different heresiarchs: but all the circumstances of this prediction were never verified, except in that departure from the faith, and that usurpation and spiritual tyranny connected with it, which took place in the Church of Rome: and the manifest absurdity of all other interpretations, as clearly shown in the controversies of those who abet one or another of them against their opponents, abundantly proves this. No apostacy of equal magnitude and duration, no delusions equally pernicious and abominable, have taken place since the apostle's days. The imposture of Mahomet alone can be at all compared with it, and this could not be here intended; for that impostor and his successors were not placed "in the temple of God," the visible church; but without it, and in direct opposition to the very name of Christianity; they propagated their delusions mainly by the sword, and not by lying miracles; and the impieties of Mahomet never equalled the blasphemies here predicted. In connexion with this apostacy, "the man "of sin would be revealed." In the language of prophecy, a king generally signifies a succession of monarchs, of the same family, or carrying on the same design, (Notes, Dan. vii. 17—24.) Thus "the man of sin," does not mean a single person, but a succession of men, impious in themselves, and conducting the same wicked design of corrupting Christianity, in doctrine, worship, and practice; establishing an intolerable tyranny on religious pretences, and using all kinds of seduction, iniquity, and cruel persecution, to induce mankind to adopt the antichristian system. This "man of sin," would be "the son of "perdition," (John xvii. 12;) a genuine descendant of Judas, the apostle and traitor, who sold his Lord for money, and betrayed him with a kiss; a peculiar factor and agent of Satan in destroying the souls of men, and finally sinking himself into perdition as his inheritance. It is manifest, that no succession of men have yet appeared on earth, to whom this description so exactly accords, as that of the Roman pontiffs, as the visible head of the popish church. This deceiver, however, would "oppose "and exalt himself above all that is called God, or is "worshipped," either by Christians or Pagans: thus the Roman pontiffs have opposed the truths, commandments, and disciples of Christ, in every age, and by every means; they have opposed the prophetical office of Christ, by teaching human inventions; his priestly office, by the doctrine of human merits and created intercessors; and his kingly office, by changing and dispensing with his laws. They have exalted themselves above all that is called God, "and is worshipped," by pretending to forgive sins, even in those who manifestly continued impenitent; by granting indulgences to men to break the commandments of God; by dispensing with, and placing their own decrees above, his laws, as if of superior validity; and by presuming to give meaning and authority to the scriptures themselves, which must not be understood in any other sense than what they impose upon them. Moreover, "This man "of sin," "sits as God in the temple of God," and we must therefore look for him within the visible church: there he blasphemously usurps the throne of God, showing himself to be God. Many Roman emperors affected divine honours, and demanded adoration: but there was no antecedent apostacy from Christianity; and they might rather be said to sit in the temple of Jupiter, or Mars, than in that of God, whose temple must be considered to be among his professed worshippers, and not among avowed heathens. But the Roman pontiff, claiming to be the universal head of the whole church of God, called by his flatterers Vice-God, a God upon earth, arrogating the title of his Holiness, boasting of infallibility, pretending to a right to depose kings, and bestow kingdoms on whom he pleased, (with those arrogant claims before-mentioned,) answers so exactly to the description here given, that we cannot doubt for whom it was designed. While the Roman pontiff opposed the worship of God, by enjoining the worship of images, and of saints and angels, and the authority of his laws to enforce subjection to his own edicts, he himself might be called the great idol, as well as the great tyrant of the Romish church; as he demanded the most abject submission and prostration from all men, and poured contempt on all authority, human and divine. But particulars cannot here be more fully insisted on. It suffices to show that the Roman pontiffs answered this description, as the original does a striking picture; and we may venture to assert, that no other succession of men ever did thus accord to it; perhaps no single individual within the visible church. The apostles, at least after the Gospel was preached to the Gentiles, never spake of the temple at Jerusalem as the temple of God; but the Christian church in general, or believers in particular, are always denoted by that phrase. The striking coincidence of this extraordinary prediction with many parts of the prophecy of Daniel may be seen to advantage, by consulting the marginal references; and, as far as the author's views of them are concerned, by examining the notes on the passages referred to in that prophecy.

V. 5—7. During the short time which the apostle spent at Thessalonica, he had stated these particulars to his converts, which they ought to have remembered. When they recollected what he had spoken upon this subject, they would know what withheld, or retarded, this apostacy for the present; and so prevented its taking place openly and evidently, till the time appointed for it in the purpose of God. The Roman empire, united under one potent government, and extremely jealous of all other power and authority, prevented the establishment of that spiritual tyranny and usurpation, by which Satan was attempting to make his grand effort against Christianity: but it would not have been prudent in the apostle, to have explicitly mentioned it in an epistle for general perusal; nor would it have accorded to the style of prophecy: however, most of the fathers so far understood him, as to declare that Antichrist would not come, till after the downfall of the Roman empire. Had it not been for this obstacle, the evil would have broken out much sooner: for even when this was written, "the mystery of iniquity did "already work." This grand and deep design of Satan, this mysterious system, which was founded in and productive of all kinds of iniquities, being placed in direct opposition to the "great mystery of godliness," was already operating upon the minds of men. The ambition and avarice of some, who preached the Gospel, and exercised spiritual gifts from corrupt motives; who opposed the apostles, in order to obtain authority, influence, and secular advantage; or who perverted the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ, introducing legal confidences, 8 And then shall [u] that Wicked be revealed, [x] whom the Lord shall consume with [y] the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy [z] with the brightness of his coming:

superstitions, will-worship, self-imposed austerities, and the worship of angels: and the disposition of many professed Christians to follow their pernicious ways, were as a corrupt leaven, which, working secretly, would at length produce this great apostacy. (Marg. Ref.) But, the Roman empire, which then let or hindered, its full effect, by keeping the church under persecution, and curbing all authority but its own, would continue to retard this event, until it should be removed out of the way. The conversion of the Roman emperors to Christianity, in the beginning of the fourth century, tended greatly to prepare things for this apostacy; by giving scope to the ambition and avarice of the ecclesiastics, and by multiplying exceedingly nominal Christians; but it was not till the subversion of the western empire by the northern nations, and the division of it into ten kingdoms, that way was made for the full establishment of the papal usurpation at Rome, the capital city.

V. 8—12. The obstacle above-mentioned having been taken out of the way, that wicked or lawless one would be revealed, and would display the deformity of his character without disguise, by endeavouring to exalt himself above all laws human and divine. But, though this great usurper would practise and prosper, yet, the Lord would at length consume him by the spirit, or the breath, of his mouth. (Marg. Ref.) According to the predictions of his word, and by the preaching of his Gospel, attended by the influences of his Spirit, he would gradually waste and consume this anti-christian tyranny, and terminate all his corruptions of the Gospel. This he hath been accomplishing, during the space of above three hundred years, since the first dawnings of the Reformation: he will shortly destroy the whole papal authority, and all its dependencies, by the brightness of his coming to spread the Gospel through the nations; (Notes, Rev. xviii. xix. xx. 1—6:) and he will finally condemn, and punish with everlasting destruction, all the actors in this grand delusion, when he shall come to judge the world. Such will certainly be the doom of this "lawless one," this "man of sin," this "son of "perdition," whose coming was to be attended, and success obtained, not by open force, but by the deep subtlety and peculiar energy of Satan: with the highest pretences to authority and claims of power; and with every kind of counterfeit signs and wonders, either of deep-laid human imposture, or of satanical operation, by which men would mimic the miracles of Christ and his apostles, as the Egyptian magicians did those of Moses. It would also be accompanied with all the various kinds of forgery, fraud, and imposture, with which men's senses and understandings have been deluded by artful deceivers, in different ages and nations of the world; and with every hypocritical device, which the ingenuity and sagacity of men or devils could possibly invent; to support the cause of unrighteousness, and delude the world into a stupid admiration, a blind reverence, and an implicit submission to the arrogant claims, and multiplied idolatries, and abominations of this grand delusion. Thus, by artful stratagems and machinations, multitudes would be fatally deceived, among such as were in the way of perdition. For, seeing they had not received the love of the truth, but had neglected or perverted the saving doctrine of the Gospel, through pride and carnal enmity, they would, for this cause, be left to judicial blindness; and God would, by means of these men, send them a delusion, which would bind them, in the strongest chains of error and false confidence; so that they would be fascinated into the firm belief of Satan's lie, and venture their souls upon it. Thus, being held in impenitence and unbelief, and under the power of their own lusts, they would be left to manifest their enmity to God, and to fill up the measure of their sins; that they might all be condemned at the day of judgment, and receive their merited punishment, who had not believed the truth of Christ, but had pleasure in Antichrist's "deceivableness of unrighteousness," because it accorded to their pride, love of the world, and dislike to the spiritual worship and service of God: for this seems rather to refer to the deceived, than to the deceivers. It implied that God would act in this matter, according to the general rule of giving up those who obstinately hate the truth through love of sin, to be blinded by Satan; and that there would be a remnant, even under the deepest darkness of Antichrist's reign, of another character and description. Nothing can more exactly coincide with the system of popery, as it prevailed in the Roman church, and under the Roman pontiff, for many ages, than this passage does. Even their boasted pretensions to miraculous powers, and the imposture or ambiguity of every instance, is the grand proof of all, that they were marked out by the Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref.) And the adherence of the church of Rome, even to the present day, to the worship of images, saints, and angels, and to the doctrine of absolutions, penances, purgatory, transubstantiation, and the merit of good works, proves that the man of sin, though consuming by the Spirit and word of Christ, is not yet destroyed by the brightness of his coming. It is very wonderful, that any reflecting persons should ever think this prophecy applicable to the anti-christian delusions of modern infidels or atheists, who have apostatized from a profession of Christianity; when the single expression, "signs and lying wonders," demonstrates that they could not be meant. Antichrist indeed has made strenuous efforts as an unmasked infidel; yet, these short-lived appearances must not be compared with the permanent and wide-spread mischiefs of 1300 years; and in some considerable degree, much longer. The original words may mean, either false and lying pretences to the power of working miracles, and the impostures by which they are rendered plausible; or to things really supernatural, when performed in support of false doctrine, and claims to a divine authority, in propagating it.

V. 13, 14. The apostle intimated in these verses, that even at that time strong delusions were sent to those who "received not the love of the truth, that they might "be saved:" he was therefore bound to thank God always for his brethren at Thessalonica; because it was evident that they were specially beloved of the Lord, having been "from the beginning chosen to salvation." (Marg. Ref.) Some contend that the apostle meant the beginning of the Gospel being preached to them; but he plainly distinguished this choice of them, from their calling, and spake of the latter as the effect of the former. The doctrine of election hath been repeatedly considered, (Notes, Rom. viii. 28—31. ix. 11. Eph. i.) but we may here add, that if the calling of the Thessalonians was the effect of any preceding choice of them; it comes to the same thing, whether that choice was made the preceding day, or from before the foundation of the world, or from eternity; except as the former suppositions would militate against the immutability of God, and his absolutely perfect prescience. Otherwise, if he acted wisely and righteously in choosing them, rather than their companions in idolatry and vice, it was equally wise and righteous to choose them from eternity, as at the very hour preceding their regeneration. This choice of them to salvation had not been made, because he foresaw they would be holy, nor yet with the purpose of leaving them unholy; but with the design of preparing them for salvation, "through the sanctification "of the Spirit," and his new-creating energy, beginning, carrying on, and perfecting their renewal to the divine image; and "through their belief of the truth, as here opposed to the lie of the man of sin. For when they had been quickened from the death of sin, he led them to believe the several truths of God's word, especially those relating to the Person and Redemption of Christ; thus they were brought to receive him, and rely on him for pardon, righteousness, and grace; and so they received their title to heavenly felicity, and were trained up for the enjoyment of it. According to these purposes of God respecting them, he had called them by the Gospel, which Paul, Silvanus, and Timothy were sent to preach to them; this "came to "them not in word only, but with the power of the Holy "Ghost;" and their conversion by it both evidenced their "election of God," and was intended for "their obtaining the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ." 'How wisely and happily does the apostle unite the views of the grace of God 'and the duties of men! While he represents our choice 'to salvation in a light so worthy of God, since this salvation is still to be obtained, through sanctification of the "Spirit, and belief of the truth." (Doddridge.)

V. 15. The apostle, therefore, exhorted his beloved brethren to stand fast in the belief of those truths which they had heard from him, not only amidst the rage of persecutors, but against the artifices of deceivers; maintaining the instructions which he had given them, whether by word of mouth when with them, or by any verbal message, or by his former epistle. Doubtless the apostle's traditions were worthy of credence and obedience; but how shall we know any thing of them, except as they were written for our benefit? It is therefore a singular instance of the "deceivableness of unrighteousness" in "the man of sin," to attempt the support of his corrupt system, by a single word in that very chapter which most fully exposes his devices. For oral traditions, of equal authority to the written word, being the rule of its interpretation, and committed to the keeping of the church, (that is, to the Romish clergy,) was the grand support of popery for ages; and of this fundamental principle they have no better scriptural proof than this single word, and one or two more of similar import! (Notes, Matt. xv. 1—20.)

V. 16, 17. The apostle here addressed himself in prayer to "our Lord Jesus Christ himself," along with "God "even our Father," and he mentioned Christ first, in this most evident act of divine adoration; "for he and the "Father are One," even that one God, "who had loved "believers, and given them everlasting consolation," a well-spring of comfort in his Gospel, and by his Spirit in their hearts, which would endure to eternity, and of which they then enjoyed the earnest: and he had given them a "good hope," well-grounded, of a good, a suitable, and sufficient portion and felicity, which originated from his mercy, and was evidenced and sanctioned by his grace, in

CHAP. III.

The apostle requests the prayers of the Thessalonians; expresses his confidence respecting them, and prays for them, 1—5. He charges them to censure, and withdraw from, disorderly walkers, who neglected their own business, and intermeddled in that of others; interspersing suitable arguments, directions, and exhortations, 6—15. He concludes with benedictions, 16—18.

their hearts: and which produced the most beneficial effects in their lives, and supported them under their manifold trials. He therefore besought our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God, even our Father, still more and more to comfort them; and to render them steadfast, not only in faith and hope, but in a constant attention to holiness, in all their discourse and behaviour, and in an habitual readiness unto every good word and work.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is peculiarly incumbent on ministers to caution men against expectations, not warranted by scripture, but grounded on impressions, supposed revelations, and perversions of the word of God: for Satan makes immense use of these things: not only to unsettle men's minds, and fill them with needless apprehensions; but even to shake the foundations of their faith and hope, to draw them off from their duty, and to expose the Gospel itself to ridicule and contempt. It is sufficient for us to know that our Lord will come, and will gather all his saints unto him; and we should be careful to be always ready for his coming, and to guard against delusions and presumption, in respect to the exact time of that great event. We know, however, that the scriptures cannot be broken: the day of Christ could not come, till the predicted apostacy had taken place. These prophecies have now in a great measure received their completion, and confirm our assured belief of the truth of the scriptures: but though "the son of perdition" hath been revealed; though he hath "opposed and exalted himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped;" and hath spoken and acted as if he were a deity upon earth, who was to be adored in the temple of God himself; though the mystery of iniquity, after working long in secret, at length was brought to light; and "the lawless one" openly proclaimed his arrogance, enforced his presumptuous decrees, and supported his delusions, by the working of Satan, with lying miracles, and all kinds of impostures; yet the Lord hath not yet fully destroyed him with the brightness of his coming; and other prophecies still remain to be fulfilled, before the end shall come. But let us observe, that Satan does most mischief by those, who, Judas like, profess themselves disciples and apostles, and sell Christ for money: these are emphatically "sons of perdition," and "men of sin." Pride and ambition are always hateful; but they are most diabolical when employed about spiritual things; and there have indeed been many Antichrists; yet no one has been so mischievous as he who seated himself in the temple of God.

V. 5—12.

The world, in every age, has been replete with cheats and forgeries; yet none are so iniquitous or impious as those which some have called pious frauds; and "Satan, transformed into an angel of light," carries on his trade of destruction, by means of lying signs and miracles, of other species of the deceivableness of unrighteousness, with more fatal effect than in any other character, or by any other engine. However, neither the father of lies, nor any of his children, can go further, or proceed more rapidly, than the only wise God is pleased to permit him. Every event takes place in the appointed season; and after all the mysterious devices of iniquity, which Satan, or wicked men, can frame, "the counsel of God shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure;" and one Antichristian power has often been employed far beside his purpose, to stop the progress of another still more pestiferous. It will at last appear that none were deceived by any "energy of delusion," who were not at heart enemies to the truth and will of God, and disposed to take pleasure in unrighteousness: he is continually permitting the devil to seduce persons of this character into the belief of some lie, by which they are held, as with fetters of iron, till they receive their merited condemnation. To avoid this fatal doom, men should take heed not to repress their convictions, from love of sin: they should pray earnestly for the love of the truth, and for saving faith, from which it springs; and they should use every means of obtaining that humble and spiritual mind, which is the best security against every fatal delusion.

V. 13—17.

If we now hate sin and love the truth, we are bound to thank God for ourselves, and for each other. Many can well remember the time when they despised or hated the doctrines of scripture, and preferred soothing errors to them: nay, some of us seemed to provoke God to send "us strong delusion to believe a lie;" and we should certainly have held it fast, if we had been left to ourselves. If then it be now otherwise with us, we may thankfully ascribe it to the sovereign love of God, who from the "beginning chose us unto salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth." But let none conclude themselves chosen and called, who are strangers to the "sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience, and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus." (1 Pet. i. 2.) Let none place saving faith in any thing, but real efficacious "belief of the truth," as revealed in scripture. This belief of the truth brings the sinner to rely on Christ, and so to love and obey him; it is sealed by the Holy Spirit upon his heart, and it prepares him for the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ in heaven. Let us then stand fast in this doctrine of the apostles, and reject all spurious additions from every quarter; let us neither hesitate nor omit to pray to our Lord Jesus himself, as well as to our loving God and Father, that our interest in his "everlasting consolation, and good hope through grace," may be evinced, not only by his "comforting our hearts, but by his establishing us in every good word and work." Then we may, even in the most afflicted circumstances, look down with pity on the wealthiest of those who have only the perishing consolations and hopes of this vain world; or who have only the vain confidence, which attends the contempt, neglect, or perversion, of the Gospel of God our Saviour.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—5. The apostle, as usual, requested the Thessalonians to pray for him and his fellow-workers, and for success to their labours; that so the word of the Lord Jesus, concerning him and his salvation, might run, and be diffused by a rapid progress, from heart to heart, and from place to place, through divers nations; and that its excellent nature and effects might be manifested in the conversion of numbers from idolatry and vice to the true worship of God, and in the holy lives of professed Christians; as the glory of the Gospel had been most signally displayed among them. He requested them also to pray for the protection of him, and the other preachers of the Gospel, from the malice and violence of perverse and wicked men, such as the Jewish zealots were; whom no arguments could convince, no persuasion or kindness mollify; seeing their prejudices, the effect of their perverseness and wickedness, hurried them into all kinds of crimes, in order to oppose and destroy the apostle, and others who preached Christ to the Gentiles. The blind devotees of the pagan idolatry, whom the Jews stirred up to aid their persecutions, may also be intended. Notwithstanding the abundance of miracles, and the fulfilment of prophecies, which evinced the truth of the Gospel, yet all men had not faith to believe it, that being the effect of a divine power upon the heart, which overcame the carnal pride, obstinacy, and enmity of fallen nature. Probably some professed Christians secretly concurred with more open enemies, in attempting the life of the apostle; and these false brethren, having no real faith in Christ, were also destitute of faithfulness in their pretended friendship to him and his fellow-labourers. He was, however, satisfied that the Lord was faithful to his promises; and that the Thessalonians were true believers, whom God would establish in the faith, and defend against the devices of the wicked one, and of evil men, and keep from the evil of sin, and all its fatal effects. He had also confidence in the Lord respecting them, that he would give them grace to dispose and enable them, both at present and in future, to observe all the directions and commandments which he had given them. He therefore prayed that God would guide and lead their hearts into the comfortable experience of his love towards them, and into the exercise of love to him, and into the "patience of Christ;" that patience which he exemplified, taught, required, and bestowed; even a resignation of soul under sufferings, meekness and long-suffering under injuries, "patient continuance in "well-doing," and a disposition calmly to believe and wait for the Lord's time of deliverance. As it is the work of the Holy Spirit to direct and lead the soul into the exercise of these holy dispositions, and as "the Lord" is here mentioned distinct from God, and from Christ, it has been supposed, with some probability, that the apostle addressed this prayer personally to the Holy Spirit, "the "Lord the Spirit," the third person in the adorable Trinity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6—9. The Thessalonians were generally deserving of high commendation; but the apostle had occasion to speak with authority, and implied reproof in one particular, of which he had before given some intimation. (1 Thes. iv. 11, 12.) He therefore commanded and exhorted, or charged them, in the name, and as they valued the authority, favour, and glory, of the Lord Jesus, that they should withdraw from every one called a Christian brother, who walked disorderly, like a soldier that quitted his ranks or deserted his post. For they well knew in what respects they ought to imitate him and his brethren; as they had not behaved in a disorderly manner among them, or done any thing inconsistent with the regularity of families, or of society. In particular, they had not lived at other people's expense, nor in idleness: on the contrary, they had wrought, with very great labour and fatigue, to earn a maintenance for themselves; even during the night, when the day did not suffice for that, and the exercise of their ministry also. Thus they avoided being chargeable to any person, that they might excite no prejudice against the Gospel. Not that they had no right to a maintenance, or power to require one, by the rule of the Gospel; but because, in their circumstances, they counted it necessary to endure much hardship, that they might become a proper example for their converts to imitate. (Notes, 1 Cor. ix.)

V. 10—12. Perhaps the apostle had perceived a disposition in some persons at Thessalonica, to make religion a pretence for indolence, and for subsisting on the hospitality of their brethren, without working at their own trades. 'How they might fall into this evil, is easy to conceive. 'Persons all alive to God and his Christ, and knowing 'little of the deceitfulness of the heart, and the crafts of 'Satan, might find it irksome to attend to the concerns of 'this life. It was a fault indeed, and very dangerous, if 'persisted in; as it was soon corrected, in all probability, 'and in part occasioned by the strength of heavenly affec'tions, one cannot be very severe in censuring it. It may 'be worth while for those who feel themselves much 'irritated against similar evils attending on the out-pour'ing of the Holy Spirit in our days, to consider whether 'they do not exercise more candour toward the Thessa'lonians, and respect them as real Christians, while they 'scorn those who walk in their steps as enthusiasts.' (Milner.) The apostle, however, being fully aware of the consequences, had, when he was with them, commanded them not to maintain in idleness such as could work and would not, either by private or public charity; that, being left to endure the pinchings of hunger and want, they might be compelled to attend to their proper duty. As God gives every thing to man in the way of labour, so the industrious part of every community maintains the slothful. Or the words may signify, if any man refuse to work, he ought by all means to live without food: but, if that be impossible, let him thence learn to consider how unreasonable and iniquitous idleness is: by which a man that cannot but consume, does nothing to replenish, the stores that are thus exhausted. The expression was for substance a proverb among the Jews. 'They state it wrong, 'who render it, Let him not eat, who does not work; for 'none are more deserving of relief from others, than 'they who, through some just and necessary impediment, 'cannot labour, though they greatly desire it.' (Beza.) This venerable reformer, of course, here takes occasion to expose the mendicant monks and friars, as exactly answering the character described by St. Paul. How far relieving vagrant beggars, of whose character, or incapacity for labour, we know nothing, can consist with this rule, is worth inquiry. Certainly the money might be almost always better employed. Whatever rank men sustain, they are mere drones in the hive, unless they fill up the duties of their station for the common benefit. Christians, therefore, should not countenance such evident injustice; especially as this hath always been one of the slanders raised against the professed worshippers of God. (Note, Ex. v. 8, 9.) The kindness required from believers, and to which they are propense, often gives slothful persons an opportunity, on various pretences, to seek exemption from labour, by which they become useless and mischievous; they and their families are often reduced to great distress; debts are contracted which they cannot pay; and that bounty is diverted into a wrong channel, which should encourage the industrious poor, and support the sick and afflicted. The apostle therefore reminded his beloved Thessalonians of this rule; because he heard that there were some of these disorderly persons among them, who did not work at their own trades or callings, but expected to be maintained in idleness by their brethren. These persons would naturally contract a sauntering, gossipping habit, and would indulge a talkative, curious, and conceited temper; and, having much leisure, they would intermeddle with other men's concerns, to the disturbance of families, by exciting suspicions and jealousies among neighbours; and to the injury of men's characters. But, the apostle commanded, and charged them, in the name of Christ, and as they would stand accepted before his tribunal, to cease from this officiousness; and to attend to their own labour with humility, modesty, contentment, and peaceable industry; that, thus subsisting on their own earnings, they might "eat their own bread," and not consume what properly belonged to others.

V. 13. As the bad use which some individuals made of the liberality and hospitality of their brethren, tended to damp the ardour of Christian charity, the apostle thought it necessary to caution them against growing weary in well doing, in this or any other instance. (Note, Gal. vi. 8—10.)

V. 14, 15. Should any one continue to disobey the command given by the apostle, "to labour with quietness, "and eat his own bread," the others were directed to note him by some censure of the Church, and every Christian was required to separate from his company, that he might be put to shame, and brought to repentance. Thus the scandal would be prevented, and the credit of Christianity maintained. Yet, they were by no means to show any ill-will to him, or do him any injury, as if he were an enemy; but to persevere in seeking his good by loving admonitions, considering him as a brother, though "over"taken in a fault." (Notes, 1 Cor. v.)

the Father and the great Author of all peace to men, was here addressed in prayer, to give the Thessalonians peace in their hearts and consciences, peace with each other, and peace with all men, at all times, and by all means, in his providence, by his grace, through the labours of his ministers, and their own mutual endeavours, and by their prayers for each other; and that he would be with them all, as the Author of comfort and holiness to their souls.

V. 17. It is probable, that the apostle's method of writing by an amanuensis gave occasion to some counterfeit epistles to be written in his name; he therefore subscribed the salutation with his own hand, as the token, in every epistle, that it came from him. It is not unlikely, that he dictated his epistles, while labouring at his trade as a tent-maker.

V. 18. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

The success of the Gospel is as really promoted by fervent prayer, as by faithful preaching. All, in whose conversion it hath been glorified, should labour to honour it in their holy lives, and they should desire and pray that it may have free course, and be glorified in this manner all over the earth. They ought also to beseech the Lord to protect his faithful ministers against those unreasonable and wicked men, who are every where to be met with, even among professed Christians, and who are equally destitute of faith and faithfulness, that they may not be discouraged by their most virulent or determined opposition. Our whole dependence, however, must be upon the Lord's faithfulness to his promises, who will surely establish those who rely on him, and preserve them from every fatal snare and real evil. If by his special grace we have that faith, which multitudes have not, our obligations to him are immense; and we should earnestly apply to him to incline and enable us, perseveringly, and without reserve, to obey his commands, and that the Lord the Spirit may direct our hearts into the love of God and the patience of Christ.

V. 6—18.

It is of great importance to the credit and success of the Gospel, that the injunctions of the apostles be observed; and that believers withdraw from every brother who walks disorderly, and habitually neglects or violates the precepts of Scripture. Pious men are often betrayed into a disregard to this rule, through humility and tenderness; by which means the misconduct of a professed believer turns to the scandal of his profession, and he is soothed into carnal security by an ill-judged and unkind lenity. Whatever difficulties occur respecting public discipline, believers of every denomination might agree, in separating from disorderly walkers, with proper admonitions and expostulations; that thus being put to shame, they might be brought to repentance. This would be so far from treating them as enemies, that it would be the wisest exercise of brotherly love. It is peculiarly incumbent on ministers, to show the tendency of their doctrine in their own conduct, that the people may perceive how they ought to follow them. It is not indeed required, nor generally expected, that they should "labour and toil, night and 'day, to avoid being chargeable" to the people; for 'they that preach the Gospel have a right to live of the 'Gospel;" and, if faithful and diligent in their work, they by no means "eat any man's bread for naught." Yet they should be very careful to avoid every appearance of selfishness, indolence, or an encroaching spirit: and they must often give up their own interest, indulgence, and inclination, to make themselves an example to the people, and to give energy to their instructions. A slothful man is a scandal to any society, but most to a religious society. It would be deemed rigorous, should we enforce the apostle's rule, "that if any will not work, neither shall he eat;" yet, in fact, it is founded in equity and love. It is injustice to the indigent, the weak, and the industrious, when the bounty of their brethren is wasted on the indolent and extravagant. The greatest kindness that can be shown to the latter, is to constrain them, if possible, "to labour, "working with their own hands the thing which is good;" this alone can preserve them from mischief, temptation, and misery. None can "eat their own bread," who are not willing, in some way, to labour for it. They who neglect their own business become busy-bodies, officious intermeddlers, tale-bearers, and disturbers of the peace of families, churches, and communities; for 'the devil finds 'some mischief still for idle hands to do.' Persons of this description ought therefore to be discountenanced, rebuked, and commanded from the Lord Jesus, with quietness to labour and eat their own bread; and, if they refuse to do this, they should be censured, noted, and shunned by all believers, till brought to repentance. No abuses, however, of this or any other kind should make us weary of well-doing, check our bounty to proper objects, or our genuine good will to the most unworthy. While we use every means of peace in our private or public capacity, we must still pray to the Lord of peace, to give us peace always, and by all means, and that he would be with us, and confer his grace on us and all our brethren.

THE
TO TIMOTHY.

The time when this epistle was written, constitutes the principal difficulty respecting it. It was long the general opinion, that the apostle wrote it soon after he was driven from Ephesus, on account of the tumult excited by Demetrius and his craftsmen. (Acts xix. 20—40. xx. 1.) But, several very learned and respectable men have, in modern times, started objections against this opinion, which they think insurmountable. There is no reasonable doubt, but that the Second Epistle to the Corinthians was written during the apostle's abode in Macedonia, after he came thither from Ephesus. But, it is evident that Timothy was with him when he wrote it; for his name is inserted in the superscription. How then, say they, could he have been left at Ephesus, and entreated to abide there? (i. 3.) 'And as to the only solution of the difficulty, which can be 'thought of, viz. that Timothy might follow so soon after, as to be with the apostle in Macedonia, when he 'wrote his epistle to the Corinthians; that supposition is inconsistent with the terms and tenour of the epistle 'throughout. For the writer speaks uniformly of his intention to return to Timothy at Ephesus, and not of 'his expecting Timothy to come to him in Macedonia. (iii. 14, 15. iv. 13.) Therefore I concur with 'Bishop Pearson, in placing the date of the epistle, and the history referred to in it, at a period subsequent to 'St. Paul's first imprisonment, and consequently subservient to the æra, up to which the Acts of the Apostles 'brings his history.' (Paley.) This is a fair statement of the main objection; though some things, of inferior moment, will require a little attention. It may, however, be questioned, whether the conclusion here deduced, does not lie open to still more insuperable objections. Some regard may be due to the total silence of the scripture, as to any subsequent visit of the apostle to Ephesus, and his departure thence to Macedonia. It is indeed allowed, that during his imprisonment at Rome, he mentions in his epistles, a purpose of visiting several places, in the eastern regions. (Phil. ii. 14. Philem. 22. Heb. xiii. 19. 23.) And in his second epistle to Timothy, it appears, that he had been at several places in the neighbourhood of Ephesus. Still, however, there is no intimation that he visited Ephesus. He observes, in the close of this epistle, that he had sent Tychicus to Ephesus; which may imply, that he had not gone thither himself. Indeed whether it be allowed, according to historical records, not very satisfactory, that he hastened from Crete to Rome, hearing accounts which induced him to think that his presence there was necessary; or whether his persecutors seized on him, and conveyed him to Rome, in an unexpected manner; it seems evident that he was hurried out of these regions, before he had time to settle his several concerns, in the manner which he wished to have done. (2 Tim. iv. 12—20.) It might also be brought as an objection to this opinion, that Timothy, after the conclusion of St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, must, on any computation, have been above thirty years of age; and though, at that time of life, the exhortation to flee youthful lusts might not be unreasonable; (2 Tim. ii. 22;) yet the caution, "Let no man despise thy youth," seems not so consistent. But, the grand difficulty arises from the words of the apostle to the Ephesian elders at Miletus: "And now, behold, I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more." It is evident, that the persons present understood this, not as a conjecture, or as 'a desponding inference,' but as a prediction: when the apostle perceived the overwhelming sorrow which it had excited in them, he neither retracted nor qualified it: and it seems unquestionable that the historian records it as a prophecy. (Notes, Acts xx. 25—38.) The words 'Ye all, &c.' confine the interpretation to the persons present: the prediction therefore would be exactly fulfilled, though the apostle visited many places in that neighbourhood; nay, though he purposed, (which is not likely,) to visit Ephesus; provided he did not actually go thither, or meet any of the elders, to whom he gave the charge at Miletus. It can hardly be supposed, that after an absence of perhaps rather more than ten years, the apostle revisiting Ephesus, found that all the elders whom he had addressed at Miletus were dead. But, except on this very improbable supposition, or on that of the words before adduced being a mere conjecture, in which the event proved the apostle to have been mistaken, we must adhere to the old opinion, that this epistle was written immediately after the apostle had left Ephesus to go into Macedonia; because it is on every other supposition, absolutely certain, that he never after left Ephesus to go into Macedonia. But let us next consider whether the objections above so cogently stated, against the ancient opinion, may not be satisfactorily answered. The apostle must have spent some considerable time in Macedonia, after he left Ephesus, and before he went to Corinth; for "he went over those parts, and gave them much exhortation." (Acts xx. 2.) Now it is not in the least improbable, that unforeseen circumstances might induce Timothy to leave Ephesus sooner than either he or the apostle had intended. The virulence of the persecutors might drive him thence, or he might need some counsel and instruction, in respect of the false teachers, or on some particulars which he had learned concerning the state of the church.—Various circumstances, indeed, might render it inexpedient for him to continue at Ephesus, according to the plan at first formed. On the other hand, it is probable the apostle wrote this epistle as soon as he arrived in Macedonia; and at that time he might fully purpose, and confidently hope, to come to Timothy at Ephesus, and yet be disappointed.—Thus, he had once and again purposed to return to Thessalonica, "but Satan hindered him." (1 Thes. ii. 18.) Thus he had seen cause to alter his plan, in respect of going to Corinth, even after he had given some intimations of it. (Notes, 2 Cor. i. 15—18.) It may not improbably be conjectured that the apostle, when he left Ephesus, expected that Timothy would abide there till he had accomplished his business in Macedonia and Achaia; and that he should be enabled to go to him at Ephesus, as he took his voyage to Jerusalem with the contributions of the Churches; but, having been induced, by the malicious designs of the Jews, to go from Corinth through Macedonia, so much time had elapsed, that he found it necessary to sail past Ephesus, lest he should not arrive at Jurusalem by the feast of Pentecost. This might derange one part of his plan, and the departure of Timothy from Ephesus would defeat another.—As the difficulties on this side seem to me far less than those on the other, I adhere, though with diffidence, to the ancient opinion, and shall comment on the Epistle accordingly. The history in the Acts of the Apostles, implies that Timothy continued with the apostle during his progress through Macedonia, and his continuance at Corinth; and that he returned with him through Macedonia into Asia. But Timothy is not afterwards mentioned as accompanying the apostle either to Jerusalem, or in his subsequent imprisonment at Cesarea, or in his voyage to Rome; and it is probable that he abode in Asia, and going with the elders of Ephesus, when they parted from the Apostle, he settled at that city for some years, according to the ancient records of the church concerning him.—But when four years, or nearly, had passed, it seems that he went to the apostle at Rome, and was imprisoned with him, but was soon set at liberty, and sent to Philippi. (Phil. ii. 19. Heb. xiii. 23.)—In respect to Timothy, it is sufficient to refer to the account before given of his appointment to be St. Paul's companion in travel. (Notes, Acts xvi. 1—3.) Having been trained up under the apostle's immediate care, he imbibed, in an extraordinary degree, his spirit and principles, and was peculiarly beloved by him.—Having been suddenly driven from Ephesus, St. Paul had left Timothy behind him to settle the concerns of that church in the best manner that he could; and wrote this epistle to him for his direction in so doing.—Whether the above conjecture (for we have no authentic records to direct us,) of Timothy's return to Ephesus, and residence there, be well grounded, or not, these directions would not be in vain; for the substance of them would be equally applicable, in any other church to which he might be sent, or in which he might have resided.—Indeed, it does not appear that the apostle intended to give Timothy instructions, exclusively, or even principally, respecting the Ephesian church; but rather general counsels for his conduct in the churches of Christ; and for all others, when called to act in similar circumstances.—The epistle contains cautions against false teachers; directions concerning the worship of God, and the behaviour of believers; the character and conduct to be expected in bishops and deacons, and their families; exhortations to Timothy concerning his private and public behaviour, especially in ordaining ministers, censuring offenders, and settling the other affairs of the church; admonitions against several sins and temptations; solemn charges to faithfulness, and various doctrinal and practical matters interwoven with them. This and the two following epistles are peculiarly replete with instruction to ministers, and should be continually studied and meditated on by all who bear that sacred character.—The postscript dates the epistle from Laodicea, but it is almost certain that the apostle had never yet visited that city. (Col. ii. 1.)

CHAP. I.

The apostle salutes Timothy, 1, 2; reminds him for what purpose he was left at Ephesus. 3. 4; shows, that the end of the commandment is love, from a pure heart, a good conscience, and unfeigned faith, 5; from which some having swerved, in attempting to teach the law, had perverted it, 6, 7. The law is good; but is intended to condemn transgressors, 8—10; which accords with the Gospel also, 11. With humble thankfulness, the apostle speaks of his own conversion, and the encouragement given by it to sinners in every age; and ascribes glory to God, 12—17. He charges Timothy to maintain faith and a good conscience; and mentions some who had renounced the truth, and whom he had delivered unto Satan, 18—20.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. In this address, Paul called himself an apostle of Christ, by the commandment of God our Saviour; by which, in this connexion, the Person of the Father seems intended, as purposing salvation for sinners, forming the plan of it, and giving his own Son to be, in human nature, their Saviour; but the Lord Jesus was joined in granting this commission, as being one with him in essence, authority, and counsel. Him the apostle called "our Hope;" as all his hope of salvation and eternal happiness was fixed upon the Person and atonement of Christ. He also addressed Timothy as his own son in the faith, or his genuine Son. In all probability, he was the instrument of Timothy's conversion; he had, as it were, educated him in the Gospel; and Timothy reverenced him and served with him in his ministry, as a dutiful son with a loving father. From the exuberance of his love to Timothy, he added the word "mercy," to his usual salutation; or perhaps because his peculiar trials and services would require peculiar consolations, from the compassion and mercy of the Lord towards him. God our Saviour. (1.) 'The Father saves us, as reconciled to him in the Son; and the 'Son saves, as reconciled in his flesh.' (Beza.)

V. 3, 4. The apostle left Timothy at Ephesus, when he went thence into Macedonia, (see Preface;) that he might solemnly and constantly charge certain persons not to teach any other doctrines than what he had done. The Judaizers would be sure to take the opportunity of St. Paul's absence to propagate their tenets; and it seems that he knew them to be zealous for the traditions and fabulous pretences of the elders and Pharisees, as well as for the Mosaic law. But the Ephesians were warned not to take notice of such fables, or of their genealogies, which related to their descent from Abraham, or the patriarchs, by which they imagined themselves entitled to peculiar privileges. These genealogies led to endless intricacies and perplexities, and to many difficult questions and useless controversies; and, at last, they rather induced a carnal confidence and a self-confident temper, than any improvement in godliness of heart and life; which could only be maintained and increased by faith in the truths and promises of God, through Jesus Christ. This charge therefore was to be steadfastly observed by him. Some imagine, that "endless genealogies," denotes the extravagant, and indeed unintelligible, notions of the Gnostics and other heretics, about the origin of the world; but the context seems to determine in favour of the interpretation before given; and it may well be questioned, whether these heretics had, at so early a period, openly propagated their incoherent and profane jargon. Godly edification, or "Edification of God;" 'because it hath God for its Object and 'End, as tending to the true knowledge and right worship 'of God: it is efficiently from him, and tendeth highly to 'his glory.' (Whitby.)

V. 5. The word rendered commandment, is, by some, explained of the moral law, the scope and substance of which is charity or love, towards God and man. Others understand it to mean the message of God to men by the Gospel; the end of which is to restore fallen sinners to the love required by the law; and this better suits the context: but others explain it of the charge given to Timothy by the apostle. This seems to be the right interpretation: and thus it had reference both to the law as the rule of duty, and to the grand design of the Gospel. The charity, or love, here spoken of, must arise out of a pure heart, or the affections of the soul, as cleansed by renewing grace from the love and pollution of sin, and from carnal enmity and selfishness, (1 Pet. i. 22:) and a "good conscience," or one well informed concerning the will of God, and made tender and active by divine grace, as well as purged from guilt by the blood of Christ; that so the possessor might be influenced to act conscientiously in his whole conduct. It must also come from "unfeigned faith," or a sincere belief of revealed truths, and a reliance on the merits of Christ, and the promises of God through him. This faith, working by love, purifying the heart, and producing a good conscience, constituted the substance of what the apostle ordered Timothy to give in charge to the Ephesian teachers; because it comprised the grand essentials of evangelical religion. The several characteristics of charity or love, here given, admirably distinguish it from the spurious charity, now the favourite virtue of the world. It is not the natural growth of the human heart, but exists only in a heart purified by divine grace. It is consistent with, and grows out of, a good conscience, not sacrificing truth and common sense, as well as conscience, to the phantom of liberality: it springs from faith, instead of being independent of it and superseding it.

V. 6, 7. From this love, and purity, and conscientiousness, some persons had swerved or deviated, out of zeal for external distinctions, legal observances, and human traditions; thus they turned aside from the faith also, and got engaged in vain janglings and angry controversies, about doubtful points of small consequence. For they were desirous of being teachers of the law, or doctors of the law, (the name frequently given to the principal Scribes,) and to exercise that office among Christians, in order to acquire a reputation for learning, and to be called Rabbi; but they "neither understood what they said, nor whereof "they affirmed." They declaimed, in a loose and perplexed manner, upon general topics; not understanding the spiritual nature and uses of the moral law, which they pretended to explain, nor the typical import of those abrogated ceremonies which they enforced.

V. 8—11. The apostle, and, indeed, all competent ministers and established Christians, knew that the law was good in itself, or for its intended purposes, provided a man used it lawfully, according to its real import, and the design of the great Law-giver. The moral law is holy, just, and good, resulting from the nature of God and man, and men's relations to him and to each other. Even the ceremonial law had a relative goodness, for the time, as typical of Christ and the Gospel; and the entire Mosaic dispensation was good, as separating Israel from other nations, affording them the means of grace, and introducing the Christian economy. But to enforce the Mosaic law on Christians, or to teach them to depend on their own obedience to any part of it for justification, was contrary to the real meaning of the law itself, and the intention of the Law-giver. It was evident, even from the books of Moses, when properly understood, that "Christ "was the end of the law for righteousness to every be- "liever;" and that the strict demands and awful sanction of the law itself, were intended to show the Israelites that they could not be justified by it, but must live by faith in the promised Saviour. As then believers were righteous persons in God's appointed way, the law was not enacted against them. As with respect to laws in general, so with respect to the divine law, it was not made to coerce the well-disposed subject, but the ill-affected. Its design, (as far as it is penal,) is to restrain and condemn the wicked, not to hold the humble in servile bondage by its curse; though it will be, of course, the rule of their conduct and the standard of their duty. "The law is not made against "the righteous." This seems a fair translation, and certainly is the meaning of the words. "If a man use it law- "fully;" 'that is,' says Theodoret, 'if he comply with 'the scope of it, which is to bring him to Christ; for 'against such there is no law condemning them: but it 'lies against the lawless to condemn them.' (Whitby.)— After the general terms of lawless and disobedient, which relate to the disregard and contempt of God's commandments, as manifested in the outward conduct of "ungodly "and sinners," which seem to denote men's neglect of their duties to God and their neighbours; and "unholy "and profane," which may refer to the gross sensuality and debauchery of multitudes, and that daring impiety commonly connected with it; the apostle enumerates some particular crimes of the most atrocious nature. Doubtless, numerous examples of them were found among the Gentiles, and some perhaps among the bigoted Jews, who depended on the law, and yet scandalously broke it. (Rom. ii. 12—29.) "Men-stealers," are inserted among these daring criminals, against whom the law of God directed its awful curses. These were persons, who kidnapped men to sell them for slaves; and this practice seems inseparable from the other iniquities and oppressions of slavery; nor can a slave-dealer easily keep free from this criminality, if indeed 'the receiver be as bad as the thief.' They who 'make war, for the inhuman purpose of selling the van‘quished for slaves, as is the practice among African ‘princes, are really man-stealers. And they, who, like ‘African traders, encourage their unchristian traffick, by ‘purchasing that which they know to be thus unjustly ac‘quired, are partakers in their crimes.’ (Macknight.) The clause should have been, ‘know, or have reason to suspect.’ The apostle did not mean, that none but persons of so infamous a character lay under the curse of the law; but that it was directed against all other practices, that were contrary to sound doctrine, or the salutary nature and tendency of the Christian revelation. According to this every impenitent sinner, every man who allowed himself in the practice of any known transgression, remained under the covenant and curse of the law. This accorded to the Gospel of the glory of God, (as intrusted to the apostle,) by which he displayed all his perfections in the most honourable and harmonious manner, by saving believers from their sins, as well as from wrath: for, being “the “blessed God,” the Perfection and Source of felicity, as well as of holiness, he had devised to render fallen men partakers of his happiness, by renewing them to the participation of his holiness.

V. 12—14. The consideration, that the Gospel of the blessed God had been intrusted to him, awakened in the apostle's mind, the affection of humble admiring gratitude, and he broke forth into adoring thanks to Christ Jesus, for his distinguished mercy to him, both by conferring on him abundantly miraculous powers, and by enduing him richly with the courage, resolution, and patience of faith, hope, and love. Thus he had enabled him and qualified him for this honourable service; and had accounted him a faithful person, fit to be employed as his steward and ambassador; which he had evinced, by putting him into the sacred ministry, and owning him as his apostle. This was, in all respects, most astonishing grace; seeing he had before been a most daring blasphemer of his name, and had compelled others to blaspheme; he had furiously persecuted Christ's disciples, and most injuriously haled them to prison, with bitter sarcasms and reproaches, and sought to put them to death, from entire enmity to the name and cause of their Lord! But, though his conduct had been so aggravated, he had obtained mercy: for his sins were not absolutely unpardonable, because he had perpetrated them “ignorantly in unbelief;” whereas, if his knowledge had been greater, and if his malice had been exerted against the full convictions of his own conscience, he would have been given up to final impenitence. His ignorance and unbelief, indeed, amidst such abundant means of information and conviction, were the result of a self-sufficient, obstinate, and contemptuous prejudice against the truth; yet he “verily thought, that he ought “to do many things against the name of Jesus,” and was in no sense convinced that he was the Messiah: but there were others, who were hurried on by malice, ambition, and selfishness, to act in direct opposition to the dictates of their own consciences, and thus to “sin against the “Holy Spirit,” by maliciously and wilfully ascribing his undeniable operations to human imposture, or satanical influence. It is remarkable, that many persons have supposed Paul's proud and wilful ignorance, and his consequent unbelief, (two sins, in themselves deserving of divine wrath, though in his circumstances they just preserved him from the unpardonable sin,) to have been a kind of meritorious cause of his obtaining mercy; especially when joined with his sincerity in opposing the Gospel. They imagine, that in some manner or measure he deserved mercy more than any who are left to perish. This they must mean, if they mean any thing to the purpose: for, though his guilt might be less than that of some Jews, who, sinning against clearer light and with more deliberate malice, were given up to final obduracy; yet they, who maintain the doctrines of grace, suppose that many perish in their sins, whose criminality is far less than his was; that he might most justly have thus been left to perish: and that no reason can by us be assigned for his salvation in preference to others, who had not committed the sin against the Holy Spirit; except the sovereign grace of God, “who hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, “and whom he will he hardeneth;” and that other reason, which the apostle himself next assigns, namely, “the praise “of the glory of that grace.” For he supposes, that he should have righteously perished, if the Lord had been extreme to mark and punish his sins: nay, if his grace and mercy had not been “exceedingly abundant,” beyond all expectation, estimation, or conception; not only, in that he was ready to forgive, bless, and employ him, when he repented, believed, and was prepared for obedience; but “in quickening him when dead in sin,” and so working faith and love to Jesus Christ in his heart, that he might be interested in him and his righteousness. ciliation of so virulent a persecutor, should be considered as an illustration of the nature of the Gospel; and of the exceeding riches of the mercy of God in Christ Jesus. It was indeed a true "and faithful saying," authenticated by every evidence which proves Christianity to be "the word of God, who cannot lie;" and it was worthy to be received, with humble and thankful faith, by men of all nations; (as all are sinners, and none can be saved in any other way,) and as none are excluded from salvation who seek it in this way; "that Jesus," Emmanuel, the Son of God, the Messiah, "came into the world" voluntarily, and with the express design, and for the single purpose, of saving sinners. "The Word," who was God and was with God, the Creator and Upholder of all worlds, the Lord of all creatures, became flesh, that he might be the second Adam, the Surety of the new covenant, to fulfil all righteousness, and make an infinitely valuable atonement for sin; in order to his officiating as the Advocate of his people in heaven, and reigning over all worlds for their benefit. The only end of this was "the salvation of sinners," of every nation and description, from condemnation, sin, Satan, the world, and death: even all, without exception, who came to him by faith for this salvation. Of these sinners, Paul judged himself the chief: the greatest enemy of Christ, and the most deserving of divine vengeance, of all who ever were, or would be, saved by him. This seems the purport of the expression: but it is possible, that he supposed his actual crimes to be so numerous and enormous, that his guilt even exceeded that of those who had sinned more entirely against their own convictions, and so had been given up to final impenitency. Instead of imagining that there was something meritorious in his blind and obstinate sincerity, as some have averred, he considered himself as one selected on purpose, because he was more guilty than any other person in the world, (those only excepted, who had committed the unpardonable sin, if even they were excepted;) that in him, first or the chief sinner, Jesus Christ might exhibit, with the greatest lustre imaginable, that degree, in which he can bear with, and pardon, his most virulent enemies and the vilest of mankind: that so it might stand upon record to the end of time, for the encouragement of all others, in every age and nation, who believe in Christ, and rely on his merits and grace for the pardon of their sins, and the gift of eternal life; to prevent their being disheartened by a retrospective view of the number, nature, and heinousness of their crimes.

V. 17. Some expositors suppose this doxology to be addressed personally to Christ as God, because the apostle had before been speaking of him; but it seems rather to be addressed to the Godhead, without distinction of persons. The Father, the Son, the Holy Spirit, three Persons in the unity of the Godhead, as the triune God of salvation, constitute the Object of all our worship, which person soever we immediately address. To God, as the King eternal, in every age and under every dispensation, the universal and everlasting, though invisible, Sovereign, the inexhaustible Source of all wisdom, he ascribed all the glory of his conversion, salvation, faithfulness, and usefulness; and he desired earnestly that God might be honoured, in all his perfections and wonderful works, by all rational creatures, for ever and ever. Amen. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18—20. The apostle here referred to what he had before spoken. (3. 5. 11.) The trust committed to him by Christ, as his apostle, he had committed to his "son "Timothy;" he was encouraged to repose great confidence in him, not only by what he knew of his principles and character, but by entertaining hopes of him "according to certain prophecies," which inspired persons had uttered concerning him, before his appointment to the ministry; and he expected, that by meditating upon them he should he animated and instructed, in "warring a good "warfare," or rather "the good warfare," as a valiant soldier of Jesus Christ. This must be done, by maintaining and insisting upon both the faith of the Gospel, or its doctrines as uncorrupted and unmutilated, and a good conscience, or an universally conscientious conduct. These Timothy must be careful to connect, both in his own example, and in his preaching; for some professed Christians, having neglected to maintain and insist on a good conscience, had, after a time, renounced the faith also, and made ship-wreck of their whole religion; either by a total apostacy from their profession, or the most heretical corruptions of the Gospel. Of this number were Hymeneus and Alexander, with whom Timothy had doubtless been acquainted. (Marg. Ref.) These the apostle had deemed it needful openly to excommunicate, and cast out of the church, into the visible kingdom of Satan; that they might not blaspheme Christ, or disgrace his Gospel by their impious tenets. It is generally supposed, that some severe correction was also miraculously inflicted on them, which would tend to make them sensible of their guilt and danger, and subserve the charitable design of bringing them to repentance. (Marg. Ref.) We afterwards read of Hymeneus; and, probably, Alexander the coppersmith was the other person meant. (Marg. Ref.) It does not, however, appear, that either of them was recovered by the discipline awarded them. It has often been justly observed, that the severe censures, which the apostle inflicted on those, who had once been professors or ministers of Christianity, and publicly recorded, with their names annexed, constitute a most conclusive proof, that he had no fear of their being provoked to disclose any secret, or give information of any evil practices, which they had witnessed among Christians. His conduct implied a public challenge to them in this respect; and was the genuine expression of conscious integrity, and the courage which springs from it. Some think, that Timothy was chosen to the ministry by the prophecies respecting him, (18;) and that this was the way in which the pastors and teachers in the newly planted churches were generally selected: but this opinion does not appear to be supported by sufficient proof.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

Apostles, and other eminent ministers in every age, who have most evidently been commissioned by God our Saviour, and the Lord Jesus Christ, have had no other ground of hope, as to the salvation of their own souls, than what they possessed in common with their meanest brethren. In some respects they have even more needed "grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father and "our Lord Jesus," than others; their temptations, trials, and difficulties, have been greater; they had the same evil nature with other men, and no more wisdom or strength in themselves than they; and even their most faithful and useful services needed mercy for their acceptance, as well as grace for their performance. He, however, who appointed them, was always ready to uphold and help them; and his strength was perfected in their weakness. It is of great importance for us to charge curious and conceited persons to preach no other doctrine than that of the scriptures; for Satan makes immense use of such teachers, to sow tares in the Lord's field, to multiply hypocrites, to deceive souls, to disturb the peace of the churches, to excite questions and contentions; and, in short, to put men upon any thing, that may take them off from "godly "edifying, which is in faith."

V. 5—11.

The design of the Gospel is not answered by speculation, and solving abstract questions, or giving heed to fables and endless disputation; but when sinners, through repentance towards God and faith in Christ Jesus, are brought to the habitual exercise of holy love, out of "a pure heart, a "good conscience, and faith unfeigned." All doctrines, ordinances, and forms, are just so far beneficial to us, as they are useful in producing this effect in our hearts and lives; and all that faith is dead, which does not thus influence men to love God, and each other, in a practical manner. But, alas! in how many ways do men swerve from this plain and simple statement of the truth, and turn aside unto vain jangling! Many called Christian ministers desire to be teachers of the law, knowing neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm; and thus a few fragments of morality are substituted in the place of the holy law and the blessed Gospel of God our Saviour! Others know not, or acknowledge not, that the "law is "good, when used lawfully;" and they declaim in so general a manner against the law and good works, that many conclude the commandments of God to be evil, or void of obligation in themselves! But believers derive great benefit from the holy law; and none have any thing to fear from it, but the lawless and disobedient, the ungodly and profane. We have all indeed deserved this condemnation: there is none righteous, no not one, except as made so by faith in Christ, and through his grace. It is allowed, that few in comparison have been guilty of actual murder, parricide, men-stealing, or perjury; that many are free from the guilt of fornication, adultery, and other still baser practices; yet the same corrupt nature is in us all; and our enmity against God, and ingratitude to him; our disposition to disobey and despise parental authority, to hate and quarrel with our neighbours, to please ourselves, regardless of their good and the glory of God; and a variety of polluted thoughts and affections, lying and vain words. and many other things contrary to sound doctrine, would expose us to the wrath of God, and justify him in our final condemnation. Unless, therefore, we are made righteous by faith in Christ, and really repent and forsake every sin, we are yet under the curse of the law, even according to the Gospel of the blessed God, preached by St. Paul; and at the same time unmeet to share the holy felicity of heaven.

V. 12—17.

It is peculiarly encouraging to recollect what manner of persons have been converted, pardoned, qualified, counted faithful, put into the ministry, and made the instruments of good to mankind. Several who before were blasphemers, persecutors, and injurious, have, in different ways, been thus employed on earth, and are now with holy Paul in heaven, celebrating the rich mercy and grace, by which they were made partakers of repentance, faith and love, and that precious blood, by which they were washed from all their sins. These, in their day, bore witness to that faithful saying, which we now would recommend to general acceptation; even that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners; and it always hath been greatly encouraging to trembling penitents, when the preachers of this rich grace were themselves evidently illustrations of their own doctrine; even chief sinners, yet pardoned and changed, sent to declare to others the long-suffering and mercy of Christ to them, as a pattern to all who should believe on him to everlasting life. Indeed, no man, with Paul's example before his eyes, can reasonably question the love and power of Christ to save him, whatever his sins have been, if he really desire and endeavour to trust in him, as the incarnate Son of God, who once died on the cross, and now reigns upon the throne of glory, in order to save all that come to God through him. For though some, having obstinately rebelled against the light, are given up to final impenitence; yet all, who penitently seek salvation by Christ, according to the Gospel, are most certainly clear of that sin, having committed their crimes, however atrocious, in ignorance and unbelief. Let us then seek and hope for this salvation; and in humble consciousness of our unworthiness, let us admire and praise the grace of God our Saviour; and ascribe to "the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, all honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen." May all, who are intrusted with the ministry, faithfully and valiantly "war the good warfare," with such weapons as are mighty, through God, to destroy Satan's strong-holds! May they, in their doctrine and examples, and all Christians in their experience and practice, "hold faith and a good conscience!" May all, who are tempted to put away a good conscience, and to abuse the Gospel, remember, that this is the old way of making shipwreck concerning faith also! And may Hymeneus and Alexander be as beacons, to warn others from such fatal rocks; and as monitors, to teach them not to blaspheme, and to caution them, "while they think they stand, to take heed lest they fall!"

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. Proceeding in his charge to Timothy, the apostle exhorted and enjoined, that "first of all," as a matter of great importance, supplications, and prayers of every kind, suited to every emergency, and accompanied with thanksgivings for mercies received, should be made, especially in their public worship; not only in behalf of themselves, each other, and all their fellow-christians; but for all men, without distinction of nation, rank, or party; and without exception of their enemies and persecutors, from a spirit of genuine and expansive philanthropy. The litany of the church of England accordingly beseeches God 'to have mercy upon all men:' yet this scriptural petition has been censured, as inconsistent with submission to the sovereignty of God! But whatever St. Paul understood by "all men," that we understand by 'all men;' and we must pray God to have mercy on them, unless we mean to imprecate vengeance on them. The command, to "love our neighbour as ourselves," is our rule of conduct, and should dictate our prayers. God will hear our supplications for temporal benefits, or eternal salvation, in behalf of those on whom he sees good in his sovereign wisdom to bestow them; and in other cases, our prayer will return into our own bosom. But how can we pray for enemies and persecutors, (whom we cannot know to belong to "the election of grace;") without equally appearing to interfere with God's sovereignty? How can we pray for our children, relatives, or neighbours, or indeed for any unconverted person, or for those whom we are not sure are converted, without violating the same imaginary rule? The malignity of an apostate, indeed, may be so excessive, that it would not be proper to pray for him: (2 Tim. iv. 14. 1 John v. 16:) but such exceedingly rare exceptions to a general rule no ways interfere with our praying even for the salvation of all men, that now are, or ever shall, live on earth. This is no more than the Lord's prayer teaches us, (Notes, Matt. vi. 10;) and if there be any individual, for whom we cannot pray that the Lord would have mercy on him, and convert him, the inability must arise from sin, even the sin of not "loving our neighbours as ourselves." Nothing can tend more to perplex theological subjects, to prejudice men's minds against the doctrines of grace, nay, to bring them into odium and contempt; nothing can more narrow and harden the heart against the human species in general; than this method of making the secret decrees of God our rule of action, instead of adhering to his revealed will. We know not, and cannot know, who are elect, and who are not; we are bound to love all men, to pray for them, and to do them good; and then leave it to God to govern the universe in his sovereign wisdom, justice, and mercy, as he sees good. (Note, Deut. xxix. 29.)

V. 2. It was a proper expression of benevolence, for Christians to pray for all orders and conditions of men; and to interest themselves in the calamities and deliverances of their neighbours, of the community, and of any of the human species. This would soften the prejudices, and conciliate the favour of those around them; especially when they persevered in such supplications and thanksgivings, notwithstanding the persecutions which they endured. It would likewise tend very much to silence the accusations of those who charged them with disaffection to the civil government, and with being troublers of the city, if they not only behaved with quiet subjection to the laws, in all things consistent with their duty, and conscientiously paid tribute and custom; but if they were known to pray for "kings, and all in authority" over them; for their preservation, and success in all their undertakings, for the protection and peace of the community, and for all blessings upon their persons and families; and that they opposed no other weapons than these to the injuries which they suffered. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Rom. xiii. 1—8.) The Ephesians were under the Roman emperor, who was a monster of tyranny and cruelty; but the apostle used the word "kings," in the plural number; whence we learn, that the Holy Spirit intended this direction for other places and ages, according to the different governments established in providence. All the kings and rulers on earth were at that time strangers or enemies to Christianity; so that no distinction, or exception, in this case, could be intended. These prayers were to be made, in order that the Christians might "lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty;" conscientiously attending on all their duties to God and man; without being molested, either by public calamities or persecutions. This object they were to aim at, and with this "quietness and security" to be satisfied. The disposition to lead a quiet, peaceable, and honest life, submitting to human authority, as far as consistent with godliness, would tend to procure them favour; and they might expect that God would answer their prayers, (so far as was good for them,) by inclining their rulers to tolerate and protect them.

V. 3, 4. The conduct above inculcated was good in itself, and acceptable to God our Saviour, as a fruit of faith and grace, and honourable to his name. For as he has provided for the salvation of mankind, without distinction of rank or nation; and can honourably, and will certainly, save every individual, who comes to him in his appointed way; in this sense, he is willing that all men should be saved; and it is his good pleasure, nay, his express and repeated command, that we should do all in our power to bring them "to the knowledge of the truth." The Gospel should be preached to every creature: we are required to assure all, whom we can address, that the Lord is able and willing to save any sinner who believes: Christ will say to numbers at the last day, "I called, and ye "refused;" "I would have gathered you, as a hen "gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would "not." As all men do not in fact "come to the know"ledge of the truth," which God wills in the same sense as "that all men should be saved:" so the difficulty, if there be any, presses equally on Calvinists and Arminians, so called, and even on such as deduce universal actual salvation from this text, and a few similar ones; for they cannot say, "that all men actually come to the "knowledge of the truth." If the clause, therefore, be explained to mean any thing more than the willingness of God to save all that believe, and his command, that we should preach to all men, and pray for all men, without distinction, it would follow, that he willed, or purposed, what he did not actually effect. But it seems equally improper to say, with many expositors, that "all men," signifies 'some of all sorts;' because it is obvious to answer, that it may with equal propriety be said, "he willeth that "all men should be damned;" for doubtless some of all nations, ranks, and orders, will be left to perish in their sins, "whereunto also they were appointed."

V. 5—7. As a further reason, why Christians ought to pray for all men, the apostle observed, that there was one God, the common Creator, Benefactor, and Lord of the whole human species: and as all had apostatized from him, and he had purposes of mercies towards them; so there was also "One Mediator between God and men, "even the man Christ Jesus;" which implies, that there is but one Mediator, and excludes the worship of all other intercessors. Jesus Christ is truly Man: and though the efficacy of his mediation and atonement is derived from the union of his divine nature with the human in his mysterious Person, yet his mediation between God and man is chiefly made by his human nature, in which alone he was capable of suffering and dying. The apostle designed to excite Christians to intercessory prayers; and he draws one argument for this end, from the relation which God himself and the great Mediator bear to those, in behalf of whom these supplications were to be offered. God, to whom they were to be presented, is the One God, the Creator of all men; and the Mediator, through whom they are presented, is the man Christ Jesus, united with us in the bond of one common nature;" "bone of our "bone, and flesh of our flesh." "One God," in this passage, does not denote the Person of the Father exclusively, but the Deity: the Manhood therefore of Christ intervenes between a just and holy God and our sinful souls; but then this Manhood is essentially and inseparably united to the Godhead, in the Person of the Son, who thus mediates between God his Father and men his brethren. This provision and appointment has been made and revealed, for the common benefit of the human race, both Jews and Gentiles; that all who will, may come, in this way, to the mercy-seat of a pardoning God, to seek reconciliation to him. This Mediator therefore gave himself "a ransom for all," as "the Lamb of God, who "taketh away the sins of the world;" that by the all-sufficient atonement of his death upon the cross and the redemption there made, a foundation might be laid for the hopes of sinners all over the earth, and that all who believe might actually be saved by it. No pious and considerate man will assert, that Christ so gave himself a ransom for all, as actually to intend the salvation of those who never believe in him; and that he thus failed of his purpose, and suffered in vain. On the other hand, there are but few, of those that limit such expressions to 'some 'of all sorts,' who do not allow the all-sufficiency of Christ's atonement; and admit that all men should be called on to believe in him, and that all who do believe will be saved by him. It is therefore most important, to determine that none will be saved by the ransom of Christ without true faith; that true faith is the gift of God, and the effect of regeneration; that "known unto God are "all his works, from before the foundation of the world;" and that all will certainly be saved, who were given unto Christ, and whom he especially intended to save, when he became the Surety of his people. These propositions are capable of clear scriptural proof; and when they are established, we may leave such expressions, as that here used, to bear in their most obvious import. Indeed, great wisdom and love are shown, in this general way of stating the truths of Christianity, as far more suitable to inquirers and unestablished persons, than a systematical arrangement would be. This ransom, once offered, was to be testified, in due time, to men of every nation: it was therefore incumbent upon every Christian to promote this great design, according to his opportunity and ability. Of this St. Paul was ordained a herald and an apostle, (in asserting which, he solemnly appealed to Christ, who had appointed him, as his heart-searching Judge, for the exact truth of what he had advanced;) so that he was now employed as a teacher of the Gentiles, especially in the doctrines and promises of the Gospel, in the nature of faith, and in the faithfulness of God to all his declarations and covenant-engagements, and in every part of his truth and will.

V. 8. According to the authority vested in him, the apostle enjoined, that Christians should "pray every where," according to the directions above given. The expression may indeed include their prayers in the closet, in the family, and in social meetings; but the chapter especially relates to the manner of conducting their public assemblies, in what place soever these were held: "for where "two or three are met together, there," says our Saviour, "I am in the midst of you." (Marg. Ref.) 'As the 'apostle is speaking of public prayer, his meaning, I 'suppose, is, that the men, and not the women, were to 'lead the devotion of the assembly.' (12.) (Macknight.) The antithesis between τȣς ανδρας, (not ανθρωπȣς) and τας γυναικας, in the next verse, the word itself, the article, and the connexion, "in like manner," combine in establishing this observation. The Gentiles had priestesses, as well as priests, not only to their goddesses, but to their gods also: but the Israelites were not allowed to conform to this practice. In like manner, women must not be ministers or preachers under the Christian dispensation. In order that men might do this with acceptance, they must in reverent adoration lift up "holy hands:" not satisfied with washing their hands, before they worshipped, according to the custom of the Jews, and, indeed, that of many Gentiles, but, taking care to keep them pure from all injustice and the practice of every sin. (Marg. Ref.) It was also necessary, that they should avoid all wrath and resentment, either against each other, or against their persecutors, that their prayers and intercessions might be the genuine dictates of enlarged good-will to all men, and not intermingled with any angry passions, whatever provocations might be given them. At the same time, they should not doubt the willingness of God, through Christ, to hear their prayers, notwithstanding all their former sins and present conscious unworthiness; or perplex themselves by vain reasonings or disputations, on the manner in which he would answer them.

V. 9, 10. In order to the proper regulation of religious assemblies among Christians, as well as their general conduct, the apostle furthermore enjoined, in the most decided manner, that the women should adorn themselves with modest apparel, suited to their station in life, and becoming that bashfulness and sobriety of manners, which would be expected from them; not copying the vain fashions of those women, whose attire was intended to render their persons attractive to beholders, and was at once an indication of the levity of their own minds, and suited to excite the passions of others. He required therefore, that they should not adorn themselves with broidered hair, gold, pearls, or expensive garments. This general rule may admit of some exceptions in the case of those whose superior rank occasionally requires it; the appearance of women in the places of worship is specially intended; and the exhortation implied that, whatever garments they wore, they must consider good works as their peculiar ornament, as became "women professing god"liness." Yet he doubtless meant it as a general rule, that Christian women should refuse conformity to the foolish fashions of a vain world in this respect; that they should choose to appear more plain and simple in their attire than others of their rank; that they should not waste time, or run into needless expense, in such empty decorations, but employ both in adorning themselves with good works: that decency, modesty, and sobriety, should be more consulted in their garments and appearance, than elegance and fashion; and finally, that ministers ought to teach these things to their congregations, as of great importance to the honour of the Gospel.—It has been well observed, that foppery and extravagance, as to dress in men, are most emphatically condemned by the apostle's silence about them: for this intimated, that surely they could be under no temptation to such a childish vanity!—'It is 'worthy to be noted by the women, that this precept 'ought not to be slighted by them, as of little moment, 'seeing it is so carefully inculcated by the two chief apostles,

V. 11—14. (Notes, 1 Cor. xi. 2—16. xiv. 34, 35.) It has before been observed that this rule admitted of an exception in the case of those, who spoke by the Spirit of prophecy; and it may here be added, that it only related to public teaching. The women were required to be silent, with all subjection, in their religious assemblies; for the apostle, as Christ's representative, would not suffer women to teach, as that would be like usurping authority over the man; and therefore their willing subjection was to be shown, by silently receiving instruction. For the man was first created, and the woman of him, and for his benefit: so that it would be contrary to the original state of things at the creation, for the woman to usurp authority over the man. Moreover, the man was not deceived in the first instance; but the tempter prevailed against the woman, who was first in the temptation, and the seducer of the man. (Notes, &c. Gen. iii.) This consideration was suited to teach the women, that they should not affect authority, or presume to be public teachers.

V. 15. The sorrows and pains, attendant on child-bearing, were indeed a peculiar mark of the divine displeasure against the transgression of the first woman, and suited to bring it to the remembrance of her daughters in every age: yet they, who professed the Gospel of Christ, might be comforted by the hope of being supported and preserved through that trying time, and even of deriving benefit from all their sufferings: at least they might be sure, that there was no curse or wrath in it, provided they continued steadfast in the faith, and in love to Christ and his people, with holiness, purity, sobriety, and modesty.—Some suppose the apostle to have meant, that though sin first entered by the woman, whence all the pains and sorrows of child-bearing originated, yet, through those sorrows, One had come into the world, born of a woman, by whom all those would be saved, who continued in the faith: and indeed the original may well bear that interpretation, which is also very ancient. Eve, whom the apostle had just before mentioned, was thus addressed by her offended Creator: “I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception, in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children:” yet the preceding verse implied a promise of salvation through “the Seed of the woman,” for all believers, both men and women. (Gen. iii. 15, 16.) Eve herself is supposed to have been saved “through child-bearing,” or, by One descended from her, though the anguish of bearing children was denounced on her, as a peculiar punishment of her atrocious guilt; and thus her sorrow was turned into joy, her curse into a blessing. In like manner, her daughters, though involved with her in the sentence of bringing forth children with sorrow, would also share with her in the same salvation, joy, and blessing, through the promised Seed, if they copied her example of faith and obedience.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

It is a most important, though much neglected, duty, for Christians to pray and return thanks “for all men,” according to the different relations in which they stand to them, and as their circumstances require. Thus they may show their love to those, whom they cannot otherwise serve; and evince that they interest themselves in the happiness of mankind in general. And, not only in public, but in our families and closets, we should pray “for kings, and for all that are in authority;” both as guardians of the public tranquillity, and in respect of their temporal and eternal welfare: this will far more conduce to the continuance of our privileges, in being allowed, without molestation, “to lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty;” than any means, which men of restless spirits can employ. But, whatever effect our conduct in these things may have on our neighbours, it is good and acceptable in the sight of God, our “Saviour.” He hath no pleasure in the death of the “wicked, but that he should repent and live.” It is his will, that all who repent and believe in Christ should be saved: “he commands all men every where to repent,” and believe the Gospel; it is his will and pleasure, that we should use every means of drawing men's attention to the Gospel, that they may “come to the knowledge of the truth.” He is the One God of the whole earth, whom all men ought to worship and serve: and, as all have sinned and deserved wrath, he hath appointed “One Mediator between God and man, even the Man Christ Jesus,” his incarnate Son, “who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.” May he ordain and qualify many preachers, like Paul, to teach the nations in truth and verity! For surely we ought to desire, that men should pray every where to God the Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ, and by the Holy Spirit, “lifting up pure hands, without wrath and doubting.” In proportion as we learn thus to worship in spirit and truth, with reverence, holy love, pure zeal, and lively faith, we shall find our minds freed from narrow prejudices and resentment, and our benevolence towards all men greatly enlarged; and we shall more emphatically say to our heavenly Father, “Hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven.”

its success: and the modest, decent, and sober apparel of "women professing godliness," must therefore have this tendency. They should evince, that they are too much engaged in contemplating spiritual glories, to take pleasure in the vain and unseemly decorations of the triflers around them; that being adorned with good works is their chief distinction; and that they can make a better use of their time and money, than in curiously adjusting their attire, or purchasing costly ornaments. But, alas! in this trifling and expensive age, when almost all vie with their superiors in apparel, till distinction of rank is nearly lost, we too often find those, who come to the places where the word of God is preached, decorated as much beyond what they can properly afford, and in as unbecoming a manner, as they are who frequent the theatre! It would be well, if the professors of serious godliness were wholly exempt from this disgraceful vanity; or if they always spent as many hours in visiting the sick and poor, and as much money in relieving their distresses, as they do in uselessly decorating themselves and their children, after a manner unsuitable to their rank in life, and inconsistent with their profession. These are by no means trifles, or pharsaical impositions, as some pretend, but apostolical injunctions; and it should be considered, that, as raiment was only made needful by sin, so it is peculiarly unsuitable for those, who profess to believe the Bible, to be proud and vain of the very badge of their disgrace. The original creation of the man, and then the woman, and the entrance of sin by the latter, who being deceived was first in the transgression, concur in showing the reasonableness of that subjection, humility, and teachableness, prescribed in scripture to the woman, and the impropriety of her usurping authority over the man. But as the Gospel gives special encouragements to the woman, in respect of those sorrows which the entrance of sin has entailed on her, provided she continue in "faith and love, with holiness and sobriety;" so the consideration of those manifold sorrows, to which the female sex is subjected, should teach men to exercise their authority with the utmost gentleness, tenderness, and affection.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. It has already been shown, that the word rendered bishop was at this time of the same import with that translated elder, or presbyter; (Note, Acts xx. 28:) for the charge, given by Paul to the Ephesian elders, is here supposed to have been subsequent to the writing of this epistle. The same is also proved, by the silence of the apostle concerning any other order than bishops and deacons. Indeed, it is evident, that the selection or appointment of an individual to be overseer of the elders or pastors, though very ancient, and probably apostolical, was not at this time in general use. It had been said, and it was true and worthy of special notice, that if a man desired, or earnestly longed for, the pastoral office, and, from love to Christ, to his flock, and to the souls of men, was ready to forego other prospects, and expose himself to hardships and perils, by devoting himself to that service, he sought to be employed in "a good "work," and his desire ought to be approved and countenanced, provided he was properly qualified.

V. 2. It is manifest that Timothy was supposed to be principally concerned in the choice of the bishops, being the apostle's deputy and representative: and accordingly, instructions are here given him how to fulfil this arduous charge in the proper manner; instructions no doubt intended to be useful in the highest degree, if duly regarded, to all others, in every age and place, on whom the same most important trust devolves. The apostle therefore showed, very particularly, what manner of persons these bishops or elders ought to be; that ambitious and improper desires after the sacred service might be repressed, and likewise that they who had been appointed to it might know how to behave in it. Whatever natural abilities, learning, elocution, or spiritual gifts, any man might possess, he must be considered as ineligible to this office, if he was not of a blameless character, and had not avoided scandalous vices, at least since his professed conversion to Christianity. He ought also to be "the husband of one "wife." Christ and the apostles expressly condemned polygamy, as well as divorces, except for adultery, (Notes, Matt. xix. 1—9. Mark x. 1—12. 1 Cor. vii. 1—3;) yet there was no direct command for a man, who had previously taken more wives than one, to put the others away when he embraced the Gospel; and such a requisition might have produced many bad consequences in domestic life, and increased the opposition of the civil powers to the preaching of Christianity. But the rule, that no man, however qualified in other respects, should be admitted into the pastoral office, who had more than one wife, or who had put away one to take another, tended to show the impropriety of polygamy, and divorces on frivolous pretences, and their inconsistency with the Christian dispensation, and concurred with other things to bring it into total disuse in the Christian church; yet without violence and confusion. To argue hence, as it has been done, polygamy was lawful for other Christians, else it would not have been needful to restrict pastors from it, would prove, if it proved any thing, that it was also lawful and common for them to be drunkards, covetous, brawlers strikers, &c. Some have inferred from this text, that stated pastors ought to be married, as a pre-requisite to their office: but this seems to be a mistake of a general permission, connected with a restriction, for an express command. It is, however, abundantly sufficient to prove, that marriage is entirely consistent with the most sacred functions, and the most exemplary holiness, and to subvert the very basis of the antichristian prohibition of marriage to the clergy, and all its concurrent and consequent mischiefs. Yet some have even endeavoured to infer a part of that system from this clause itself, and have supposed that the apostle meant to prohibit second marriages to the clergy; but this is contrary to the whole tenour of Scripture: it is by no means contained in the meaning of the words, and would certainly bring in a part of those evils, which long experience hath proved inseparable from the general prohibition; for as good reasons may very often be given for marrying a second time, as for marrying at all. The pastor must also be "vigilant," a circumspect and attentive man, one who watches carefully over his flock, capable of discerning dangers at a distance, guarding the people against the artifices of false teachers and the devices of Satan, and prompt to embrace opportunities of usefulness; he must be sober, serious, and temperate; moderate in all his desires and indulgences; "of good behaviour" in all the transactions of life; showing a meek, kind, equitable, faithful, and prudent disposition towards all men. He should likewise be ready, according to his ability, to relieve the poor, to entertain his brethren without grudging, and with evident cheerfulness and satisfaction; especially, he ought to be hospitable to Christians, who were driven from home by persecution, or who in any other way were brought to the place of his residence. He must be ready at teaching, both capable of instructing others, and prompt to embrace every occasion of doing it in public or in private; counting it his business, and making it his delight. 'But now that the 'ancient customs are changed, and inns are every where 'open, in which travellers, for their money, may be as 'well accommodated as in private houses, there is little 'occasion for what the apostle calls hospitality.' (Macknight.) This is a specimen of the way, in which many learned men, (some perhaps without intending it,) show us, that we have little or nothing to do, either with the practical, or doctrinal part of Scripture! I should rather say, 'Now that ancient customs are changed, and bishops have a[illegible] revenues, they are bound to exercise enlarged hospitality to the poor, especially to the inferior clergy, who often have little of that money, which is needful for accommodation at inns; and who, if hospitably entertained by bishops, would feel cordially reconciled to the affluence of such kind superiors, and disposed to receive their pastoral instructions with reverence.' Here let me observe, in particular, that when young men go for ordination or institution, to places where they cannot be accommodated except at an inn, it is incalculable what mischief might be prevented, and what an opening would be made for usefulness, if the bishops would entertain them in their own houses, and take the abundant opportunities, which this would afford, of instructing them respecting the nature and importance of those solemn engagements, into which they are about to enter. The affection and veneration thus excited, in all who are in any degree proper for these sacred services, and the opening thus made for subsequent admonitions and counsels, would repay the expense of it a thousand fold.

V. 3. The person eligible to the office of a bishop must also be free from every measure of intemperance, in the use of wine or strong liquors, which would both be scandalous to him, and unfit him for the important duties of his station; (Notes, Lev. x. 1, 2. 9, 10. Prov. xxxi. 4, 5;) and he ought to be equally superior to anger, and not liable upon any provocation, however great, to vent the vehemence of his passion, by striking the offender, as was often the practice among worldly men. Nor be greedy of gain, which might lead him to prostitute his ministry for the sake of "filthy lucre;" or to carry on any disgraceful employment, along with his ministry, for the sake of profit. But he must be of a resigned, meek, persevering, and constant spirit; peaceable, forgiving, and calm; not clamorous in disputation, or even in reproving others; nor yet avariciously tenacious of that property, which he had obtained even in the most unexceptionable manner,

V. 4, 5. The bishop or pastor should likewise be able and careful to govern his own household in a discreet and regular manner; maintaining a meek and firm authority over his domestics, and having his children in due subjection, ruling over them in all gravity, and restraining them from all levity and excess; that their appearance, deportment, and attendance on the worship of God, might be an example to others. For if a man were evidently incompetent to govern his own family, and to preserve order and decorum in it, how could it be supposed that he would be found qualified to preside over the Church of God, and to preserve order and harmony among the members of whom it consisted, who were of various dispositions and situations, and generally removed from under his immediate inspection?

7 Moreover, he must have [a] a good report of [b] them which are without; [c] lest he fall into reproach, and [d] the snare of the devil.

8 Likewise must [e] the deacons [f] be grave, not [g] double-tongued, [h] not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre;

V. 6. It would not be generally expedient to choose a new convert to this office, or an inexperienced person, one but superficially acquainted with human nature and the things of God, lest the distinction of his situation, or the applause bestowed on him, should elate him with pride and ambition, and he should thus fall into a condemnation, similar to that of the devil. It is evident from this, that spiritual pride and ambition constituted the beginning of Satan's apostacy. Some have conjectured that it was revealed to the angels, that the eternal Son would assume a nature inferior to theirs, in which he would rule over them, and be worshipped by them; and that Satan, and the other angels who fell with him, proudly disdained such subjection. But all our conjectures on this subject must be uncertain, and in a measure presumptuous. The pride, however, and ambition of ministers, on account of their office, gifts, popularity, or success, would be of a similar nature to Satan's pride in heaven, and might involve the novice under a similar condemnation. It is evident that some exceptions to this important general rule must have been admitted in the first formation of newly planted churches, in which the special gifts of the Holy Spirit seem to have superseded the necessity of such previous study and experience, as are, in all ordinary cases, indispensable.

V. 7. The person elected to this office must also have a good report, an unblemished character, even among his unconverted neighbours: lest he should fall into reproach, lose his influence, disgrace the Gospel, and be ensnared by Satan into the practice of his former evils, and entangled in the world and sin. Or, "into the snare of the "false accuser," who might watch for his halting, to retort his mistakes, as a reproach to the Gospel. (See 11. Gr.) It would not therefore be generally adviseable to appoint those to the ministry, whose conduct had been remarkably bad, until a competent time had elapsed to evince the reality of their repentance, and to retrieve and re-establish their characters. It is evident, that the apostle did not here at all speak of the several duties of ministers; but only of the conduct and character of those whose desires after that office were to be countenanced by Timothy, and by others concerned.

V. 8—13. The deacons were primarily appointed to dispense the charity of the church, and to manage its secular concerns; yet they preached occasionally, or taught in private, or were readers in the public assemblies; or pastors and evangelists were often chosen from among them. (Notes, Acts vi. viii. 5—40.) Some of the same things were requisite in them as in the pastors. They too must be grave, serious, and prudent men; sincere, candid, and consistent in their discourse; not speaking one thing before men's faces, and another behind their backs; neither flattering, slandering, dissembling, nor prevaricating, in any company, or on any occasion; not addicted to much wine, nor greedy of filthy gain, which might tempt them, after the example of Judas, to embezzle the money committed to them, or unfit them for liberally and impartially supplying the wants of the poor. They must also profess and maintain the mysteries of the Christian faith, with a pure conscience and a uniform integrity of conduct, that so they might recommend it to others. It was proper, even in respect of this inferior office, that trial should be made of new converts; that, previous to their admission to it, they might be approved to be men of blameless conversation. The wives also of the deacons, (and much more those of the spiritual pastors,) must be of grave and serious deportment; not addicted to the vanities and dissipations of the world; not slanderers, or prone to circulate disadvantageous reports of their neighbours: (the original is διαβολους, devils, 7;) but sober women, temperate in all things, and faithful in the discharge of every relative and religious duty. Nor would it be proper for those, who had previously to their conversion taken more than one wife, or divorced one for the sake of taking another, to exercise the office of a deacon. It was requisite that they also should rule their children and domestics in a regular and exemplary manner. For the faithful discharge of this office would tend to the increase of their gifts and graces, and to render them very bold in professing the faith. They would be much employed among the poor and sick, and such as were imprisoned for the Gospel; and by thus exposing themselves, and giving counsel and encouragement to their suffering brethren, they would be emboldened and habituated to a promptitude of utterance, which would be a good step towards their being admitted to the office of pastors or evangelists.—This interpretation has been contested; yet it seems to be the apostle's meaning; and, without adverting to modern habits or controversies, it is evident, that the due discharge of the primitive office of a deacon must tend to qualify men for the ministry; it appears from facts that some deacons became preachers, nor have we reason to think that any persons were then regularly educated for the pastoral office; but ministers seem to have been always chosen from the most established and best qualified believers, and generally from those that were matured in years and experience. This does not, however, prove, that a regular education may not, in the present state of things, be most expedient.—Proved. (10.) 'By publishing their names 'to the church; that if any one hath aught to lay to their 'charge he may show it.' (Macknight.)—No doubt this was customary in the primitive church, and productive of many good effects: indeed, the form of it remains to this day. But it does not appear that the original word can admit of this interpretation; for it generally means that trial of persons and of things, which is made by experience and observation.—Wives or women. Some think, that the wives of deacons and of bishops are not here meant; but women, who were selected and appointed by the church to teach young persons of their own sex, who were restrained by local customs from so attending on the instructions of men, as to obtain from them an adequate acquaintance with Christianity. It is, however, very doubtful, whether this be the apostle's meaning; and the instruction from the passage as interpreted of the wives of those who performed any public office in the church, is so replete with instruction, that it seems highly worthy of the mention made of it by the apostle.

V. 14, 15. The apostle hoped, when he wrote this, that he should soon be able to return to Ephesus: but matters so turned out, that he never again visited that city; and Timothy, in all probability much sooner than had been intended, went to him into Macedonia. (Preface.) In case, however, the apostle should not see Timothy for some time, he wrote this epistle, to show him how he ought to conduct himself, as an evangelist intrusted by him, and by the Saviour, to regulate matters in the family or household of God; even that society of believers, in whom the living God dwelt, as in his holy habitation. These directions were not peculiar to the Ephesians, but would be a rule to Timothy in other churches also, where he might sustain the same office, and perform the same services; and to all others in subsequent ages, who should be employed in a similar manner.—The following words have been variously applied: the church of the living God, by supporting, maintaining, and recommending the truth of revelation, by publicly preaching and professing it, and by the worship and service therein performed, may be considered as the foundation which upholds the edifice, as a pillar that supports and adorns it. This by no means includes the infallibility of any particular church; but merely implies that divine truth is upheld, professed, and maintained in the true church: whilst ungodly men in general, and heretics in particular, oppose, pervert, and undermine it; and so error and ignorance envelope all the rest of the world, as with a dark and dreadful cloud. Some apply it to Timothy and other faithful ministers, (Gal. ii. 9:) but this seems to be only a part of the preceding truth; for the profession and suitable conversation of believers as really maintain and recommend the truth, as the minister's labours and doctrines do. Others detach the sentence from this verse, and connect it with the following; as if the apostle had meant, that the doctrine there specified was "the pillar and ground of the truth:" but this construction also seems unnatural, and the first interpretation is most obvious and satisfactory. As the church was appointed to maintain, hold forth, and adorn, the doctrine of God our Saviour, in the midst of a dark and wicked world; so it was very important for Timothy to know how to conduct himself in subserviency to that great design.

V. 16. That mystery of godliness, which the church must maintain, was, without controversy, exceedingly great. It never could have been thought of, if it had not been revealed; it could not be received but by faith; and it must be very imperfectly understood by man in his present state, being connected with infinite and incomprehensible objects. Some persons might on that account deem it less credible; and others attempt to obviate the objection, by explaining away the mysteriousness of it: but the apostle declared it to be beyond all controversy "a great mystery." It must, however, be noted, that it was "the mystery of godli-"ness." The revelation and belief of it were the source of all the pious dispositions and affections in the heart of fallen men, and of all the spiritual worship of God in the world. Had this mystery never been revealed, there would never have been any true godliness among men: none could be found, where this mystery was unknown or rejected; and that abounded, in proportion as it was scripturally proposed and received.—By this mystery, men learn the true character of God, and the way in which sinners may approach and worship him; they discover their real situation, their danger, and their remedy; and thus they are brought to fear, trust, love, worship, obey, and rejoice in God. The substance and centre of this great mystery was this, "God was manifest in the flesh;" the divine nature, in the Person of the co-eternal and co-equal Son and Word of God, was manifested to fallen men, as dwelling in the man Christ Jesus; so that whoever saw, or contemplated by faith, this express Image of the invisible God, saw the

CHAP. IV.

The apostle foretels a great apostacy, and corruption of the Gospel in after times, 1—3. Every creature of God is good, and to be received with thanksgiving and prayer, 4, 5. He directs Timothy, in respect of his doctrine and personal conduct, that he may behave so, as "to "save himself and those that hear him," 6—16.

Father also; (Notes, John i. 1—18. Phil. ii. 5—11. Col. i. 15—17.)—Thus sinners became acquainted with, and reconciled to, God. This high character Emmanuel claimed, when on earth; and the unmeasurable unction of the Holy Spirit in his human nature, as evinced by his perfect holiness and stupendous miracles, justified his claim. But the Jewish priests and rulers put him to death, "because "he, being man, made himself God;" and he was further justified by the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on the apostles and disciples, who bare witness to his resurrection, and ascension into heaven. During the whole of these amazing events, "he was seen of angels." These "morn- "ing stars, who sang together," when he called the world into existence, (Job xxxviii. 7,) saw their incarnate Lord laid as a babe in a manger, and sang "Glory to God in "the highest, Peace on earth, Good will towards men." They saw him fasting forty days in the wilderness, and tempted by the devil; they witnessed his agonies in the garden: and, in both cases, they were employed to minister unto him. They saw their incarnate Maker expire, amidst the most cruel indignities, on the cross, but with what sensations who can conceive! They witnessed and attended his resurrection and ascension. They now behold his glory, sing his praise, and execute his mandates; and they will at length be his attendants, when he shall come to judge the world. In all this they contemplate, with astonishment, delight, and adoration, the infinite wisdom, justice, holiness, truth, and love of God; and desire to look into these things, as more conspicuous displays of the divine glory than all his other works had exhibited. "God, "manifested in the flesh," had also been preached to the Gentiles, as their Lord and Saviour, which was a great mystery to the Jewish nation. And thus he had been believed on in the world, by many tens of thousands of different nations, who, without the Mosaic law, were become the spiritual and accepted worshippers of JEHOVAH; and the case has been to a great degree the same to this day. This was the effect of his having been "received "up into glory;" and proved, to a demonstration, his exaltation to the mediatorial throne; all power in heaven and earth being given to him, as the Advocate and Intercessor for sinners.—This important text seems to have been obscured and confined in the interpretation given of it, by the attempt of some expositors to reduce the overflowings of the apostle's fervent spirit to their own ideas of method. But the events referred to cannot be reduced to exact order of time, without evidently doing violence to the meaning of the words.—The construction necessarily requires, that the first clause of the passage serve as the nominative case to the subsequent verbs. On the above interpretation the construction is as follows: "God was manifested in the "flesh;" "God manifested in the flesh," was justified by "the Spirit, was seen of angels, &c." But the Socinians, and some others, have laboured to establish another reading, to this effect: "the mystery of godliness, which was "manifested in the flesh." According to this reading, it must follow, "which mystery was justified in, or by, the "Spirit;" "which mystery was seen of angels;" "which "mystery was preached unto the Gentiles;" "which "mystery was believed on in the world;" "which mystery was received up into glory." The mystery being manifested in the flesh, and the mystery being received up into glory, are not very sensible propositions: but numbers seem to prefer any absurdity to orthodoxy, especially in respect of the person of Emmanuel. Indeed, it is not very consistent with their avowed dislike of mysteries, to personify the word mystery in this text, and put it even in the place of God our Saviour. In fact, however, the authority for this emendation does not entitle it to any regard.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The office of a minister is a laborious, but a good, work: they who desire it as such, from proper motives, do well; and, if duly qualified, they should be encouraged and assisted in obtaining their object. But to desire emolument or authority in the Church, by intruding into this sacred office, without either qualifications suited to its important duties, or any purpose of performing them, from indolence, ambition, and love of filthy lucre, is the vilest of all prostitutions, and merits the deepest condemnation. Let then none, who desire this office, or have entered into it, or who have any concern in admitting others, forget, that nothing can compensate for the want of proper motives, or a blameless conduct, in those who minister in holy things. The pastors of the Lord's flock should be continent, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach, and remote from violent passions, and every kind of covetousness. The more extensive the sphere, and the more conspicuous the station, to which any of them are called, the greater measure of all these holy endowments is requisite: but no man can be a meet person for the pastoral office, in the most obscure situation, who is unwatchful, frivolous, licentious, given to wine, greedy of gain, disposed to furious anger, negligent of moral and relative duties, selfish, averse to hospitality, and unable or unwilling to teach the flock. It would be invidious to contrast this description with the characters of those who have sustained the ministerial office in different ages and parts of the visible Church. No order of men fulfil the duties of their station: but, alas! none have more violated them than nominal ministers. It, however, behooves us to look to ourselves, and those with whom we are concerned. We, who sustain this office, should pray without ceasing to be enabled more fully to transcribe these rules into our lives; and the people should learn to distinguish mercenaries from upright disinterested ministers: they should make allowance for human infirmities, which are incident to all: they should help their ministers by their prayers, blessing God for such as are faithful, and supplicating converting grace for such as are evidently the reverse of what they ought to be. It is incumbent upon ministers to rule well their own houses, and to have their children in subjection with all gravity. If they find this too difficult for them, "how shall they "take care of the Church of God?" The folly, ostentation, conformity to the world, extravagance, or ungodliness, of a minister's family, will surely lessen his own influence, and prevent his usefulness, as well as his comfort. It is also very wrong for novices, however eminent for abilities and gifts, to be pushed forward prematurely into this arduous work. This hath ruined many promising young men, by puffing them up with pride, and so casting them into the condemnation of the devil. The honour of the Gospel also is greatly concerned in the good report of ministers amongst those that are without. And Satan finds various advantages against those who lose their reputation, and incur the reproach of the enemies of the Gospel.

V. 8—16.

Not only bishops and elders, but all concerned in the Church of the living God, should be grave, sincere, upright, candid, temperate, and disinterested; those especially to whom money is intrusted, and who have the charge of relieving the poor: for to rob them is one of the very worst kinds of dishonesty. The mystery of faith will never appear respectable among men, except it be held in a pure conscience. Professed Christians should therefore be proved, and found blameless, before they are admitted to any office in the Church. Time spent in preparation and probation will not be lost; and a precipitate zeal is not one of the prescribed qualifications for the ministry. All who are connected with persons in public stations in the church should be exemplary in their whole appearance and deportment. The wives of ministers and deacons should be grave and sober, no slanderers, but faithful in all things. They should choose such wives; and their wives should be reminded to study and practise these rules, and to assist and concur in ruling their children and households well. They who have acted faithfully and diligently in inferior stations, are best qualified for more important services; especially when, by enduring hardship and facing danger, they have attained to great boldness in the faith of Christ. These things should be frequently meditated upon and prayed over by all persons concerned; that they may know how they ought to behave in the Church of the living God, according to the relations in which they stand to him, to his saints, and to the world, that they may hold forth and adorn the doctrine of truth, as pillars and supporters of it. This will be despised, or revered, in great measure, according to the conduct of professors; which will be greatly influenced by that of ministers, their families, and connexions. The importance of these things is therefore unspeakable; and our watchfulness ought to correspond to it. Whilst numbers want a religion without mystery, (which they who worship the incomprehensible God cannot possibly have,) and whilst many seem to make the very truths of the Gospel a mystery of ungodliness, let us glory in the incontrovertibly "great mystery "of godliness," and show the sanctifying efficacy of it in our lives. Let us remember that "God was manifested in the "flesh," to take away our sins; "to destroy the works "of the devil; to redeem us from all iniquity, and to "purify us unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of "good works:" and let us recollect, that the doctrine of his mysterious Person and Redemption must be justified by the fruits of the Spirit, brought forth in our lives. Let us learn to contemplate his antecedent glory, his voluntary humiliation, his subsequent exaltation, and his future coming to judgment; till we hate sin, despise the world, are transformed into his image, filled with his love, and prepared to join the worship of his holy angels; and let us still pray, that he may be preached to all the nations on earth, and believed on in all parts of the world, and so wait till he shall please to receive us to his glory.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—5. To stir up Timothy, and others by him, to adhere steadfastly to the "Great Mys- "tery of Godliness," the apostle declared, that the Holy Spirit spake, in the most express and decisive manner, not only by Daniel, and others of the ancient prophets, but to him by immediate revelation, and perhaps to several of his brethren, (Marg. Ref.) concerning some in the latter days, under the Christian dispensation, or in after times, that would apostatize from the true faith of the Gospel. This apostacy would be effected by men's hearkening to false teachers, who would be influenced by seducing spirits; and thus they would embrace doctrines of devils or demons, and adopt such notions about the souls of the dead, as would introduce the worship of saints as intercessors, and of angels as spirits superior to men, though inferior to God. This was a species of idolatry, like that of the heathens in worshipping their departed monarchs, legislators, and benefactors, as demons, or a middle order of beings between God and men. And, as devils are the real objects of all worship paid to mere creatures, so this delusion would tend to gratify the ambition of these apostate spirits. (Notes, 1 Cor. x. 19—22. Col. ii. 18.) These doctrines and practices would be supported by the hypocrisy of liars, who would invent a variety of legends, impose on men with pretended miracles and revelations, cheat them by legendary tales, and so carry on an infamous traffic by forgery and imposture, under the pretext of great sanctity, to the aggrandizing of themselves and the deluding of the credulous multitude. Nor would these men feel remorse for their lies and forgeries, as the habit of villany, under the mask of extraordinary piety, would cauterize their consciences, and render them entirely callous; even as the external skin becomes unfeeling by being frequently seared with a hot iron. To maintain their usurpations over men's minds, and to fix a large body in their interest, by detaching them from other connexions, as well as to amuse mankind by the appearance of uncommon sanctity, they would discourage, and even forbid marriage, as if it were an unholy estate, and unfit for devout persons: they would deny this liberty to numbers, especially to the clergy, by means of which all kinds of abominations would be introduced and connived at. They would also enjoin their abstinence from this and the other kind of meat, either entirely, or on particular days and seasons; by this likewise they would keep up their authority over men's consciences, and impose upon the multitude with apparent devotion, whilst they perpetrated all kinds of iniquities, as the Pharisees had done before them. (Notes, Matt. xxiii.) But, indeed, God had created every kind of wholesome food for the benefit of man, and allowed Christians the use of it all, indiscriminately, at all times and seasons, without restriction; and therefore any of his creatures might be received with thanksgiving by those who believed the truth, and so far understood it as to know their Christian liberty. For all his creatures being in themselves good, and serving the purposes for which he made them, nothing was to be refused as unclean, provided it was received with thankfulness, as the permission of God's word, a temperate use of it according to his precepts, and prayer for a blessing upon it, sanctified it to the believer's use, and to fit him for the Lord's service. Every smatterer in ecclesiastical history must know what apostacy and corruption of Christianity most entirely accorded to this prediction. The Judaizing teachers, and the Gnostics and others, contended indeed for some of these superstitions; the mystery of iniquity in these respects also did even then work; but it was reserved for the Church of Rome fully to prove the truth of the scriptures, by accomplishing these predictions in their most detestable enormities. (2 Thes. ii.) It has often been shown, in what manner the errors of the Judaizing teachers and the traditions of the Pharisees, on the one hand, and the speculations of the heathen philosophers, on the other, corrupted the pure doctrine of Christianity in the primitive times. But it should not be forgotten, that in subsequent ages, especially in the Roman Church, the mythology of the Pagans, and the writings of the poets, helped to introduce still further corruptions. For what are the nuns of popery, but the vestal virgins of the Romans engrafted on Christianity? Saints and angels, as mediators, answer to the demi-gods and heroes of the Pagans; and the numerous processions, and festivals, and the method of observing them, answer, with surprising exactness, to those described in Homer and Virgil, especially in the latter. Indeed, it appears to me that a learned man, who had leisure to compare all the pompous and fascinating outward services, in the Church of Rome especially, though not there exclusively, with the Greek and Latin poets, might form, I had almost said, a Rubric and a ritual from the latter. At least, I have never, for many years, opened Virgil to read a few pages, but I have met with some things, which cogently reminded me of the popish processions and festivals. The third verse contains 'one of the boldest ellipses in the New Testament, where a word is to be understood contrary to that 'which is before expressed: but some of the most celebrated classical writers, and particularly Horace and 'Cicero, take the same liberty.' (Doddridge. Blackwall.) The passage undeniably demands this construction, and all the ancient expositions and versions supply the ellipsis in the same manner, or to the same meaning. (Note, Acts xv. 19—21.)

V. 6—10. Timothy was directed to attend to these precautions himself, and also to put his brethren in remembrance of them, that they might be upon their guard against every specious delusion. Thus he would be a good minister of Christ, and act as became one who had been fully instructed in the words of truth and good doctrine, and who had digested them well, and turned them into spiritual nourishment: as he had been trained up in these things, and indeed had made great proficiency in them. But he ought steadily to reject the impious fables and foolish traditions of the Jewish deceivers and others, who perverted the Gospel; which were no better than the stories, with which the weakest and most ignorant of women, when almost superannuated, used to amuse children. He ought, therefore, to treat such follies with the neglect which they merited, and to exercise himself, by daily study, meditation, and practice, in every part of godliness; as consisting of a proper temper of mind and conduct of life towards God; and as obtained by sinners, through the believing contemplation of, and dependence on, "the great mystery of godliness." In this he must daily make progress himself, and this he ought to inculcate on others. For no diligence in mere externals, however laborious, self-denying, or exact, could be of much use to any man. Even the Mosaic ceremonies had little profited the Israelites in general, nor could they much avail the Jewish Christians; and human inventions must be still more unprofitable and vain. But godliness, according to the principles and rules of the Gospel, was profitable unto all things: it benefited the man himself, his connexions, the Church, and society. The promises of temporal prosperity to Israel, as annexed to their national obedience, were indeed no longer in force; and godliness might expose a Christian to many outward losses and persecutions; nor were any promises of wealth, prosperity, or long life, given by the Gospel: yet the new covenant engaged to bestow on believers such spiritual peace, and such abundant supports and consolations, and they were under such a peculiar care and protection of providence, that godliness might well be said to have the promise both of this life, and of that which is to come. (Marg. Ref.) This was therefore to be considered as a faithful saying, worthy of universal acceptation: for, in dependence on these promises, in experience of their accomplishment, and in promoting godliness among mankind, the apostle and his brethren both laboured without wearying, and suffered reproach without fainting; because they trusted in the living God, who is the Preserver of all men, in respect of their lives and temporal concerns; and who will therefore take especial care of believers, as interested in his covenanted blessings. Or who is the Saviour of sinners, whether Jews or Gentiles, and of mankind in general; so that none are rejected when they apply for his salvation; of which believers are already made partakers by special grace.

V. 11—16. Timothy was here required to enforce on the consciences of the people, the practice of all those things in which godliness consists, and to teach them the nature, obligation, motives, and encouragements of it: and, as he was younger than men generally were, to whom such important services were allotted, and probably than several of the elders at Ephesus; it would be peculiarly incumbent upon him to act with such sedateness and wisdom, as might deprive every one of any pretence for despising his person or admonitions on that account. It behooved him therefore to be an example to the whole company of believers, by a steadfast and consistent adherence to the word of the Gospel, in his profession and preaching; by a pious, pure, and edifying conversation; by love to the Lord, his people, and all men; by spirituality, and all the fruits of the Holy Spirit; by a lively exercise of faith in the mercy, promise, and providence of God, amidst all hardships and perils; and by purity, avoiding whatever might excite suspicion, in respect of those youthful lusts by which so many were contaminated. "Till the apostle came to "him," (which he hoped to do, though it turned out otherwise,) let him devote his time to the study of the scriptures, or in reading any other books which could add to his fund of profitable knowledge; and to exhorting and instructing the people in sound doctrine. As he had been endued with excellent gifts, which were conferred upon him, according to the prophecies of inspired men repecting him, when he was solemnly ordained to be a minister and an evangelist, by the imposition of the hands of the elders, as well as those of the apostles, let him not neglect to exercise and improve those gifts: for some who received those gifts were thus negligent; nay, they made a bad use of them, and perhaps were deprived of them on that account. Let him therefore assiduously and carefully meditate on these things, and well consider the various important duties to which he was called. Let him "give "himself wholly to them," or be "entirely in them;" making them the one great business and pleasure of his life, and cordially devoting all his time and abilities to this important service; that so his growth in wisdom and ministerial endowments, and in holiness, might be manifest to all around him. And as he was placed amidst various snares and difficulties, and had the same deceitful heart as others had; so he ought to take special heed "unto himself," to the state of his soul, his own growth in grace, and his motives, temper, and conduct in every thing: he ought also to look well to his doctrine, that it might be scriptural, clear, evangelical, and practical;

well-stated, explained, defended, and applied. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

The scriptures are arranged with such consummate wisdom, that the apostacies of those who give heed to seducing spirits, and teach the doctrine of devils, introducing idolatry and various corruptions into the Church, on the most frivolous pretences, turn to a testimony to every humble believer; who, reading that the Spirit spoke expressly of these things long before, is thus most fully convinced of the divine authority of the sacred oracles.—They who allow themselves "to speak lies in hypo-" crisy," for their secular purposes, will gradually become callous in impiety and iniquity, as if their consciences were seared with a hot iron: so that no desperate infidels or profligates will be found so destitute of feeling and remorse, as the sanctified impostor; nor ought we to deem any enormity incredible, when properly authenticated to have been committed by men of this description. Those false teachers, who most neglect the commandments of God, and allow themselves and others in the most atrocious violations of moral and relative duties, are most prompt to forbid as evil, what God hath pronounced innocent and honourable; and to command that as a duty, which he hath left indifferent. But the law of the Lord is exceedingly broad; and we shall find abundant exercise for watchfulness, diligence, self-denial, and mortification of the flesh, in attending to all its holy requirements, without being laid under further restrictions, or tasked to imaginary duties, as if we had done all his will, and wanted more employment! We should therefore be upon our guard against such impositions, on whatever pretence they are enforced; and whilst we follow after purity, and exercise temperance in all things, according to the will of God, let us disregard such as judge us in those things which he hath allowed. Whilst we are satisfied that every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, let us remember, that all should be received with thanksgiving by them who believe and know the truth; that even the divine allowance will not sanctify an intemperate, inexpedient, extravagant, or unthankful use of the creatures; and that nothing will be good to us, except we seek by prayer the Lord's blessing on our enjoyment of it.

V. 6—16.

They who would approve themselves to be faithful ministers, must put the brethren in remembrance of all those things which Christ and his apostles delivered to the Church; and whatever other studies or accomplishments may be supposed requisite in those intended for the ministry, it is above all necessary, that they "be nourished up in the words of faith and of good doctrine;" and that they well digest that knowledge of the scripture to which they have attained. Instead of amusing ourselves and others with ingenious fancies and curious speculations, or with enforcing human inventions and superstitions, by imaginary or fallacious explanations of their origin, meaning, and benefit, which are often "profane and old wives' fa-" bles," we should exercise ourselves, and instruct others, in the substantial duties of godliness. This hath, at all times, the promise both of this world and of the next; and our present solid satisfaction, (as well as our eternal happiness,) is inseparably connected with it; but all else is vanity and vexation of spirit. This faithful saying is worthy of universal acceptation: apostles, evangelists, and martyrs, have laboured, endured reproach, and faced death in all its terrors, in support of it, because they trusted in the living God; who, being the Preserver of all men, and the Saviour of the world, will surely take especial care of those that believe, and cause all things to work together for their eternal good. It behooves all who command and teach these things, to take heed that no man despise them: but this is especially incumbent on young ministers, when called into conspicuous situations; for they will be narrowly observed, and many will be ready to deem them unfit for their arduous services, especially when they are called to instruct or admonish their seniors and superiors. Ministers should also be careful to confirm and elucidate their instructions by their example, and thus to lead forward believers to steadfastness in the faith, holiness of conversation, fervent love, spirituality, fidelity, integrity, and purity. Their time should be employed in reading and meditating on the scriptures, in acquiring religious knowledge, and in communicating it by the public and private duties of their ministry. This will leave them no leisure for dissipated pleasures, trifling visits, or idle conversation, and but little for amusing and merely ornamental studies. That measure of endowment which God hath given them for the work, to which they were set apart, and to which they solemnly devoted themselves, when ordained by the laying on of the hands of the pastors of the church, must not be neglected or left to decrease by disuse, but must be diligently exercised and improved. Alas! we cannot but reflect with grief of heart, that so few of those called ministers seem so much as to have ever seriously read these directions! and that their method of spending their time, the subjects of their studies, the objects of their pursuits, and the business and pleasure of their lives, form a perfect contrast to what they ought to be! But may the Lord have mercy upon each of us, and write these admonitions in our inmost souls! May we meditate continually on them! May our thoughts and affections be engrossed by them! May we "give ourselves "wholly unto them, that our profiting may appear unto "all men!" Let every minister, then, hear the apostle call upon him to "take heed to himself," as one that must give account; to look to it, that he experience the power of the Gospel in his own soul, and bring forth the fruits of it in his life; that his motives, temper, words, and works, be pure and evangelical; that his doctrine be scriptural; that he "declare the whole counsel of God;" and that he manifest his truth to every man's conscience, as in the sight of his heart-searching Judge. And let every one, who hath thus begun his ministry, persevere in this holy living and faithful preaching; however despised, reviled, opposed, or discouraged, he may be: for in so doing, he shall both save his own soul, and those of his attentive hearers; whilst blind guides and mercenary teachers can only expect to go before their deluded followers into the pit of everlasting destruction.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. The connexion of the word translated "an elder," in this place, has induced expositors in general to understand it of senior Christians, as well as of pastors. It must likewise be supposed that the apostle spake of such faults, as resulted from infirmity, and were not openly scandalous; or the counsel here given cannot be reconciled with a subsequent injunction. (Note, 19, 20.) As Timothy was young, it was peculiarly incumbent on him to avoid harshness, in animadverting on the misconduct of aged Christians or ministers: he ought not therefore to rebuke them with severity, or in apparent anger; but to entreat them to act with greater circumspection, and endeavour modestly to convince them of the impropriety and bad effects of the mistakes into which they had been betrayed: even as a son, placed in authority, would address an honoured parent who had not acted with due regard to his character and situation. In reproving young men or ministers, it would be proper to speak with great meekness and affection, and to admonish them as brethren. The elder women he must counsel and caution, as dutiful sons in such stations would their mothers; and he should behave towards the younger women with that kind of regard and affection which is borne to sisters; and with all purity, that nothing contrary to the strictest decorum might attend his ministerial converse with them.

V. 3, 4. The apostle next directed, that the aged widows, who were really destitute, should be honourably treated and provided for. But, if any widow had "children or grand-children," who were capable of relieving her, they ought to be required, as a duty of the first importance, to show piety, or a respectful and grateful affection, "at home;" requiting the tender, laborious, and expensive care of their parents towards them, in infancy and childhood, by providing for them in old age: for that was good in itself, a debt due to them, and an acceptable service to God, even in preference to any other charitable work.

V. 5, 6. The "widow indeed," whom the apostle peculiarly intended, was one who was desolate, having neither children nor relations, able to maintain her; and being destitute of the means of procuring a decent subsistence: at the same time she trusted in God to provide for her, and used no improper methods of obtaining a support; but devoted herself to his service, in continual prayers and supplications, stated and occasional, public and private, and even by night as well as by day; taking great delight in devotion, and employing herself very much in supplicating God, in behalf of her fellow Christians and all around her. (Note, Luke ii. 37.) But any one, who lived a delicate, luxurious, dissipated life, and perhaps chose to continue unmarried, that she might have less restraint in this self-indulgent course, must be considered as dead in sin, and only alive to worldly pleasure, (Marg. Ref.) so that no honourable attention was due to her from the church.

V. 7, 8. These things Timothy must give in charge to the pastors and deacons; that the body of professing Christians at Ephesus might be preserved blameless; that no encouragement might be given, even by means of their benevolence to such persons as were a scandal to them.—But if any man refused to provide for his own near relations, especially for his wife, children, and household, or for his aged parents, through sloth, covetousness, extravagance, or self-indulgence, he should be considered as having renounced the faith, by manifestly and habitually refusing to obey Christ; nay, as acting more disgracefully and unreasonably than an unbeliever would do in such circumstances. The heathen, in general, considered children as bound to support their aged parents; and considered the neglect of this duty as infamous, and fit only to be mentioned along with the most scandalous vices.—(Marg. Ref.) The manner in which many covetous persons grievously pervert this text must not pass unnoticed: while they evidently violate the duties of piety, equity, and charity, as well as that of providing for their indigent relations; yea, while they bring up their children, and maintain their families, in a manner utterly unsuitable to their circumstances, from eagerness to amass riches; they often quote this verse, in vindication of their sordid avarice, and imagine that the apostle commanded men to neglect all other duties, in order to enrich their children! (16.) 'Some plead these words, to justify, or to excuse, 'their sordid parsimony and want of charity:—whereas, 'they plainly respect the provision which children should 'make for their parents; and not that which parents should 'make for their children.' (Whitby.)

V. 9—12. The apostle could not here mean, that no widows were to be relieved by the Church, who were under sixty years of age: for the distresses of younger widows, as well as of other poor persons, might be very urgent.—He is, therefore, generally supposed to refer to a certain number of widows, who were discharged from all secular cares, and maintained by the Church; of whom such as were able acted as deaconesses, to visit sick and poor women, and to administer relief and counsel to them; to instruct young women, and perhaps children; or to attend on such other concerns of the church, its ministers, and pious strangers, as lay within their province. Though no command is given for such an order of persons in the church; (for many things of this kind were left discretionary, and to be determined according to circumstances;) yet they might frequently be useful, if properly selected and regulated. In this view the propriety of the rule here given is apparent. As the apostle counsels the younger widows to marry, it cannot be imagined that he would exclude them, when grown old, from the number here intended, if otherwise qualified, merely because they had followed his counsel. By "the wife of one man," therefore, the apostle did not intend to exclude such as had married a second time, which the Scripture no where disallows. But shameful and astonishing irregularities, in this respect, were common among the heathen women: they frequently left their husbands to live with other men, and then sometimes returned to them again; they often designedly gave them just cause to divorce them, that they might take other husbands; nay, they sometimes did what was equivalent to divorcing their husbands: nor were these things deemed scandalous; at least, not in that degree which they would be at present. If then any woman had formerly conformed to these corrupt customs, it would not be consistent with the credit of Christianity to admit her into this select number of devoted widows, though no other objection lay against her; for it must exclusively consist of those who had lived virtuously and honourably in the married state. (iii. 2. 12.)—Some expositors think that they who had married again, after being divorced, were intended: but there is not the least intimation in scripture, that the divorced should be restrained from marrying again, even if justly put away, and surely, then, not when unjustly divorced.—They must also be such women as had an established character for good works since they were converted. Those were to be preferred who had charitably educated the children of their poor relatives or neighbours, or who had faithfully done their duty towards their own children; who, when in more prosperous circumstances, had hospitably entertained strangers in their houses; who had willingly stooped to the office of washing the feet of the saints, when wearied with travelling; and who had, from love to Christ, readily relieved the afflicted, and diligently attended to every good work. These widows, when grown old and left desolate, were the proper persons for this service.—But Timothy was directed to reject the application of younger widows; for experience showed that their avowed purpose, of no more entering into the married state, was not to be depended on. After a time, when their grief on account of their former loss had subsided, various circumstances might induce them to marry again: and as their admission into the number of devoted widows implied an engagement to the contrary, and probably was attended by some promise to this effect; so their violation of it might be called "a waxing wanton against "Christ," leading them to be unfaithful to him, for the sake of some earthly object. Thus their engagement would serve to their condemnation, by occasioning their violation of that fidelity to Christ which they had previously promised: the church would see it necessary to censure them, and their sin would expose them to condemnation, if not repented of. They might perhaps be tempted to apostatize from the faith, by marrying heathens: and this seems to have been the case with some of this description. For Christians, probably, would not be disposed to marry those who had entered into this number; and if their inclinations led them to marry, their situation might expose them peculiarly to this temptation. The original is, "They will "incline," or choose, "to marry."

V. 13—15. It might likewise be feared, and experience had shown there was danger, lest younger widows, being early freed from the employments of domestic life, and having much leisure, should neglect to spend it in devotion and the duties of their station; and so contract habits of idleness, and waste their hours in sauntering from house to house, as trifling visitants; tattling and gossipping about the news of the day, and intermeddling with other people's affairs, spreading slanders, and speaking many things of a mischievous and improper nature. (2 Thes. iii. 11.) We should not suppose the apostle meant, that all the younger widows, who were employed in this service, acted in this manner; but it was an evil incident to that practice, and formed a sufficient reason for excluding them. He therefore determined that it was better to leave them at liberty to marry, if they chose it and circumstances admitted, that they might be occupied in the useful duties of wives and mothers, and in domestic business; that so no occasion might be given to any adversaries of the Gospel to speak reproachfully of it, through the misconduct of such as professed to be peculiarly devoted to the service of Christ. For indeed, some younger widows, being improperly admitted into this number, had turned aside to follow the suggestions of Satan, had married unbelieving husbands, and so relapsed into idolatry. 'The converting 'men to the Christian faith, being the "turning them "from Satan unto God," 'The casting off the faith 'may well be styled, "the turning aside after Satan."' (Whitby.) The apostle's determination, that no widow under sixty years of age should be admitted into this select number of devoted women, lest their useless lives and misconduct should occasion scandal, concludes with peculiar force against all vows of virginity, taken by young persons, under pretence of more strict religion than can be practised in the married state: and, indeed, the silence of the apostle concerning women who had never been married, in this connexion, is very expressive. But the pastors of the church, before many ages had elapsed, abundantly made up this deficiency!

V. 16. In closing this subject, the apostle required every believer, man or woman, that was able, to relieve widows belonging to their families, and others who were destitute, that the church might not be burdened with them, or prevented from relieving such as were entirely indigent and friendless. 'In the opinion of Estius, this precept 'extended to the proprietors of slaves, and bound them to 'maintain their slaves, when they became incapable of 'labour.' (Macknight.) The spirit of it, no doubt, extends to servants of every kind, who have spent their strength in our service, as far as we are able to support them.

V. 17, 18. Many expositors infer from these verses, that there were ruling elders in the church, who did not preach; others do not allow the inference; and, in general, ruling and teaching are united. (Marg. Ref.) Indeed, as double honour chiefly relates to a more plentiful and decent maintenance, it is improbable that mere rulers, who would not be greatly taken off from their secular business, should be thus maintained at the expense of their brethren. To preside in the affairs of the church, and to preach the word, (even the doctrine of Christ,) constitute the outlines of the pastoral office; the direction seems therefore to mean, that they who ruled most prudently, faithfully, and diligently, and were most laborious in their ministry, should be most respected and best provided for: especially they who were most unwearied in preaching and private exhortation; as the exercise of authority was more suited to the natural disposition of the human heart. (Notes, 1 Cor. ix. 4—14.) Labourer, &c. 'This, as well as 'what goeth before, is affirmed by the apostle to be said in 'the scripture; yet it is no where written in the Jewish 'scriptures. It is found only, (Matt. x. 10. Luke x. 7.) 'The apostle must therefore have read either Matthew's or 'Luke's Gospel, before he wrote this epistle. And seeing 'he quotes this saying as scripture, and represents it as of 'equal authority with the writings of Moses: it is a proof, 'not only of the early publication of the Gospels, but of 'their authenticity, as divinely inspired writings.' (Macknight.) (Notes, 1 Thes. v. 27. 2 Pet. iii. 16.)

V. 19, 20. The character of an elder, or pastor, was of great importance; it would therefore be improper, not only to condemn him, but even to receive an accusation against him, except it was attested by two or three credible witnesses. Many might be disposed to revile those faithful ministers, whose doctrine and reproofs had offended them; and indeed, the grand enmity of "the accuser of "the brethren," and of all his servants, would be excited against them. It was therefore highly reasonable, that no accusation, tending to bring the conduct of an elder to a public investigation, and thus to endanger his character, should be regarded, if supported only by one solitary testimony; which his denial of the crime would at least counterbalance. But in respect of those who were evidently guilty of any scandalous offence, whether elders or others, Timothy, as presiding in the Church, was required to rebuke them before all their brethren; not only in order to their being made ashamed and brought to repentance; but that others might fear the same censure, and so be excited to greater circumspection.

V. 21, 22. The apostle here most solemnly charged Timothy, as in the presence of God and the Lord Jesus Christ; and as he hoped to join the company of the elect angels, who had been preserved and confirmed in holiness, when many of their company apostatized and ruined themselves; who then witnessed his conduct, and would attend, when he should give an account of it to his sovereign Judge; that he observed these things with the utmost care and exactness, whatever opposition and trials he might incur; and that in all these regulations he should take care not to prefer one man to another, through any carnal affection, attachment, connexion, or obligations: and that he should manifest no partiality, either in censuring offenders, or ordaining elders, or in any other part of his important service. In ordaining elders, especially, he must be careful not to act in a hasty manner; but take time to examine into men's characters, principles, motives, and endowments, that he might not be induced to lay hands on improper persons, by importunity employed in their behalf. He would need great care, in this immensely important concern, to avoid being partaker of other men's sins, and becoming answerable in part, at least, for the crimes of those who thus intruded into that sacred function, to the dishonour of God, the great detriment of the church, and the ruin of immortal souls: for even an obliging and easy temper might betray him into much criminality, from which he must by all means keep himself pure. It is manifest, that Timothy is here, and elsewhere, supposed to possess great authority in the Ephesian church, both in superintending the elders already ordained, and in ordaining others. It is also allowed that he was an extraordinary person, especially appointed by the apostle to this service; but there is no proof, that he conferred miraculous powers by the imposition of his hands, as the apostles did. We cannot indeed by any means infer the divine right of episcopacy, from the authority exercised by Timothy, Titus, and other evangelists; yet it is highly probable, at least, that it was very early found expedient, and conducive to peace, to have a stated presiding inspector, of approved wisdom and piety, who might superintend the pastors and the affairs of a few neighbouring churches, as moderator and censor; and be peculiarly attended to in the appointment of church-officers. Hence a moderate episcopacy was very early, probably even while some of the apostles lived, generally prevalent in the church: indeed, this seems to have taken place between the time, when St. Paul gave his admirable parting charge to the elders or bishops of Ephesus, and the time when St. John, from our Lord's own mouth, wrote epistles to the angels of the seven churches in Asia. And after all the abuses, usurpations, controversies, and prejudices, that have since been introduced, probably the time will ere long arrive, when experience will convince pious men of different persuasions, that something of this kind, properly conferred, limited, and exercised, would prove a suitable remedy to those multiplied divisions, which so weaken and disgrace religious societies, that in doctrine, worship, and practice, are in all other respects unexceptionable.

V. 23. This verse is a remarkable instance of the apostle's neglect of exact method in penning his epistles. It occurred to his mind, when reflecting on Timothy's manifold cares and labours, that his frequent indispositions might be increased by his too great abstemiousness; to the prevention of his usefulness, and the shortening of his days. He therefore broke in upon his subject, to counsel him not to drink water any longer, at least as his only liquor; but to use a little wine, to strengthen his stomach, and preserve his health. We may hence form an estimate of the exact temperance practised by these laborious servants of Christ, who so zealously pleaded the cause of Christian liberty, who placed no dependence on such matters, and who never prescribed their own conduct as a rule for other men!

V. 24, 25. In respect of the choice and ordination of ministers, it might further be observed, that some men's crimes were so notorious, and so easily proved, that they lay open before-hand, and anticipated the judgment which was to be formed of their conduct and pretensions. In other cases they followed after; so that diligent and impartial investigation would be requisite, in order to detect them. In like manner, some persons, applying for admission into the public service of the church, had a sufficient testimonial in their known and abundant good works, which were manifest before any peculiar inquiry was made; and when this was not the case, yet, upon due investigation, Timothy and others might become acquainted with them: so that, in most instances, an impartial attention to the business, without any respect of persons, would enable them to know who were, and who were not, eligible to public stations. 'I speak not of men, whose good or bad works 'are manifest before-hand: for they without further ex-'amination may be admitted; or are to be rejected: but 'those whose vices, or good works, are latent. For they, 'after examination and inquiry, cannot be long hid. And 'so, if thou be not hasty in laying on of hands, thou may-'est timely discover them. Or thou wilt not be partaker 'with the sinner, having done as much as was in thy pow-'er to discover them.' (Whitby.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

There is a respect due to the aged, which must not be withheld by their juniors, when placed in authority over them, or even on account of incidental faults. Every thing harsh and assuming must be improper, in the conduct of young ministers towards their seniors, as it would be in the conduct of a son to his parents. Indeed, admonitions are generally most efficacious, whether to old or young, when meekness and affection unite with firmness and faithfulness. The greatest caution and purity are requisite in the conduct of ministers, (especially while in the prime of life,) as to their most needful converse with the younger women in their congregations; that all occasion, appearance, and suspicion of evil may be prevented. —It is an indispensable duty, for children and grand-children to requite the kindness of their aged parents; this is good and acceptable with God; nor are more distant relations exempt from a measure of the same obligation, when they can afford it; that neither the church, the parish, nor the public, may be charged; but that the contributions, raised in any way, may be applied to such as are really destitute. But if any professor of the Gospel, through sloth, improvidence, selfishness, or other corrupt principle, wilfully neglect, or refuse to provide for, his near relatives, he is, in the apostle's judgment, virtually a denier of the faith, and even worse than his neighbours who do not pretend to believe the doctrines of grace. And may we not, by parity of reason, infer, that they who neglect to instruct their household, and to do what they can for the salvation of their relatives, act altogether inconsistently with the Christian profession? Aged widows and others of good character, who are left destitute in the decline of life, ought to be honoured as well as supported. It seems the intent of these scriptures to teach us, that every religious society should, as far as it is able, make provision for persons of this description, and not leave them to sordid penury, or to the tender mercies of the wicked, in their old age. But then this provision should be limited to such as "trust in God, and devote themselves to his service, in "prayer and supplication night and day;" at least to such, as give evidence that they are of a widely different character from those, "who live in pleasure, being dead whilst "they live." Alas! what numbers are there of this description among nominal Christians, even to the latest period of life! And how much does the same leaven work among professors of the Gospel! These things we must give in charge, that the church may be preserved blameless; or, at least, that we may deliver our own souls.

V. 9—16.

Every one, who is brought forth into notoriety in the church, should, as much as possible, be free from scandal; and many are proper objects of charity, who ought not to be employed in public services. They who in domestic life have shown most diligence, humility, compassion, benevolence, love to the people of God, and readiness for every good work, are most likely to fill up leisure time profitably, and to be faithful in whatever is intrusted to them. It is not sufficient to determine what would be best in itself, of things not absolutely obligatory or unlawful: the state of human nature, and facts, must be attended to, that it may be known what is most generally expedient. It might have seemed plausible to admit the young widows, or other young women, to such a service in the church, as implied an entire devoting of themselves to religion for the rest of their days; yet the apostle, not only with the wisdom derived from deep reflection and extensive observation, but under the influence of the divine Spirit, decided otherwise. He knew that this would expose them to temptation, and lead many into sin; that it would tend to ensnare some of them into improper marriages, and even occasion their apostacy and ruin; that it would give others of them a habit of indolence, sauntering, slandering, intruding into matters not belonging to them, and improper conversation: and that it would, therefore, be generally better for them to be employed in the duties of the married state, and in the cares of a family; that this would give less occasion to the enemies of the Gospel to speak reproachfully, and Satan less opportunity of prevailing against them. And immense numbers, in every age, have shown their total ignorance of human nature, and have done incalculable mischief, by attempting to improve on his plan, or rather to subvert it.

V. 17—25.

The office of a minister is honourable to all, those alone excepted who are a disgrace to their office; but the most prudent, faithful, and diligent, especially the most laborious in the word and doctrine, ought to be most honoured and best provided for. The reverse proportion indeed seems generally to be adopted in this matter; but the Lord will provide for his faithful servants, whatever method men may follow in disposing of their favours. It may be expected that the impartial public reprover will be exposed to the attacks of malicious calumniators: and though his faults should not be connived at, yet accusations against him ought not to be regarded, except well authenticated: but they who give public offence by their crimes, should be rebuked publicly, that others may be put upon their guard. All, who are employed in important services in the church, should consider themselves as charged by the apostle, "before God and the Lord Jesus "Christ, and the elect angels, to observe those things, "without preferring one before another." The neglect of this rule, in the exercise of ecclesiastical authority, has given its opponents one of their best arguments against it. So much hath been done out of carnal respects, and by partiality to relatives, friends, and connexions, in admitting men into the ministry, appointing them to livings, and conniving at their crimes, that the exercise of all authority of this kind has been considered as unlawful.—How far those concerned in ecclesiastical matters are culpable, in respect of "laying hands suddenly" on improper persons, without due inquiry and circumspection, or from complaisance to superiors or friends, and how far this rule is observed, or violated, in all its extent, every man's conscience must determine for himself, till Christ shall come to take an account of his servants. But it is certain that immense criminality must rest somewhere, as the multitude of ignorant, slothful, ambitious, avaricious, immoral, and heretical clergymen, who remain uncensured, throughout this land, and in almost every part of the visible church, most manifestly proves. There must somewhere be those who are, in this respect, "partakers of other men's sins;" and it must require great care and conscientiousness for any one absolutely to keep himself pure.—It is extremely difficult, under any form of church-government, to conduct every particular in such a manner as to "do nothing by partiality:" this will require circumspection, firmness, intrepidity, disinterested zeal, and the meekness of wisdom; and these cannot be obtained without much fervent prayer. These things, however, must be carefully observed by those who would not be partakers of other men's sins; as every person concerned must feel in proportion to his conscientiousness. But they who honestly desire to do their duty, will generally be directed in it: some men's sins will be discovered at once, going before to judgment; others require more diligent search; whilst the good works of others are manifest; and they that are otherwise may yet be known upon due inquiry: so that a sufficient judgment may generally be formed for the regulation of men's conduct, if their minds be free from prejudice and partiality. Finally, let us observe, that eminent grace will connect the strictest temperance with the most fervent zeal for the liberty of the Gospel; that it is the duty of every one to use proper means for the preservation of his health and life, as a debt which he owes to the church, the community, and his family; and that they who are frequently infirm, who labour abundantly in important services, and whose earnestness in spiritual things induces a disregard to animal indulgence, should follow the advice of those who give them proper directions for a due regard to their health.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—5. (Notes, Eph. vi. 5—8. Col. iii. 22—25.) The apostle next directed, that Christians, who were under the yoke of slavery, should quietly attend to the duties of their lowly situation; counting their own masters entitled to all that respect, fidelity, and obedience, which that superior relation demanded; and not supposing that their religious knowledge, privileges, or liberty, gave them a right to despise their heathen masters, to disobey their lawful commands, or to expose their faults to their neighbours. This they ought to attend to, that the name of God might not be blasphemed, and his truth and worship reviled, among the Gentiles, by means of the failure of Christian servants in acknowledged duties. And such of them as enjoyed the privilege of believing masters, ought by no means to despise them, or withhold from them due respect and obedience; because they were brethren in Christ, and so upon a level in respect of religious privileges: but rather to do them service, with double diligence and cheerfulness, because of their faith in Christ and their interest in his love, as partakers of the inestimable benefit of his free salvation. This shows, that Christian masters were not required to set their slaves at liberty; though they were instructed to behave towards them in such a manner as would greatly lessen the evils of slavery. It would have excited much confusion, awakened the jealousy of the civil powers, and greatly retarded the progress of Christianity, had this been expressly required by the apostles; though the principles both of the law and the Gospel, when carried to their consequences, will infallibly abolish slavery. These things Timothy was directed to teach and enforce as matters of the greatest importance: and if any persons taught otherwise, and consented not to such salutary words, which were indeed the words of Christ speaking by him, and an essential part of the doctrine according to godliness, he should be considered as a self-conceited ignorant man, who, being puffed up with an opinion of his own abilities, was ambitious of distinction and applause, though entirely unacquainted with the real nature and tendency of the Gospel. It is not absolutely certain to what set of men the apostle referred: but as many of the Jews deemed it unlawful to submit to heathen governors, so it is probable the Judaizing teachers inculcated that the worshippers of God ought not to obey heathen masters: and so paid their court to servants, by persuading them that they ought to assert their liberty. But there might be others also who disregarded and despised these practical instructions, while their attention was taken up with curious and nice speculations and distinctions. Such persons, however, were to be considered as doting or raving, (like men in the delirium of a fever,) about hard questions and disputes of words, names, forms, or notions, which had no connexion with the power of godliness: nay, on the contrary, they tended to excite envy and competition between one and another, angry contests for victory and pre-eminence, mutual revilings and calumnies, injurious suspicions and jealousies, and absurd, obstinate, and violent controversies, between men of corrupt and carnal minds, who were destitute of the real knowledge of the truth and its sanctifying efficacy, and who only sought their own secular advantage, supposing religion to be valuable, in proportion as it tended to enrich them, as if gain and godliness had been but two names for the same thing! Thus they wanted to persuade the Christian servants, that the recovery of their liberty was to be considered as a Christian privilege, of great value, which they ought to claim, whatever the consequence might be: and, from the same principle, they sought worldly lucre by their religious profession, and as their leading object. From such men Timothy was exhorted to withdraw himself; and neither have acquaintance with them, nor spend his time in disputing against them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6—10. The proposition before mentioned, "that "gain is godliness," might be reversed, and thus contain a most important truth. Godliness, connected with a contented mind, was indeed very great gain, (Note, iv. 8. Phil. iv. 10—13;) as it tended to a man's present comfort and everlasting benefit, whatever his outward circumstances were. For men brought nothing into the world with them, but were born helpless and destitute, except as providence supplied all their wants: and it was most certain, that no man could take any thing along with him when he left the world. So that a subsistence during his journey was the utmost that any one could have of earthly things; and a very mean and scanty provision would answer that end, as well as a more luxurious and abundant one, and occasion less temptation and sin. In a short time all these things would be finally done with; whereas godliness would soon terminate in eternal felicity. Having therefore food and raiment, (or covering,) including both raiment and habitation, and things barely needful for the present, we ought to be contented and satisfied with them, without indulging any desire of acquiring greater affluence, or of being exempted from hard labour and mean fare: for discontent in a lowly situation, commonly produced a determination to be rich if possible, and led men out of the plain path of honest industry and prudent economy, in dependence on the providence, and obedience to the commandment, of God. It was indeed evident from facts, they who would at any rate be rich, gave Satan the opportunity of tempting and ensnaring them into such actions, as could not consist with godliness or a good conscience; urging them to use dishonest means of increasing their gains, and a variety of fraudulent practices: it betrayed them into such a multiplicity of employments and hurry of business, as left no time or inclination for spiritual religion; and it led them into such connexions and companies, as tended to draw them still further into sin and folly. Thus they were brought under the power of "many foolish and hurtful lusts," even "the lust of the "flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," which mocked their expectations, and proved most injurious to themselves and others, till they were plunged into inevitable ruin and eternal perdition; as men are drawn in by the vortex of a whirlpool, when they venture too near it, and so are swallowed up and drowned, without any possibility of escape. When once "the love of money" is allowed to rule in the heart, it becomes the prolific root of all kinds of evil. Impostures, frauds, lies, thefts, robberies, oppressions, murders, ungodliness, hypocrisy, apostacy, contention, law-suits, wars, cruelty, pride, luxury, sensuality, and penurious avarice, are some of the noxious weeds, of which it daily produces a most abundant increase, according to the different constitutions, habits, and circumstances of mankind. Every species of impiety, iniquity, and vice, in one way or another, grows from it; and a large proportion of the miseries, as well as the crimes, of mankind originate from the same source. And while some professed Christians, even in the apostle's days, had coveted riches, they had been seduced into apostacy, or led to corrupt the faith, or to act grossly inconsistent with it: and thus, "they had pierced themselves through," as with wounds made by a sword, in every part of the body; so that even those who were not finally ruined, were filled with many sorrows, and must endure the most exquisite anguish, in consequence of their folly. All this would have been avoided, if they had been contented with food and raiment, and watched and prayed against the desire of being rich. It is not to be supposed, that the apostle meant to establish, as an universal proposition, that every kind and every act of wickedness grew from the love of money, as from their only root; for, doubtless, many kinds and innumerable acts of wickedness spring from other roots, which have scarcely any connexion with the love of money. But whoever well considers what influence the desire of riches, (not only to hoard them, but to purchase with them the gratification of pride, ambition, sensual inclinations, and even revenge,) has on the conduct of mankind, will readily see, that, as a general truth, there is sufficient ground to aver, that the love of money is the root of all evil. The abandoned prostitute Judas who sold his Lord, the traitor who sells his country, and the mercenary teacher of religion, combine in saying, "What "will ye give me?" It was the remark of a corrupt, but able statesman in this nation, that 'every man has his 'price;' and it is in some sense true of every man, who is a lover of money, of pleasure, or of worldly honour, more than a lover of God. The ambitious conquerors and destroyers of mankind have always loved money, as the means of accomplishing their object; and have extorted it from those in their power, with the most entire disregard to justice, truth, and mercy. Nor did any of them ever desire to revenge himself, or remove a rival, by assassination, or perjury, but some wretch could be found disposed by love of money to perpetrate the villany. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. According to the language of the Old Testament, concerning the ancient prophets, the apostle addressed Timothy as a "Man of God," one devoted to God, and employed by him as his messenger to mankind: and he exhorted him to flee, without delay or looking back, to the utmost distance from this destructive whirlpool, in which such numbers were swallowed up: and to follow after more entire conformity to the perfect rule of universal righteousness, by an upright faithful conduct towards all men; a proper temper and behaviour towards God in every thing: a lively faith in Christ and the divine promises in him, as well as faithfulness in his stewardship; love to the Lord, to his brethren, and mankind; patience under sufferings, and meekness amidst injuries and provocation. Thus let him fight, with consecrated armour, "the good fight of faith;" maintaining the honourable and profitable conflict against sin, the world, and Satan, to which the Gospel animated him: let him contend earnestly for the prize, by faith, and self-denying obedience; by mortifying sin, by resisting temptation, by enduring hardship and persecution, and by using every means of weakening the kingdom of Satan, and advancing that of Christ in the world. After this manner let him press forward with all earnestness, till he laid hold in actual possession of eternal life; unto which he, (as well as the apostle,) had been called by the special grace of God; and had, in consequence, made an honourable profession of the truth before many witnesses, at his baptism, when ordained to the ministry, and especially in his subsequent labours and sufferings as a preacher of the Gospel.

16 Who [c] only hath immortality, [d] dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto; [e] whom no man hath seen, or can see: [f] to whom be honour and power everlasting. Amen.

V. 13—16. To confirm Timothy in the purpose of persevering amidst his various trials and perils, the apostle solemnly charged him, as "in the sight of God, who "quickeneth all things," (or giveth life to all,) and could therefore preserve his life, however exposed, and would certainly raise him again to immortal glory, if he laid it down in his cause: and "before Jesus Christ," who had boldly borne witness to the truth, and avowed himself the Son of God and the King of Israel, in the presence of Pilate, when he knew that he should be crucified for maintaining that claim; who required his servants thus constantly to confess him before men; and who had promised to own them that did so, before his Father and the holy angels: as in the sight of God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ, he charged him to keep the commandment before given, or the trust committed to him, without the spot or blemish of any miscarriage, neglect, or unfaithfulness, from fear of man or love of the world; that he might be "unrebukeable;" that his brethren might see nothing to reprove in him, that the world might have nothing to say against him, and that his Lord might welcome him as a good and faithful servant. In this let him persevere, till "the appearing of the Lord Jesus;" which, in his appointed season, he would display in the sight of the whole world, who was, "the blessed," or most happy, "and only Potentate," possessed of absolute, universal, and eternal dominion, "the King of kings, and Lord of "lords," from whom all power and authority were derived and delegated; (Matt. vi. 13;) who alone possessed immortality in and of himself, having underived, unalienable, and unchangeable existence, perfection, and felicity; who inhabited the "light itself," being surrounded with such resplendent glories, that no man could possibly approach to him, (except as revealed to sinners in and by his incarnate Son;) whom no man ever did or ever can see with his bodily eyes, being a Spirit, and the object of intellectual vision alone; to whom honour and power everlasting ought to be ascribed by all intelligent creatures. Amen. The Godhead itself seems to be here intended and adored, without distinction of persons; of which all these things are properly spoken, whether the Person of the Father, of the Son, or of the Holy Spirit, be mentioned. But the invisible God is revealed to us only in and through the human nature of Christ, as the only-begotten Son of the Father: and this display of the divine glory will be rendered most illustrious, when Christ shall be seen as man, exercising all the power, authority, and perfections of God, by the whole assembled universe. (Notes, Matt. xxv. 31—46. John i. 18.) "Without spot," 'in respect of the commandment itself, and "unblameable," 'in respect of thy performance of it; which will contribute to preserve the good confession in the world, "till the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ.' (Macknight.) This is true and important, and indeed implied: but the apostle constantly, in his exhortations, referred to the appearing of Christ; not to establish as a doctrine, that it was near, in respect of time; but to inculcate a continual readiness for it, and an habitual regard to it, in the whole conduct of Christians, to the very close of life.

V. 17—19. A few rich persons had, it seems, embraced the Gospel at Ephesus; and, as wealth is a comparative thing, some such must be found in other places.—But Timothy, and other ministers, might be tempted to pay them undue deference; and it would require much firmness and impartiality to give them proper counsel, caution, and instruction. He was therefore peculiarly directed, in the most plain, authoritative, and solemn manner, to warn them against the danger to which they were exposed, and to enjoin on them the peculiar duty of their station. He must "charge those that were "rich in "this world," (which was perfectly distinct from being "rich towards God,") that they should not be puffed up by affluence, and superiority of circumstances above their brethren; as if this implied more wisdom or excellency, or conferred on them higher privileges, ensured them more regard from God, entitled them to pre-eminent authority in the church, exempted them from censure or reproof, or authorized them to neglect or contemn others: and that they should not confide in their riches; as if they could make them safe or happy, increase their present comfort, give them any permanent advantage, or promote their eternal felicity. For riches were uncertain, liable to be torn from them, often proving the cause of distress, temptation and sin, speedily to be left at death, and to be given an account of at the day of judgment. (Notes, Matt. vi. 19—24. xix. 16—26. Luke xii. 13—21. xvi.) Timothy must therefore charge the rich, as well as the poor, "to trust in the living God," both for present safety, support and comfort, and for eternal happiness; remembering that he gave them bountifully all the things which they enjoyed. They ought therefore to acknowledge him as the Author of their abundance; it was all given them in his wisdom, and revocable at his will, and could only be profitable to them, when used to his glory. They must therefore be enjoined, by the authority of God himself, to do good with their riches, and to deem this their duty and happiness, instead of avariciously hoarding, or luxuriously wasting them. By relieving the wants of the indigent, and largely contributing to the support and comfort of their poor brethren, they must aim to be rich in good works, the genuine fruits of faith and love. They must be prompt and liberal in distributing their wealth to proper objects, and for valuable purposes; as the husbandman scatters his seed without grudging, in hopes of a future harvest. Thus they would treasure up for themselves the true riches, (not for their heirs, or they knew not whom, as misers do their idolized wealth,) and lay a good foundation for their hope and comfort, in the approaching season of affliction and death; showing their faith in Christ, (the Rock of salvation,) by the unequivocal fruits of love and obedience: that so they too might lay hold on eternal life in actual possession, when the self-indulgent, the covetous, and ungodly rich men around them, would "lift up their eyes in hell, being in torments."

V. 20, 21. The apostle, considering the snares and temptations, the allurements and terrors, which Timothy had to guard against and overcome, in order to the faithful execution of his ministry; and reflecting also on the various species of false religion, which many artfully substituted instead of the humbling, holy Gospel of Christ; again most affectionately and earnestly called upon him to keep inviolable, without shrinking or wavering, the ministry, or stewardship, with which he had been intrusted. And he charged him to shun the profane aud vain babblings of those, who wanted to impose the foolish and trifling traditions and observances of the Jewish scribes, as well as the rites of the Mosaic law, upon Christians; and the "oppositions of science," or knowledge, "falsely so "called," such as the Gnostics, or knowing ones, afterwards corrupted the Gospel with. These speculations were borrowed from the vain philosophy of the Gentiles; and, being distorted and mutilated to suit their purpose, they introduced them into Christianity, to render it more congenial to the heart of man, and especially to gratify their fondness for disputation, and their pride of superior penetration and acuteness. Thus one corrupt system of pretended knowledge was opposed to another, jangling controversies were multiplied and perpetuated, the truth was obscured and overlooked, and the wildest absurdities were substituted in its place. Some, even then, having been seduced into these speculations, had erred from the faith into fatal heresies; and the evil was likely to increase. Having therefore, given Timothy this warning, the apostle closed this most instructive epistle with his usual salutation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

It is most important to the honour of the Gospel, that professed Christians duly perform their various relative duties; and that "servants count their own masters worthy "of all honour," even though they be unbelievers. Their condition, indeed, in this favoured land of liberty, allows them to change one situation for another; but the precepts of scripture do not at all permit them to behave with disrespect to the persons, or disregard to the lawful commands, of those whom they serve; nor yet to return affronting answers, or to speak of their master's faults to others without cause; but rather to weep over and pray for them in secret, when they are ungodly and unreasonable. Alas! how grievously are the name and Gospel of God blasphemed through those servants, who love to discourse and dispute about doctrines and sermons in families averse to them, and then behave with impertinence in their places, if not with sloth, dishonesty, and unfaithfulness! Thus thousands are fatally prejudiced against the Gospel. Nay, this matter is so little attended to, that many masters, who would be glad to have believers in their families, and to behave to them like brethren, as far as it is consistent with domestic subordination, are often wearied out, and tempted to prefer servants who know not the Gospel, because of the misconduct of those who profess it. Indeed, some servants, whose sincerity is unimpeached, through a lamentable mistake, suppose equality in religious privileges to imply equality in the family: and thus they act as if they despised their believing masters and their authority, giving them rude answers, or neglecting their business, or doing it in their own way, as if this was a part of their Christian liberty; whereas they ought to honour and serve them, with the greater diligence and alacrity; because "they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit." No doubt there are violations of duty equally inexcusable, committed by those who stand in the opposite relation: and professors of the Gospel are accessory to believing servants choosing to live in irreligious families, by behaving in an unchristian manner to such as have come among them, expecting better treatment. Ministers are bound to teach and enforce the duties of all ranks and orders to men, in the church and community; and if any one teach otherwise, and speak contemptuously of these exhortations, and consent not to salutary words, which are, indeed, the words of our Lord, and a part of the doctrine according to godliness, he ought to be deemed a proud man, who knoweth nothing, (whatever his gifts and profession may be;) and he should be pitied, and shunned as a distempered man, who is infected by the love of abstract "questions, and "strifes about words; whereof cometh envy, contention, "revilings, evil surmises, and perverse disputings." This is manifest from daily observation; to these things men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, are peculiarly addicted; especially when they can make them subservient to their emolument and reputation, being disposed to think that the best religion, by which they can get the most money. Instead of engaging in controversy with such mercenary, self-wise, and ignorant wranglers, who will not consent even to the apostle's words, or to those of Christ himself, we should withdraw, and thus protest against them, and leave them to dispute by themselves or with one another.

V. 6—12.

We should always remember, "that godliness with contentment is great gain." As we brought nothing with us into the world, and can carry nothing out, let us trust him that hath hitherto provided for us, to supply our wants during the remnant of our pilgrimage. Having food and raiment, we should daily beg of God that we may be contented with it, and that he would keep us from every degree and kind of covetousness. We cannot look about us at all, without perceiving that "they who will be "rich fall into temptation, are entangled in a snare, and "are overcome by many foolish and hurtful lusts, which "drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of "money is the root of all" kinds of "evil," in every part of the earth: and even among professors of the Gospel, we often see piety, charity, mercy, equity, sincerity, temperance, and humility, laid like so many bleeding sacrifices on the altar of Mammon; while men's own souls, and those of their ill educated children, are destroyed, to gratify the malignant demon! Many hopeful persons, by allowing themselves to covet something greater, more elegant, or affluent, have erred from the faith, have made shipwreck of their profession, or have turned out mere thorny-ground hearers; and others have pierced themselves through with many sorrows, to the embittering of the whole of their future lives. No words can express, no description reach, the numberless and horrid evils that continually flow from this source; especially in a day of outward prosperity, extensive commerce, vast expense, and loose profession! But "what is a man profited, if he gain the whole "world, and lose his own soul?" Let every Christian flee from this destructive lust; let the men of God especially avoid every appearance of the love of filthy lucre, or improvident expense: let us, on the contrary, "follow "after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meek-"ness," with that assiduity and earnestness, with which worldly men pursue their perishing riches: let us fight the noble and profitable fight of faith, and thus lay hold on eternal life, to which we also are called; and strive to act consistently with that good profession, which (in our ministry at least,) we have made of the truth, before many witnesses, who will all at last testify against us, if we forsake Christ from love of this present world.

V. 13—21.

The apostle charges us also, "as in the sight of God, "who quickeneth all things, and of Christ Jesus, who "before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession, that "we keep the commandment of God without spot, and "unrebukeable, till the appearing of Jesus Christ." Let none suppose that our Lord delayeth his coming: in his own times he will be manifested, as "the effulgency of "the divine glory, the Image of the invisible God." This will be brought to pass by "the blessed and only Poten-"tate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords; who only "hath immortality, dwelling in inaccessible light," and invisible to human eyes. That we may be presented faultless before the divine Redeemer's presence with exceeding joy, receive the crown of immortal glory, and be admitted to the beatific vision, it behooves us now to be faithful, watchful, sober, diligent, and disinterested. Thus honouring our God here, and desiring to ascribe to him glory and power to eternity, he will honour us at last, before the assembled universe. Ministers are required, especially, to point out to rich men their peculiar dangers and duties; because they are numerous and important. Whilst nature prompts us to desire connexion with them, it produces a reluctancy to that part of duty which relates to them. Even modesty, timidity, gratitude, or supposed prudence, may warp us in this matter: a false apprehension of what may conduce to their best interest, that of our religious society, or of the Church at large, and a fear of prejudicing and offending them, and so losing the opportunity of doing good to them or by them, may easily mislead us in this great concern: not to speak of the dread of their frown, and the credit and advantage of their friendship, both which are very ensnaring to the ministers of the Gospel. But we must break through all these obstacles, if we would be faithful stewards and vigilant watchmen, and deliver our own souls. We must charge them in the name of God not to be high-minded, nor to trust in their uncertain riches, or idolize them; and not to seek happiness from them, but from the "living God, who giveth us all "things richly to enjoy." We must show them the danger to which they are exposed, of being betrayed into pride, avarice, ambition, self-indulgence, and the love of outward splendour. We must point out to them the proper use and improvement of their wealth; charging them to do good, to be "rich in good works, ready to distribute, "willing to communicate:" we must call on them to provide against the time to come, when it will be said to them, "Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou "shalt be no longer steward." We must exhort them so to use present advantages, that they may lay up for themselves a better treasure, and ensure a good hope, and know themselves to have a firm foundation in a dying hour, that they may lay hold on eternal life. But who is sufficient for these things? Or who can give such charges with energy, that is not himself evidently superior to the love of wealth, or any thing that wealth can purchase? May the Lord help us all to keep these things, which are committed to our trust, to avoid profane and vain babblings, disputations, philosophy, and oppositions of science, falsely so called; by which so many are drawn away from the preaching of, and believing dependence on, a crucified Saviour: and may the grace of the Lord Jesus be with all his faithful ministers and people every where, and at all times! Amen.

TIMOTHY.

The apostle was evidently a prisoner at Rome, when he wrote this epistle; but some suppose that it was written during his first imprisonment, as the epistles to the Ephesians, the Philippians, the Colossians, Philemon, and the Hebrews were: others, however, are of opinion, that it was written when he was imprisoned a second time, and not long before he suffered martyrdom; and this appears to me by far the most satisfactory. The ancients, from these words, "I am ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand," (iv. 6.) do generally conclude, that this was the last of his epistles. And truly the words are not well capable of any other sense: for he says expressly, "I am now offered, and the time of my dissolution is instant. I have finished my course." Whereas he not only expected to be delivered from his first bonds, but says expressly, "I know that I shall abide, &c." (Phil. i. 25, 26. Philem. 22. Heb. xiii. 23.) 'In his first bonds, he was in libera custodia, in his own hired house.' (Acts xxviii. 30, 31.) 'His bonds were known in Cæsar's palace, and to all others. Here he is in areta custodia: so 'that Onesiphorus was forced to "inquire more diligently after him, that he might find him out." Again 'he said before, "Many of the brethren, being encouraged by my bonds, were bold to speak the word "without fear." (Phil. i. 14.) Here "all men forsake him." (Whitby.) Timothy was with Paul, when he wrote to the Colossians, to the Philippians, to Philemon, and to the Hebrews. (Phil. i. 1. Col. i. 1. Philem. 1. Heb. xiii. 23.) Mark was also with him, and joined in saluting the Colossians: but both were absent when this epistle was written. Should it be argued, that they came to him before he wrote the other epistles: what can be said concerning Demas? For he was with the apostle when he wrote to the Colossians, but had forsaken him when he wrote this epistle. (iv. 10. Col. iv. 14.) The supposition, that Timothy and Mark had come to the apostle, before he wrote the other epistles, implies that this was written a considerable time before those: but the supposition, that Demas had repented, and returned to the apostle, when he wrote to the Colossians, implies, that this epistle was written some time after. Yet, these contradictory suppositions must both be admitted, to support the opinion, that this epistle was written during the apostle's first imprisonment. Indeed, the language used in it, implies that the apostle considered himself, as one who had finished his ministerial labours, and after a severe imprisonment, perhaps for some time, was about to close his testimony by martyrdom. (Notes, i. 15—18. iv. 5—9.) It is also questioned where Timothy was, when the apostle wrote to him. It is generally thought that he resided at Ephesus; and indeed this is probable, though not certain. (Compare ii. 16—18 iv. 15. with 1 Tim. i. 20.—See Notes iv. 9—12. 19—22.) The scope of the epistle evidently was to animate Timothy to endure persecutions with courage and constancy; to caution him and others against false teachers and corrupt professors of Christianity; the increase of whom, the apostle predicted in most energetic language; and to direct and animate him in fulfilling his ministry, and in following after holiness. 'The apostle had been for some time under close confinement at Rome, at the mercy of a cruel 'and capricious tyrant. He had seen himself deserted by his friends in his greatest extremity, and had 'nothing before him, but the certain prospect of being called to suffer death, in the same cause to which 'he had devoted his life. In this situation, how does he behave? Does he seem to look back with concern 'on his past conduct; or to regret the sacrifice he had made of his worldly interests? Can we discover 'any thing, that betrays a secret consciousness of guilt, or even a suspicion of the weakness of his cause? —'On the contrary, upon the most calm and deliberate survey, he expresses an entire satisfaction in 'reflecting on the part he had acted; and earnestly recommends it to his beloved pupil, to follow his 'example in maintaining the glorious cause, even at the hazard of his life. He appears throughout the 'epistle to have felt a strong conviction of the truth of those principles he had embraced; and glories in 'the sufferings he had endured in support of them; triumphing in the full assurance of being approved 'by his great Master, and of receiving at his hands a crown of distinguished lustre.' (Doddridge.)

CHAP. I.

The apostle affectionately salutes Timothy, with thanksgiving and prayer on his account, 1—3: and expresses a great desire of seeing him, 4; remembering his faith, and that of his grandmother and mother, 5. He exhorts him to stir up the gift of God which was in him, 6. He charges him not to be ashamed of the divine testimony, or of him the Lord's prisoner; but to prepare for suffering, as having been saved and called by special grace, according to the blessed tenour of the Gospel, 7—10. Of this, Paul had been made an apostle; for which cause he suffered, without being either ashamed or afraid, as he knew the power of Him in whom he trusted, 11, 12. He exhorts him to steadfastness and faithfulness, 13, 14; shows that those of Asia had turned from him, 15; and commends the diligent and courageous kindness of Onesiphorus; praying fervently that he and his family might find mercy from God, at the last day, 16—18.

PAUL, [a] an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the will of God, according to [b] the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus;

2 To [c] Timothy, my dearly beloved son: [d] Grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and Christ Jesus our Lord.

3 [e] I thank God, [f] whom I serve from my forefathers [g] with pure conscience, [h] that without ceasing I have remembrance of thee in my prayers [i] night and day;

6 Wherefore [r] I put thee in remembrance, [s] that thou stir up the gift of God, which is in thee, [t] by the putting on of my hands.

7 For God hath not given us [u] the spirit of fear; [x] but of power, and [y] of love, and of [z] a sound mind.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. The Gospel, intrusted to the apostle by the sovereign will of God, according to the promise of life and salvation made to fallen man, through the predicted Messiah, from the beginning: all these predictions were fulfilled in Christ, and then the promise of life was sent to Jews and Gentiles without distinction. 'Thus he 'shows, that the Gospel is not new; but the very thing 'which God promised by the prophets. I would again 'and again admonish the reader, not to pass over the 'superscriptions to the epistles of Paul in a slight man'ner; as he uses, in them, with a sort of inimitable 'brevity, to embrace the sum of the mystery of the 'Gospel: so that, while these are preserved, the church 'possesses that which she may oppose to all heretics.' (Beza.)

V. 2. (Marg. Ref. Note, 1 Tim. 1, 2.)

V. 3—5. The apostle returned hearty thanks, on Timothy's account, to the one living and true God, whom he worshipped, after the manner of his pious progenitors in successive ages, from Abraham to that time; or according to the revelations of a Saviour vouchsafed to them. For indeed they all looked forward to the Messiah, and served God with a believing regard to him; though their descendents had rejected and crucified him, and now persecuted those who believed in him. The apostle had indeed formerly been a leader of these persecutors: but his conscience was now purged from dead works by the atoning blood of Christ, and made tender and well informed by divine grace; so that he served God conscientiously and cheerfully, with spiritual worship and believing obedience. He was especially thankful, that he was enabled continually to remember Timothy in his fervent and frequent prayers, by night and by day; being mindful of the tears which he shed, as expressive of his love and sorrow when they last separated; and longing greatly for another interview, which he was assured would fill his own heart with joy and satisfaction. This persuasion arose from his recollection of the unfeigned faith which Timothy's whole conduct had manifested to dwell in him, and to influence and sanctify his heart. This was the same precious faith that had first been communicated to his grandmother Lois, and to his mother Eunice. These pious women seem to have "waited for the consolation of "Israel," before they heard the Gospel, and thus were prepared to receive it: having diligently given Timothy a religious education, it greatly conduced to his being made partaker of the same faith, as the apostle was fully persuaded concerning him. (Note, iii. 14—17.) It is not unlikely, that Timothy accompanied the apostle to Miletus, and parted with him there, accompanying the Ephesian elders when they returned to Ephesus.

[c] his prisoner: but [d] be thou partaker of the afflictions of the Gospel, [e] according to the power of God;

9 Who [f] hath saved us, and [g] called us with an holy calling, [h] not according to our works, but [i] according to his own purpose and grace, [k] which was given us in Christ Jesus, [l] before the world began;

10 But is [m] now made manifest by the appearing of [n] our Saviour Jesus Christ, [o] who hath [p] abolished death, [q] and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel:

V. 6—8. (Note, 1 Tim. iv. 14.) The spiritual gifts conferred by the laying on of the apostle's hands, probably at Timothy's ordination, ought to be exercised in the performance of the ministry intrusted to him. The apostle therefore reminded him to "stir up the gift of God that "was in him," by meditation, prayer, and diligence, as the fire is stirred, and so made to glow, when fuel hath been laid upon it. Thus love, zeal, and compassion for souls, being brought into vigorous exercise, he would be animated to improve his talents, and fulfil his ministry with ardour and effect. For the Holy Spirit, whom God had given them, as established believers, was not the Author of a timid and cowardly disposition, or of slavish and discouraging fears; but, as the Spirit of adoption, he inspired their hearts with holy courage and confidence, gave vigour and energy to their spiritual affections, and endued them with strength for service or suffering: while love to Christ, his people, and all mankind, animated them to self-denying and perilous labours; and a sound mind, a sober judgment, and heavenly wisdom, led them to choose the noblest ends, and to pursue them in the persevering use of the most prudent and effectual means. So that the spirit of a lively Christian was that of courage, firmness, zeal, and consistency of conduct, in the midst of persecutions and temptations. Timothy was, therefore, exhorted not to be ashamed of that testimony which he had borne to the Lord Jesus, among those who reviled and derided him: nay, he must not hesitate to avow himself the fellow-labourer and dutiful son in the faith of Paul, the despised and imprisoned apostle of Christ. On the contrary, he ought willingly to become a partaker of those afflictions, which were to be endured for the Gospel, depending for support, protection, and comfort under them, "on the power of God," which would certainly be exerted in his behalf.

V. 9. The Lord, indeed, had already saved both the apostle and his son Timothy; or brought them into a state of safety: having "called them with a holy calling;" as the Holy Spirit, by whom they were converted, was the Author of all holiness in the hearts of believers, and as the Gospel, through which they were called, was in all things of a holy tendency. This had not been "according to "their works;" for if God had dealt with them by that rule, they must have been left under condemnation: but it was "according to his purpose," of special love, and "his grace, which was given them in Christ before the "world began;" that is, his purpose of giving them grace in and through Christ Jesus, which was engaged to him as the appointed Surety of his chosen people, "from eternal "ages." Various ways of setting aside the obvious meaning of the verse, as implying personal election from the beginning, or "before eternal ages," (which is the most literal translation,) have been proposed: but, none of them can be maintained, as it appears to me, without supposing that all they, who live and die impenitent and unbelieving, may be said to be "saved and called with a "holy calling;" because a Saviour was promised from the beginning of the world. Indeed, "the purpose of God" is mentioned, as the reason why they, rather than others, were thus saved and called.

V. 10. This eternal purpose of God, respecting the calling and saving of sinners by grace given them in his Son, was at length made manifest by his appearance in human nature; when, through his righteousness, atonement, resurrection, ascension, and mediation, he abolished the reign and power of death, and deprived him of his sting and terror, in respect of all believers, who might through him face that dreaded enemy, in his most tremendous form, with comfort and confidence; being assured of the immediate entrance of their souls into glory, and a future triumphant resurrection of their bodies from the grave. By the publication of the Gospel, likewise, he had brought life, spiritual and eternal, and a state of immortal felicity, as attainable by sinners, into full light; and had given the most explicit declaration of the nature, certainty, and method of obtaining that future happiness. Whatever notions the Gentiles had of the soul's immortality, they knew nothing of the way in which eternal life might be attained by sinners; they were wholly ignorant of the meaning annexed to the words, "life and immortality," in scripture: their speculations served only for amusement or disputation, being blended with error and fable, involved in obscurity and uncertainty, and utterly inefficacious on their practice. The Jews indeed had a revelation in the Old Testament, both of a future state and the resurrection of the body. But it was far less full and explicit than in the New Testament; it was chiefly confined to one small nation; and it was very imperfectly understood and believed even by them. So that whatever had been conjectured, or believed, previous to the coming of Christ, concerning a future state, it might properly be said, that "he had brought life and immortality to light by the "Gospel:" the doctrine respecting it was placed in the most convincing and interesting light; every proper question about it was satisfactorily resolved: and the whole was suited to answer the most important practical purposes. Indeed, after all modern improvements and metaphysical demonstrations, all influential belief of the immortality of the soul, and a future state of retribution, rests wholly on divine revelation; as well as that of the resurrection of the body, and the way of a sinner's acceptance. If indeed it could be demonstrated that the soul is naturally capable of immortality, yet it cannot be proved, except from immediate revelation, that almighty God will not terminate its existence, especially as it is forfeited by sin; or that he will not make every sinner miserable in his immortality: and it serves to enhance our value for the oracles of God, when we clearly perceive the insufficiency of the oracles of reason in the most important concerns.

V. 11, 12. St. Paul had been constituted a preacher, and an apostle, of the Gospel before described, that he might instruct the Gentiles in the way to immortal life and happiness: but instead of receiving honour and affluence, as a recompense for his labours, he suffered all kinds of injuries, and was then in prison as a criminal, in continual expectation of an ignominious death. He was not, however, in the least ashamed of having engaged and spent so many years in the service of that Saviour, whom men thus despised: for he knew, by faith, divine teaching, and happy experience, the power, faithfulness, and love of him, in whom he had believed: and, as he could not doubt of his compassion and kindness, so he was fully persuaded of his authority and ability to take care of him in all events. He had intrusted his life, his soul, and his eternal interests, into his hands, as a precious deposit. He had discovered especially the value and danger of his immortal soul; he had been convinced that none else could effectually deliver and secure it through the trials of life and death; and that Jesus both could and would: he had therefore long before, and by renewed and constant application to him from time to time ever since, intrusted it in his hands by faith and prayer; to be washed, justified, and sanctified, and at last to be produced complete in holiness, and meet for glory. What he might pass through by the way, he knew not; but he was persuaded, that Christ was fully able to keep the precious deposit to that day, to which he continually had respect, as the grand accomplishment of all his hopes; when his beloved Lord would again appear in glorious majesty to judge the world. His most important interests, therefore, being thus secured beyond the reach of all enemies, he was prepared to endure ignominy, pain, and death, without shrinking; hoping to commit his departing soul into his Saviour's hands, even as Jesus himself had commended his spirit into those of his heavenly Father. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13, 14. After the above animating declaration of his own experience in the midst of sufferings, and the prospect of a violent death, the apostle exhorted his beloved Timothy to hold fast, in a steadfast profession and by faithful preaching, "the form of sound words," the substance of evangelical truth, which he had heard of him; and of which he perhaps had given him some compendious epitome. This he must do in the exercise of faith and love, by which the soul has communion with Christ, and receives communications from him, and so holds the truth in a vital and efficacious manner; and he must thus guard himself, and others, against the innovations, which false teachers were introducing by unsound and specious words. That good thing, the ministerial charge, or the Gospel committed to his stewardship, he was exhorted thus to keep, observe, and fulfil, without turning aside from it on any account: but he must do this "by the Holy Ghost, which dwelt in them;" in dependence on his sacred influences, sought by constant prayer, and by compliance with them; 'adhering closely to the words and phrases, in which the apostle had taught the doctrines of the Gospel. The teachers in modern times, who, in explaining the articles of the Christian faith, use phrases different from the scripture-phraseology, would do well to attend to this apostolical injunction.' (Macknight.)

V. 15. The caution above given was the more needful for Timothy, as he must have heard that all they who were in Asia had turned away from him. Some understand this of those ministers and Christians, who had been natives of Asia professing Christianity, and with the apostle at Rome, but who had shamefully deserted him in the season of his greatest danger. Others suppose the apostle to mean, that the churches in Asia, (or that district of which Ephesus was the metropolis,) had withdrawn their regard from him, being perverted by heretical teachers. Some indeed interpret it of the Judaizing teachers; but they who had always openly opposed the apostle could not be said to be turned away from him. These, however, and other false teachers, probably had succeeded to alienate many of the apostle's converts. Yet the first interpretation seems to be the true one. The expression, "Thou knowest," may only mean, 'No doubt thou hast heard;' and to mention two individuals, of whom better hopes had been formed to Timothy, while resident in Asia, and witnessing the defection of many churches, seems wholly unnatural.

V. 16—18. Onesiphorus was, no doubt, an exception to what had before been said concerning those of Asia; and it is probable he resided at Ephesus; where his family then was, while he was at Rome, at a distance from them. The apostle therefore prayed for them separately: for Onesiphorus, by his company and assistance, had greatly refreshed and enlivened his spirits, and had not been ashamed of being known to be his friend when he wore a chain, as many others had been. He had bestowed much pains to find out the place of St. Paul's confinement, and had at last succeeded. This shows that the apostle's imprisonment was more close and severe than before; so that Christians in general scarcely knew where he was, and were afraid to inquire after him. (Marg. Ref.) He therefore prayed, that Onesiphorus might find mercy in the day of Christ: for Timothy knew in how many things he had served him at Ephesus, and ministered to his wants; and he had now proved the genuine constancy of his affection. The eager manner in which the Papists catch at the unfounded notion, that Onesiphorus was dead, because the apostle prayed separately for his household, and yet that he afterwards prayed for him also, shows how entirely destitute their practice of praying for the dead is of scriptural proof; and how glad they would be to meet with some countenance for it in the word of God, if that could be done.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The promise of eternal life to sinners, who believe in Jesus Christ, is the leading subject in the preaching of those ministers, who are employed "according to the will "of God:" and though outward dispensations vary, yet his real people have in every age substantially the same religion, and serve God, after the manner of their forefathers and predecessors, with a pure conscience; being partakers of the same "grace, mercy, and peace, from "God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ." The tears of loving Christian friends, when separated at the call of duty, make way for their fervent prayers for each other; their earnest desires of meeting again on earth, lead to the cheerful hope of a blessed re-union in heaven, and the fulness of joy to which they will then be admitted; and their remembrance of the clear evidences of unfeigned faith, which they have witnessed in each other, excite their thanksgivings to God for his grace bestowed upon them. The pious instructions and fervent prayers of believing parents, are often the means of conversion to their children; yet such as enjoy this advantage should be reminded, that they will derive no benefit from the unfeigned faith of the nearest relations, unless the same dwell in them also. We ought to remind those of whom we have the best opinion, "to stir up the gift of God that is in "them," and to occupy with it in the duties of the stations allotted them. The new nature communicated in regeneration tends to liberty, and victory over the fear of man; and of those reproaches, contumelies, and injuries, which may be expected in the path of duty: whenever, therefore, we find our hearts discouraged, our hands weakened, or our earnestness in the work of the Lord abated, we should ascribe it to the remains of unbelief and a carnal mind, and to the temptations of Satan; and we should strive more fervently in prayer for supplies of the Spirit of Christ, to invigorate our faith and hope, to "shed abroad "the love of God in our hearts," to animate us with zeal and holy affections, and to produce in us a sound mind and heavenly wisdom. (Note, Phil. i. 9—11.) Then we shall not be ashamed of the testimony of the Lord, but glory in it, even among his most scornful enemies; we shall not hesitate to join ourselves to his most despised and persecuted servants; and we shall willingly become partakers of the afflictions of the Gospel, in dependence on the power of God to support and comfort us. In proportion as "the Spirit witnesseth with our spirits, that we "are the children of God," and we know, "that he hath "saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his purpose and "grace given us in Christ, before the world began;" we shall feel ourselves constrained by love to devote ourselves and all our talents to his glory; thus we shall manifest the holy nature of our calling, and of that doctrine, which is so much opposed and abused by the pride and carnality of the human heart.

V. 10—18.

We should bless the Lord continually for the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, for what he hath done and suffered to abolish death, and for his Gospel, by which he hath brought life and immortality to light. As we have such decisive assurance of a future state, such full information concerning the nature of it, and so clear a prospect of immortal felicity, by faith in Him, "who is the Resur-"rection and the Life," let us give the more diligence in making our personal interest in his salvation sure to our souls; and let such of us, as are appointed to publish these important tidings to mankind, and to instruct the nations in the truths of Christ, prepare for sufferings, knowing that his most honoured servants have always been most conformed to him in this respect. If then we be despised and persecuted for "this cause," let us not give place either to fear or shame; for he, in whom we have believed, is able to bear us out, and to keep us safe to that day, when he shall appear to perfect our felicity. The hope of the meanest real Christian, rests on the same basis with that of the greatest apostle. He too hath learned the value and danger of his soul, and his eternal interests; he intrusts them, by daily faith and prayer, in the Redeemer's hands, as the only security with which he can be satisfied. He too hath believed in him, and hath some experience of his power, truth, and compassion; the answers which he hath received to his prayers, and the change that hath been wrought in his soul, increase and confirm his confidence; and thus he is "persuaded that the Lord Jesus will preserve him unto his heavenly kingdom," whatever dangers, trials, and enemies, he may meet with in his way thither. In order to possess this good hope, we must adhere steadfastly to the form of sound words, which the apostles have taught us; not only rejecting new notions, but new expressions; which are often employed to exalt one part of religion, by drawing the attention from others of equal importance. We must also be careful to hold even an orthodox creed, "in faith and love which are in "Christ Jesus:" this, as well as ministerial faithfulness, must be attempted "by the holy Spirit which dwelleth "in us;" and will never be performed by those who trust in their own hearts and lean to their own understandings. We need not wonder that self-wisdom, and a contempt of the influences of the Holy Spirit, united with a dislike to the humbling truths of the Gospel, and to bearing the cross for Christ's sake, should turn so many in these latter ages from regarding the writings of the apostles, as similar causes turned many from them, when the apostles were living, and confirming their authority and doctrine by the most undeniable miracles! But if others choose to follow the example of Phygellus and Hermogenes; let us copy that of Onesiphorus, by seeking out, refreshing, and ministering to the afflicted servants of Christ; not being ashamed of their poverty or disgrace, though laid in dungeons or work-houses; and doing them all the good we can with a constant affection for the Lord's sake. Then shall we have an interest in their prevailing prayers; we may hope for the mercy of God upon our families; and may rest assured of "finding mercy of the Lord in that "day," when we shall most know its unspeakable value. And let those, who are thus comforted and relieved by their brethren, not be backward to acknowledge their obligations, nor negligent in praying for them, and all their connexions.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. The apostle next exhorted his beloved son Timothy, to be bold and vigorous in preaching "the grace that was in Christ" for sinners, or to be strong in dependence on the grace of Christ. In order to continue and spread the knowledge of the Gospel among men, he directed him to commit those doctrines, which he had heard from him concerning the Lord Jesus, and his atonement, resurrection, ascension, intercession, and salvation, in the presence of many witnesses, (or by many witnesses, who all concurred in attesting them,) "to faithful men, "who might be able to teach others also." This does not indeed prove, that the people had no concern in the appointment of their own pastors, or of ministers to preach the Gospel in dark places; but it shows that Timothy had a superintending authority; and was empowered to take heed that none should be appointed, except faithful men, able to instruct others also. It can scarcely be supposed that there was any competition at that time. The apostles, and those sent by them, would, doubtless, select the most suitable persons, and the people would cordially acquiesce in their choice. The communication of divine truth to mankind, by a succession of witnesses, from age to age, was thus effectually provided for.

8 [s] Remember that [t] Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, was [u] raised from the dead, [x] according to my Gospel:

9 Wherein [y] I suffer trouble, [z] as an evil-doer, even unto bonds: [a] but the word of God is not bound.

10 Therefore, [b] I endure all things [c] for the elect's sakes, that they may also [d] obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus, [e] with eternal glory.

V. 3—7. Timothy was again called on to consider himself as the good soldier of Christ. Having enlisted under his banner, he was bound to follow him, and obey his orders; he must be ready to expose his life in the cause of the Gospel, and at all hazards to endeavour to promote it. As therefore soldiers, in actual service, must expect toil and hardships, as well as danger, so he ought to be prepared for sufferings and difficulties of every kind. And as no man, who engaged in the military life, entangled himself with the management of husbandry, or commerce, but left these employments to others, that he might be wholly at liberty to please the commander under whom he served, and so to obtain preferment and honour; so Timothy must not engage in any secular business, or any of the affairs of life, so as to interfere with his pleasing Christ, who had chosen him to be his soldier, and was able abundantly to make up all losses to him. It is plain from Paul's own example, that ministers may, on some occasions, earn their bread by labour; but this widely differs from seeking to grow rich by trade, or such employments as engross the mind and time, and introduce ministers into such connexions, and involve them in so many pecuniary engagements, as greatly endanger their own characters and the honour of the Gospel. The original word means negotiations, rather than affairs. In the public games, also, the man who strove for mastery was not crowned victor, unless the contest had been managed according to prescribed rules; it therefore behooved Timothy and his brethren to regulate their diligence and earnestness by the word of God, otherwise they could not expect the conqueror's crown. And as the husbandman must first labour, before he partakes of the fruits of the field, so they must first diligently and patiently execute their ministry, before they received the gracious recompense. This is the most obvious construction and meaning of the verse; but it may signify, that the labouring husbandman must first be supported by the fruits of the earth, or he cannot perform his work; nor can the office of the ministry be duly exercised, except by those who live on Christ themselves, as well as preach him to others. Timothy ought therefore well to consider these illustrations; for thus the Lord would give him understanding in respect of all things pertaining to his work and circumstances. Thus it may be explained; though our version renders it as a prayer for him.

V. 8—13. Amidst all dangers and sufferings, it behooved Timothy to "remember Jesus Christ," the promised Saviour, "of the seed of David, who had been "raised from the dead." This seems the proper translation; for Timothy was not only called on to remember, and preach to others, the resurrection of Jesus, but all the sufferings which preceded this great event, and his conduct under them. (Notes, Heb. xii. 1—3.) This could not fail to suggest proper motives and encouragements to perseverance and constancy. For preaching that Gospel, which related to these great events, St. Paul was then suffering trouble as a malefactor, even unto bonds, and in prison; yet as the word of God was not bound, but was successfully preached by numbers, he was well satisfied, nay, he exulted with joy. For he willingly endured all things that he was called to suffer, from love to the elect of God; and in order to be an instrument in bringing those to complete deliverance from all evil, and the enjoyment of eternal glory, for whom Christ had shed his precious blood. Thus he at once sought their salvation and his own: for it was a faithful saying, (probably in frequent use among Christians) that if they were indeed dead with Christ, to sin and the world, and ready to die for his Gospel, they would assuredly live with him in that glory, which he entered on after his crucifixion and resurrection; if they denied him from dread of sufferings and death, or any other carnal motive, and persisted in this denial, Christ would also deny them, and leave them to perish with his enemies; if they dared not to rely on his word, would not credit his testimony, or were unfaithful to him, they would ruin themselves; but he would still abide faithful to his covenant-engagements to his true disciples, and true to his word of executing vengeance on unbelievers. For he could not deny himself, or act contrary to his word, and his own essential and divine perfections, out of partial favour or weak compassion; so that it behooved them all to "hold fast the "beginning of their confidence steadfast to the end."

V. 14—18. Timothy was directed to remind Christians, and ministers, of the important practical truths before stated; and to charge them most solemnly, as in the presence of the Lord, not to strive and dispute about words, and such frivolous matters, as the love of controversy magnified into important distinctions. These disputes could answer no good purpose; but, on the contrary, they tended to subvert the hearers; perplexing them about empty speculations, feeding their self-conceit and contempt of others, and drawing them off from the simplicity of faith and obedience. At the same time, Timothy was enjoined studiously to endeavour to approve himself, in the sight of God, in all his conduct and ministrations; he was reminded to bestow pains, that he might perform his ministerial services as a workman who knew how to go about his business, and needed not to be ashamed of his performances, or afraid of having them most accurately examined. In preaching the Gospel, he must "rightly "divide the word of truth;" giving to every person his proper portion, according to his state, character, and circumstances. In this expression, the apostle is supposed by some to allude to the skill used by the priests, in cutting in pieces the victims, and dividing them according to the legal prescriptions; and by others, to refer to the conduct of those, who carve for a large company, and are peculiarly careful that no one wants what is suitable for him. To this conduct he was required to adhere: and to avoid the "profane and vain babblings," to which many paid undue attention: for, however frivolous they seemed, yet the apostle foresaw that they would increase, and produce more ungodliness among men professing Christianity. For the words of such perverters of the truth, being of a poisonous nature, would imperceptibly diffuse their noxious influence, till they had eaten out the life and power of true religion: even as a gangrene spreads in the human body, till it corrupts and destroys the whole of it. Of these vain disputers there seem to have been various descriptions: but the apostle mentioned Hymeneus and Philetus in particular, who had wandered far from the truth of the Gospel; for they explained the doctrine of the resurrection in a mystical and allegorical manner; as if it only meant the introduction of a new dispensation, or some moral change in men's characters, which were events in themselves, or in respect of Christians, already past; and thus they denied the future resurrection of the dead. (Notes, 1 Cor. xv. 1—19. 1 Tim. i. 19, 20.) In this manner they had perverted the faith of some, and seduced several into fatal heresies, who had once made a promising profession of the Gospel. Rightly dividing, &c. 'Let 'him pass over nothing that should be said; let him add 'nothing of his own: let him mutilate, tear in pieces, and 'wrest nothing: finally, let him diligently consider what 'the hearers are capable of receiving, and what conduces 'to edification.' (Beza.)

V. 19. Notwithstanding those apostacies and delusions, by which many were ruined, it ought to be firmly believed, that "the Foundation of God stood sure." Some have interpreted this of the doctrine of the resurrection, and others of election; but Christ himself, or the promise of eternal life to every one that believeth in him, is doubtless "the Foundation of God," which the apostle meant. This stands sure; "the gates of hell cannot prevail against "it," nor can any one, who has truly built upon it, be fatally deceived. According to the ancient custom of sealing the foundation-stones of magnificent structures, and engraving some inscription upon them, this mystical Foundation had the seal of God, and a double inscription, upon it. On the one side it was engraved, as it were, for the believer's encouragement, "The Lord knoweth them that "are his;" he knows whom he hath chosen; he approves, and takes special care of those, whom he hath called, and who are his believing and obedient people; he distinguishes the meanest of them from the most specious hypocrites, and he will preserve every one of them, whilst others are deceived and perish. This is supposed by some to refer to the words of Moses, concerning Aaron and himself, in the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. (Num. xvi. 5.) On the other side it is engraven, for the admonition of all professed Christians, and to mark the characters and direct the conduct of true believers, "Let "every one, that nameth the name of Christ, depart from "iniquity." Thus men must seek the assurance of their calling and election; thus they must evidence the sincerity of their faith and love, and show their gratitude for distinguishing grace; thus they will best avoid the snares of deceivers, and mark the difference between themselves and every kind of hypocrites. (Notes, Zech. iii. 9. Matt. vii. 24—27. 1 Cor. iii. 11.)

V. 20—22. Still further to show that heresies and defections were entirely consistent with the engagements of God by his covenant to believers, the apostle observed, that in a great house, the habitation of some wealthy person, there were not only vessels of gold and of silver, but others of baser materials: the former for honourable, and the other for meaner, uses. In like manner, in the visible church, not only true Christians and faithful ministers were found, as willing instruments in the honourable work of glorifying God, and promoting the good of men; but persons also of a different character, whose hypocrisy and iniquity were over-ruled, contrary to their intentions, to fulfil his righteous purposes, though to their own ruin and everlasting contempt. If then a minister carefully purified himself from these evil things, and simply adhered to the truth and will of God, he would be a vessel of honour, sanctified, and prepared for the service of Christ, and ready to be his willing instrument in every good work. The apostle therefore warned Timothy, not only to avoid false doctrines, but "to flee youthful lusts:" both the sensual indulgences to which young persons are most liable, and also those impetuous passions, that rashness, and love of novelty or controversy, and that desire of being distinguished, to which they are equally propense: and he exhorted him to pursue every holy temper, and diligently to practise every good thing himself, as well as to inculcate them on others; especially to follow after peace with all those, who called on the Lord out of a pure heart, or in sincere faith and love, notwithstanding their infirmities, and mistakes in matters of inferior consequence.

V. 23—26. Again the apostle saw it necessary to caution his beloved Timothy against foolish and unlearned questions: such curious, presumptuous, or useless questions, as often appear to spring from a depth of discernment, reflection, and erudition; but which in fact are suggested by folly, and a want of solid acquaintance with the majesty of God, with man's true condition and character, and with other subjects of similar importance. For these questions, which different persons would resolve in different ways, must engender fierce and hostile contests among proud and obstinate disputants, which would be managed with such acrimony and mutual revilings, or even injuries, that they might be called fightings. Whatever Jewish or Gentile disputers did, "the servant of the "Lord must not strive" in this manner, or with such weapons. On the contrary, he must be gentle in his address and conduct to all men, even to the most virulent and unreasonable opposers, or perverters of the truth: he must be apt and ready to instruct men in the doctrines of Christ, with clear explanations, cool discussions, conclusive arguments and testimonies, pertinent illustrations, and kind language: at the same time he must patiently bear revilings, ridicule, and ill usage, without recrimination or resentment. Thus, in a meek, dispassionate, forbearing, and forgiving temper, he must continue to instruct such as opposed themselves, however perverse and obstinate they were, provided they would attend to the word; still hoping that "God, peradventure, would give them repentance." This might be sometimes the case; and then they would humbly receive and profess the truth, and depend on the mercy and grace of God in Christ for pardon, assistance, and deliverance. But, should this take place, the servant of God would reflect, with remorse, on the sharpness which he had shown towards those, whom the Lord had mercifully borne with, notwithstanding their provocations. He should, therefore, rather hope and wait for their coming to themselves, "awaking as from sleep," or recovering as men from intoxication; and so escaping the snare of the devil, in which he had entangled them, by his artful devices and suitable temptations, even as fowlers draw the birds into the fatal snare. That so they might recover their liberty, though taken captive by Satan, as prisoners are after a battle, who may be disposed of at the victor's will; being consigned to death, to chains, or to slavery, as he pleases. For such men would remain entirely in the power of Satan, unless God should mercifully please to give them repentance, and so effect their deliverance.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

The falls of some, and the good examples of others, should excite us to be strong in the grace of Christ, and zealous in his cause. None ought to be chosen or appointed to the sacred ministry, who are not faithful men, and competent to instruct others also: and all concerned in this important trust should be careful, to whom they commit the "stewardship of the mysteries of Christ:" for if they wilfully, negligently, or partially choose, or ordain, improper persons, they will be condemned for it before many witnesses, however they here concealed their motives or excused their conduct. The good soldier of Christ must be ready, at his Captain's word, to venture into the most

CHAP. III.

The apostle foretels grievous times, in the last days, through the atrocious wickedness of those, who would have the form, without the power, of godliness, 1—5; and the devices and opposition of false teachers, 6—9. He proposes his own example to Timothy, 10—13; exhorting him to continue in the faith, 14; and showing the excellency, authority, and sufficiency of the sacred scriptures, 15—17.

perilous situations, and to endure the extremest hardships. He ought therefore to be hardy, self-denying, and courageous; one who loves his leader, and firmy believes he can make up all losses to him, even the loss of his life, which no other prince, or general, can do for his soldiers. It is desirable that they who are engaged in this holy warfare, should be exempted from the necessity of attending to secular business: but all, who would please their Lord, must avoid whatever is not absolutely necessary, and every thing that is entangling. Whilst numbers wholly disregard these rules, some, who are active, and seem to strive for the mastery, are not careful to "strive lawfully:" for they either spend their zeal about outward forms, human inventions, and doubtful disputations, or they use unsanctified weapons, furnished by bigotry and resentment. We should also labour in patience and hope, assured "that "in due season we shall reap, if we faint not," without vainly expecting to receive our reward, till we have given proof of our persevering diligence. In all our hardships, conflicts, and temptations, we must remember the Lord Jesus, and meditate daily on his sufferings, his resurrection, and his subsequent glory. Thus we shall learn to expect trials, and be the less disquieted "if we suffer trouble as "evil doers even unto bonds;" knowing that no power can bind the word of God, or prevent the spread of the Gospel as he sees good. And if the mind of Christ be in us, we shall be willing "to endure all things, for the elect's "sake," and to promote the salvation and eternal glory of those, for whom Christ willingly laid down his life. It is a faithful saying, that if we be thus dead with Christ, we shall also live with him; if we suffer, we shall also reign with him. But he will deny before his Father's throne, those who deny him before men; and his truth as much ensures the unbeliever's condemnation, as the believer's salvation; for he cannot deny himself, and "heaven and "earth shall pass away, but his words shall not pass away."

V. 14—18.

Ministers must charge their flocks before the Lord, with great solemnity and earnestness, not to strive about words, or the Shibboleths of a party, which tend to no profit, but rather to the subverting of the hearers. In this part of our work we shall be likely to give offence; for eager controversy is exceedingly relishing to the vitiated taste of the carnal mind, which loathes plain practical instruction. We should therefore "study to show ourselves approved "to God," and to obtain his seal to our ministry: we should bestow pains to become skilful, as well as faithful, preachers, "workmen that need not be ashamed;" instructors "that know how rightly to divide the word of "truth," and to give every man the portion that belongs to him, with close application to his conscience and affections. This will lead us to a distance from profane and vain babblings, which continually increase to more ungodliness: for many a specious error is allowed, without notice, to be intruded among professed Christians, which gradually eats like a canker, and destroys the power of godliness in an imperceptible manner. Scarcely any thing hath done more mischief within the church, and among those who retain a regard for the scriptures, than the manner of Hymeneus and Philetus, in allegorizing away its plain doctrines and precepts, and so causing them to evaporate in some visionary mystical notion. This some call spiritualising; but it well answers the purpose of deceivers, (though often used by well-meaning injudicious persons.) It excites the wonder of the ignorant, and the disgust of rational men; and thus it takes off the one from the substantial part of religion, to amuse themselves with fancies; and it increases the prejudices of the other against evangelical religion. Nothing can be so crude, foolish, or evidently erroneous, but it will subvert the temporary faith of some professors of the Gospel; for of all the numberless delusions, which have been, or may be invented, there is not one, but is more congenial to the pride and lusts of men, than the simple truths of God's word.

V. 19—26.

Amidst all confusions and apostacies, "the Foundation "of the Lord standeth sure." Secure and happy are they, who build thereon by an obedient faith! He knows them as his own people; and they may know this themselves, by their diligent care to depart from iniquity, and to honour the name of Christ by a holy conversation. These are the vessels of gold and silver, which the Lord hath "before pre-"pared unto glory," whom he hath "sanctified and made "meet for his own use, and ready for every good work:" and when the vessels of dishonour shall be consigned to destruction, these will be "filled with all the fulness of "God." Let us then seek to be cleansed from all filthiness of flesh and spirit: let young Christians and ministers flee from youthful lusts: let all "follow after righteous-"ness, faith, love, peace, with all them that call on the "Lord out of a pure heart:" and let the frequent repetitions of the apostle teach us the vast importance of avoiding foolish, curious, and frivolous questions, and whatever can produce strifes and angry controversies. Alas! how little has it been remembered, that "the servant of the "Lord must not strive, but be gentle towards all men, "apt to teach, patient!" Numbers seem to think that the reverse should be his character and conduct, and that zeal for doctrinal truths is incompatible with gentleness, meekness, patience, and love! This predilection for controversy, both in teachers and hearers of the Gospel, is one grand hinderance to our recovering sinners out of the snare of the devil; for to exasperate opposers is by no means the way to convince them. The artful enemy of our souls knows how to bait his hook, and spread his net for men, according to their different tastes, humours, and situations. He conceals the danger, and allures them with the prospect of gain or pleasure. They suspect not the deception, till they have swallowed the bait, or are caught in the net: then they are "taken captive by him at his will;" and they sometimes appear under a kind of necessity of proceeding in their ruinous courses. Yet, some are recovered from out of the snare: for when God gives them repentance, they come to themselves, they acknowledge the truth, they confess their guilt, they cry for mercy and deliverance, they obtain pardon and grace, they are set at liberty, and walk in newness of life; and Satan can never more regain his dominion over them. There is no peradventure in respect of the readiness of God to pardon those, who do repent; but we cannot tell whether he will give repentance to those, who still continue to oppose his will: yet, as he sometimes gives it even to the most obstinate of his enemies, it is our duty to hope and pray for them; and in meekness to instruct them, as long as we have the opportunity. And, if any feel themselves taken captive by Satan, and long for deliverance, let them remember, that they can never recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, except by acknowledging the truth of God in the Gospel; that this they never can do without repentance; that repentance is the gift of God; and finally, that they must ask it of him by earnest persevering prayer.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—5. The apostle foresaw, and gave warning to Timothy, that in the last days, or under the Christian dispensation, perilous or grievous times would arrive; in which it would be extremely difficult for Christians to escape the contagion of bad examples and corrupt principles, or for ministers to preach the unadulterated truth of the Gospel; and in which they, who retained their integrity, would be exposed to the hatred and persecution of their professed brethren. For, while the love of Christ, of one another, and of all men, distinguished real Christians from others, a race was about to arise, who would in general "be lovers of their own selves," in a carnal, inordinate, and exclusive manner; being covetous and greedy in getting and keeping wealth at any rate, and idolatrously trusting in it. They would be "vain-glorious "boasters," and "proud," of their abilities, attainments, and supposed merits; blasphemers of the perfections, truths, and ways of God; disobedient to their parents; ungrateful to the Lord, and their earthly benefactors; unholy and profane, ready to violate promises and covenants, being unfaithful to every trust reposed in them; false accusers of others, in order to find a pretence for persecuting them; given up to the excessive indulgence of their appetites; fierce and savage in their tempers; not loving, but despising good men and good things; betrayers of those who trusted them; of a seditious and turbulent spirit respecting their rulers; rash and impetuous; haughty and imperious; and lovers of sensual or dissipated pleasures, rather than lovers of God; delighting in these gratifications, and not in the Lord and his holy service. Yet, along with all these hateful vices, they would retain "the form "of godliness," professing Christianity, attending on sacred ordinances, and pretending to be religious; whilst they renounced "the power of it;" and at least practically denied, that it ought to have any sanctifying influence on their affections, tempers, and conduct. From persons of this character Timothy was directed to turn away, and to have no fellowship with them. We are not to suppose that the same individuals would answer to the whole of this description; but men would arise, called Christians, who would be guilty of these vices: some being more notorious in one way, and some in another, even as the heathens were, and differing from them only in name. (Notes, Rom. i. 29—32.) Such persons have abounded within the visible church in every place, and through all succeeding ages hitherto; and some have been found even among those, that most zealously contended for the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel. Many such were soon perceived in the primitive church; but things grew worse and worse, (13,) till the grand antichristian apostacy was produced. The selfishness, enormous covetousness, high swelling words of vanity, and blasphemous claims and titles of the church of Rome, have generally been supposed to be pointed at in an especial manner. Their countenancing children to disobey their parents, and parents to withdraw their natural affection from their children, in order the more readily to replenish their religious houses; their disregard of the most solemn leagues and covenants, and want of all faith and mercy towards those whom they falsely accused of heresy; their enmity against true Christians; the licentiousness countenanced by indulgences and dispensations; their fierce persecutions; their arrogant conduct towards princes and emperors; have certainly exceeded every other corruption of Christianity that hath yet appeared: yet they have always maintained, and been very exact and pompous in their "form of godliness." It seems almost self-evident, that the apostle foretells what the state of things would be in the visible church, and among the professors and ministers of Christianity. No doubt, the Jews, just before the destruction of Jerusalem, answered in many things to the description here given; and so do numbers of protestant Christians, so called at this day. There was, however, no occasion to warn Timothy to "turn away from" persecuting Jews; but the mystery of iniquity was already working, and it was necessary for faithful ministers to protest against it in the most decided manner. Without natural affection. (3.) 'The Roman clergy, being forbidden to marry, can neither have wives nor children 'openly; so they are without the affections natural to 'mankind; at least they dare not avow them.' (Macknight.) The word rendered "false accusers," (3,) is devils. The persons intended are the ministers, and as it were the mouth, of this grand accuser of the brethren, and the successors of the traitor Judas, (John vi. 70, 71. Rev. xii. 9, 10.) Lovers, &c. (4.) Or "Lovers of pleasures, rather than lovers of God." This is the literal translation. The persons intended idolized pleasure, devoting themselves to it, instead of God.

V. 6—9. There were, even in the apostle's days, men of the sort which he had described, who, in a covert manner, and with subtle insinuation, crept into families, prying into their affairs, winding themselves into confidence, gaining ascendency over the consciences, and perverting the souls of the unstable, for their own interest or that of their party. Such deceivers singled out the weakest and most credulous women, that they might take advantage of their want of information and discernment, to work upon their imaginations and passions. Their success was also chiefly among such "as were laden with sins, and led "away with divers lusts;" perhaps such as, before they professed Christianity, had been addicted to licentiousness, and not being renewed by divine grace, but merely restrained by temporary convictions, were ready to hearken to the flatteries and soothing delusions of false teachers, and to embrace a carnal self-indulgent religion, which would at once give ease to the conscience, and licence to sinful passions. There were also such as were "ever learning," bestowing pains to become acquainted with religion; but running after every new teacher, and hearkening to every novel notion, continually shifting from one thing to another, and thus "never able to come to the knowledge of the "truth." (Marg. Ref.) These were the persons whom the false teachers first assailed; and, by their insinuations and flatteries, they reduced them into a kind of captivity to them, that by their means they might accomplish their covetous, ambitious, or licentious purposes. Now as the Egyptian magicians, (whose names were reported by tradition, and by some ancient writers, to have been Jannes and Jambres,) withstood Moses by counterfeiting his miracles, and thus endeavoured to bewilder Pharaoh's mind, that he might not regard the message of JEHOVAH; so these false teachers withstood the truth, by deceiving men with a false Gospel and various lying pretences; being corrupt and depraved in their minds, alienated from the faith of Christ, and rejected by God as hypocrites or apostates. But they would not be able to proceed any further in their opposition to the Gospel, than the limits prescribed to them in the wisdom of God; and at length their folly would be published to all men, even to their most devoted adherents; as that of the magicians was, when the bile was upon them as well as on the other Egyptians. (Note, Ex. ix. 11.)

V. 10—13. As a contrast to the base spirit of the deceivers before-mentioned, the apostle called Timothy's attention to his own conduct and ministry. He had had full opportunity of knowing accurately the doctrine, which he had preached in every place, the manner in which he had lived, the leading aim and purpose which he had pursued in the most determined manner, with every particular, concerning his spirit, conduct, and ministry; and he had attained to a full acquaintance with them. He had especially observed the patience, with which he had endured persecutions in several places. It is highly probable, that Timothy was converted to Christianity during the apostle's first progress through the cities of Asia Minor, (Notes, Acts xiii. xiv. xvi.—1—3;) and that he was an eye-witness of St. Paul's sufferings at that time. This satisfactorily accounts for his mentioning these persecutions, rather than more recent ones, which Timothy had not witnessed. Antioch in Pisidia is meant. Indeed, it was a general rule, that if any man was determined to live a godly life, in dependence on the atonement and grace of the Lord Jesus, and according to his precepts, he would certainly be exposed to persecution. A form of godliness, without any direct connexion with the doctrine of faith in a crucified Saviour; or a profession of that faith, without the example of a godly life, might be endured and tolerated: but the open profession of "the truth as it is in "Jesus," and a resolute attention to all the duties of vital godliness, would excite the scorn and enmity of mankind; nor could any abilities, amiableness, or beneficence, secure a man from some effects of their persecuting animosity.—Instead of matters taking a more favourable turn, the apostle predicted that wicked men and seducing teachers would grow more and more subtle, daring, callous, malicious, cruel, covetous, and ambitious; deceiving others, and being themselves deceived, by their own delusions and by Satan's wiles. The history of the Christian church, through all the subsequent ages, forms an awful demonstration, that he spake as he was moved by the Holy Spirit: so that all the declamations of infidels against the impostures, persecutions, wars, massacres, and mischiefs, occasioned by Christianity, are only so many attestations to the truth of that religion, which is contained in the holy scriptures, and in the profession and lives of a remnant through every age; and they bear against nothing but that spurious Christianity, which was long before condemned by the Spirit of prophecy. The individual deceivers, whom the apostle in the preceding verses described, would soon be put to shame: but others, succeeding them in the same course, would, from age to age, carry on a similar plan of deception, with more diabolical subtlety and iniquity; being themselves deceived by Satan, while employed by him to deceive mankind. The original word, for "seducers," signifies magicians, or enchanters, such as Jannes and Jambres had been: that is, men who, by lying pretences to miraculous powers, opposed that Gospel, which had been confirmed by real and indisputable miracles. Now it scarcely admits of a doubt, what company of men, since the apostle's days, have most exactly answered this description. (Note, 2 Thes. ii. 9—12. Rev. xiii. 11—17.)

V. 14—17. The apostle, applying what he had before stated, called on Timothy vigilantly to maintain, and persevere in, the profession and preaching of that doctrine which he had learned, and assuredly believed; knowing that he had received it from the Lord through his ministry, and remembering that it accorded to the holy scriptures, with which he had from his childhood been acquainted.—These, when properly understood, were sufficient to render him wise unto salvation, and to instruct him in all things pertaining to it; as they all spake of the promised Messiah, and prepared the mind for receiving him in faith, and submitting to his authority. For all the writings of Moses and the prophets were given by inspiration of God, to instruct men in divine things: and every part of them was not only perfect truth, but profitable, to teach them sound doctrine respecting God and themselves, the eternal state, the way of acceptance, and other interesting and difficult subjects; to reprove and convince them of their errors and sins, that they might learn their guilt and danger, and so value and embrace the remedy proposed; to correct and regulate their affections, dispositions, and conduct; and to instruct them in every part of universal righteousness, with the obligations, motives, and encouragements to it.—Thus they were suited, and sufficient, not only to make the Christian wise unto salvation, and to direct his whole behaviour, but to perfect "the man of God," the faithful minister of Christ; and fully to supply him with knowledge and wisdom, and whatever could tend to his fitness for every good work, in his private conduct, and public services. Doubtless this is still most emphatically true of the sacred scriptures, now the canon of the New Testament also is completed. The Old Testament, almost entirely in its present form, was called by the Jews, "The "scriptures," or, "The Oracles of God:" now, if every thing, which Christ and his apostles spoke on the subject, was exactly calculated to confirm them in this opinion, and to discredit all traditional revelations; and if the apostle here expressly declares, that the whole was divinely inspired; what are they about, who, as professed friends to Christianity, and in the office of pastors and rulers of the Christian church, labour indeed to persuade men that the books of Moses, and other parts of the Old Testament, are genuine and authentic, but speak so ambiguously on the point of their being divinely inspired, as to leave their readers in general to suppose, that they do not believe them to be so; or that this is a matter of subordinate consequence?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The descent of a stone to the earth is not more natural, than men's propensity to turn away from God; so that, whatever means are used to bring them to love him and one another, the end will not be attained, unless by the continual influence of his new-creating Spirit. We need not, therefore, wonder, that, in the last days, under the fullest external revelation which God hath made to man, perilous times soon came, and professed Christians became "lovers of themselves, lovers of money, of honour and "of pleasure, rather than lovers of God." Our land at

CHAP. IV.

The apostle solemnly charges Timothy to be diligent and faithful in his ministry, 1, 2; as ere long men would not endure sound doctrine, 3, 4; and as he, Paul, had nearly finished his work, was about to suffer martyrdom, and receive the crown of righteousness, 5—8, he presses Timothy to come to him, and to bring Mark with him, as he was almost left alone; and gives him information, direction, and caution, in several particulars, 9—15. He shows Timothy how his brethren had forsaken him, and how the Lord had supported him, when called to answer before his persecutors; expressing his confidence in him for the future, 16—18; and concludes with salutations and benedictions, 19—22.

this day abounds with such nominal disciples as are here described; some are selfish and covetous; others proud boasters and blasphemers, or regardless of their duty to parents or children, relatives and rulers, being unthankful and unholy; others are slanderous, treacherous, intemperate, licentious, fierce, implacable, despisers of good men, traitors, heady, high-minded; and who can number those, " who are lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of " God?" Can any man seriously think that these crimes are less abominable in men called Christians, than they were in heathens? Can any one doubt that they will be more terribly punished? In fact, in proportion to the zeal and exactness with which the form of godliness is retained, when the power of it is denied, the more criminal and dangerous men become, and the more should they be avoided and protested against. For when any form or notion of religion is made a cloak or an excuse for wilful transgressions of God's law, the danger becomes greater than from men who openly cast off all regard to God. Hypocrisy, superstition, enthusiasm, and antinomianism, are infectious beyond other mental maladies; the poisonous draught is most dangerous, when mingled to resemble some valuable medicine; and a wolf in sheep's clothing is most dreadful to the unsuspecting flock. Of this genus, (which is divided into various species, popish and protestant, ancient and modern, learned and unlearned,) there have ever been artful men, who have insinuated themselves, by pompous or plausible pretensions and flatteries, into the favour and confidence of the weakest, most credulous, most ignorant, and imaginative of the human species; and who have taken them captive, by soothing them into quietness, " when " laden with sins, and led away with divers lusts." Those weak and deluded persons, who want a safe and comfortable religion, without self-denial, humiliation, and mortification of their lusts, " are ever learning, and never " able to come to the knowledge of the truth," and readily fall in with artful and interested deceivers of every description. For as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses by aping his miracles, so do such men resist the truth by a counterfeit Gospel, and by substituting visions, superstitions, or curious speculations, instead of repentance, faith, and holy obedience. Such delusions act like opiates; they lull the conscience into a pleasing sleep, and increase the disease; and they are administered by men of corrupt minds, who are reprobate concerning the faith, of whom all should beware. But, though it is grievous to perceive that " evil men and seducers grow worse and worse, de" ceiving and being deceived;" yet we may rejoice that they cannot exceed their limits, that they cannot fatally delude the upright believer; and that, at length, their folly will be made manifest to all men, as that of their predecessors has been.

V. 10—17.

In order to escape and expose every seduction, let us study to become well acquainted with the doctrine and example of the apostle; let us copy his manner of life, " his purpose, faith, long-suffering, charity, and patience;" let us frequently reflect on his persecutions, supports, and deliverances; let us count our cost, and know assuredly, that " if any man will live godly in Christ Jesus, he must " suffer persecution" in one way or another, as far as Providence will permit the enmity of men's hearts to break forth against him. Let us then continue in the things which we have learned and professed to believe, endeavouring to get further acquaintance with the holy Scriptures, " which are able to make us wise unto salvation, by " faith in Jesus Christ," who is the principal Subject both of the Old and New-Testament; and let us learn to reverence the whole Bible, as every sentence in it was given by inspiration from God, and is profitable to instruct, reprove, correct, and guide us in the way of peace and holiness. Nothing more can be wanting to render the Christian or the minister perfectly qualified for every service required of him, and thoroughly furnished unto every good work, than a complete, believing, experimental, and practical knowledge of the whole Scriptures, in their genuine meaning and connexion, and the proportion of one part to another. All religious error springs from ignorance, perversion, or misunderstanding of the Scriptures; from overlooking, objecting to, or explaining away some part of them; or from adding men's notions, inventions, superstitions, or new revelations, to them, as of equal or superior authority. The way therefore to oppose error is by promoting the solid knowledge of the word of truth, especially by the faithful preaching of the Gospel; and the greatest kindness we can do our children is, to make them early acquainted with the Bible. Thus we shall do something important, that may tend to preserve religion in the world, when we are removed out of it; and to perpetuate a succession of those, who are established in the faith, wise unto salvation, and thoroughly furnished unto every good work. ' For it is evident, that the pious endeavours of Lois and Eunice, in bringing young Timothy acquainted with the Holy Scriptures, laid the foundation of all his subsequent eminence and usefulness, in which he was inferior to none but the apostles. It is probable, that, while they were teaching the child to read, and treasure up in his memory, the Oracles of God, they little thought what a harvest in future life would spring from the seed thus sown. But the scripture warrants high expectations in this respect: and it may fairly be said, that the education of women in useful knowledge and genuine piety, in order that they might be qualified and disposed to instil good principles into the tender minds of children, would have the happiest effects towards reforming mankind, and diffusing the light of the gospel in the world.' NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—5. These repeated solemn charges of the apostle, to so zealous and faithful a minister as Timothy, most emphatically show how difficult it is to fill up this important office, in a proper manner even to the end, especially in dangerous times. Again he called on his beloved Timothy, by the authority and as in the presence of God: and in that of the Lord Jesus, who was appointed to judge the living and the dead, at his last glorious appearing to complete the design of his mediatorial kingdom, and to gather his saints into his heavenly kingdom; that he should preach the word of God as one in earnest, being "instant" and unwearied in his work, "in "season, and out of season," at stated times and occasionally, when the opportunity was more and when it was less favourable; to large congregations, in private circles, in obscure places, before friends, or enemies, to one, or to ten thousands of hearers; when it might be done with safety and credit, and when it exposed him to hardship, reproach, peril, or loss. Timothy, to whom this exhortation was given, had an infirm constitution; so that this excuse for remissness should not be too readily admitted. In thus preaching the word of God, he was charged to reprove with authority the sins and negligences of professors; to rebuke with more sharpness those that were guilty of gross evils; and so to exhort, persuade and beseech his hearers, to attend to every part of the divine message with the obedience of faith. In this he was to persevere, "with all long-suffering," though many were unruly, ungrateful, or slow to understand his instructions; and he must enforce his exhortations, by explaining and applying the doctrines of the gospel, in the simplest and most convincing manner. In these important services, he ought to be the more assiduous; as the time was about to come, when professed Christians would not endure sound doctrine, the faithful salutary truths, and practical instructions, of God's word; but, being led away with divers lusts, would be exasperated or disgusted by it; and desire a doctrine, which gave them no disturbance or offence, whilst they indulged their several inclinations. They would therefore seek for "teachers after their own lusts; and they would "heap such unto themselves," as dissatisfied, without a large number of them, to gratify their love of novelty and variety, and to keep them in countenance in their delusions. Thus their "itching ears" would be humoured and pleased: they would turn them away from the truth with contempt and disgust, and pay all their attention to cunningly devised fables and specious heresies. To oppose the progress of this corrupt leaven, which was even then beginning to work, Timothy was called upon to "be vigilant in all things," and to shun all pursuits, which might prevent him from watching against the fallacies, with which Satan and his servants would in varied ways endeavour to seduce men from the simplicity of Christ; to endure cheerfully all the afflictions, to which his zeal and faithfulness might expose him from false brethren, or avowed enemies; to perform the office of an evangelist, in the several places to which he might have access; and to make full proof of his ministry, by trying to the uttermost every method of doing good to the souls of men, in the exercise of all its duties. Timothy is said in the postscript, to have been 'ordained the first bishop of the 'church of the Ephesians:' but it seems to me at least, that the office of an evangelist was superior to that of a diocesan bishop, as exercised in the earliest ages of christianity.—The evangelists appear to have been extraordinary assistants to the apostles, exercising great authority in their absence, over the several churches which they visited: perhaps when that extraordinary office began to cease in the church, diocesan episcopacy was substituted in its place. (Marg. Ref.) 'The twelve, after Christ's departure, had 'others, whom they sent into some part of their charge.—'These, when they were employed in preaching the gos-'pel, to them that had not yet received it, the scripture 'calls Evangelists.' (Hammond.)

V. 6—8. It behooved Timothy to act with the greater vigilance and fortitude, as the apostle foresaw that he himself should shortly suffer martyrdom, and pour out his blood as a drink-offering to the honour of the Lord. For this approaching event he was ready, and he knew the time was at hand, when he should be removed out of the world, as the sojourner took up his tent and departed to another place. He considered himself as one who had finished his public ministry, and had only the concluding scene to pass through; and since the time when Christ had chosen him to be his soldier, he was conscious that he had "fought a good fight," he had valiantly contended against sin, the world, and Satan; he had, at Christ's command, through labours, perils, and sufferings, sought the subversion of the kingdom of darkness, the deliverance of Satan's captives, and the advancement of the kingdom of Christ; this he had done, with the appointed weapons of his warfare, by faithful preaching, a holy example, fervent prayers, and patient sufferings. He had "finished his course." He had set out to run the Christian race, laid aside every weight, pressed forward through every obstacle to the mark, and was now about to seize the prize. "He had also kept the faith," both in his profession, and in the execution of his important ministry. He therefore assuredly expected the "crown "of righteousness," that glory and immortality, which were prepared for all true believers in Christ, according to the measure of their grace, services, and sufferings, in his cause. This the apostle knew had been "laid up for "him," and he had little more to do, than to receive and enjoy it. The righteous Judge would openly award it to him "in that day," to which he constantly called men's attention; for, though as a sinner he merited condemnation according to the law, yet, as a believer, whose faith had been shown by his works, he was entitled to the reward of righteousness, according to the Gospel. He expected, indeed, "when absent from the body, to be present "with the Lord," and to have pre-libations of his complete felicity with "the spirits of just men made perfect;" but the public declaration of his right to the conqueror's crown, and his admission to the full enjoyment of immortal glory, would be reserved for that day, when Christ shall appear to show his righteousness, as well as his mercy, in rewarding his faithful followers, (Notes, 2 Thes. i. 5—10.) Nor was this crown of righteousness laid up for him only, or for other eminent ministers or martyrs, but for all believers, in every age and place, even for all "who love Christ's appearing;" for they all expect, prepare, and wait for his second coming; they look for their gracious recompense from him at that period; they endure hardships, and deny themselves worldly pleasures and interests, in hopes of that recompense; they regulate their habitual conduct, as those who believe 'that he will come 'to be their Judge;' they long to see him as he is, to be freed by him from all sin, and to witness his triumph over all his enemies, and, as far as faith and hope exclude anxious doubts of their acceptance, they love the thoughts of his appearing to raise the dead and judge the world.

V. 9—13. The apostle greatly desired Timothy to come to him, as he was solitary in his imprisonment, and had scarcely any with him whom he could employ in needful services. Demas, of whom he seems before to have judged favourably, had forsaken him in his perilous situation, "having loved this present world." He had not courage to venture his life, by continuing with the apostle under his persecutions; he loved the world too much to give up all for Christ, and perhaps some prospect of secular advantage offered itself, with which he was caught, and he departed to Thessalonica in pursuit of it. Whether he finally apostatized or not we cannot tell, but the apostle stood in doubt of him. (Note, 1 John ii. 15—17.) Two other helpers, known to Timothy, were gone to different places, about the work of the Lord, with the apostle's approbation, so that only Luke, his faithful companion in all his sufferings, continued with him. He therefore desired Timothy to bring Mark with him, who was employed in the same parts. Mark had once forsaken the apostle, having too much "loved this present world," but he had repented, and had now regained his entire confidence, and might be profitable to him for the ministry at Rome, as he had been in other places. He also informed Timothy, that "he had sent Tychicus to Ephesus." This has been deemed a decisive proof, that Timothy was not at Ephesus at that time, and indeed it greatly favours that conclusion; but, possibly, Tychicus might be sent by another way than the bearer of this epistle, and calling at other places might not arrive till afterwards, and the apostle might mean, that he had sent Tychicus to supply Timothy's place at Ephesus, that he might come to him the sooner. Among these informations and directions, we find St. Paul desiring Timothy to bring his cloak to him. If the word means a cloak, or upper garment, (as it seems to do,) which he supposed he might want at the approach of winter, it is a remarkable proof of his poverty to the end of his life, that he should need to send so far for a garment to keep him warm during the remnant of his days! What books and parchments were meant, Timothy would know, but it is vain for us to conjecture. As Troas was not in the direct road from Ephesus to Rome, this may be urged as a proof that Timothy was not then at Ephesus; but it is not certain, that he might not go by another way, to call upon some of the churches with which he was connected.

V. 14, 15. It is not certain, though probable, that this was the same Alexander, of whom we have before read. (Acts xix. 33. 1 Tim. i. 20.) The apostle, however, knew the person spoken of to be an incurable apostate, or enemy to the Gospel. Perhaps, after having been excommunicated, he openly renounced Christianity, and did every thing that he could to stir up persecution against St. Paul and the believers, and to obstruct the success of the Gospel. He therefore spake by the Spirit of prophecy, declaring that the "Lord would reward him according to his works," or denouncing this awful sentence upon him for a warning to others. We cannot certainly know who are given up to final obduracy, and must therefore persevere in praying for our enemies and persecutors. Timothy was moreover warned to beware of the malignant and subtle machinations of this wicked man; as he would do as much to injure him, and withstand his words, as he had done against the apostle and his doctrine.

V. 16—18. When the apostle was first, "after his second imprisonment," called before the emperor, (or the prefect of the city in his absence, as it is generally thought,) none of the Christians at Rome had courage to stand by him, but all forsook him, to provide for their own safety, as the apostles had done when Christ was apprehended. The cruel persecutions of the Christians at Rome, under Nero, seem to have preceded the writing of this epistle. Numbers had then been put to death or driven from the city, and the rest seem to have been greatly intimidated; so that on this important occasion none were found, who dared to attend St. Paul to the tribunal. This was a criminal weakness, the effect of unbelief; but the apostle prayed that it might not be laid to their charge. Yet, though he was deserted by man, the Lord was graciously pleased to stand with him, and make him sensible of his presence, favour, and protection; thus giving him strength of faith, courageously to bear witness to the truth before his persecutors, that so the doctrine of the Gospel might be fully known by those in authority, and by all present; and that thus it might be circulated among the Gentiles into distant nations, with the most overbearing evidence of its divine authority. Indeed, though his judge was powerful and outrageous, yet he had been for that time delivered from him, as out of a lion's mouth. Perhaps the apostle had in view that adversary, "who goeth about as a roaring "lion, seeking whom he may devour;" and who was not entirely without hope, that the fear of death would induce St. Paul to renounce the faith, and that he should thus seize upon his soul. St. Paul certainly did not expect to escape martyrdom; but he was confident that "the Lord "would deliver him from every evil work," not suffering Satan to prevail against him, to cause him to do any thing inconsistent with the honour of the Gospel, or the benefit of his soul, and "that he would preserve him to his "heavenly kingdom." Instead therefore of complaints or dejection, he was ready to ascribe "glory to the Lord for "ever and ever. Amen."

V. 19—22. Prisca, or Priscilla, and Aquila, were near to the place where Timothy resided; but, as they frequently changed their abode, this does not determine where he then was. (i. 16—18.) The apostle had probably been attended by Erastus and Trophimus, when he last parted with Timothy; but the former abode at Corinth, and the latter was left sick at Miletum, the Lord not seeing good to enable him to work a miracle for his recovery. Having again desired Timothy to come to Paul before winter, (probably apprehending that he might otherwise come too late to see him,) he concluded with repeated prayers and benedictions. Surely, every reader must be fully satisfied, from reading the close of this epistle, that St. Peter was not at Rome when it was written: if, therefore, he suffered martyrdom at the same time that the apostle Paul did, according to ancient tradition, he must have arrived at that city after this epistle had been sent. Timothy accompanied the apostle from Corinth, through Macedonia, probably to Miletus, when he went to Jerusalem before his first imprisonment at Rome. (Acts xx. 4--16.) It would therefore have been wholly superfluous to inform him concerning Erastus, if that voyage had been spoken of: and Trophimus accompanied the apostle to Jerusalem. (Acts 21--29.) Some, indeed, suppose Miletum in Crete, mentioned by Homer, to be intended: but, in that case, St. Paul must have left Trophimus there, at some time subsequent to the voyage towards Rome, in which he suffered shipwreck; for no intimation of such an event is given in the narrative. Martial, a Roman poet, who lived about this time, mentions Pudens and Claudia; and some suppose that the same persons are here meant, and that they were converted to Christianity, by the apostle, during his imprisonment.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The importance of the work of ministers, the peculiar temptations to which they are exposed, and the multiplied evil effects of their unfaithfulness or negligence, concur in rendering it needful to charge the most zealous of them, as in the presence of God and of the Lord Jesus, before whom they must shortly appear to give an account of their stewardship, that "they preach the word; instant in "season, out of season," to few, or many, as opportunities offer; like men engaged in the work, who make it their one great business and pleasure, without consulting their ease, interest, or reputation, or shrinking from hardship, reproach, or persecution; and that they reprove, rebuke, exhort, with forbearance and perseverance, with plain instructions and close application. This is the more indispensable, as the time is indeed come, when even the most of professed Christians "will not endure sound doc-"trine:" they are offended by the heart-searching, distinguishing, practical truths of God's word, which detects their sins, and shows the necessity of mortifying their peculiar lusts; and they desire to be soothed and flattered in the indulgence of them, and to have "teachers accord-"ing to them." Hence some admire emollient, complaisant, ingenious, or eloquent harangues; others prefer curious, speculative disquisitions, or virulent invectives on men of diverse sects and sentiments. Thus their consciences are quieted, and their self-preference and contempt of others are humoured, together with a curious and captious temper: and because "they have itching "ears," the pruriency of which is not easily quieted, "they heap to themselves such teachers," and always want new voices, new gifts, new notions, till their ears are wholly turned from the truth, and they are turned unto fables. This should induce those who love souls to watch in all things, to venture and endure all painful effects of their faithfulness, to take every opportunity of preaching the pure Gospel, and to make full proof of their ministry, that they may do all the good in it that they possibly can. In doing this, they should be quickened by the consideration, that their brethren, one after another, are taken away, or laid aside, and that their own term of usefulness will soon expire. In this way we may hope to be ready for the stroke of death, when the time of our departure arrives; for the diligent Christian, or faithful minister, who is conscious of having acted in good measure consistently with his profession, may with comfort say, at the close of life, "I have fought the good "fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the "faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of "righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will "give me at that day, and to all who love his appearing." The true believer will give all the praise to sovereign grace, and expect acceptance only by faith in Christ: but his conduct will prove, that "he hath loved the "Lord," who first loved him, and that he hath exercised the faith of God's elect. Such a man may therefore, amidst poverty, contempt, pain, sickness, and the agonies of death, rejoice in hope of the glory of God: but this triumphant language cannot properly be adopted, when most needed, by those who have been negligent, lukewarm, and unfaithful in the service of God, from the time of their supposed conversion. In proportion as the duties of a man's place and station are neglected, his evidence of an interest in Christ must be obscured; and uncertainty and discouragement may probably distress his closing scene.

V. 9—22.

There are various characters in the visible Church, and various changes take place among ministers. Some, who have apparently run well, are hindered, and forsake the Lord and his faithful servants, "loving this present "world:" others are recovered from grievous backslidings, and become profitable for the ministry: and not a few turn open apostates or virulent opposers, doing much harm to the servants of Christ, and greatly withstanding their words; whom the Lord will reward according to their works. Others bring their characters into doubt, or incur disgrace, by their cowardice in times of danger; and their brethren are called on to pray for them, that the Lord would not lay that sin to their charge. But a few proceed with diligence and courage in every circumstance; though no man stands by them, the Lord is with them, to strengthen and comfort them; he "gives them a mouth "and wisdom which all their enemies cannot gainsay;" he delivers them from outward dangers and enemies, as long as it is good for them; he preserves them from the mouth of the lion that would destroy their souls; and he keeps them from every evil work even unto his heavenly kingdom. Many such are now before the throne, giving glory to his name; may we be followers of them; may the Lord Jesus be with our spirits, to comfort and sanctify them; and may his grace be with all his disciples and ministers in every place! Amen.

THE

TO TITUS.

It is remarkable, that Titus, of whom the apostle repeatedly speaks in terms of the highest approbation, and most cordial affection, in his epistles ; (Marg. Ref. i. 1;) is not once mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. Nor is any thing recorded, concerning St. Paul's labours in Crete, now called Candia, a large island in the Mediterranean Sea. It is indeed probable, that the gospel was made known there at an early period ; as there were Cretes present on the day of Pentecost, to witness the stupendous miracles of that day, and to hear the unanswerable sermon of St. Peter, on that wonderful occasion. (Acts ii. 11.) If, however, any, who were then converted, on their return home made known the gospel to their neighbours ; the joyful report would reach none but the Jews and proselytes. But, no information is given us of what passed in that island, at that time, or afterwards ; except as this epistle shows, that St. Paul had laboured there with great success. Probably, this was subsequent to his first imprisonment at Rome, and before his second. He seems to have had very great success in his ministry in that island ; but by some means to have been hurried thence, before he could order the state of the Churches, in a regular manner. He, therefore, left Titus there, to settle the churches in the several cities of the island, according to the apostolical plan, in other places. Tradition and ecclesiastical records have made Titus bishop of Crete ; and, because so large an island, renowned for an hundred cities, was an extensive charge ; some have conferred on him the title of archbishop. But, I am not convinced, that even this title would not have been a derogation from his real dignity, as an evangelist. 'If by saying, Timothy and Titus were bishops, the one of Ephesus, the other of Crete, we understand that they took upon them these churches, or dioceses, as their fixed and particular charge, in which they were to preside for a term of life ; I believe that Timothy and Titus were not thus bishops : For, both Timothy and Titus were evangelists. Now the work of an evangelist, says Eusebius, was this, to lay the foundation of churches in barbarous nations, to constitute them pastors ; and, having committed to them the cultivating of those new plantations, they passed on to other countries. As to Titus, he was only left in Crete, to ordain elders in every city, and to set in order the things that were wanting. Having therefore done that work, he had done all that was assigned him in that station, and therefore St. Paul sends for him, the very next year to Nicopolis.' (Whitby.) It is, however recorded, that he afterwards returned to Crete, and died there when ninety four years of age. Dr. Whitby never doubted, nor does the author of these notes, at all doubt, but that diocesan episcopacy, was generally introduced into the churches, even during the lives of the apostles. But, the office of an evangelist of old, and that of a true missionary, at present, should be considered, as perfectly distinct from that of a bishop, and in many respects, (especially as a general commission, to preach the gospel to the nations,) superior to it. The postscript states, that the epistle was written from Nicopolis in Macedonia : but, had this been the case, the apostle would have said, " I have determined here to winter ;" not " there to winter." (iii. 12.) There were several cities called Nicopolis ; and it is not certain which is here meant. The scope and instructions of it, are similar to those of the two preceding epistles.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1—4. St. Paul was the servant of God, as he was an apostle of Christ; the former was his general character, the latter his special employment. His apostolical office accorded with the faith of God's elect, and was intended to bring numbers to believe in Christ, and to encourage, increase, and direct, the faith of those who had already believed. This he did by publicly declaring the great truths of the everlasting Gospel. Thus men would receive and profess those doctrines, which being truly believed, bring sinful men, who have been alienated from God, to reverence, trust, love, and worship him, as his obedient children and devoted servants. These truths he preached, and his converts acknowledged, amidst manifold trials, "in hope of eternal life, which God, who can-"not lie," break his word, or deceive those that trust in him, "had promised" to Christ, the Surety of his peo-"ple, before eternal ages," (Note, 2 Tim. i. 9, 10;) which purpose or promise had been concealed, or but in part revealed, in former ages; but in due time God "had "manifested it as his word," that cannot be broken, by the preaching of the Gospel which had been committed to the apostle, "according to the commandment, or appoint-"ment of God our Saviour." He therefore wrote to Titus, "his genuine son in the faith," (which was common to all true Christians,) as he had been converted by his ministry, and trained up under him for the work of an evangelist, and in his behalf he presented his usual devout desires of "grace, mercy, and peace." (Marg. Ref.) The expression, "God our Saviour," seems here to relate to the Godhead, without distinction of persons; and in some places it refers to the person of the Father, as saving us by his beloved Son, (iii. 4—6.) Some explain the words, rendered "before the world began," (literally, before eternal times,) to relate to the promise made to Adam, or to Abraham, before the promulgation of the Mosaic law. But, without engaging in any argument on the critical question, I must think that the interpretation above given is far more obvious; if indeed Christ be "the Chosen of God," the Surety and Representative of all who were given to him: eternal life was promised to him, in behalf of his people, of all, who in every age should believe in him, before the world was, in consequence of his engagement to become incarnate, and to be obedient even to the death upon the cross. "Known unto "God are all his works, from the beginning of the "world." Allow this, (and who will venture to deny it?) and then the promise of eternal life to the divine Logos, in behalf of all his people, is clear, and the meaning satisfactory, which, in my judgment at least, the other interpretations by no means are.

V. 5—9. Titus had been left in Crete, to set in order what was wanting in the government, worship, and discipline of the churches; and especially to ordain elders in every city in which there were converts to Christianity. (Notes, 1 Tim. iii. v. 21, 22. 2 Tim. iv. 5.) There were many cities in this populous island, and the apostle seems to have been very successful during his short stay there but probably many had before been converted to Christianity. The character and qualifications of these pastors, (who are called elders and bishops indiscriminately,) correspond to what hath before been considered: but, it is here added, that they ought to be such as "had believing "children." They who had children grown up, not having embraced Christianity, that were accused of riot and licentiousness, or that would not be governed and restrained from scandalous vices, were not to be admitted into the pastoral office. The pastors must be chosen from those, who had for some time professed the Gospel, (when that could be done:) but, if their children proved untractable, it would at least be thought that they did not know how to govern their own families; and the misconduct of their children might reflect disgrace upon the Christian religion, as well as weaken the hands of their parents in the public ministry. For the overseer and steward of God's household, (Note, 1 Cor. iv. 1—3.) must be an irreproachable person; and not of an over-bearing, self-willed, dogmatical temper, that could not endure to be opposed or contradicted. To the other excellencies of his character, it was needful that he should be a man who "held fast," in a steady consistent profession, "the faithful word" of the Gospel, according as it had been taught by the apostles, without having perverted or sophisticated it, as many did; that so he might be a judicious, experienced defender of its truths; able, by substantial, salutary, and holy doctrine, in every particular, to exhort the disciples to steadfastness in the faith. and to an honourable conduct; and to confute, convince, or silence gain-sayers, who opposed or corrupted the truth.

V. 10—13. The qualification mentioned in the ninth verse was the more requisite, as there were in every place, (especially in Crete,) a number of ungovernable talkers and interested deceivers, who could not be kept, by any censures or admonitions, from doing great mischief. These were of various descriptions; but the Judaizers were the most busy, unruly, and pernicious; they subverted whole families, turning them aside from the simplicity of faith in Christ, to attend on legal ceremonies and human traditions, by teaching such things as they ought not, and "this for filthy lucre's sake," rather than from mistake or ignorance. For in this manner they humoured the pride and prejudices of some, and flattered others in their sins, till they got to be the heads of a party, and found means of enriching themselves. The mouths, therefore, of these deceivers must be stopped, by sound doctrine, and conclusive arguments, and testimonies from the word of God; that the tendency of their principles, and the baseness of their designs, might be manifest to every man, and that they might have nothing to say in their own defence. The character of the Cretians indeed was so bad, that numbers of such persons, both deceivers and deceived, might be expected in their churches: for Epimenides, a native of Crete, a poet of some reputation, who might be "called a prophet of their own," and who perhaps was deemed a prophet by his countrymen, had said, "the Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, slow bel- "lies;" they had in all ages been notorious for lies, frauds, and impostures; they were like poisonous or ferocious animals, gluttonous, and indolent to excess; so that, whilst a great proportion of their time was employed in eating and drinking, they were rendered torpid and inactive, by their excesses, and made no good use of the rest. They united the subtlety of the fox, the venom of the serpent, or the fierceness of wolves and tigers, with the greediness and inactivity of swine. It is not easy to determine, from what concurrence of circumstances the Cretians obtained so odious and contemptible a national character: but the inspired apostle attested the truth of this testimony; and the effects of it appeared in the conduct of many false teachers and professors of Christianity. Titus was therefore directed "to rebuke them sharply," or with cutting reproofs and awful warnings, "that the churches might be sound in "the faith," when the mouths of deceivers were thus stopped, hypocrites detected, and unestablished Christians put upon their guard. Timothy had been taught to instruct opposers with meekness, and to rebuke with long-suffering; but Titus was ordered to rebuke with sharpness. Some have conjectured, that Timothy was too vehement in his natural spirit, and Titus too timid and pliant; others ascribe the difference to the opposite characters of the persons to be rebuked. But, in fact, Christian meekness is as distant from pusillanimous connivance at sin and error, as from impetuous anger and impatience. This the apostle's conduct, and even that of our Lord himself, demonstrates.

V. 14—16. In order to the Cretian churches being

CHAP. II.

The apostle directs Titus to instruct the people in their several duties; to exemplify them in his own conduct, and to take heed to his doctrine, 1—10: and enforces his exhortations, by showing the holy tendency of the gospel, and charging Titus to speak with authority and firmness, 11—15.

sound in the faith, Titus was to warn them with sharp rebukes, if necessary, not to give heed to Jewish fables, human traditions, or legal observances, which were then entirely the commandments of men who "turned from the "truth," and wanted to impose their own usages on Christians. These related, greatly, to distinctions of clean and unclean meats, and the pharisaical inventions of washing their hands, and other external observances. (Notes, Matt. xv. 1—20.) But to the pure, to the real believer, who had peace with God through Jesus Christ, and had his heart purified by faith, all such things were pure in themselves, and used in a holy manner, by the allowance, according to the precepts, and for the glory, of God: to those, however, "that were defiled," with the guilt and pollution of unrepented sin, and who, through unbelief, remained strangers to the purging of the conscience with the blood of Christ, "nothing was pure:" for as their hearts were unsanctified, and their consciences were erroneous, partial, callous, and unclean, so all their enjoyments and actions, however innocent or good in themselves, were corrupted by their pride, avarice, sensuality, and enmity against God. They indeed professed to know him and to be his people, but in works they denied him, and manifested a disregard to his authority, favour, and indignation: for their conduct in all respects, especially in crucifying Christ, persecuting Christians, and endeavouring to subvert the churches of the Gentiles, proved them to be abominable and disobedient; and as to every good work rejected by God, and given up to judicial blindness. The unbelieving Jews seem to be primarily intended; but the judaizing teachers were purposely included as unbelievers also, though they professed to believe.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

All who are not slaves of sin and Satan are the servants of God: "this honour have all his saints," and this dignifies their meanest employments, though the office of ministers is confined to a few, and that of apostles and evangelists to a very small number. But sinners cannot serve God, except "according to the faith of his elect" people, and by "acknowledging the truth which is after "godliness:" (Note, 1 Tim. iv. 8:) nor can they be steadfast in the midst of trials and temptations, save "in hope "of eternal life." This was promised in Christ, "be- "fore the world began:" and, though he who gave this promise can do all things else, he "cannot lie," he cannot "deny himself." In his due time, he has manifested his word of truth by preaching: and all, to whom this is committed, must take heed to publish it, "according to "the commandment of God our Saviour," that the common faith may thus be wrought in those whom they may rejoice in as their own children, and to whom, "grace, "mercy, and peace, may be given from God the Father, "and the Lord Jesus Christ, our Saviour." When a multitude of captives are brought forth from the dark dungeon of Satan into the glorious light and liberty of the Gospel, many things will be wanting, and much required to be set in order, before their worship and service can be performed in a suitable manner, the best methods used for their edification, and the most effectual defence made against the assaults of their spiritual enemies. Then the presence, counsel, and influence of some experienced and faithful servant of God will be peculiarly useful, especially in respect of the choice and ordination of pastors to preside over them and teach them. They, to whom this important trust is committed, are bound, as they shall answer for it before God, to appoint blameless and faithful men to this stewardship; such as are of pliant tempers, respecting their own humours and interests, peaceable, sober, temperate men; superior to the grovelling love of filthy lucre; lovers of hospitality and of good men; just and holy; prudent managers of domestic concerns; attentive to relative duties; constant and bold in professing the truth, as taught in the word of God, and able by sound doctrine to exhort and to convince gain-sayers. As it is peculiarly incumbent on ministers to educate their children with diligence and piety, and to rule them with prudence and firmness, so the children of ministers should consider what a dreadful account must be rendered by them, if their unbelief, riot, and unruly behaviour, bring an imputation on the characters of their fathers, and interfere with their usefulness.

V. 10—16.

In all ages there have been unruly and vain talkers and deceivers, by whom Satan sows tares in the Lord's field; and this should teach and induce the servants to be vigilant and diligent, that they may counteract the enemy. For unless the "mouths of such men be stopped," they will subvert whole families of hopeful persons, and teach the most pernicious doctrines for filthy lucre's sake. To prevent this mischief is the most difficult part of a minister's work: and his wisdom must especially be shown, in discerning men's characters, distinguishing between the weak and the wicked; and knowing when to exhort with gentleness, and when to "rebuke with sharpness, that men may be "sound in the faith." For though there are national differences of character, yet the heart of man in every time and place is deceitful and desperately wicked: and while some need the gentlest guidance, others must be exposed and warned with decided severity; or they will turn men away from the faith to fables and human inventions. The true Christian learns to exercise his liberty in a pure and holy manner; all things are pure to him, and grace teaches him "to eat, and to drink, and to do all "things to the glory of God;" and when he fails, he has humble recourse to the purifying blood and sanctifying grace of Christ. But unbelievers are defiled in their minds and consciences ; their ordinary actions and religious duties are unclean to them : whether they riot in licentiousness, as if that were liberty, or whether they enslave themselves to superstitious observances. For, alas! "numbers, of "various descriptions profess to know God, but in works "deny him ; being abominable, disobedient, and unto "every good work reprobate." Yet, at last "the tree "will be known by its fruit ; and every tree that bringeth "not forth good fruit, shall be hewn down and cast into "the fire."

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. To mark the difference between false teachers and the servants of Christ, the apostle exhorted Titus to "speak such things as became sound "doctrine," or the salutary healing truths of the Gospel, from which all the motives and encouragements to holy obedience must be deduced : and it "became sound doc"trine," that preachers should inculcate on their hearers the practice of their various duties, from evangelical principles. Thus, "the aged men should be sober," serious, prudent, vigilant, "grave, temperate," in every kind of indulgence, and "sound in faith," steadfast in the profession of sound doctrine, and faith in Christ, "in cha"rity," or love to him and their brethren, and "in "patience," amidst trials and persecutions. It does not appear that elders, or pastors of the Church, were exclusively intended. The original word is different from that translated elders, and signifies men advanced in years. The apostle had before spoken of the elders. (Note, i. 5—9.)

V. 3—6. Aged women also, whether employed as deaconnesses by the Church or not, should be instructed to act consistently with their sacred character, as professedly a part of the spiritual priesthood, and that devotedness to God which it implied. They should be warned against speaking slanders or calumnies, a sin to which human nature is peculiarly prone, and to which the national character of the Cretians must give them an additional propensity. The original word is the same that is in many places rendered "devils ;" which shows what a hateful example slanderers and back-biters imitate. They must be careful not "to enslave themselves to much wine :" some of them might have been accustomed to this when heathens, and it would need great self-denial to acquire victory over the habit, and liberty from the thraldom, of this infatuating vice. They were likewise required to be teachers of good things in their families, and to their juniors : that so they might be employed in exhorting the younger women to be sober and prudent, without levity or vanity ; affectionate to their husbands and children, and taking pleasure in the duties of wives and mothers ; discreetly avoiding all appearance of evil, or ground of suspicion, as well as every actual violation of their conjugal fidelity ; to be "keepers at home," and diligent in managing their domestic affairs, (for both are implied ;) not delighting to gad abroad, nor yet loitering away their time at home ; to be good or kind to all around them, "and "obedient to their own husbands," even if they were not Christians, and in many things behaved improperly to them ; for this would frequently be the case. These things must be attended to, "that the word of God might not be "blasphemed," or evil spoken of among the Gentiles, through any improper conduct of Christians in relative life. Young men also must be taught to be sober-minded, to act in a prudent and considerate manner ; avoiding all youthful lusts and vanities, and attending to their several duties in the fear of God.

V. 7, 8. It was especially incumbent on Titus to give, in his own conduct, a pattern of all those good works to which he exhorted others, that they might have his example for a comment on his instructions. In his doctrine also, he should take care to preserve "uncorrupt"ness," not admitting any of those additions or vain conjectures, by which the holy nature and efficacy of divine truth might be altered ; "gravity," avoiding every thing ludicrous, all affectation of wit, or whatever did not consist with the solemnity becoming the great concerns of God and eternity ; and "sincerity," or an upright, evident, and single aim to the glory of God and the good of souls ; without seeking applause or worldly advantage, or the appearance of selfish designs, in what he did. He must also use "sound speech, that could not be con"demned," as erroneous, ambiguous, unintelligible, or of bad tendency : that, thus stating divine truth in plain, convincing, and scriptural language, they, who were of the contrary part, whether heathens, or heretics, might find nothing weak, frivolous, or unguarded, to object against ;

but that they who attempted to find fault with what was so evidently good and beneficial might be put to shame, having no evil thing to say of him.

V. 9, 10. (Notes, Eph. vi. 5—8. 1 Tim. vi. 1—4.) In general, servants must be exhorted to be obedient to their masters, and to make it their constant endeavour to please them well, and give them full satisfaction, in every part of their conduct; and, in particular, they must not "answer again," with rudeness or warmth, when found fault with, even though they had not been to blame; but rather bear an unmerited rebuke, than engage in altercations and give further offence, or incur the charge of impertinence. They ought also scrupulously to avoid "purloining," or pilfering, in the absence of their masters, such things as were put under their care or within their reach; either to apply them to their own use, or to bestow them on their companions. The word is used concerning Ananias, who clandestinely kept back part of the price for which his land was sold. (Notes, Acts v. 1—10.) This species of stealing was so common among the heathen servants, that the same word sometimes signifies a slave, which is generally rendered a thief! and it is to be apprehended, that it is extremely common, even among servants who are called Christians; few of whom are scrupulous about using, or disposing of, the provisions of the family, contrary to the intentions and interests of their masters; nay, sometimes they affect the praise and pride of generosity, by giving away their property to dishonest hangers-on, who acknowledge the obligation by reciprocal favours. But Christian servants must be taught strict honesty in these things, and "to show all good "fidelity," by uprightly using, or saving, whatever was intrusted to them, according to the will of their masters; being satisfied with the provision allotted them, and not countenancing any degree of waste or embezzlement— Thus they must "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour "in all things;" for though the doctrine of salvation by faith in the divine Saviour has unspeakable glory and beauty in it, yet unconverted men cannot discern this, but rather deem it foolish, absurd and pernicious; and the misconduct of professed Christians confirms them in these ruinous prejudices. On the other hand, honesty, fidelity, industry, a peaceable obliging conduct, and exact conscientiousness, in servants professing the Gospel, would put an ornament and a lustre on the doctrine in the eyes of their heathen masters. This argument of its excellency would be intelligible, and excite their attention, and they would thus be rendered more favourable to the truth, and might be induced at length to hear and embrace it.— The same observation might be equally applied to every other instance of relative and social good behaviour.

V. 11, 12. The nature of Christianity required, that such exhortations as have been considered should be given and observed; for "the grace of God which bring-"eth salvation," or the saving mercy and grace of God, and his abundant love to lost sinners, as discovered in the Gospel of Christ, "had appeared to all men," or had been illustriously displayed before Jews and Gentiles, of every rank and character, without exception; and the preachers were directed to preach to all, and invite all, to whom they could obtain access. This doctrine, in the most energetic manner, taught all who heard it "to deny "ungodliness and worldly lusts," as it exhibited, in the clearest light, the holiness and justice of God, the obligations and requirements of his perfect law, the evil of sin, the future state of retribution, the lost condition of fallen man, his need of mercy and grace, and the encouragements given him to "repent and turn to God, and to do "works meet for repentance." It taught men, that they ought to deny ungodliness, showed them how they might be enabled to do it, and supplied the most powerful motives to set about it. Moreover, when this saving grace of God took possession of the heart in regeneration, the new nature, under the influences of the Holy Spirit, inwardly and efficaciously taught men the same things; the law was written in their minds, whilst new, and more constraining motives to obedience were drawn from the obligations of redeeming love, the comforts of communion with God, and the hope of heavenly felicity. Thus in every age, the Gospel teaches men in general, and grace teaches believers in particular, "to deny ungodliness;" to refuse compliance with every inward and outward suggestion to neglect God and their duty to him, or to treat him with irreverence, ingratitude, contempt, and enmity; and constantly to resist and counteract that principle of alienation from God, whence all idolatry, infidelity, impiety, and irreligion, in thought, word, and deed, originate. It teaches them also to deny "worldly lusts," refusing to gratify those impetuous, carnal, and selfish desires of the human heart, which influence men to seek happiness from the world, and not from God; such as pride, ambition, avarice, sensuality, wrath, malice, and envy; whence spring all kinds of contentions, wars, cruelties, injustice, frauds, oppressions, murders, intemperance, and licentiousness, which disturb, desolate, and plague the earth; these the saving grace of God teaches us, constantly and resolutely to deny, resist, and mortify; refusing them every kind of indulgence, opposing their first risings in the heart, and avoiding all temptations to them. The holy law of God, indeed, teaches men to love God and each other; but, requiring perfect obedience, it gives sinners neither injunction nor encouragement to repentance, to self-denial, or to works meet for repentance. It shuts them up under sin, and leaves them in that state, without hope or help; for every command, counsel, and encouragement to a sinner, properly belongs not to the law, but to "the saving grace of God," according to the Gospel. This grace, inwardly and efficaciously, teaches all who receive it, as the necessary effect of "denying "ungodliness and worldly lusts," "to live soberly," in the conscientious government of every appetite and passion; refraining from every unlawful and inexpedient indulgence, and from whatever can be injurious to themselves, or others, in body or soul, or in respect of social and relative comfort; "and to live righteously," according to the requirements of universal justice to all ranks and orders of men; in all commercial transactions and relative duties to superiors, equals, and inferiors; in an equitable and humane treatment of servants, labourers, and poor dependents: in a meek and forgiving conduct towards enemies; in exact truth, sincerity, and fidelity respecting the conversation, professions, promises, and engagements; in a compassionate, kind, and liberal behaviour to the poor, afflicted, and distressed; and a constant endeavour to promote the peace, comfort and happiness, temporal and eternal, of all men, according to their ability and opportunity; "and godly," or piously attending on all the ordinances of God with reverent devotion, as means of grace, and as rendering him the tribute of adoration, praise, and gratitude, due to his name; worshipping him in secret, in the family, and in public; hallowing his day, in reverencing and studying his word, honouring his name, fearing, loving, believing, submitting to, obeying, and delighting in God, according to the requirements of his holy law, and expressing these affections of the soul, in a constant desire and aim to please and glorify him. The grace of God taught, and still teaches, men to live after this manner, "in this pre"sent world," notwithstanding all its snares, temptations, and corrupt examples, and the ill usage to be expected by those "who will live godly in Christ Jesus;" and notwithstanding the remaining power of sin in the heart, with all the manifold infirmities and hinderances, of which the believer is conscious.

V. 13. In this tenour of conduct, the Gospel teaches believers to persevere, looking for that blessed object of hope, which the promises of the Gospel lead them to expect at the end of their course of obedient faith; and waiting in patient preparation for "the appearing of the "glory of the great God, even of our Saviour Jesus "Christ," to judge the world, and perfect the salvation of his people. The invisible God, the divine Essence, "which no man hath seen or can see," will not be manifested at that solemn period; but Christ will be displayed "in his own glory," as Mediator, "and in the glory of "the Father;" and thus will appear "the glory of the "great God, even of our Saviour Jesus Christ:" when, through his human nature, he shall exercise omnipotence, omniscience, and all the perfections of the Godhead, in assigning by a single word the everlasting state of unnumbered millions, whilst none shall be able to withstand the power, or object to the justice, of that awful decision!

V. 14. The decision above mentioned will be made by Him "who gave himself for us," to die in human nature as a sacrifice in the stead of his people, to atone for their sins and effect their salvation; that through his expiation he might redeem them from the punishment of all "their iniquity," and by his power deliver them from the dominion and pollution of all their sinful propensities; and that he might "purify them" by his word and Spirit, from all remains of defilement, that they might be devoted to him, as their Lord and God, to be his worshippers and servants, to live to his glory, and to recommend his salvation, as "a peculiar people, his property, not only as creatures, but as redeemed sinners, and as having voluntarily devoted and yielded themselves to him. Thus they were under singular obligations, as well as of a singular disposition, peculiarly pious spiritual, poor, humble, kind, and upright; not conforming to the customs and fashions of the world; but "zealous of good works," taking delight in obedience, waiting for, and embracing gladly, opportunities of doing good, and not regarding trouble, expense, or self-denial, in performing works of piety, righteousness, and charity, from zeal for the honour of Christ and love to mankind. Surely these verses are calculated, in the most conclusive and affecting manner, to lead us to the confession of Christ by Thomas, "My "Lord, and my God!" The view of Christ, as Judge, in the preceding verse, and in this verse, as he to whom all believers are devoted, "to live no longer to themselves but to him," as "a peculiar people zealous of good works," concur to establish this conclusion: for Jehovah will not give his glory to another."

V. 15. As the things above inculcated were a compendium of the important truths and duties of Christianity, Titus was directed to speak them; to exhort in the plainest and most urgent manner; and to rebuke with all authority, in the name of Christ, those persons who neglected, perverted, or opposed them; that acting with firmness, prudence, and faithfulness, no one might treat him or his words with contempt, without being evidently a despiser of Christ who sent him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

It becomes sound doctrine, and it is indispensably incumbent on ministers to teach all Christians their several duties, in connexion with evangelical principles. Aged men and women, professing godliness, are peculiarly called upon to "be sober, grave, temperate; stable, sound in "faith, love, and patience;" and less allowance will be made for them than for others, if they indulge in levity, vanity, and intemperance, or are betrayed into rashness, instability, or selfishness. In proportion as Christians advance in years, they are supposed to understand better, what behaviour, appearance, attire, and language, become holiness: they will have need to watch against censoriousness and peevishness; and they should be taught to seek comfort under the decays of nature, from a nearer communion with God, and not from "much wine," or any undue indulgence. The excellence of true religion is manifested, when every one is taught and induced by it to attend on the duties of his situation; and elderly persons should be teachers of good things to their juniors, by word and deed. Thus aged and pious women may with peculiar propriety instruct young women in their duties, as wives and mothers, "teaching them to be sober, to love their "husbands and children," and to show that love in a proper behaviour towards them; "to be discreet, chaste, "keepers at home," diligent in their domestic employments, and "obedient to their own husbands;" and to persevere in this useful and honourable conduct, though they meet with trials, hardships, or unkind usage, "that "the word of God may not be blasphemed." "Young "men also must be exhorted to be sober-minded," and to copy the seriousness, piety, purity, discretion, and temperance of those who are grown old in the service of Christ: and not the levity, excess, and folly of such as are preparing themselves anguish for riper years, or treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath. But they, who would with energy inculcate these practical subjects, must "in all things show themselves patterns of good works;" or else the most scriptural admonitions will be disregarded, or expounded by their own conduct. Uncorrupt evangelical doctrine also should be manifestly made the basis of such practical exhortations; and they should be delivered with gravity, as well as with sincerity; that sound speech, which cannot be condemned, may put to shame and silence, captious and malicious opposers.—As no rank in the community raises men above the minister's admonition, so none places them beneath his attention. The conduct of the meanest servant may disgrace, or it may "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour." The latter will be the happy effect, when servants, professing that doctrine are obedient to their masters, obliging in all things, "not answering again, not "purloining, but showing all good fidelity." In this manner they may acceptably and effectually recommend the gospel, and perhaps be instrumental to the salvation of the souls of their superiors. In these, and in all other things, it behooves every professed Christian to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour;" which alone can ensure that doctrine its proper respect in this evil world.

V. 11—15.

The law teaches us godliness, righteousness, temperance, and universal holiness: but the grace of God which bringeth salvation, alone can "teach sinners to deny ungodli- "ness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, "and godly in this present world." How greatly then are they mistaken, who would inculcate such practical subjects, without leading men's attention to the mercy and grace of God in Christ, for instruction, motives, help, and encouragement! As this saving grace of our God hath appeared to all men, and to us in particular, by the word of truth; let us inquire, whether our whole dependence be placed upon that grace, which saves the lost, pardons the guilty, and sanctifies the unclean? And whether we have inwardly been taught by it, as truly penitent, to hate, forsake, and "deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live "soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world?" Whether we are daily mortifying our sins, following after holiness, and practising all our duties to God and man, in expectation of Christ's coming to be our Judge; and patiently continuing in well-doing, whilst we look for "that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great "God, even our Saviour Jesus Christ," to 'number us 'with his saints in glory everlasting.' If we indeed believe, that Emmanuel "gave himself for us," to redeem us from deserved and eternal misery, that he might also deliver us from Satan and from "all iniquity, and purify us "unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works;" we can want no further inducement, to any kind or degree of self-denying obedience; provided we duly estimate his love, our obligations, and the assurance given us of all sufficient help, and of every needful good. The more evidently we are redeemed from all iniquity, and purified unto Christ as a peculiar people, zealous of good works; the clearer will our evidence be of an interest in his salvation, and the brighter our hope of eternal felicity: and the further we are removed from boasting, or trusting in imaginary good works, that we may glory in Christ alone: the more zealous shall we become of abounding in real good works, performed in an upright, humble, believing manner, to the glory of our Lord, and the benefit of his people, and of mankind. May all ministers speak these things decidedly, enforce them with earnestness, and rebuke opposers with all authority; and may their doctrine and example secure them from the contempt of all, except that of the avowed despisers of Christ and his salvation!

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. (Notes, Rom. xiii. 1—8. 1 Tim. ii. 2.) Titus was further instructed, to remind the Cretians to obey those principalities and powers, or civil governors, whom Providence had placed over them; and even the inferior magistrates appointed by them. These were heathens, and generally oppressive and injurious: yet the apostle, during his short abode in Crete, had taught an unreserved subjection to them, except in matters of conscience towards God. But, as the Cretians would be apt to forget his admonitions, they were to be reminded of them, that so no disgrace might be brought on the gospel, by the turbulent spirits and conduct of professed Christians. They must also be directed "to be ready to every good "work," showing a willing mind for any kind action, even to their heathen neighbours: not reviling or slandering any man, nor even propagating disadvantageous reports when true, unless there were a necessity: not "brawl-"ing," or disputing, with acrimony and vehemence, even against those who injured them; but acting with gentleness and meekness to all men.

V. 3. The preceding exhortations would inevitably oppose the natural inclinations of the Cretians; and therefore the apostle enforced them by an argument, which related to the state of Christans in general before their conversion. (Notes, Eph. ii. 1—10.) Including himself. Titus, and all other Christians, among those in Crete; (for this is undeniably the plain meaning of the passage;) he argued, that they ought to bear with, and be kind to, their enemies, and patiently to endure their perverseness and injustice: for they themselves had experienced far greater patience and kindness from God; as "they had "sometime," that is, before their conversion, "been fool-"ish," ignorant of God, of themselves, and of divine truth; and had perversely preferred worldly things to true religion. In different ways they all had "been dis-"obedient," to God, in their habitual conduct; having been "deceived," by Satan and their own hearts, and led to wander out of the right way. They had been "slaves "to divers lusts," and the love of worldly "pleasures;" some being under the power of one sinful passion, some of another: they had lived in malice and envy, from the various competitions, animosities and resentments, which their eager pursuit of worldly objects, and the pride of their hearts, gave rise to: thus they had been "hateful" in their disposition and conduct in the sight of God, "and "had hated one another," especially in the reciprocal contempt and enmity borne by the Jews and Gentiles against each other.

V. 4.—7. God might justly have left even the apostle and Titus, with their brethren and fellow-labourers, to perish in their sins, as, before their conversion, they had not only deserved it, but were "vessels of wrath fitted "for destruction." Yet he had not only spared them, but had effected a blessed change in their state and character. For the kindness and philanthropy of God, (his love to sinful men, whilst he left sinning angels to perish,) had made it proper for them to call him "God our Sa-"viour," as he had purposed, planned, and effected men's salvation, by giving his holy Son to be their Redeemer. After this love of God to man had been displayed in the incarnation, obedience, death, and resurrection of the eternal Son of God, and by the preaching of the Gospel, he had also brought the apostle and his brethren to partake of this salvation; not through the merit or efficacy of "works of righteousness which they had done," but according to his exceedingly rich and free mercy, and compassionate good-will to them; and by "the washing of "regeneration," that new birth of the Spirit, of which the laver of baptism was the sacramental sign, but nothing more. This was not only a washing of the heart from the prevailing love and pollution of sin, but made way for the renewal of the soul to the divine image by the power of the Holy Spirit, which God the Father had richly and abundantly poured forth upon them, in all the variety of his gifts, graces and consolations, through Jesus Christ our Saviour. His atonement had purchased, and his mediation had obtained, this inestimable gift for sinners, in order to apply his salvation to their souls. Thus, being brought to repent, and believe in the Son of God, they had been justified in him, of his free mercy and grace, without any of their own merits; and so they became the adopted children and heirs of God, according to the hope of eternal life, which his promise had taught them to entertain. Seeing then all their hopes and privileges had been conferred upon them wholly by the mercy of God, contrary to all their own deserts, it was proper for them to be followers of God, in their conduct towards their brethren and neighbours. The miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit are not so much as alluded to in this place: and nothing induces more confusion into the expositions given of the Scripture, by commentators of different descriptions, than the neglect of distinguishing between those communications, which constituted men prophets or apostles, and those which were, still are, and ever must be, indispensably necessary to render them true Christians. The expression, "shed," or poured, "on us," in this manifest allusion to the ordinance of baptism, may properly be noted as an intimation, that the pouring of water on any person, "in the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit," is baptism, equally with immersion.

V. 8. "The saying," which the apostle had just delivered concerning free salvation to vile sinners, was true and faithful; and the doctrines which he had stated, as well as the exhortations before given, (for both seem to be referred to,) he would have Titus insist upon with constancy, and without wavering; in order that "they, who "had believed in God," and had come to trust in his mercy, grace, truth, and power, through Jesus Christ, might be rendered careful to maintain, or to stand foremost, in the practice of good works; being influenced by love and gratitude, and encouraged by the promises of the Gospel to abound in them. For though the things, before stated in various practical admonitions, could not in any degree justify sinners before God, they were good in themselves, and profitable to men, in respect of their temporal and eternal interests, both to those who performed them and to others.

V. 9. It was incumbent on Titus, to insist on the grand peculiarities of the Gospel, and by all means to avoid frivolous and foolish questions, or subtile nice distinctions and "genealogies," which the Jews were attached to, as if men were the better in the sight of God for being descended from the patriarchs. These matters and the contests and angry disputes of the Jewish teachers about the Mosaic law, and the obligations of its ceremonies, were utterly vain under the Christian dispensation; and only amused men with such speculations, as took them off from the great doctrines and duties of Christianity.

V. 10, 11. A heretic, in St. Paul's sense, seems to have been a professed Christian, who obstinately denied, and opposed, some fundamental doctrine of the Gospel, as taught by the apostles; especially if he were earnest to propagate his notions, from a vain desire of being the head of a party, and so made divisions in the Church. (Note, Gal. v. 20.) Titus was therefore directed to admonish such a man, once, and again; showing him the error and evil tendency of his principles, and their corrupt source; warning him of his guilt and danger, and exhorting him to retract them. If this failed of effect, he ought afterwards to reject him, as an excommunicated person; being assured that his dangerous errors, and his proud and pertinacious adherence to them, evinced him "to be subverted," or turned aside from Christ, the Foundation of the Church, by the artifices of Satan; that his mistakes arose, not from unavoidable ignorance, but from proud and carnal prejudices, so that he sinned in them; and that "he was condemned of himself," as his avowal of such heresies rendered further proof against him unnecessary: he was therefore not to be considered as a Christian, or allowed to continue in the communion of the Church. (Marg. Ref.) The Scriptures referred to in the margin, and many others, show, that when a man's own words suffice for his condemnation, without further evidence, he may be said to be "condemned of himself:" nor does any great difficulty appear in this much disputed text, except in explaining it in consistency with the systems of contending zealots. In subordinate matters, the apostle inculcated mutual forbearance: but all his epistles show, that he supposed some errors to be fundamental, and absolutely inconsistent with faith in Christ. For avowing these errors men were to be excommunicated, as much as for gross immoralities; and were things restored to their primitive state in the Church of Christ, there can be no doubt, but that they who deny the lost estate of man by nature, the Deity of Christ, the real atonement of his death, justification by faith in the merits of Christ being of grace and not of works, the need of sanctification by the Holy Spirit, and obedience to God's commandments as the effect and evidence of justifying faith, with other doctrines of similar importance, would, after proper admonition, be rejected by believers, and excluded from their communion. No doubt would remain in their minds, but that such heretics were subverted and sinned; and their profession of tenets, so destructive of Christianity, would be deemed a kind of "self-condemnation," without considering them as less sincere in opposing the truth than Saul of Tarsus was. They would not judge them proper persons to associate with those who believed the doctrines of grace; but they would not do them any injury in their temporal concerns, or neglect to pray for "God to give them "repentance, to the acknowledging of the truth." The connexion, so long subsisting between excommunication and persecution, has caused a latitudinarian candour, and a laxity of discipline, to associate with men's ideas of toleration. But the fullest toleration does not imply, that all opinions should be regarded as alike right or probable: nor does excommunication imply, that any alteration should be made in men's civil circumstances. Learned and ingenious men have indeed at length discovered, that it is no sin to treat God's word with neglect, contempt, or proud opposition, and that it is of little or no consequence what doctrines men believe! No wonder then, that they cannot explain the Scripture into an agreement with such tenets, or bring the word of God to declare its own insignificancy. But they, who believe that "men love darkness rather "than light, because their deeds are evil," and treat the truth of God as a lie, because it opposes their pride or lusts, will not find much difficulty in understanding why such heretics should be separated from the society of believers; and they will chiefly lament, that it is not more generally practised, and more easily practicable, seeing it is evident, "that a little of this leaven leaveneth the whole lump," in many churches which once seemed to flourish.

V. 12—15. There were several cities called Nicopolis, and it is not certain which was here meant; but it hence appears that Paul was at this time at liberty. Had he written from Nicopolis, as the spurious postscript asserts, he would have said, "here to winter." He purposed to send Artemas or Tychicus to inform Titus when to meet him there, and probably to supply his place in Crete, and desired him to come without delay. But he was to bring, or to send before, Zenas, (who was either a converted Jewish doctor of the law, or one who had been a Roman lawyer,) and Apollos, who seems to have been then in Crete; and he was studiously to help them, that, by the kindness of the churches, their wants and travelling expenses might be supplied. Titus was also directed to remind the immediate friends of the apostle, and especially the ministers, that they should "learn to maintain," or to stand forth in the practice of good works, for such useful and necessary purposes; that they might not be unfruitful, but might set a good example to the new converts. Some explain the words to mean, that they should learn and labour in "use- "ful trades," which would enable them, though no emolument were annexed to their office, to assist their brethren, and so, in this respect, not to be unfruitful. (Marg. Ref.) With this admonition and customary salutations and benedictions he concluded the epistle.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

It hath at all times been necessary to remind Christians "to be subject to principalities and powers," and to obey "magistrates;" but it is peculiarly so at present, when most valuable privileges and liberties, which ought to have rendered cheerful subjection and peaceable obedience universal, among all who name the name of Christ, have given occasion to a contrary spirit and conduct in numbers, who seem to forget that precepts to this effect are found in the Scriptures. But real religion, in proportion as it prevails, will render men quiet subjects, as well as good neighbours and relations, and ready to every good work; it will repress the turbulent and censorious temper, and restrain them from speaking evil of others, and from reviling and wrangling, and it will teach them to be gentle and meek to all men. These dispositions and this conduct are the genuine effects of a deep conviction of our own guilt, united with an experimental knowledge of the free salvation of the Gospel; we shall not, if thus humbled and enlightened, disdain, or be wearied out by, the misconduct of the most unreasonable enemies; if we duly consider that we ourselves were formerly foolish, disobedient, and deceived, slaves to divers base lusts, and a fondness for carnal pleasures; "that we lived in malice and envy;" and, in short, were hateful to God, and disposed to hate one another, and thus "vessels of wrath fitted for destruc- "tion," till divine grace effected the blessed change. Let us then often contemplate the discoveries which have been made, of the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards our fallen apostate race, in giving his Son to be the propitiation for our sins; his patience in sparing us during the years of our foolishness and rebellion; his goodness in sending us the word of salvation; and, above all, his mercy in causing us to partake of the "washing of "regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost," which he poured upon our souls, of his plenteous grace, through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Surely we know that none of these things were procured "by works of righte- "ousness that we had done!" And that we were "jus- "tified freely by his grace," and so made heirs according to "the hope of eternal life." Having been therefore brought into a state of safety, and made partakers of a joyful hope by the mere mercy of God the Father, through the redemption of his incarnate Son, and by the new creation of the Holy Ghost, it certainly behooves us to take the lead in every good work, by which we can glorify God our Saviour, or benefit mankind. Ministers should insist upon these faithful sayings, and affirm these things constantly; and show the tendency of the truths of the Gospel to holiness of life: and Christians should be ambitious of exceeding all other men in every good thing, for the honour of the truth through which they are saved.

V. 9—15.

Attending to the good and profitable things before inculcated, we should learn to avoid foolish questions and contentious disputations, which are unprofitable and vain. But, though we must not strive about words, or magnify every difference of opinion into a damnable heresy, yet, we should carefully watch against fundamental errors, which are inconsistent with the life of faith in the Son of God, and of grateful obedience to him. Many are subverted by heretics; we should therefore withdraw from them, if they neglect proper admonitions; and though they be not separated from the communion of believers here, yet, continuing impenitent, they will at last be rejected by the omniscient Judge of all men. Whatever Christians find to do, they should attend on it diligently; they should be ever ready to help one another, and to prevent and relieve the wants of those who are labouring to promote the Gospel. They who exhort others to such good works, must learn to maintain them in their own conduct, and, on necessary occasions, to set a decided and conspicuous example. Then they will not be unfruitful in the knowledge of Christ; mutual love, as the fruit of faith, will be increased, and the grace of our Lord will be with them all.

THE

TO PHILEMON.

Philemon seems to have been a Christian of some eminence, residing at Colosse; (Col. iv. 9. 17;) who had been converted under St. Paul's ministry; (19;) perhaps during his abode at Ephesus. (Acts xix. 10.) When the apostle was imprisoned at Rome, Onesimus, a slave of Philemon, having, as it is generally thought, been guilty of some dishonesty, left his master and fled to that city, though at the distance of several hundred miles: When he came thither, curiosity, or some such motive, induced him to attend on St. Paul's ministry, which it pleased God to bless for his conversion. After he had given satisfactory proof of a real change, and manifested an excellent disposition, by suitable behaviour, which had greatly endeared him to Paul, he judged it proper to send him back to his master; to whom he wrote this epistle, that he might procure Onesimus a more favourable reception than he could otherwise have expected. The most competent judges have given it a decided preference, as a model of good writing in the epistolary kind, to the most admired remains of antiquity. Indeed, we can scarcely conceive, how such a cause, as that of Onesimus, could have been pleaded in a more interesting, obliging, prudent, pathetic, and masterly manner. It is also very replete with useful instruction. The apostle entertained no doubt of Philemon's compliance with his request; and expected that he would do more than he said. It is therefore probable, that Onesimus was not only received into favour, but set at liberty; and, it is generally thought, that he became afterwards a minister of the gospel. Onesimus accompanied Tychicus to Colosse, and, it may be concluded, that the apostle wrote to Philemon at the same time; and that Onesimus, having delivered the letter to his master, and obtained his forgiveness, joined with Tychicus, in executing the apostle's commission to the Colossians.

A. D. 64. A. D. 64.

The apostle salutes Philemon, 1—3; declares his joy at hearing of his faith and love, 4—7; carnestly and pathetically entreats him to receive into favour his fugitive servant, Onesimus, now become, by the apostle's ministry, a consistent believer, 8—21; desires him to provide for him a lodging, as he expected to be speedily released, 22; and concludes with salutations and benedictions, 23—25.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. The apostle did not intend to write authoritatively to Philemon, and therefore he only styled himself "the prisoner of Jesus Christ," which tended to procure an affectionate regard to his request; and he joined Timothy with him, that they might be presented as the united desire of him and his brethren. Though Philemon is called "a fellow labourer," yet it is not certain that he was a minister; perhaps he served the cause of Christ by active diligence in another manner. (Marg. Ref.) The beloved Apphia is supposed to have been his wife, though some think that she was his sister. Archippus, whom the apostle called his fellow-soldier, and to whom he sent a special charge in another epistle, is thought to have been the son or near relation of Philemon; and he seems to have resided in his family, which was so pious and well regulated, that it was in some sense a Christian Church.

V. 4—7. The apostle thanked God continually for his grace bestowed on Philemon, making mention of him in his prayers. His gratitude to the Lord was excited from time to time, by the good accounts which he received of his "love and faith," even his faith toward the Lord Jesus, and his love to all the saints for his sake. The obvious meaning of the passage requires a transposition of the words, which arises from an arrangement not at all unsuitable to the Greek language, though it is rather harsh in an English translation. The apostle also prayed, "that "the communication of Philemon's faith might become "effectual," &c. Some explain this of his liberal communication from his temporal affluence, being made effectual for the relief of the saints, and for the evident demonstration of his faith from which it sprang. Others suppose the apostle to mean, that his communion, or participation of faith in Christ, might be effectual in regulating his whole temper and conduct. But, though both these senses may be contained in the words, they seem to have a still further meaning; and the apostle probably prayed, that his endeavours to communicate his faith in Christ to those around him might be rendered effectual, through the evident excellency of his example and that of his family; so that men might be induced to acknowledge the reality and value of every good thing which was in them, by means of their relation to Christ, and thus to entertain a favourable opinion of that religion, which produced such beneficial effects on the conduct of those who embraced it. This he hoped would be the case; for he had great joy and comfort in the accounts that he heard of his liberal love, by which the urgent necessities of Christians and ministers were supplied; so that, while their bodies were refreshed at his expense, their hearts were also rejoiced by his good example and pious conversation; and therefore the apostle cordially owned him, and greatly loved him as his brother in the Gospel. The word brother, placed thus at the end of a sentence, is peculiarly emphatical, and expressive of the most entire cordiality.

V. 8—11. The apostle here enters on the immediate business of the epistle. When he considered his own apostolical authority and Philemon's character, he supposed that he might, with propriety, have enjoined him, in the name of Christ, to do what was so evidently convenient, or agreeable to the loving spirit of Christianity; yet he preferred the language of a suppliant in the present case, and besought Philemon, for love's sake, even the love of Christ to them, and their love to him and to each other through him, that he would grant him one special favour, which he had it much at heart to obtain. He would remind him, that his humble supplicant was such an one "as "Paul, the aged" minister of the Gospel, (for he was probably above sixty years old at this time:) who, having encountered numberless afflictions and perils, in seeking the salvation of men's souls, was then enduring the hardships of a tedious imprisonment in the cause of Christ; and he could not doubt of Philemon's readiness to do any thing which might mitigate the severity of his sufferings. His petition indeed was not presented for himself; but it was in behalf of "his son," even of one "whom he had "begotten in his bonds," the son of his old age, for whom he had the most tender parental affection; and the name of this son was "Onesimus!" In the original, Onesimus is mentioned at the close of the sentence; that the suspense, and most affectionate introduction, might prepare Philemon to read a name, which could scarcely fail of being associated in his mind with unfavourable ideas. Onesimus signifies profitable; in allusion to which, the apostle allowed that he had not formerly deserved that name, having been unprofitable; probably he had been unfaithful, dishonest, and unruly; perhaps addicted to other vices, and this the apostle seems to have known from his own confession. But he spake of his faults in the gentlest language, and hastened to mention the change that had taken place; by which his character was now made to answer the meaning of his name, and he was become profitable both to Philemon and to St. Paul. He was prepared to be a useful servant to the former; he had been serviceable to the latter, and he hoped that he would be still more so.

V. 12—16. Onesimus was Philemon's legal property, and St. Paul had required, and prevailed with him to return to him, having made sufficient trial of his sincerity; and he requested Philemon to receive him with the same kindness, as he would the aged apostle's own son according to the flesh, being equally dear to him, as his spiritual child. He would gladly have kept him at Rome, to minister to him in his confinement; which Onesimus would willingly have done in the bonds of the Gospel, being attached to him from Christian love and gratitude; and, as he knew that Philemon would gladly have done him any service in person, if he had been at Rome, so he would have considered Onesimus as ministering to him in his master's stead. But he would not do any thing of this kind without his consent, lest he should seem to extort the benefit, and Philemon should appear to act from necessity, rather than from a willing mind. And though he had hopes of deriving benefit from Onesimus' faithful service, at some future period, by Philemon's free consent, yet he was not sure that this was the Lord's purpose respecting him; for perhaps he permitted him to leave his master for a season in so improper a manner, in order that, being converted, he might be received on his return with such affection, and might abide with Philemon with such faithfulness and diligence, that they should choose to live together the rest of their lives, as fellow-heirs of eternal felicity. (Marg. Ref.) In this case he knew that Philemon would no longer consider Onesimus merely as a slave, but view him as "above a slave, even as a brother "beloved." This he was become to Paul in an especial manner, who had before been entirely a stranger to him; how much more then might it be supposed, that he would be endeared to Philemon, when he became well acquainted with his excellency! seeing he would be near to him both in the flesh as one of his domestics, and in the Lord as one with him in Christ by faith.

V. 17—21. If Philemon deemed the apostle a partner, or partaker of the same grace, and dear to him for Christ's sake, let him express his love to him by receiving Onesimus with as much kindness as he would have received himself, if he had come in person; and, in case Onesimus had wronged Philemon, or was in his debt, let him place that to his account; and, as he wrote the epistle with his own hand, he gave, as it were, a promissory note, that he would repay it upon demand. It is generally observed, that this is a plain instance of a debt being imputed to one, which was contracted by another; and of one by a voluntary engagement becoming answerable for the misconduct of another, that he might be exempted from the punishment due to his crimes, and partake of benefits to which he had no right; according to the doctrine of Christ's voluntarily bearing the punishment of our sins, that we might receive the reward of his righteousness, by a reciprocal imputation. Perhaps the apostle understood that Philemon had expressed some sharpness concerning Onesimus' conduct; or knowing him to be naturally somewhat severe in his temper, he might fear lest he should punish him, as the laws permitted masters to do their slaves in such cases; which would not only have been grievous to Onesimus, but disgraceful to the Gospel, and to Philemon himself. He therefore so far interested himself in the matter, though he could scarcely suppose that payment would be demanded of him; and added, that although he made this proposal, yet, in doing so, he had forborne to bring into the account, that Philemon owed to him his own self, besides other benefits, as God had made him the instrument of his eternal salvation; thus intimating that he never could sufficiently requite that obligation. He therefore pathetically besought him to let him have an opportunity of rejoicing on his account, in the Lord's kindness to him, and to grant him this request, which would as much refresh his compassionate heart, as Philemon's liberality did the bowels of the saints. Having confidence that he was ready to obey the Lord's will, intimated by him, he had written to him, being assured that he would do even more than he had requested. Our curiosity is not gratified by being informed of the effect of this epistle; but we can hardly doubt that Philemon forgave Onesimus, received him with kindness, remitted what he owed to him, and afterwards gave him his liberty, that he might attend on the apostle. His appointment with Tychicus to deliver the epistle to the Colossians, seems to intimate, that Paul meant to employ him as a minister, which probably was afterwards done.

V. 22—25. The apostle, though at this time in bonds, had an expectation of being speedily released when he wrote this epistle, and he purposed to visit Philemon and the Colossians when that took place: he was persuaded they did not forget to pray for his liberty, that he might be enabled to visit them, and he trusted, that in answer to their prayers this would soon be effected; therefore he desired them to prepare him a convenient lodging. Epaphras attended Paul so closely, that he might be deemed his fellow-prisoner; or, perhaps he was imprisoned with him. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

The fellow-labourers and fellow-soldiers of Christ ought to pray, and to thank God, for each other, with the greatest constancy and fervency; for faith in Christ, and love to him, should unite saints more closely, than any outward relation can the people of the world. They, who partake of these graces, must and will desire to communicate them to others; and their endeavours will be rendered effectual, through fervent prayer, and by an uniform course of piety, purity, integrity, and benevolence, which will constrain men to acknowledge the good things, which are in them as believers in Christ. Faithful ministers have great joy and comfort in the little company of affluent Christians, whose love abounds in liberality to all men, and when the bowels of the saints are refreshed by them, and their wants generously supplied. It is by no means proper to exercise authority on every occasion, even when ministers may be bold to enjoin what is convenient. It is often far more prudent, for love's sake, to beseech even juniors and inferiors; especially when it may be supposed that they will be reluctant to what is required, and when it may be difficult to convince them of its indispensable obligation. These requests, from such a one as in any good measure resembles Paul the aged, will have the energy of injunctions, and engage compliance, without risking a subsequent distaste, which is always in such cases to be feared from the remaining self-love of the human heart, even in respect of pious men, who would do much to alleviate the sufferings, or increase the comforts, of their faithful pastors. In such circumstances, wisdom and humility will teach the aged and experienced to become willingly the obliged parties, when they might assume a higher tone. In speaking to men of their sins for their humiliation, the heinous nature and manifold aggravations of them should be insisted on: but in mentioning them to others, who are disposed to severity or resentment, we should soften and extenuate as far as truth will permit: and such subjects ought to be introduced with all the tenderness and caution imaginable, that every thing may tend to conciliate, and nothing to exasperate. When penitents show their sincerity by "works meet for repent-"ance," they should be treated by ministers with parental tenderness, and taken under their patronage, in respect of the temporal consequences of their former sins. For in this manner they, who were unprofitable to their relatives and neighbours, and a trouble to all connected with them, are made profitable to the community and to the Church of God. They often become greatly useful to ministers and their families, and a blessing to all among whom they reside; they supply other men's lack of service to the suffering disciples of Christ, by tending on them in their stead; they promote the Gospel by their example, conversation, and prayers, and many of them become preachers of the word of life to their fellow-sinners; for "behold "all things are become new!" No prospect of usefulness should induce ministers to counsel their converts to neglect relative obligations, or to fail of obedience to their superiors. One great evidence of true repentance, consists in returning to the practice of those duties, which had been neglected: and even liberty to engage in other services should be sought from those concerned, not as it were of necessity, but by their willing consent. We know not for what services God may intend those, whom he hath marvellously converted: having therefore given our judgment, and used proper means, we should leave all things to his determination.

V. 17—25.

Little do men know for what purposes the Lord leaves them to change their situations, or engage in enterprises, from worldly or criminal motives. We should have thought, that Onesimus' departure from his master would have been final, and his journey to Rome ruinous; yet the Lord had far other and more gracious purposes concerning him: and had not He over-ruled, in a similar manner, some of our ungodly projects, the writer, and many readers, may say, with humble gratitude, our destruction must have been the inevitable consequence, though they proved the means of our being brought into the way of salvation. And when we read of Onesimus' conversion at Rome, after having grown worse and worse, as it is probable, in Philemon's pious family, we should learn to despair of none, but still to use means and offer prayers for them; while we should be ever ready to receive the penitent with that kindness that God shows to his returning prodigals. This should especially be attended to in our conduct towards relations or domestics, whose conversion should be doubly welcome, notwithstanding their past misconduct, that they may be nearer to us in the flesh and in the Lord. Ministers should, in such cases, love to be peace-makers, and they should give up their own interest, in order to prevail with offended parents or masters to be reconciled to their penitent children or servants, that so the severity, animosity, and division, may be prevented, by which the Gospel is often disgraced. When such offenders have wronged others, or owe what they cannot pay, it may sometimes be proper for us to pay it for them, if we can, as followers of Christ, who bore our sins in his own body on the tree. Thus we shall best prevail with our brethren to use lenity and forbearance; especially when we deal with those, who owe their ownselves to the blessing of God on our ministry; and such persons ought to be reminded to let their loving pastors have joy of them in the Lord, to refresh their hearts, to answer their confidence, and even to do more than modesty will permit them to request. Then their prayers for each other will be more fervent; and, in answer to them, their meetings on earth will be comfortable and cordial; but even if this be denied, the grace of the Lord Jesus will be with their spirits, and they will soon meet before the throne, to join for ever in admiring the riches of redeeming love.

THE

EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE

HEBREWS.

The general testimony of antiquity, the current tradition of the church, and the judgment of the most competent modern critics, determine this epistle to have been written by the apostle Paul: though some, both in former and latter times, have thought otherwise. "The epistle of Paul." 'Thus we find it 'written in all our manuscripts, one only excepted, in which it is only, "The epistle to the Hebrews."' (Beza.) 'It is evident, that this epistle was generally received in ancient times, by those Christians who 'used the Greek language, and lived in the eastern parts of the Roman empire. In particular, Clement 'of Alexandria, before the end of the second century, received this epistle as St. Paul's, and quoted 'it frequently, and without any doubt or hesitation. It is not expressly quoted as St. Paul's by any of 'the Latin writers in the three first centuries. However, it was known to Irenæus and Tertullian. 'It is manifest, that is was received as an epistle of St. Paul, by many Latin writers in the fourth, 'fifth, and sixth centuries.' (Lardner.) Origen, who held some peculiar notions concerning it, says, 'The ancients did not rashly hand it down as St. Paul's.' 'It is very certain, that the churches and 'writers, who were ancients with respect to Origen, must have conversed with the apostles themselves, 'or at least with their successors. Since this tradition was ancient, in the times of Clement of Alexandria 'and Origen, about a hundred and thirty years after the epistle was written; it must have had its rise 'in the days of Paul himself, and so cannot reasonably be contested.' (Hallet in Macknight.) The doubts, which have been entertained on this subject, seem principally to have arisen from the circumstance, of the apostle's name not being affixed to it, according to his custom in all his other epistles 'If it is 'not to be considered as Paul's, because it does not bear his name; let it belong to no one, because it 'bears no name. But, on the contrary, I contend, from this very circumstance, that it belongs to Paul 'rather than to any other person. For why should any other person have omitted his name? But Paul 'had a sufficient reason for sending an anonymous letter to Jerusalem: not, as I think, because he was 'the peculiar apostle of the gentiles, as Peter of the circumcision: but because he knew his name was 'greatly hated at Jerusalem, by the enemies of Christianity, and that their fury was even then raging; 'and was perhaps exasperated by occasion of his imprisonment; (x. 33, 34;) he was therefore unwilling 'to inflame them against the church by affixing his name.' (Beza.) 'As Paul was the apostle of the 'gentiles, in writing to the Hebrews, he did not assume his apostolical character; because it was little 'respected by the unbelieving Jews and Judaizing Christians. It being designed, not for the believing 'Jews alone, but for the unbelieving part of the nation, especially the learned doctors and scribes at 'Jerusalem, Paul might think it prudent, not only to avoid assuming his apostolical character, but even 'to conceal his name, which would have prejudiced the unbelieving part of the nation to such a degree, 'that, in all probability, they would not have read his letter.' (Macknight.) The apostle intended to prove the doctrines of Christianity, and the changes, which it had introduced, and would introduce, to be entirely consistent with "the oracles of God," as received by the Jews: and as being either clearly predicted or evidently typified, or, at least sufficiently intimated, by them: so that any man, who fully understood the Old Testament, must have expected the substance of what was taught by Christ and his apostles, and the events which had occurred, It is, therefore, highly probable, that he expressly aimed to write an epistle, which might be put into the hands either of Judaizing Christians, or unbelieving Jews, and read by them, without any prejudice, on account of the person, who wrote it: let them impartially consider his arguments. It is, however, evident, that he supposed some of the Hebrews would know from whom it came. (x. 34. xiii. 18. 23, 24.) But these intimations are not given, till the argumentative part of the epistle is ended; and they would not be clearly understood by any but the apostle's friends. The writer's connexion with Timothy, and his residence in Italy, tend to confirm the ancient tradition; and the other objections, as the supposition, that the style is more elegant than St. Paul's; and that he uses expressions, which imply, that he received his doctrine from those who heard Christ, and not by immediate revelation, &c.; appear very vague and frivolous. He might perhaps, bestow more pains in this epistle, concerning the style, than he did when he wrote to other Churches: but indeed, many competent judges are of opinion, that it is not more elegant: and certainly the internal evidence, arising from the writer's manner of expressing himself and his reasoning, and things of a similar nature, corroborate the opinion, that St. Paul is the author; and if he thought it prudent to write as a converted Jew, to his countrymen, and not as an apostle, who insisted on his authority; he must of course join himself with the other Jewish converts, and not distinguish himself from them, as having received his doctrine immediately from Christ. (Comp. ii. 4. with 1 Pet. iv. 3.)

Origen and some others were of opinion, that the epistle was written in the Hebrew, or Syriac, language; and translated into Greek by Clement, or Luke: but if this had been the case, it can hardly be supposed, that no one copy of the Hebrew epistle should be mentioned as extant in their days, and as seen by them. The quotations from the Old Testament are generally taken from the Septuagint; even where that version in some degree varies from the Hebrew: but this would scarcely have taken place, had the epistle been written in Hebrew. The Hebrew names are interpreted also in Greek, in a manner, that is not at all like the addition of a translator. The apostle, doubtless, supposed that the epistle would circulate widely among his countrymen, who spoke Greek; and among Christians in general, as well as among the Hebrews; and therefore, probably, he wrote in Greek, as most generally in use at that time, of any language in the world. The Hebrews were the Jews in Judea, and who spoke a dialect of the Hebrew; and to such of them as professed Christianity, the epistle was addressed; and probably sent to Jerusalem, to the rulers and pastors of the Church in that city; yet, the writer evidently expected, that the unconverted Jews also would read it; and their conviction and instruction seem to have been a leading part of his object in writing it. It opens with a declaration of the personal and mediatorial dignity of Christ; and proofs from the Old Testament that the Messiah was to be far greater than the angels: it then shows his superiority to Moses and other eminent men of the nation; proves, by the most unanswerable arguments, that in him the types of the law had their full accomplishment; that he was the substance of all those shadows; and that the ancient scriptures taught Israel to expect an entirely new dispensation, priesthood, and covenant, under the reign of the Messiah. These reasonings are interspersed and closed with most solemn and affectionate warnings and exhortations, addressed to different discriptions of persons. At length the writer shows the nature, efficacy, and triumphs of faith, by which all the saints in former ages had been accepted by God, and enabled to obey, suffer, and do exploits in defence of their holy religion; after which he adds various instructions, admonitions, encouragements, and exhortations; and then concludes with the customary salutations and benedictions. The internal excellency of this epistle, as connecting the Old Testament and the New, in the most convincing and instructive manner, and elucidating both, more fully, than any other epistle, or perhaps than all of them; added to other arguments, puts the divine inspiration of it beyond all doubt; we here find the great doctrines which we have elsewhere been considering, stated, proved, and applied to practical purposes, in the most convincing manner. It is supposed to have been written at the close of the apostle's first imprisonment at Rome, when he either was set at liberty, or daily expected it.

CHAP. I.

The writer declares the essential and mediatorial glory of the Son of God, by whom the Father speaks to men under the gospel dispensation, 1—4. He adduces several scriptures to prove, that the Messiah was to be far greater than the angels, and worshipped by them as their Creator and Lord, 5—14.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. The Hebrews allowed the divine authority of the Old Testament; and therefore the writer of this epistle waived the mention of his apostolical authority, and reasoned with them principally from their scriptures: and he thought it best to conceal his name; that none might be deterred by it from reading his arguments, or induced to receive them with prejudice. He therefore entered upon his subject without any introduction. That God, who in former ages had spoken to the progenitors of the Hebrews, from the calling of Abraham, to the latter times of their nation, by prophets, mere men of the same fallen nature with their brethren; who had gradually made known his truth and will, from time to time, through successive generations, and who had spoken to them in divers methods, by personal conference, by dreams and visions, or by supernatural impulses upon their minds; had in the last days, under the dispensation of the Gospel, spoken to them by his own Son, appearing personally among them in human nature. The eternal Word, or Son of God, had indeed appeared, and spoken to the patriarchs, prophets, and others: but he then spoke as JEHOVAH, as God, to a few individuals, by whom his will was made known to their brethren: whereas he had at length become flesh, and dwelt among men, and among the Jews almost exclusively, to fulfil ancient prophecies and promises, and to give the most complete and explicit revelation of God, and of his truth and will, to mankind; as well as to procure salvation for them. So that, while Moses and other mere men, were the prophets of the old dispensation, the only begotten Son of God, appearing in human nature, was the great Prophet of the new dispensation. This glorious Person the Father had appointed "Heir of all "things." As the coequal Son of God, the government of all worlds by original right was vested in him: possessing the essential perfections of the Deity, he was capable of properly exercising universal authority, which no mere creature could have done; and he had been appointed by the Father, in respect of his assumed manhood, to rule over all worlds upon the mediatorial throne, with uncontrolled dominion and unrivalled glory. Thus he inherited all things, and no creature can have any inheritance of power, honour, or felicity, except as derived from him, and held in subordination to him. (Notes, Phil. ii. 6—11.) This appointment had the more evident propriety, in that "by him also God made the worlds:" being One with the Father and the eternal Spirit, in essence, power, and counsel, he had been the immediate Creator of the heavens and the earth, and of every order of beings in the universe. The idea of a created agent, by whom God made all things, which some have endeavoured to support from this text, is so absurd in itself, as well as contrary to other scriptures, that it is astonishing it could ever have been adopted. The apostle evidently meant, that God now spake to men by that same glorious Person, who had been the immediate Creator of the world, and who was also exalted to the mediatorial throne as Heir of all things. 'I believe it is as impossible to understand how a man 'should have this empire over all things in heaven and 'earth, and over death itself, and yet be a mere man, as it 'is to understand any mystery of the sacred Trinity.' (Whitby.) (Notes, John i. 1—18.)

V. 3, 4. The essence of the Deity is invisible to man; but the only begotten Son, of whom the writer spake, had been appointed to make known his glory and perfections: being one with the Father, and equal to him in the divine nature; and shining "in the form of God," with all the effulgency of his glory; and being also distinct from the Father, as to his personal subsistence. By assuming human nature he became "the Effulgency of the divine glory" to men, and made known the perfections of the Godhead to them, so that "he who saw Him saw the Father also." For the Son was "the express Image," or the Character, of the Father's Person, or Subsistence; and showed every part of the nature and perfections of God to man, with the greatest exactness and in the most effectual manner possible; so that in proportion as any man knows Christ, in his Person, character, and salvation, he knows the Father also; and he that knows not Christ, hath no real knowledge of God at all. (Notes, Matt. xi. 25—27. 2 Cor. iv. 3—6. Col. i. 15—19.) And not only did the Father create the world by the Son, but the same divine Agent still upholds all things by the word of his power, as one in the unity of the Godhead with the Father; and he even upheld all things in being, and in their settled order, by his almighty word and will, when he appeared on earth

"as the visible Effulgence of the Father's glory, and the "Character of his subsistence;" of which he gave many proofs in his miraculous power over the course of nature, legions of evil spirits, diseases, and death. This same Person, who created and upholds all worlds, as the High Priest of his people, purged away the guilt of their sins, by himself, and the sacrifice of his death upon the cross. Then, having risen as a mighty Conqueror over death and hell, he ascended in human nature, to be seated as Heir of all things upon the mediatorial throne, at the right hand of the Father, where he displays his glorious majesty. There the incarnate Son is enthroned in pre-eminent dignity, as the Head of all things to his church, which he purchased with his own blood. For he was made so much better than the angels, or superior in authority to them, that they were all made subject to him, as reigning in human nature; seeing he inherited, as "the only begotten "Son of God," a more excellent name, or nature, than they: for, however exalted any of them were in capacity or authority, they were only mere creatures, and he their infinite Creator. This interpretation coincides with that, which hath already been given of similar passages; but it differs, in some degree, from that of several eminent evangelical expositors: for they suppose that the expressions, "the Brightness of his glory, and the character of his sub-"sistence," are illustrations, taken from external objects, of the eternal generation of Christ, and his equality with the Father in the Godhead. But though the author is decidedly of opinion, that Christ is called the only Son of God, in respect of his divine nature; and therefore allows the eternal generation, as well as the equality of the Son with the Father, yet he does not think that the scripture contains any illustrations of these mysteries; or that we are taught to form any ideas of the manner, in which they subsist; but rather to receive them in implicit faith, as the revelation of God, and to adore them as absolutely incomprehensible by us in our present state. He, therefore, supposes these expsessions to signify the manifestation of the glory, character, and perfection of the invisible God to man, in and by the Person of his incarnate Son; whose original equality with the Father, by the participation of the divine nature, and his voluntary assumption of the human nature, concurred in rendering him the proper medium, so to speak, through which we might see the effulgency, or shining forth of the divine glory; and become acquainted with the perfections and subsistence of God in the best manner, of which in our present condition we are capable. He is also confirmed in this view of the passage, by finding that the venerable reformer Beza interprets it in the same manner, and makes the same objections to the other interpretations.

V. 5—7. In the preceding verses, the apostle had stated the outlines of that doctrine, on which he meant more largely to discourse: and, having declared the personal and mediatorial superiority of Jesus the Son of God to all angels, he proceeded to show, that the Old Testament prophecies spake of the promised Messiah in similar language. As we are satisfied by abundant evidence, that the writers of the New Testament were equally inspired with those of the Old, their expositions are of equal authority with the originals which they quote. But when the apostle reasoned with the Hebrews out of their scriptures, he doubtless quoted them in that sense in which many of them had been used to understand them, or in which they might be convinced they ought to be understood. Had not the more learned Jews, at the time when the epistle was written, been used to understand the texts adduced in the sense which the apostle puts upon them, he would scarcely have left them, as proofs of his doctrine, without hesitation, in an argumentative treatise, which he knew must pass the ordeal of the strictest examination, by the most prejudiced and hostile persons. Now, if they were sufficient proofs to the persons immediately addressed, they must be sufficient for all, who consider the writer as fully knowing, by divine inspiration, both the doctrine of Christ, and the true meaning of the scriptures: though the context might otherwise, in some instances, lead us to suppose them instructive accommodations; and though the Jews, in subsequent ages, to evade the writer's conclusion, have attempted to put another construction on them. We have briefly considered these quotations before; yet it is necessary here again to examine them. The first is brought from an evident prophecy of the Messiah's kingdom. (Notes, Ps. ii.) JEHOVAH had there addressed him in such language as had never been used to any angel. The words quoted were spoken long before his incarnation, and were the declaration of an eternal decree: they must therefore relate to his Sonship, or eternal generation: for the subsequent production of his human nature, by the power of the Holy Spirit, would not give him that essential and original superiority to the angels, which the argument here required; nor could his appointment to the office of the Messiah be meant by the words, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee:" as that appointment was the consequence, rather than the cause, of his superiority to the angels; he was advanced above them, as he had inherited a more excellent name than they: and his Sonship is plainly denoted to be such a participation of the Father's nature, as any son partakes of that of his father, in the ordinary course of things; and not merely a communication of existence by an act of creating power; or adoption, by an act of special grace. The next quotation appears primarily to have been meant of Solomon. (Note, 2 Sam. vii. 14;) but Solomon was a most remarkable type of the Messiah, as the Jews in general must know: so that when JEHOVAH said of him in so peculiar a sense, "I will be to him a Father," it must be obvious that this, in its fullest meaning was to be understood of the antitype rather than of the type. The next proof was brought from a prophecy of the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom, (Notes, Ps. xcvii.) in which it is said, (v. 7.) "worship him, all ye gods." JEHOVAH there spake of bringing in the Messiah, whom he had elsewhere declared to be his first begotten Son, (Ps. ii. 7.) and appointed to be Heir of all things; and at the same time he called upon the most exalted of his creatures to "submit to the Son," adore, and "honour him, even as "they honoured the Father that sent him." For, though the magistrates and grandees of the earth might be included, yet all the angels of God were evidently intended also. But JEHOVAH had never spoken in such language concerning angels; of whom it had been said, that he made them spirits, or winds, (for so some render it,) and as flames of fire to be his ministering servants. (Note, Ps. civ. 4.) (Marg. Ref.) He had indeed formed them active, powerful, pure, and spiritual intelligences, to perform his mandates with inexpressible force and fervent love; but he had never commanded other rational creatures to worship them; nay, he had most peremptorily forbidden the worship of any creature; yet he required the most exalted of them to worship his Son, even when brought into this world to dwell in human nature! A most decided proof of an infinite disparity between Christ and the highest angels. (Rev. xix. 10.)

V. 8, 9. A passage is next adduced from a most remarkable prophecy of the Messiah; (Notes, &c. Ps. xlv.) in which JEHOVAH said to him, as his Son, "Thy throne, "O God, is for ever and ever:" he addressed him as God, declaring the perpetuity of his mediatorial kingdom to the end of the world, and over his redeemed people to all eternity. (Note, 1 Cor. xv. 24—28.) As the sceptre with which he would rule his people, and all nations, yea, the universe, for their benefit, was a sceptre of righteousness, the exercise of his pardoning mercy would be most honourable to divine justice, and most effectual to promote righteousness in the world. His laws and administration would be altogether righteous: whilst he acted as the Friend and Saviour of sinners, he would most perfectly love righteousness and hate iniquity: as the Son of God, he was essentially and unchangeably holy: his human nature would be produced and preserved, entirely free from all pollution of sin; his whole conduct, even unto death, would be perfectly righteous, and the government of his kingdom would be the same for ever. On this account God, even his God and Father, would anoint him, (for the future was spoken of as if it had already taken place,) "with "the oil of gladness," or the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, (the source of all substantial gladness in the heart of man,) in a more abundant manner than any of those prophets or servants of God had received, whom he owned as his fellows, companions, or brethren, in the human nature. The Holy Spirit was given without measure to Christ, for the benefit of his church, in consequence of his undertaking, incarnation, obedience to death, and exaltation to the mediatorial throne: from this fulness all his fellows have received their appointed measure, whereby they have been qualified for these services, to which they were called, comforted in the trials appointed for them, and prepared for their future happiness in heaven. Some suppose, that angels were meant by Christ's fellows, because the apostle was proving his superiority to angels; but he never bore the nature of angels, and partaking of the same nature seems to be the meaning of the expression. (Marg. Ref.) The quotation was full to the apostle's purpose, by proving that JEHOVAH spake of the Messiah in such language as he never used of angels; and the Psalmist, from whom he adduced his proof, spake of the Messiah as incarnate, of his espousing the church to himself, and of believers as the companions of the glorious King. They were indeed anointed with the oil of gladness for his sake; but he far more than they all, even as his excellency and dignity exceeded theirs. 'They, who imagine this Psalm is 'an epithalamium upon Solomon's marrying Pharaoh's 'daughter, must suppose that it is foretold, that Solo'mon was to have a numerous progeny by her, whom he 'would set up for princes and rulers, up and down the 'world. (Ps. xlv. 16.) But this cannot be true: for, be'side that, we read not of any children Solomon had by 'Pharaoh's daughter. Rehoboam, who succeeded him, 'was the son of Naamah, an Ammonitess. And so far 'was he from being able to set up his sons to rule over 'other countries, that it was with great difficulty his suc'cessors kept two tribes of the twelve steadfast to them.' —Certainly, "a greater than Solomon was here." (Bp. Pierce.) Very many other suppositions, by which the prophecies, concerning Christ, are explained away, or enervated, by men called Christians, might be shown to be equally absurd, if the nature of this publication would admit of more than a specimen.

V. 10—12. (Note, Ps. cii. 25—27.) The psalm, whence these verses are quoted, seems to be a prayer of the afflicted church of Israel for the coming of her expected Deliverer; yet we might not have discovered that the Son was personally addressed in this passage, had not the apostle led our attention to it in this view. But considering it in connexion with other Scriptures, and remembering that the ancient prophets continually spake of their expected Messiah, we shall perceive a propriety in the church under affliction addressing herself to him as her unchangeable Friend. He had in the beginning created the heavens and the earth: these would at length wax old and wear out as a garment, but he would remain possessed of infinite power and perfection; at the appointed period, therefore, he would lay them aside, with as much ease as a man folds up a garment, and changes it for another, and so introduce "new heavens and a new earth, wherein "dwelleth righteousness;" and still he would continue the same "yesterday, to day, and for ever." (xiii. 8.)—Probably, many of the Hebrews were prepared to understand this psalm of the Messiah, as well as the others: it is, however, to us a most explicit testimony to the Deity of Christ, as one with the Father, the Creator of all things; and they, who labour to prove that the Father was spoken of by the apostle, must think that he reasons inconclusively, yea, absurdly; for what had the quotation, in that case, to do with Christ's superiority to the angels?

V. 13, 14. (Notes, vii. Ps. cx. Matt. xxii. 42—46. Marg. Ref.) JEHOVAH had never spoken to any angel in such language as was contained in another well-known prophecy of the Messiah, in which he called him to sit, as a mighty Prince, on his right hand, till he had crushed and put under his feet all those who presumed to rebel against his authority. Did not the Hebrews well know that all the angels, even the most exalted of them, were so far from possessing such supreme and universal authority, that they all were worshipping spirits, and servants of the Lord, to execute his commands with unreserved submission; and that they were sent forth by him to minister to those of the human race, who were appointed to be the heirs of salvation? Their willing and delightful obedience to such commands, and their loving services to such inferior and sinful creatures, for the Lord's sake, showed a most excellent disposition, and was worthy of imitation; yet no homage or worship were due to them on that account: on the contrary, they were joint worshippers of JEHOVAH, whom they adored in the person of Christ, the incarnate Son of God, and the Saviour of sinful men. As therefore such things were spoken of the Messiah, immensely above what was said of angels in the sacred scriptures, it was absurd to expect a mere man, or a temporal kingdom, or to suppose that this glorious Lord would come to confirm and continue that dispensation, which had been given by the ministration of angels.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

We can never sufficiently bless our God, that he hath, in so many ways, and with such increasing clearness, spoken concerning salvation to us fallen sinners: and especially that he hath sent the message of mercy to us, by his well-beloved Son, whose dignity gives authority to every appointment, and certainty to every truth and promise. That the First-begotten of the Father, the Heir of all things, by whom all worlds were created, and by the word of whose power all things are upheld; who is the Effulgency of the divine glory, and the manifestation of the divine perfections, should "by himself purge our "sins," is a mystery of love, which exceeds, and overwhelms, all our admiration, praise, and gratitude. Now having sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high; angels, principalities, and powers, are subject to him, who inheriteth a far more excellent name than they. Let us not then, absurdly and ungratefully refuse him our adorations, whilst all the angels of God worship him! For our salvation he abased himself, that he might redeem us to God with his blood; and shall we on that account refuse to adore and "honour him, even as we honour the "Father that sent him?"

V. 5—14.

We should never forget, that all the enemies of Christ will at length be put under his feet; and that all, who will not have him to reign over them, are his enemies. Let us then seek mercy of our God, in that way which glorifies his justice also: let us bow to the sceptre of our Redeemer's grace; put our souls under his protection; and seek that renewal of our hearts, which will make us delight in obeying his holy commands, and render us like him in "loving righteousness and hating iniquity." In proportion as we are anointed with "the oil of gladness" from his fulness, and as members of his mystical body, this will be our character: and "if any man have not "the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." We cannot indeed serve him as angels do, who excel in strength, and are like a vehement wind, or the swift lightning, in executing his mandates: but we may copy their love, their alacrity and humility, in ministering at his word to the poorest of the heirs of salvation, who are thus more royally attended than the mightiest of ungodly men. Surely then we should deem none of our brethren, nor any of their concerns, beneath us; but, like these pure spirits, should count it our honour to do them good for Christ's sake. Such humiliation and self-abasement will make way for our exaltation to be equal with the angels, yea, to sit down with Christ upon his throne; when he, who at first created the world, shall, with unchangeable power, destroy it as a worn-out garment, and make all things new: and when all they, whose hearts and hopes were placed on its perishing treasures and fading glories, will be driven from his presence into everlasting misery.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—4. The apostle paused, after his proof of Christ's pre-eminent dignity, to make some application of his doctrine. The Hebrews, and all to whom the Gospel came, ought to give the more earnest, believing, and obedient attention to what they had heard, because of the majesty of the Speaker, and the gracious nature of his words. It was incumbent on those, who professed Christianity, to apply their minds with increasing reverence to these important subjects, lest at any time, through temptation, worldly cares and pleasures, or persecution, they should be induced to let them slip, or run out as water from a leaky vessel. This aptly represents the treachery of the memory, respecting spiritual things, and the way in which good instructions, convictions, or affections, gradually vanish, and no abiding change is made, or effect produced by them. The Jews counted the authority of the law to be the greater, and its perpetuity the more indubitable, because it was spoken by angels, as employed by Jehovah in delivering it to their fathers from mount Sinai; (Note, Acts vii. 53.) But if the word spoken by ministering spirits was steadfast, so that Jehovah would not permit any of the people to transgress in any way without inflicting on them merited punishment, how could they escape his vengeance, who neglected the great salvation of the Gospel? The greatness of the Saviour who created and upholds all things; the immensity of the price paid by him for this salvation; the depth of the misery from whence he saves his people, and their perishing need of it; its entire freeness to the chief of sinners who seek for it, without limitation or exception; the infinite provision made for the supply of all their wants, and the glorious felicity in which it terminates; all these things unite in rendering it worthy to be called "so great "salvation," even so great a salvation that it surpasses all conception. To refuse this invaluable blessing, from pride, love of the world, and sin, or attachment to superstitious vanities; to neglect it through sloth, procrastination, and aversion to the means of grace, or a fear of persecution; and to oppose or corrupt it from enmity to God and holiness, not only leave men under the curse of the law, but incur the condemnation of treating the truth of God as a lie, of despising his mercy, defying his justice and power, and rejecting his most gracious and urgent overtures to a reconciliation. How then can such persons escape the wrath to come? This salvation first began to be published in the fullest display of it under the Gospel dispensation, by the Lord himself appearing in human nature, as the great Prophet of the Church. He deigned to be the preacher of this great salvation; and after his ascension into heaven to appear in the presence of God for us, it was confirmed to the Jews and others, by his apostles and evangelists, who had been eye-witnesses of his glory, had heard his doctrine, and received their commission immediately from him. Moreover, God bore witness to their doctrine, as that of his beloved Son, by various miraculous powers exercised by them, and conferred on others also, and by the gifts of his Holy Spirit, dispensed to them according to his own sovereign will. So that the condescension of the Son of God, in becoming incarnate, and in first publishing his doctrine by his own personal ministry, his exaltation, and the subsequent sending of his ambassadors with such divinely attested credentials, to preach salvation to sinners, concurred in calling their attention from the abrogated Mosaic dispensation to Christianity.

V. 5—9. The argument, concerning the Messiah's superiority to the angels, is here resumed. "The world "to come," or the future age or dispensation, was a phrase in use among the Jews, denoting the times of the Messiah, of which the apostle was discoursing: and it is observable that he uses it only in this epistle. (Marg. Ref.) This period began at the first coming of Christ, and will continue till his second coming. Now, it is not subjected to angels, but to him whom all the angels worshipped and obeyed; nor were they ministerially employed in the introduction of it, as they had been in the giving of the law.—This had been implied in what was spoken by one in a certain place, with which the Hebrews were well acquainted, (Notes, &c. Ps. viii.) In a view of the starry heavens, those majestic displays of God's creating power, David had exclaimed, "What is man, &c.?" The words might indeed be explained of the attention and kindness of God to so inconsiderable a creature as man, amidst the immensity of his works. He had made him at first in some degree inferior to the angels, but he had crowned him with glory and honour, and made him lord of this lower creation. Yet, as man had soon fallen from his original dignity, had lost his crown of honour, and retained but an imperfect dominion over the creatures; and as the Messish was intended to be the chief Glory and Blessing of the fallen race; so the Psalmist might properly be considered as "in Spirit" speaking of him, and of JEHOVAH's being mindful of and visiting the human race, by giving his own Son to become the Son of man for their salvation. Indeed, if the words were exactly weighed, it would be found that they had not received a full accomplishment in any other sense; for if God put all things in subjection under the feet of the Son of man, it must follow, that there was nothing left that was not put in subjection under him: whereas it was manifest, that all things, even here on earth, (not to speak of other worlds,) were not thus put in subjection to man, for many of the creatures scorned to bear his yoke, and some even made war against him. But believers, looking to Jesus, saw the accomplishment of the words in his exaltation, and the event of it; he had become a little lower than the angels, by appearing in the likeness of sinful flesh, that he might be capable of suffering death; but speedily he had been, as the Son of man, crowned with glory and honour, placed on the mediatorial throne, invested with universal dominion, and made Head over all things to his Church. So that, in fact, all things in heaven and earth, and under the earth, were put in subjection to him; and, though some for a time refuse to submit to him, they must all at length either be his willing servants, or be crushed under his feet as enemies. (Note, 1 Cor. xv. 24—28.) Thus, by means of his humiliation, he became capable of dying; and, by his subsequent exaltation, he was enabled to apply the benefits of his death to his people; and so he tasted death in all its bitterness, for the benefit of every man, who came to trust in his salvation; which constitution was the effect of the plenteous mercy and free favour of God to our rebellious race, as the Psalmist had intimated; nor could that grace ever be sufficiently admired. Little lower. (9.) Many expositors suppose the original to mean, "lower "for a short time," that is, during the term of our Lord's humiliation on earth; but the use of the same words in the seventh verse determines its sense here; yet there it can have no reference to time, unless we explain the Psalm as a prophecy of Christ exclusively, without allowing that either Adam or his posterity were at all intended. It is, indeed, argued, that Jesus was made, in human nature, immensely lower than the angels, being "despised "and rejected of men," and considered as one of the most abject of the human race. This objection, however, seems to be of no validity; for his real dignity and excellency as man, and not the opinion of others concerning him, are meant. He was in human nature, as the first Adam had been, "a little lower than the angels;" and being made like us in all things, sin alone excepted, he became capable of suffering and death, which angels are exempted from. In these respects he was "made a little "lower than the angels;" but, in all other things, he, even as man in his lowest humiliation, was but little lower than they, being vastly superior to all others of the human race, not excepting Adam himself before the fall. Beza thinks that the apostle includes the future glorification of believers, as one with Christ, and as sharing his glory. Taste death. (9.) Some explain these words as signifying the pain which our Lord endured in dying; and others, as marking the short time during which he continued dead; but the expression seems to have been in use among the Jews, merely denoting, to die. (Marg. Ref.) Every man. The word man is not in the original, and some think that the apostle meant, 'every one of those 'many sons, who shall be brought to glory.' (10.) The death of Christ is indeed sufficient for all men, and the proposal of the benefit should be made to every man; yet none but believers eventually share the blessing.

V. 10—13. Whatever the Jews might object to the sufferings and crucifixion of him, who was preached to them as their Messiah, yet it certainly became the eternal God, for whose glory, and by whose power, all things were created, and are upheld and governed, to adopt this method. It had not only pleased him as a Sovereign to do this, but it was admirably suited to manifest the glory of all his perfections; yea, it was necessary for the harmonious display of them. Having, therefore, purposed to adopt as children an innumerable company of Adam's fallen race, he was pleased in his infinite wisdom and love to appoint them a Captain, who should call them forth out of their state of sin and misery, and lead them through life and death to his eternal glory. The word, rendered "in bringing," agrees with that translated "Captain," not with "Him," in the preceding clause. But it was proper that this Captain, Prince, or Commander, (Is. iv. 4,) who leads countless millions of fallen sinners, as the adopted children of God, to victory over Satan, sin, the world, and death, and to eternal glory; that this Author of their salvation should be "made perfect" through sufferings; that is, perfectly authorized to, as well as qualified for, every part of that most important work. For, by assuming human nature, and humbling himself to the death upon the cross for our sins, he made the salvation of sinners consistent with divine justice, and showed us the way of fighting the good fight of faith, and pressing forward to the conqueror's crown. Thus Jesus, who purifieth his people from guilt and sin, and consecrateth them to God, and they who are thus sanctified by him, "are all of one," that is, of one father Adam; or, as speaking to the Jews, the apostle might mean Abraham. He became one with us in human nature, in order that his sufferings might atone for our sins, and that we might be justified by his righteousness; for which cause, he is not ashamed to own us as his brethren, notwithstanding his glorious majesty and perfect holiness, and our meanness, guilt, and pollution. Thus, in a remarkable prophecy of his sufferings and subsequent glory, (Notes, &c. Ps. xxii.) he had been introduced as saying, (22.) "I will declare thy name unto my brethren," and as engaging to celebrate the praises of JEHOVAH in his Church of redeemed sinners. In another place, where the Messiah's deliverances, victories, and kingdom, were predicted under the type of David, he spake as man, of "trusting in the LORD," amidst his trials, even as his brethren did, (Ps. xviii. 2:) and by another prophet, he had said, "behold I, and the children, which God hath "given me;" (Notes, &c. Is. viii. 18;) this implied the same equality of nature and endeared affection, as the relation of brethren. (Note, Matt. xxviii. 10. John xx. 17. Rom. viii. 29.) Many things in the eighth of Isaiah are evidently prophetical of the Messiah, and as such are quoted repeatedly in the New Testament; (Marg. Ref. Notes, Is. viii.) and, no doubt, the text here adduced was understood of him by the learned Jews, when the apostle wrote; for he was well acquainted with their sentiments, and would not have quoted it in a sense different from the usual interpretation, in an argumentative discourse, without attempting to establish the novel interpretation by cogent reasonings. (Note, i. 5—7.)

V. 14, 15. As, therefore, the children, of whom Christ spake by the prophet, even his elect people whom he had undertaken to redeem, were partakers of flesh and blood, or of the human nature, he also voluntarily condescended to partake of the same, in order that he might stand in the nearest relation to them, and so most properly become their Surety and representative, as well as be made capable of suffering and dying for them; that by so doing he might, as to them, abolish the reign of death, by destroying the dominion of the devil, who hath the power of death. For Satan, by seducing man into sin, first brought him under the sentence of death; and every man must be exposed to the sting, the terror, the stroke, and the consequences of death, whilst he continues unpardoned and unconverted; and the devil, as accuser and executioner, may have much power in inflicting or aggravating them. But the atonement of Christ made way for the deliverance of his people from Satan's bondage, and for the pardon of their sins through faith: then the devil loses his power in respect of death also; they are delivered from its sting, its terror, and its consequences; whilst inward peace and hope reconcile them to its stroke, and the whole will terminate in their glorious resurrection to eternal life. Thus Christ "delivered those, who all their life-time had been "subject to bondage through fear of death." Whatever pride, ambition, and desperate passions may sometimes effect, or perpetrate, the fear of death is universal, and in some degree enslaves all mankind; the juster apprehensions men have of God and eternal things, the greater must be their dread of death and its awful consequences, except as faith in Christ deliver them. Many of those who have been enslaved by it, during the former part of their lives, or at least from the time when they began seriously to reflect on the subject, are actually delivered from their terror by the Gospel, and habitually think of dying with composure and satisfaction: many, who do not before rise superior to their terrors, are entirely freed from them at that critical season; and even those believers, who fear death to the last, (as some perhaps do,) will be the more amazed at their deliverance, when, by the stroke, which they dreaded all their life-time, they find themselves perfectly freed from all that they groaned under and hated, and admitted to a felicity exceeding their largest expectations. (Note, 1 Cor. xv. 55—58.) By death. 'Had not this been added, the apostle might 'have seemed to speak very absurdly: for must God 'become Man, in order to conquer the devil? Assuredly, here was need rather of strength than weakness. 'The apostle therefore declares, that to render this victory the most glorious, it was peculiarly suitable, that 'Satan, the conqueror of man, should be laid prostrate 'by a man; and so, by the very death of a man, he might 'be destroyed, as by his own weapons. The devil is 'said to have the power of death, as from him sin sprang, 'which death followed; and as he daily tempts us to sin, 'that he may draw us with himself into the ruin of eternal death. Understand death as joined with the wrath 'of God, which, without Christ, it must necessarily be; 'nor can any thing be conceived more miserable, than to 'be under the perpetual slavery of this dread and horror.' (Beza.)

V. 16—18. The introductory words of this passage are differently interpreted. Our translation explains them of our Lord's assuming, not the nature of angels, but our nature, in order to be our Brother, Surety, and Saviour; and the mention of the seed of Abraham, from whom he descended, favours this interpretation; but the margin, and, indeed, a great majority of commentators, suppose the apostle to mean, that the eternal Son of God, when angels sinned, did not take hold of them, to preserve them from final perdition; but he took hold of fallen man, to rescue him from his dreadful doom; and this lays the firmer foundation for the subsequent inference. The seed of Abraham, however, on this interpretation, cannot mean all the natural descendants of Abraham, nor any of them exclusively; but must be understood of Abraham's believing seed, whether Jews or Gentiles; and this, though according to the apostle's manner in other places, (Rom. iv. 11—18. Gal. iii. 26—29.) is not thought a natural exposition, in his present argument. The difference, indeed, is not great, between the two interpretations. In laying hold of fallen man, and not on fallen angels, he did not assume the nature of the former into personal union with his Deity; but, by a condescension still more inconceivable, he assumed the human nature of the seed of Abraham; and this was worthy of peculiar attention: for it thus appeared that it behooved him, and he must, in order to the honourable salvation of those sinners whom he graciously owned as his brethren, be made like them in the same nature, and in all those sinless infirmities to which sin had subjected them. This was needful, in order that he might become their High Priest, making atonement and reconciliation for their sins by his sacrifice of himself, and so lay the foundation for his subsequent intercession for them; and that he might give them the firmest ground of assurance of his compassion, love, and faithfulness, in this endearing and important character. For thus he, who was One with the Father as God, became one with them as Man; and so assured them that he would attend to the interests of his brethren in the most condescending, merciful, and faithful manner, even as he would regard the glory of God the Father, before whom he acted as their High Priest. And by his voluntary humiliation and suffering for them when enemies, he gave the most endearing pledge of his love to them, and taught them, most emphatically, that he would not fail them, when they were brought to trust in him; and when his omnipotent arm could effect the purpose for which he had shed his precious blood. For in that he suffered, being tempted by Satan in the wilderness, and during his last conflicts, (whose unholy suggestions must have tortured his mind, in proportion as he abhorred, and could not be defiled, by them;) in that he endured the severest trials from man's contemptuous malice and cruelty; and in that he bore the wrath of the Father for our sins: he was able to succour such as were tempted or tried, and afflicted by God; being authorized as Mediator to exert omnipotence in supporting, comforting, and rescuing them; and having a sympathizing and most tender love for them; seeing he had passed through the same temptations himself, as far as he could do it, continuing perfectly free from sin. The ends of Christ's humiliation, death, and exaltation, are set forth in this chapter. To "taste death for every "man," to "become the Captain of our salvation," and to "lead us to glory," to "sanctify us," to "destroy death, "and him that had the power of death," to deliver us from his bondage, to become our Hight Priest to "make "reconciliation for our iniquity," having "by himself "purged our sins." (i. 3.) What unutterable blessings are these, flowing to us from "the grace of God!" and what do they imply concerning the natural state of man!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

The excellency, importance, and clearness of the Gospel, and the dignity and grace of the Redeemer, concur in calling on us to "give the more earnest heed to the "thing, which we have heard;" for unless serious recollection, fervent prayer, and reverent attention, with subsequent meditation and practice, prevent, we shall surely let divine truths run out of our minds, as water from a vessel with holes. Alas! how many hearers of this kind are found in all our congregations! and indeed we are all in some measure criminal, and foolish, in this respect. Let us then beg of God to sanctify our memories and hearts, that we may become less forgetful, and more practical, hearers of the word of life. The judgments of

CHAP. III.

The great superiority of Christ above Moses is proved and illustrated, 1—6. The Hebrews are warned not to copy the example of their unbelieving ancestors, who perished in the wilderness, 7—19.

God under the new dispensation are chiefly spiritual: but they are on that account the more to be dreaded, and "if "they, who despised Moses' law, died without mercy, "how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation" as Christ hath purchased and revealed? Blessed be God, this salvation is so great, that nothing but our neglect of it, in one way or another, can exclude us from its eternal advantages: so that the trembling penitent, who is ready to think himself too vile to be pardoned, or too polluted to be cleansed, may come to Christ with cheerful confidence, and expect from him the free gift of all that can be needful for him: and even they, who are conscious of having hitherto neglected so great salvation, may hope for the pardon of that atrocious guilt in the same manner; being assured, that "where sin hath abounded, grace shall "much more abound." Yet even partial neglects will not escape rebukes: and they, whose souls are not finally ruined, often weaken their evidence, and bring darkness upon their minds by them. Let us then mind this one thing needful: for, though we cannot sit at the Lord's feet, as they did, to whom he first began to speak the word, yet in duly attending to the writings, which were penned by those who heard the words from his gracious lips, and which have been abundantly attested to us by God himself, we shall be blessed with "that good part which cannot be "taken from us."

V. 5—13.

The glorious God hath done wonderful things for us in creation and providence, for which, alas! we have made the basest returns; but he was mindful of us, and visited us, in the most surprising manner, when he gave his own Son to be made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death in our nature and for our salvation; that, being crowned with glory and honour, and having all power given to him in heaven and earth, he might rescue every man, who believes in him, from all the effects of original and actual sin, and raise him to far higher dignity than what was lost by Adam's transgression. By the grace manifested in the incarnation of the Son of God, and the exaltation of the Son of man, the honour of our nature is eternally secured; and all our concern should be to secure an interest in this salvation. Whatever the proud, carnal, and unbelieving, may imagine or object, the spiritual mind will perceive peculiar glory in the cross of Christ, and be satisfied that it became him, (who in all things maketh the display of his own perfections his chief end,) "in bringing many sons unto glory, to make "the Author of their salvation perfect through sufferings." Wisdom, power, justice, holiness, truth, and love, beyond expression or conception, are displayed by our God, in that union which was voluntarily formed between "him that sanctifieth and them that are sanctified," when "the Word was made flesh, and tabernacled among "us," and when he "whom all angels worship," vouchsafed to become our Brother, and to own and glory in that condescending relation to us sinful worms! And what advantages may we not expect from so powerful and gracious a Friend and Brother?

V. 14—18.

When the divine Saviour saw the children, whom he had undertaken to redeem, partakers of flesh and blood, he also was pleased to partake of the same; though he knew that he must not only dwell in their nature, but bear their curse, pay their ransom, and, through death, deliver them from the old serpent, by whom sin and death entered into the world, to make havoc of the human race. For verily he took not on him the nature of angels, but "he took upon him the seed of Abraham," that we might be made the children of Abraham, and the friends of God through him! Let then sinners, who dread death, and use a variety of methods to get the better of their terrors, no longer attempt to outbrave or smother them; let them not grow outrageous or licentious through despair, nor let them expect help from the world or human inventions; but let them seek pardon, peace, grace, and lively hope of heaven, by faith in him who died and rose again; that, being rescued from Satan's power, they may be made superior to the fear of death, which hath always hitherto held them in bondage. Let the trembling believer frequently meditate on the love of Christ, and on his cross, his sepulchre, his resurrection, and his glory; and thus, in simple dependence and obedience, let him wait for more complete deliverance from the fear of death, and from that last enemy himself, in the Lord's appointed time. Let us all remember, that so deep was our ruin, and so heinous our guilt, that it behooved Jesus to become "in all things like unto us, that he might be our faith-"ful and merciful High Priest, in things pertaining to "God, to make reconciliation for the sins of his people;" that we may come to the Father only in his name, and pleading his atonement and intercession, not in the least doubting of his faithfulness and mercy towards all who come to God by him: and let the afflicted and tempted, instead of yielding to despondency, or giving place to the devil, (as if their harassing temptations rendered it improper for them to come to the Lord with their prayers,) remember, that the Saviour suffered being tempted, on purpose that he might be able to succour them that are tempted; that he hath infinite power and compassion; and that he only waits to be called in to their help, by fervent persevering prayer. May we then hear him declare to us the name of God, and teach us to celebrate his praises; and may we learn to pass through all trials and temptations, trusting in the Lord and staying ourselves upon our God; that we may at length be found among those, whom the incarnate Saviour will present before the Father's throne, saying, "Behold, I and the children whom thou "hast given me!"

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—6. From what had been advanced concerning the superiority of the Messiah to the angels, and his dignity, as the incarnate Son of God, the apostle took occasion to call the attention of the Hebrews to the offices which he performed for the benefit of his Church. He addressed them as "holy brethren," either as belonging to that nation which was relatively holy, or rather as professors of Christianity, and "partakers of the heavenly "calling," by which the Lord from heaven called them to leave the vain pursuit of earthly things, and to seek those things which are above. He exhorted them to consider and attend impartially and seriously to his words respecting Jesus the Messiah, as the apostle and the High Priest of their profession. He had been sent by the Father as his Apostle, even as he had sent others to be apostles or messengers from him to mankind; (John xx. 21.) In this respect, he more especially superseded Moses, in his prophetical office, as the law-giver of Israel, as in his high priesthood he superseded Aaron and his posterity. Of this latter office the sacred writer meant afterwards to discourse more fully; he therefore proceeded to show how superior Christ was to Moses, as it might be proved from the prophecies of his being the Son of God. He had been faithful to the Father who had appointed him to this office, and had revealed to mankind the character, truth, and will of God in the most perfect manner. Indeed, Moses had been faithful to his trust, in delivering to Israel all the commandments and statutes which God gave to him, and in ruling over the Church, which might be called his house, or the holy habitation of JEHOVAH. (Num. xii. 7.) Yet Christ must be considered as immensely superior to Moses; "for he was counted worthy," by the Father, of more glory and honour than Moses could be entitled to, even as the builder of a house is more honourable than the building, or any part of it. Thus Moses had been only a part of the house of God, or a member of his household; but Christ had created him and his whole nation; he had formed them into a Church, had arranged every thing, with supreme authority, respecting their civil and religious constitution, and given all the believers among them spiritual life, grace, wisdom, and ability: so that he was as God, the Former, Owner, and Head of the Church, even before his incarnation, though in a different manner than afterwards. For as every house is contrived, erected, furnished, and prepared for a habitation by some person, whose skill and intelligence are visible in it, so He, who built all things as Creator, and arranged all things in the church of Israel, could be no other than God himself: yet this honour the Messiah possessed, and this glorious person, at length, appeared in human nature, as the Apostle or Prophet of the Father, to introduce a new dispensation, and terminate the old one. In still plainer language, Moses had been faithful, as a servant, in the house of the Lord, to introduce the legal dispensation, which prefigured and bore witness to those things that were to be more clearly revealed in future times: but Christ was faithful, as a Son placed in authority over his own house: for the church belonged to him equally as unto the Father, though he voluntarily acted as the Prophet of the Father to mankind. This spiritual house consisted of those who had been given to him and redeemed by him, and who were called by his grace, and made "an habitation of God through the Spirit;" so that the apostle and the Hebrews professing the Gospel, whom he immediately addressed, were a part of that sacred temple in which God would delight to dwell, to manifest his presence, and to communicate his blessings for ever, if they held fast their confidence in Christ, their hope of salvation by him, and their joy and glorying in him, and were firm and steadfast in dependence on him, and obedience to him, amidst the various temptations and persecutions to which this would expose them, as this perseverance would be the proper evidence of their sincerity. Faithful. Faithfulness to God who appoints, and tenderness to man by whom he is appointed, are the two great qualifications laid down as requisite in the High Priest, here and elsewhere. (ii. 17. iv. 15. v. 2—8.) He was made perfect, as to the latter, by his assumption of our nature and his sufferings in it. His Deity, as One with the Father, secured the former. He faithfully maintained the honour and rights of God, in every part of his salvation; he was faithful in the whole revelation which he made to us of God and his will, and in performing whatever he was sent into the world to accomplish, for rendering the salvation of man consistent with the honour of God. 'The government of the Christian Church is 'entirely committed to the Lord Jesus, and he, as su'preme Head and Lord of all, governs both it, and all 'things in earth and heaven, for the good of it; and

'therefore, if he be not truly God, God doth not now 'govern the world, but hath given up the administration 'of it to a creature.' (Whitby.) The words translated, "made all things," may rather relate to the formation of the Church, than to the creation of the world; yet there can be no reasonable doubt, but that the apostle purposely intimated, that he who formed the Church also created the world; and certainly he asserted that Christ, whether as Former and Ruler of the Church, or Creator of all things, was God.

V. 7—13. This address was directed to those professed Christians who were in danger of apostatizing, or who did not seem in earnest in their religion; but it was peculiarly suited to excite the attention of such Jews also as might read it. The example of their unbelieving progenitors, and the words of their own Scriptures respecting them, were adduced with great propriety on this occasion. (Notes, Ps. xcv.) The warning given by the Holy Spirit in the days of David, with reference to more ancient events, was equally applicable to the Jews in the days of the apostle. On the present day, which might terminate their lives, or the season of the Lord's long-suffering, or deprive them of the means of grace, they were urgently entreated to attend to, and obey, the voice of God, if they ever meant to obtain his favour and escape his wrath; and not obstinately to harden their hearts, and stupify their consciences in wilful sin, by carnal prejudices and pleasures. This their fathers had done, in that provocation of Jehovah which had taken place in the wilderness; when, after all the demonstrations of his power and goodness to them, they ungratefully wearied out his patience by their aggravated rebellions. That season was peculiarly "the "day of temptation;" for their fathers acted as if they meant to try how much provocation God would bear with, before he took vengeance upon them. (Note, Ex. xvii. 2.) Wherefore he was at length so angered and grieved, by their perverse returns for his manifold favours, that he would no longer bear with that generation of Israel; for he said of them, that their wicked hearts always led them to depart from him; as they had never approved and chosen his holy ways, but had always preferred their own evil devices; he therefore irrevocably determined, and confirmed it by an oath, that they should never enter into the rest of Canaan, the type of heavenly felicity. (Notes, Num. xiii. xiv.) It therefore was incumbent upon the Hebrews to look well to themselves, lest there should be in any of them the same evil or wicked heart, the same proud, carnal, rebellious, and ungrateful temper, whence the unbelief of their ancestors had originated; and lest this should be manifested by their apostatizing from the living God: either in rejecting Christianity, or in afterwards renouncing it; for in both cases they would be deemed apostates from the living God, who now spoke to them by his beloved Son, and in no other way; and they would be punished accordingly. To prevent this, they ought also, day after day, to exhort one another to embrace and adhere to the Gospel of Christ; while the day of their personal and national probation continued; as they were shortly to be cast off from being the people of God; and that generation was about to be visited in a far more tremendous manner than their fathers had been in the wilderness. This was needful to every one, "lest any of "them should be hardened through the deceitfulness of "sin;" for their sinful propensities tended to deceive them into a persuasion, that satisfaction and impunity might be found in the world and in disobedience; and that the self-denial and suffering, connected with Christianity, were unnecessary and intolerable; and thus to delude them into negligence, procrastination, and sinful indulgence; which, producing frequent violations of the light of their own consciences, would gradually render them callous; and God might thus be provoked to give them up to fatal delusions or final obduracy. 'Seeing Moses, the servant, 'could not be despised with impunity, let them consider 'what punishment they must endure, if they despised the 'Son of God, to whom Moses himself invites them.' (Beza.) The apostle's reasoning, like that of Stephen, (Notes, Acts vii.) was suited to show, that the fathers of the Jewish nation had, in every age, been prone to resist the Holy Spirit, and those who spake by him. This had excluded the generation which came out of Egypt from Canaan, in the days of Moses: David, many ages after, was inspired, by the Holy Spirit, to warn the Israelites against imitating their unbelieving progenitors, and forfeiting spiritual blessings; and the writer of the epistle warns his contemporaries, not to exclude themselves from heaven, in the same manner as their ancestors were excluded from Canaan. In this view, there is a vast propriety in the warning and exhortation.

14 For [q] we are made partakers of Christ, [r] if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end.

15 While it is said, [s] To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts, as in the provocation.

16 For [t] some, when they had heard, did provoke: howbeit [u] not all that came out of Egypt by Moses.

V. 14—19. They, who professed the Gospel, were made partakers of Christ, and of all the blessings of his kingdom and salvation, provided they maintained the beginning of their confidence, (or their subsistence in him by faith) steadfast unto the end; and thus showed that they really were what they appeared to be. Considering, therefore, the immense advantages of perseverance, and the tremendous consequences of apostacy, they should consider the words of the Holy Spirit as if addressed to themselves. For though the whole nation of Israel had been brought out of Egypt, to hear the will of God from Moses, yet some of them, (how vast a proportion need not be said,) did provoke God to exclude them from Canaan. There were, however, some exceptions even in that devoted generation, as Joshua and Caleb, and some of the Levites, and perhaps of the women; (Note, Num. xiv. 27—30;) and thus, in the apostle's time, a remnant of Jews believed in Christ, whilst the bulk of the nation were about to perish in unbelief. Yet God had not failed of performing his promises, when he excluded that generation from Canaan; neither was it inconsistent with his justice; for with whom was he grieved, but with those obstinate transgressors, who always rebelled against him? He therefore cut them off, and their dead bodies lay by heaps in the wilderness; whilst his promises were performed to the remnant of believers, and to the children of the rebels, as they would also be in the present case. And in that particular instance, when he sware in his wrath that they should not enter into his rest, the tremendous sentence included none but the unbelievers; so that they could not enter into Caaaan because of their unbelief; nor could the Hebrews then enter into heaven, unless they believed in Jesus Christ. The original word for "believed "not," (18,) is often rendered "were disobedient," (Rom. x. 21. xv. 31. Heb. xi. 31. Marg. 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8. iii. 20;) for unbelief itself is an act of disobedience, inseparably connected with disobedience in other things, and generally the source of it. Confidence, (14.) (Marg. Ref. Note, Heb. xi. 1.) While it is said, &c. (15.) 'This 'sentence is noble; from which we learn, that the words 'of the prophets did not pertain to that one time; but that 'God, even at this day, invites us to himself, by setting 'the writings of the prophets before us.' (Beza.) This is directly opposite to the conduct of many moderns, who labour strenuously to prove, that the language of the sacred writers in many places was intended for certain descriptions of persons in their own time, and is but little, if at all, applicable to us, who are placed in very different circumstances. But, in reality, it is of comparatively small importance to us, as to religion, what the meaning of any passage in Scripture may be, if we are not concerned in it, and can, in our situation, derive no instruction, encouragement, or warning from it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

All who hear and profess the Gospel should be "holy "brethren," and all who are "partakers of the heavenly "calling" will be sanctified, and united in love, according to their measure of faith. This calling is from heaven, and brings men thither; yet we all need to be excited to consider more frequently the condescending Apostle and compassionate High Priest of our profession, Jesus Christ: and every renewed contemplation of his Person and his salvation, will suggest new instructions, or new motives to love, confidence, and obedience. The stewards and servants of God are required to be faithful in all things intrusted to them, and many have been approved as such by their common Lord. But the eternal Son of God is counted worthy of more honour, than any, or all of his servants; they are only a part of the spiritual house, of which he is the great Builder, Proprietor, and Ruler; and his new creation of the Church proclaims his eternal power and Godhead, even as do his formation and upholding of the universe. As therefore they are most absurd, who allow "every house to be builded of some man," and yet atheistically ascribe the glorious creation around them to chance or necessity; so they reason little, if at all, better, who allow Christ to be the Author of life, holiness, wisdom, strength, and salvation, to the multitudes of his people, and yet deny his real Deity. All prophets and apostles acted as servants in the house of another, to bear testimony to Christ and to honour him; but he appeared to direct and govern all things with unlimited sovereignty, as a Son over his own house. May we then belong to this spiritual building, and manifest that we do so, by holding fast our confidence, and the rejoicing of our hope in Christ, steadfast through all trials even to the end!

V. 7—19.

Alas! what numbers of professed Christians are as far from the power of true religion, as the Israelites were in the days of Moses, or the Jews in those of St. Paul! The Holy Ghost therefore still says to them, 'To-day if ye 'will hear the voice of God, and submit to his righteous- 'ness and authority; do not harden your hearts.' While sinners are procrastinating, God may be about to say, "This night shall your souls be required of you:" how infatuated then must they be to close their eyes and harden their hearts against conviction, to run into dissipation and worldly lusts, and to yield to sloth and make delays in such a perilous situation! Thus, like the ancient rebels in Israel, they provoke and tempt God, till, being grieved by their obstinacy, and their carnal enmity to him and his ways, he swears in his wrath that they shall never enter into his rest. Let then such triflers and loiterers on the brink of the bottomless pit look well to themselves, for evil is before them. Let them remember that their unbelief springs from the wickedness of their hearts; for they must be conscious that their excuses, their delays, and even their objections to doctrines and preachers, arise from covetousness, or sensuality; from pride, and an aversion to the life of faith and holiness. We all, however, have need to exhort one another daily, or whilst the day of life and grace continue, lest sin should first deceive, and then harden us, till negligences and offences in lighter things terminate in more daring crimes or open apostacy. The happiness of being partakers of Christ, as our complete salvation and eternal portion, and the fear of God's wrath and eternal misery, combine to put us upon our guard against hypocrisy and apostacy, and to excite us to persevere in the life of obedient faith. Let us then beware of trusting to outward privileges or profession, remembering that unbelief and disobedience will exclude men from God's promised rest, and that nothing else can do it; and let us pray to be numbered with that remnant of believers who will enter heaven, when all others shall be refused admission because of their unbelief.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1, 2. The awful justice of JEHOVAH towards his ancient people, when they believed not, called aloud on their descendants "to fear," with a humble and jealous distrust of their own hearts, a diligent self-examining attention to every means of grace, and a careful watchfulness against temptation, lest they should fall under a still more terrible condemnation. A promise indeed of "entering into rest," under the Messiah and in heaven, had been left them in the scriptures, as a legacy from their believing progenitors, for whose sake they had been thus favoured; and they were called on by the preaching of the Gospel to partake of that promised benefit; but it behooved them to fear, lest any of them should be seen to come short of it, and so be excluded from heaven, as their fathers had been from Canaan; or even lest they should seem to themselves, or to others, to be in danger of doing this, either during their lives, or when death approached; and this must be the case, if they rejected or renounced the Gospel, and would probably be so, if they grew remiss or wavering in their profession of it. For the glad tidings of entering into this rest had been preached to the Hebrews, even as they had more obscurely been declared to their fathers; whose unbelief and consequent disobedience had excluded them from Canaan, and from that better rest of heaven typified by it. For the word of hearing had not profited them, because "not "being mixed with faith," or joined by the faith of the hearers; as these were destitute of faith, by which they might receive the word into their hearts, for the appropriation of the benefit, and to render it a principle of obedience. And, in like manner, the clearer revelation of the Gospel would be unprofitable to the Hebrews, unless they had faith in it, and so received it in a dependent and obedient manner. Of all that vast multitude which fell in the wilderness, not one came short of Canaan, by the power of any enemy, or because of his past sins, or present weakness; or for any other cause, but the want of true faith; and none that hear the Gospel are excluded from heaven, on any account whatever, except through unbelief. 'He proves, that the promise to give Abra'ham and his Seed the land of Canaan, for an everlasting 'possession, was really a promise to give believers of all 'nations the everlasting possession of the heavenly country, 'of which Canaan was the emblem; and that the oath 'which excluded the rebellious Israelites in the wilder'ness from Canaan, likewise excluded from the heavenly 'country all that continue in their sins. So that, in this 'ancient oracle, a future state, with its rewards and 'punishments, was actually made known to the Jews.' (Macknight.)

[q] some must enter therein, and [r] they to whom * it was first preached [s] entered not in because of unbelief:

7 (Again, he limiteth a certain day, [t] saying in David, [u] To-day, [x] after so long a time; as it is said, To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts.

8 For if † Jesus [y] had given them rest, then would he not afterward have spoken of another day.

9 There [z] remaineth therefore, ‡ a rest to [a] the people of God.

10 For [b] he that is entered into his rest, he also [c] hath ceased from his own works, [d] as God did from his.)

11 [e] Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest, [f] lest any man fall after the same example of § unbelief.

V. 3—11. The apostle laid it down as a principle, that they who believed, and they only, entered into that rest which was especially intended: they had the title to that inheritance, and earnests of it, in peace with and confidence in God, delight in his love and service, hope and joy through the power of the Holy Spirit, and a full persuasion that happiness could only be found in the favour and salvation of the Lord Jesus. It was evident that more was meant than the rest of Canaan, in the scriptures referred to, as God had called it his rest, with allusion to the appointment of the sabbath, though the works of creation from which he ceased, and in which he rested with infinite satisfaction, as being "very good," had been finished from the foundation of the world; above two thousand five hundred years before he spake thus of the unbelieving Israelites; for it was thus written in a passage of scripture, well known to the Hebrews, concerning the original institution of the sabbath, (Note, Gen. ii. 1, 2.) And yet he spake so long after, that they "should not "enter his rest," which implied that the rest of Israel in Canaan would be a type of a more spiritual and sacred rest, satisfaction, and felicity, in him and his glory, (in some degree resembling his complacency in his own perfect work of creation,) which would be conferred on his believing people. The exclusion of the generation from Canaan, to whom that rest was first preached or proposed, implied that it remained for some others to enter in, which their posterity accordingly did; and the language denoted, that while, through unbelief, numbers of them came short of the better rest of heaven, yet it was purposed that some should enter in by faith. In confirmation of which, another day was limited by the Holy Spirit in the prophet David, many ages afterwards, during which believers would enter into rest, but after which unbelievers would be irrevocably excluded. Now, as this was addressed to those who were actually in possession of the promised land, and at the height of their prosperity as a nation, it evidently related to another and better rest than that of Canaan, from which unbelief would exclude even the inhabitants of that good land. For if Jesus, (or Joshua, as it would have been better rendered, to prevent mistake and ambiguity,) had given them all the rest intended for believers, God would not so long after have spoken "of another day." Joshua had indeed given Israel rest from the fatigues and wanderings of the desert, and from the hardships and perils of war, by their settlement in Canaan, yet there evidently remained for the true people of God another and better rest, even the keeping of a perpetual and most blessed sabbath; for the word is changed to express the idea the more strongly. This was reserved for them in heaven, where they have done with sin, temptation, pain, conflict, fear, death, labour, and disappointment, and enjoy uninterrupted, unalloyed, ineffable, and eternal delight, in God and his holy worship and service. This point the apostle argued from the Old Testament so carefully, because the Sadducees entirely denied that any better recompense than temporal prosperity was to be expected, and the Jews in general were prone to overlook the spiritual blessings proposed to them in the promises made to their fathers, and to rest wholly in the temporal sanctions of the national covenant made with them at mount Sinai. (Notes, Ex. xix. 1—15.) He therefore added, that he, who had entered into his rest, had ceased from his own works, in which he had previously been occupied, even as God ceased from creating when he rested on the sabbath-day. Thus Jesus had finished his work on earth, and had entered into his rest in heaven, as the Fore-runner of his people; thus the souls of the righteous have ceased from their self-denying labours, and are enjoying their gracious recompense: and thus the believer, when brought to rest in the mercy and love of God, through Jesus Christ, ceases from all his allowed works of sin and folly, as well as from his vain endeavours to establish his own righteousness, or to effect his own happiness. As such blessings therefore were surely attainable by those who diligently sought them; and as the promised rest would so abundantly repay their previous hardships and conflicts: it behooved them to labour in the use of all appointed means, and in the persevering attendance on every duty, to enter into this rest, and to obtain the assurance and earnest of it; fearing, lest any of them should fall under condemnation, after the same example of unbelief, by which their ancestors had been excluded from Canaan. The apostle's reasoning, from the Old Testament, concerning another rest, entirely distinct from the rest in Canaan; even "the keeping of a sabbath re- "served for the people of God," which unbelievers even in Canaan came short of, is as conclusive against all those moderns, who labour to prove, that the doctrine of a future state of righteous retribution was no part of the religion of Israel; as against the ancient Sadducees. The proof of this doctrine, from comparing two passages in the books of Moses, with one in the Psalms, is as clear and conclusive, as our Lord's proof of the resurrection by what JEHOVAH said to Moses from the bush; and, probably, the apostle knew the Pharisees in general would have allowed, that all who rejected it, "erred, not knowing the scrip- "tures."

12 For [g] the word of God [h] is quick, and powerful, and [i] sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, [k] and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart.

13 Neither [l] is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight: but all things are [m] naked, and opened unto the eyes of him [n] with whom we have to do.

14 Seeing then that we have [o] a great High Priest, [p] that is passed into the heavens, [q] Jesus the Son of God, [r] let us hold fast our profession.

15 For [s] we have not an High Priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points [t] tempted like as we are, [u] yet without sin.

16 Let us therefore [x] come boldly unto [y] the throne of grace, that we may [z] obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.

V. 12, 13. It hath been greatly controverted whether the holy scriptures, or the personal Word of God, be meant in these verses; but St. Paul never calls our Lord by this title, and it appears to me that the apostle meant the written word, and that he gradually passed from the word spoken, to him who spake it. The Hebrews needed not be surprised to find such deep and interesting truths couched under the typical events of their history, or contained in other parts of their scriptures, for they were "the word of God." This was no lifeless, feeble, or formal instruction, like the traditions and glosses of the scribes, but it was a living, active, energetic word, suited to be the instrument of the Holy Spirit in quickening those that were dead in sin, and in awakening, convincing, and alarming the most careless and insensible of mankind. It was even sharper than any two-edged sword, which would cut each way; for it would pierce the heart and conscience like the irresistible lightning, forcing convictions and alarms upon the most haughty and obstinate; showing men their past and present sins in all their odiousness and aggravations; detecting the unsuspected pride, enmity, rebellion, ingratitude, and other evils of the heart; distinguishing men's characters with the clearest evidence, and exposing the base motives of their most specious actions. Thus, by exhibiting the glory of the divine perfections; men's relations and obligations to the great Creator; the spirituality, extent, excellency, and sanction of the law; the evil and desert of sin, and the depravity of the human hearts, in a variety of ways and a multiplicity of experiments; it forces conviction of guilt and danger upon the sinner, and compels him, as it were, to condemn himself and seek deliverance; nor can any kind of delusion or hypocrisy stand before its penetrating energy, when experimentally and fully preached, and applied to the hearts of men according to their various characters. It is, as it were, a sword which can pierce so deep and cut so keenly, as to divide between soul and spirit, (1 Thes. v. 23.) and to penetrate the joints and marrow, which no other sword can reach; being, in plain language, a discerner of men's most secret thoughts and intentions: so that it often shows them their most hidden purposes, and makes them afraid of being openly named and exposed; as if the preacher knew their hearts far better than they did themselves, and had a register before him even of those sins which they had forgotten. (Marg. Ref.) Thus "the word of God," is "the sword of the Spirit," in the hands of Christ, as well as in the hands of his people. For the Lord himself is the Speaker, when his own word is properly declared and applied; he discerns, and, by his word, detects, the thoughts and intentions of the heart; nor is there any creature, who is not wholly manifest in every respect in his sight, before whom all things are naked, as stripped of all disguise, and open, being fully understood by him "with whom we have to do," as with our Lawgiver and Judge, and to whom we must at length render an account of all our conduct, and of all our most secret thoughts, motives, and intentions. The expressions, "naked and "open," are supposed to refer to the sacrifices, which were flayed and opened, and cleft down the chine, and then every part of the body and of the intestines, that were before concealed, were exposed to the exact inspection of the priest.

V. 14—16. As, therefore, conviction and condemnation were inevitable to sinners before an omniscient Judge, whose quick and powerful word forced men even here to condemn themselves, it was the more needful for the Hebrews to regard the great High Priest, whom he was recommending to them, even Jesus the Son of God, who, having appeared in human nature, as in the court of the sanctuary, to offer his atoning sacrifice, had passed through the intervening heavens into the immediate presence of the Father, (as the high-priest passed through the first sanctuary into the holiest of all, to sprinkle the blood and burn the incense on the great day of expiation,) and was accepted in his ministrations, and invested with all power in heaven and earth to save or to destroy; it behooved them to hold fast the profession of the Gospel in all dangers and persecutions. For they had not a High Pries who disregarded or could not sympathize with them in their pains and sufferings for his sake, or who would make no allowance for their infirmities, or refuse assistance in their temptations; but he was One, who, to procure their pardon and salvation, had voluntarily submitted to be tried and tempted, even as they were, as far as he could be without a sinful nature, or the least sin in his life; and this exemption was needful, in order that he might be their Sacrifice and their Advocate. As therefore there was a mercy-seat above the ark of the covenant in the most holy place, before which the high-priests once a year appeared in behalf of the people, and over which the glory of God was displayed, as propitious to them: even so, God the Father was, as it were, placed on a throne of grace, a mercy-seat, in the heavenly sanctuary, before which Jesus appeared as the High Priest of his people, through whom he waited to receive petitions, to grant pardons, and to communicate blessings, to all who applied for them in humble faith and by fervent prayer. Let then every one of them, before they were summoned to the throne of judgment, come with humble confidence in Christ, and in the love of the Father through him, to supplicate forgiveness and mercy, and to ask for seasonable and sufficient grace, to support, comfort, strengthen, and sanctify them, as their trials and services required: not fearing a refusal, but boldly and freely, yet with reverence and lowliness, enlarging and multiplying their requests, as fully assured of their heavenly Father's readiness to do for them even "more than they could ask or think."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

Blessed be God, that the Gospel is preached to us, even as to the primitive Christians, and far more clearly than to Israel of old! Exceedingly great and precious promises are given to us of entering into the heavenly rest: yet we should "rejoice with trembling," in our outward advantages, lest any of us should be found at last to come short of the blessing, and to sink under proportionably deeper condemnation, through unbelief. Nay, it is a very dreadful consequence of a wavering profession, or a lax and negligent conduct, that it often causes men to seem to come short, even when they are launching into eternity; and they leave the world in gloomy doubt, and their survivors in distressing uncertainty, whether they are gone to heaven or to hell. Let us then "give diligence, that we may "have an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom "of our Lord." Under every dispensation God hath declared man's rest to be in him and his love, as the only suitable and sufficient happiness of the soul; and faith in his promises, through his Son, as the only way of entering into that rest. His rich mercy, the plenteous redemption of Christ, and the word of the Gospel, will not profit those who do not unite faith with his gracious message; for many have heard and professed the truth, who are finally excluded from the promised rest because of their unbelief; their state is determined, and all their sabbaths and ordinances have only served to increase their condemnation. Many thousands join them every day, to whom, could we address them, we could only say, 'Had you attended yes'terday, it might have been well; now it is too late.' To survivors, however, we may still say, "To-day if ye will "hear my voice," and the present is an accepted time and a day of salvation. Many, also, are continually entering into the earnest and beginning of this rest by faith: and others into the full possession of it, by dying in the Lord. Then they have done with all their sorrows, sins, and temptations, and their groans and tears are exchanged for unalloyed and perfect serenity and satisfaction. Let sinners then labour to enter into this rest, lest they should fall after the example of ancient unbelievers, and perish with heaven before their eyes: let believers keep close to Christ by faith and obedience, and learn to delight in his holy day and sacred ordinances, as earnests of their expected eternal sabbath, and preparations for it: let them bear up under fatigues and hardships, in the prospect of heavenly rest; and, if ever drawn aside, let them recollect these things, and say to themselves, "Return unto thy rest, O my soul." (Ps. cxvi. 7.)

V. 12—16.

While we find, by experience, that "the word of God "is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged "sword," to penetrate the heart and conscience, let us remember that the Lord himself is the Discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart, before whom all creatures are manifest, and all things are naked and open. With him we have to do, and to him we are accountable; and if, under faithful preaching, we find our hearts condemn us, we are sure that "God is greater than our "hearts, and knoweth all things." Instead, therefore, of quarrelling with the heart-searching ministry, and choosing such lifeless, feeble instructions, as are more like a shaken reed than a two-edged sword, let us lay open our inmost souls to the piercing strokes of the distinguishing word of God, that we may learn our need of that great High Priest, even the Son of God, who now pleads for us before his Father's throne in heaven. In proportion as we know and condemn ourselves, and abhor our sins, he will become more and more precious to our souls, and we shall cleave to him more constantly. The thoughts of the holiness and heart-seaching knowledge of God, and our consciousness of guilt and infirmity, will endear to us the Redeemer's condescension and compassion; and we shall rejoice that he can be "touched with the feeling of our "infirmities," and that he knows what sore temptations mean, though he was perfectly free from sin. Let us then approach continually to the throne of grace, where our reconciled God deems it his peculiar honour to pardon rebels, and answer the prayers of those who supplicate his favour in the name of his beloved Son: let us improve the day of his patience, and approach in his appointed way: let us come with believing boldness, as well as with adoring reverence and humble repentance: let us seek for mercy to pardon our sins, to compassionate our miseries, and to supply our necessities: and let as supplicate grace sufficient for us in all our trials and temptations, and to enable us for every day's service; thus waiting as humble pensioners at the throne of grace, which is our best preparation for appearing before the tribunal of our omniscient and holy Judge.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—4. In order more fully to show the nature and efficacy of the high priesthood of Christ, the apostle made some observations on that of Aaron, which tended to manifest its insufficiency, and to point out its typical meaning, as well as to illustrate his subject. Every high priest, selected from among men, was ordained and appointed for the benefit of man in the great concerns of religion. That office required him who sustained it to present before God the oblations and sin-offerings of the people; nor would he accept of any services that were not offered in this way, which continually testified that sinners were unworthy to approach their offended Creator, save through an expiatory sacrifice and an intercessor. For as the high priest was the head of the whole priesthood, so all the other priests were descended from Aaron, who had first obtained this office in Israel, and, were in some sense, one with him. It was, moreover, proper that the high priest should be capable of compassionating, in a proportionate and reasonable manner, his brethren, who had sinned through ignorance and infirmity, for which their sin-offerings were appointed; and this was provided for, by ordaining men of like passions with others to that office, who being conpassed with natural and moral infirmities, were as liable to mistake or sin as they. It was therefore prescribed, that they should offer sacrifices for their own sins, as well as for those of the people, which was a plain intimation, that they could only be typical high priests, being not worthy to appear before God in their own cause, but with the shedding of blood. (Marg. Ref. and notes on the Scriptures referred to.) Nor might any man assume this honourable office of his own will, or by human appointment, but it was confined to those whom God expressly called to the execution of it, as he did Aaron, and his posterity after him: and if any one else presumed to perform any part of its peculiar duties, he did it at the hazard of his life, which showed, that it derived all its efficacy from the appointment of God, and not from its own intrinsic value.

V. 5, 6. According to these prefigurations, Christ had not taken honour to himself, by acting as the High Priest of his people, without express warrant; but the Father had in the Old Testament openly declared that the Messiah should sustain that office; for as he said in one place, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee," when announcing his decree concerning the Messiah's kingdom; (Notes, i. 5. Ps. ii.) so had he as expressly made known his appointment to the priesthood in another prophecy, (Notes, Ps. cx.) though the Jews had paid more regard to the predictions of his kingdom, than to those of his priesthood, through their prejudices for the Levitical law. Many expositors, interpreting the expression, "This day have I begotten thee," of Christ's resurrection, (though that was only the proof, and not, in any sense, the cause or origin, of his Sonship,) have strangely argued that he did not officiate as a priest till after he arose from the dead! But the typical meaning of the legal ceremonies will sufficiently expose the gross absurdity of this supposition as we proceed with the subject.

V. 7—10. Though our Lord was free from all sinful infirmity, yet he came as near the condition of a sinner as he possibly could; he was compassed about with the sinless infirmities of our frail nature; he "appeared in the "likeness of sinful flesh;" he was dealt with as a sinner, both by God and man; he endured the most violent temptations, sufferings, and agonies; and even his soul was full of consternation and of horror unspeakable. This was "in the days of his flesh," subsequent to his incarnation, and previous to his exaltation, when his human nature became incapable of suffering, and was made inconceivably glorious, (Note, 1 Cor. xv. 50.) His humiliation, and distress were extreme in his agonies in the garden. (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 36—42. Luke xxii. 40—44.) Then especially he offered up to his Father most earnest prayers, and supplications, accompanied with strong cries and tears, 11 Of whom [e] we have many things to say, and hard to be uttered; seeing ye are [f] dull of hearing.

12 For when [g] for the time ye ought to be [h] teachers, ye have need that one [i] teach you again, which be [k] the first principles of [l] the oracles of God; and are become such [m] as have need of milk, and not of strong meat.

as vehement expressions of his inward anguish: he addressed himself to God, as able to save him from death, and he was heard and answered because of his piety, his reverence of the divine Majesty, his love, and his zeal for the glory of the Father. Or, as most commentators explain it, "He was heard, and delivered from his fear." No doubt the most distressing dread of that awful wrath of God against our sins, which he had undertaken to endure, was one cause of our Lord's agony in the garden. This might well oppress his human soul, without his having the least apprehension that he should finally sink under it, or come short of "the joy set before him;" the least distrust of the Father's faithfulness to his engagement; any defect in his patience and submission, or any degree of sin. For the prospect of the temporary, and even transient, enduring of such a load of guilt and wrath was sufficient to excite the most overwhelming consternation. Thus it appeared that he had communion with his brethren in that passion, or feeling, which is most foreign to the divine nature, even fear; and which is never ascribed to God, as many others are; and that he could sympathize with them in it, and deliver them from it.—And indeed, though he was not delivered from dying; though "the cup did not pass from him," but he willingly submitted to drink it; yet he was delivered from that agonizing terror, which dictated his "supplications "with strong crying and tears;" and was afterwards calm and composed under his heaviest sufferings. Learned men have clearly shown, by pertinent examples, that the words may well bear this sense: and it seems more exactly to suit the apostle's argument. Our Lord was not indeed spared, or exempted from any part of his expiatory sufferings, concerning which he said, "Thy will be done," notwithstanding the strong reluctancy of his holy human nature to such exquisite and complicated sufferings, knowing that it was not possible for that cup to pass from him, consistently with the glory of the Father and the salvation of his people: yet the horror of his mind was allayed; he was strengthened to support the immense weight of suffering that was laid upon him; his sacrifice was accepted for his people; he was raised from the dead, exalted to the mediatorial throne, and invested with the power of saving, "to the uttermost, all who come to God through "him." So that, when the Son of God himself was appointed to the high priesthood, he learned the difficulty of obeying the divine commandments, in the present circumstances of human nature, amidst the temptations and trials to which men are exposed: of this he acquired an experimental knowledge, as far as could consist with sinless perfection; and even his perfect obedience became more exalted and honourable, through his whole life, by the enlargement of his human powers, and by the things which he suffered; so that his zeal and love were never so admirable and astonishing, as when he agonized in the garden and hung upon the cross. Thus, by his appointment to the high priesthood, by the obedience which he finished amidst sufferings and unto death, by the efficacy of his sacrifice, and by his subsequent exaltation, he was made perfect, as Mediator; being fully authorized and qualified for his gracious work: and so he became "the Au-"thor of eternal salvation to all those," of the whole human race, who obey his call to repentance, to faith, and to take his yoke upon them; mercifully giving them all things pertaining to that deliverance, as the purchase of his own blood, and leading them forth to all those conflicts and services, which are connected with their laying hold of eternal life. For all this springs from his having been nominated and acknowledged of God as a High Priest after the order of Melchisedec; a King as well as a High Priest, and so of a nobler order than that of Aaron. (Notes, Gen. xiv. 18—20. Ps. cx.) It is observable, that Melchisedec is never mentioned in the Old Testament, after the account of his meeting with Abraham, as recorded in Genesis, except in the hundred and tenth Psalm; and never in the New Testament, except in the apostle's argument in this epistle concerning the high priesthood of Christ; a subject of infinite importance, and proved, beyond all reasonable doubt, by this single argument? How much may depend on a detached testimony of scripture, which superficial readers pass over unobserved, and which perhaps very few much attend to!

V. 11—14. Concerning Christ, as a High Priest after the order of Melchisedec, the apostle meant to discourse more fully: but the things which he had to say of him were such as it would be difficult to state in a proper manner; not so much because they were in themselves abstruse, as because the Hebrews were dull of hearing, through their prejudiced attachment to the Levitical law and priesthood. Though they had heard and professed the Gospel so long, that it might have been expected they would have been instructors of others in the great doctrine of Redemption by Christ: they had so closed their minds to the truth, or turned aside from the purity of the faith; that they wanted some one to teach them anew the very rudiments of that religion, which were contained in the oracles of God, when rightly understood. They were become such Christians, as had need to be fed with milk, or be taught the plainest and most obvious truths of the Gospel, being incapable of receiving and profiting by its deeper and more spiritual doctrine. 2.) For, indeed, every man who could only receive the simpler and more common truths of religion, without applying his mind to the more experimental and exalted parts of it, must be considered as a babe in Christ, how long soever he had professed the Gospel, being evidently unskilful in the word of righteousness. But the more sublime doctrines of Christianity, which immediately related to the counsels of God for his own glory, and the display of his perfections by the redemption of Christ, and which, indeed, were obscurely intimated in ceremonies of the Mosaic law, when rightly understood, were as strong meat for those who were matured in knowledge, judgment, and experience, being the proper nourishment of their faith, hope, love, and spiritual affections. For such Christians, by reason of use, or habit, acquired by assiduous meditation and unbiassed attention to the truth, had attained to a spiritual taste and relish for divine excellency; they had their spiritual senses exercised to distinguish between good and evil, truth and falsehood; they could readily perceive the nature and tendency of the things proposed to them, and the comparative excellency or worthlessness of them: even as natural men, by a sound judgment and long continued habit, decide at once upon natural things, with great accuracy; or as the bodily senses distinguish and judge of their proper objects. (Marg. Ref.) "Word of righteousness." (13.) Or that word by which men are shown the way of righteousness; both "the righteousness of faith," for justification, and "the sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Fallen man cannot approach God, except on a mercy-seat, through a high priest, and by a sacrifice for sin; but a priest, who was compassed with infirmity, and needed to offer sacrifice for himself, however he might compassionate the ignorant and transgressors, could never be an effectual advocate with God for them. Indeed, in the more ordinary work of the ministry, the consciousness of our own wickedness and unworthiness is well suited to render us tender to the weak, the erroneous, the tempted, and the fallen, seeing "we ourselves are compassed with infirmity:" and though this service differs widely from that of the priests under the Law, yet no man should take it upon him, till it appear to others, as well as himself, that he is called of God to it. But Christ alone is qualified and authorized to be our High Priest; his dignity and excellency, as the Son of God, and his appointment by the Father to that office, give efficacy to his ministrations; his voluntary humiliation and sufferings in the days of his flesh, when he offered up prayers and supplications to the Father, with strong crying and tears, assure us of his tender love and compassion to his afflicted people; and the answer given to his meritorious prayers makes way for the granting of our weak and defiled petitions, when offered in his name: his obedience in our nature encourages our attempts to obey, and our expectations of support and comfort under all the temptations and sufferings to which we are exposed; for, being made perfect for this great work, "he is become the Author of eternal salvation to "all them that obey him." But are we of that number? Do we at present, whatever our former conduct has been, obey his instructions as our Prophet, trust in his sacrifice and intercession as our Priest, and make his commandments the rule of our conduct, as the subjects of his kingdom? To those who thus come to him, and yield themselves to him, and to those alone, he will be the Author of eternal salvation. Of this great High Priest, and of his merits, grace, and authority, ministers have many things to say, which they will not be able to utter in a proper manner, unless "he give them a mouth and "wisdom" for that purpose; for men's prejudices are so many, that they are generally more ready to take offence, than to receive instruction. Nor are professed Christians, even old professors of evangelical doctrine, so docile as might be expected: many are far from that spiritual maturity, which is proportioned to the time during which they have attended to the Gospel. Instead of teaching others, they need to be taught themselves "the first principles of the oracles of God;" they "need milk, and "not strong meat;" they are babes in understanding, but not in teachableness; they are unskilful in the word of righteousness, yet often presume to dictate to their pastors! These things are very discouraging; but we should still exercise patience and meekness, and "seek out acceptable "words," in which to convey instructions in the best manner we can. Aged professors of the Gospel, as well as babes in Christ, should beware of prejudice, and pray for a mind open to conviction; we should begin with simpler truths, and so gradually proceed to such as are more deep and perplexing; we ought to employ ourselves peculiarly about such matters, in an experimental and practical improvement of doctrinal truth: thus we shall gradually be matured in judgment, and enabled to digest strong meat, and our spiritual senses will be habituated to a just and exact discernment of good and evil, which will greatly tend to our stability, comfort, and fruitfulness, in the faith of Christ. NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—3. The apostle here proposed to lead the Hebrews into a fuller acquaintance with the deep mysteries of redemption, of which he had spoken: (Note, v. 11—14:) and, in order thus "to go on to perfection," he would leave the elements of the doctrine of Christ, without especially insisting on them; and he in this way expressed his desire of their attentive and candid perusal of his arguments. The necessity of repentance from dead works, such as are done by men dead in sin, and which expose them to the condemnation of eternal death, was indeed fundamental to true Christianity; but they had been instructed in it from the first dawning of the new dispensation. (Note Matt. iii. 2.) Nor would he speak particularly of the nature and necessity of faith towards God, or a belief of his word, and a dependence on his mercy, grace, and faithful promises in Jesus Christ. He did not indeed purpose to discourse concerning "the doctrine of baptisms;" either the various legal washings, whether by immersion, ablution, or sprinkling; or John's baptism, or that of Christ, which were distinct from each other, and much disputed of by many in their nation: nor of the laying on of the apostle's hands, by which miraculous powers were conferred, as evidential of the truth of the gospel; or the laying on of hands in the ordination of ministers, as a significant token of the authority intrusted to them. Nor would he insist upon the important doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, or that of future judgment, the consequences of which will be eternal happiness or eternal misery. But, passing over these subjects for the present, he meant to explain to them the deeper and more spiritual mysteries of redemption by Christ, and he would proceed to execute his design in the subsequent part of the epistle, if the Lord would permit him. Some expositors would explain these "principles of the doctrine of Christ," as relating wholly to instructions contained in the Old Testament, concerning the Messiah's kingdom; and others would confine them exclusively to the new dispensation. Those favouring the former scheme, interpret the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, to signify the legal purifications, and the laying on of the hands of the offerer upon the head of the sacrifice, as typical of repentance and faith; including the words in a parenthesis. But, understanding by principles, or the "beginning," not the most fundamental truths, or parts of christianity; but the introductory elements, the lower and easier beginnings of it, as letters are the first principles or elements of learning; we may see a propriety in the interpretation above given. Some of the things mentioned were, though most important, yet the more obvious and simple parts of Christianity; and the others were externals connected with their first profession of it, which the Jews were apt to lay far more stress upon, than they ought to have done: and it was obvious for the apostle to mention such things as these, when he would call them off from the introductory elements of Christianity, to its more sublime and spiritual doctrines. 'Interpreters observe, that the doctrine of 'Origen, touching the period of the torments of the 'damned, is here condemned: and indeed, the primitive 'fathers, not Origen himself excepted, taught the contrary. If we do not the will of Christ, says Clemens 'Romanus, nothing will deliver us from eternal punishment. The punishment of the damned, says Justin 'Martyr, is endless punishment, and torment in eternal 'fire. Irenæus, in his symbol of faith, makes this one 'article, That Christ would send the ungodly and unjust 'into everlasting fire. Tertullian declares, that all men 'are appointed to eternal torments, or refreshments; and if 'any man, says he, thinks that the wicked are to be consumed, and not punished, let him remember, that hell-fire is 'styled eternal, because designed for eternal punishment; 'and their substance will remain for ever, whose punishment doth so. St. Cyprian saith, that the souls of the 'wicked are kept with their bodies to be grieved with endless torments. There is no measure nor end of their torments, saith Minutius. Lastly, Origen reckons this among 'the doctrines defined by the Church; That every soul, 'when it goes out of this world, shall either enjoy the inheritance of eternal life and bliss, if its deeds have rendered it fit for bliss; or be delivered up to eternal fire and punishment, if its sins have deserved that state.' (Whitby.)

V. 4—6. It was the more proper to write in the manner proposed to the Hebrews: as those who adhered to the principles of Christianity, had dwelt long enough upon the introductory lessons, and they who had renounced them were in a most hopeless condition. The verses that we now consider, have caused immense perplexity and distress, to many timid and conscientious Christians; and they have been supposed to contain a cogent objection to the doctrine of the believer's final perseverance. These things must be adverted to in our examination of them. It should be remembered, that the apostle wrote in an age of miracles; and to the Hebrews, among whom the Holy Spirit was first poured out in his extraordinary operations. The persons, whose case is described, had been enlightened, and had obtained that measure of knowledge concerning the nature and truth of Christianity, which enabled them to make a satisfactory profession of it, in order to their admission into the Church; "they had tasted the "heavenly gift, and been made partakers of the Holy "Ghost," being at their baptism, or afterwards, by the laying on of the apostle's hands, endued with some measure of spiritual gifts, or miraculous powers, such as speaking with tongues, or discoursing with supernatural fluency on divine subjects, so that, in this respect, their own experience proved to them the truth of the Gospel. They had moreover "tasted of the good word of God;" and their convictions, impressions, and transient affections, made them sensible that it was a good word, of a holy and salutary tendency, and that it was for their good to attend to it, and their purposes of doing so had produced such hopes and joys, as have been described in the case of the stony-ground hearer. (Note, Matt. xiii. 21, 22.) Thus they had tasted of "the powers of the world to come," in their temporary realizing apprehensions of a future state, and of its happiness or misery, or they had experienced the powers communicated under the dispensation of the Messiah. All these things, (except miraculous powers,) often take place in the hearts and consciences of men, in these days, who yet continue unregenerate. They have knowledge, gifts, convictions, fears, hopes, joys, and seasons of apparent earnestness, and deep concern, about eternal things: but they are not truly humbled, they are not spiritually minded; religion is not their element and delight; they do not cordially receive Christ in all his offices, or sincerely love the spiritual excellency of his people, his ordinances, and commandments. In short, the old nature, the principle of selfishness, is impressed, affected, interested, alarmed, or pleased; but a new nature is not produced, and therefore, in time of temptation, they fall away. In respect of spiritual gifts, or the miraculous powers of the Holy Ghost, Christ will reject many, who had been partakers of them, declaring that "He never knew them." (Note, Matt. vii. 21—23.) But they, who received such gifts from Christ, through the laying on of the hands of his apostles, had a personal demonstration of the truth of Christianity, which the most enlightened apostates in these days can scarcely be supposed to have had; and therefore but very few cases now occur, in which a conclusion concerning their state can be unreservedly drawn in the apostle's awful words, though the case of some few may be nearly similar, and they alone are immediately concerned in it. If the persons whom the apostle had thus characterized, (for he spake of none else,) had totally apostatized from Christianity, and were become its avowed enemies, it was not the minister's duty to bestow pains about them; it was generally found "impossible to renew "them to repentance," and thus to restore them with the spirit of meekness. For, considering the clear light against which they sinned in so desperate a manner, it might be concluded, that they had committed the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, and had ascribed his operations, by themselves and by others, to a satanical influence. (Note, Matt. xii. 31, 32.) In fact, as far as they could, they crucified to themselves the Son of God afresh, despitefully acting, as if they approved the conduct of those who nailed him to the cross, assented to their deed, and apparently wished it in their power to repeat his ignominy and torture; and they put him to an open shame, by renouncing his religion, blaspheming his name, joining his enemies, and doing evil to his disciples. They were therefore to be considered as given up to final obduracy, and left to the awful judgment of God. But this conclusion by no means authorized ministers finally to exclude from the communion of the Church those apostates who professed and appeared to be true penitents, much less did it authorize such rigour in less aggravated cases. In general, encouragement should be held forth to all who appear penitent, and means are in most cases to be used for the recovery of such as have most lamentably turned aside, though ill success will often discourage the benevolent endeavour. The very words, however, of this awful passage show, that all who "are renewed unto repentance" shall be pardoned, and that God leaves all to final impenitence, whom he determines not to save; so that the trembling sinner, who pleads guilty, and cries for mercy, can have no ground for discouragement from this passage, fairly interpreted, whatever his crimes have been, nor does it prove that one, who is "in Christ a new creature," ever becomes a final apostate from him.

V. 7, 8. The different sorts of professed Christians might be compared to fruitful and barren land. The believer resembled a field, which, being well watered by the rain from heaven, yielded an useful produce to repay the husbandman's toil; the fertile appearance and valuable fruits of which showed, that it had received a blessing from God; thus, by divine grace, being enabled to improve ordinances and advantages, so as to become fruitful in genuine good works, honourable to the Lord and profitable to men, he was blessed, and would be still more so. But as the sterile soil would, neither by the rain nor the husbandman's labour, be made to produce any thing but thorns and briers, and was therefore generally left as a neglected desert, under the original curse, being fit for nothing, with all its produce, but to be burned; so the mere professor of the Gospel, continuing unfruitful under the means of grace, or producing nothing but hypocrisy, selfishness, and iniquity, was likely to be left under the curse of the law, was near to the awful state above described, and everlasting misery in the flames of hell was the end reserved for him, if he continued in his present unfruitfulness. This was a solemn warning to professed Christians to beware that they were not left to apostatize, as a punishment of their unfruitfulness.

V. 9, 10. While the apostle spake such awful and alarming truths, with reference to the case of those to whom he knew them to be seasonable, he would not have it thought that he had so unfavourable an opinion of the Hebrew Christians in general, or of those whom he immediately addressed in particular; on the contray, he and his fellow-labourers were "persuaded better things of them, even "things which accompany salvation;" namely, that they were real penitents, humble believers, spiritually minded, and grounded in the love of Christ, and of his cause and people. The expression is remarkable and emphatical; the things before spoken of, might or they might not accompany, or be inseparably connected with salvation; but those things which he now spake of were always found in true converts, and never in others. 'Nothing 'availeth in Christ but "faith that worketh by love;" "but a new creature." "Hereby we know that we are "passed from death unto life, because we love the bre"thren." "To be spiritually minded is life and peace." There is no intimation in the whole Bible, that any one, who ever had these things, came short of eternal salvation, or that any apostate ever possessed them. The apostle especially referred, in this, to those Jewish converts, who had manifested their love to the name of God, as revealed in Christ, by their works, yea, their laborious services, and in ministering to the saints for his sake. Of this, a most admirable specimen had been given, after the day of Pentecost, and many of them still continued the same disinterested self-denying conduct. These genuine evidences of faith working by love, God would not reject nor forget; he was not unrighteous, and therefore he would not fail to deal with them according to his promises and covenant engagements to believers, who have, through grace, a claim upon him on that ground.

V. 11, 12. The apostle earnestly desired and longed, that every one of those whom he addressed, whatever he had formerly done, might thenceforth show the same attentive and disinterested diligence in good works, which some of them had heretofore shown; that so, evidencing their faith to be genuine, beyond all reason for doubt or hesitation, they might obtain and possess the full assurance of hope, in respect of their final salvation, to comfort them under all trials, even to the end of their lives. Thus they would be distinguished from slothful unfruitful professors of Christianity, and be approved as imitators of their pious progenitors; and of those Christians, who, by faith in the promises of God, and "patient continuance in well"doing," and in waiting his time of deliverance from their trials, had at length entered into rest, and were actually enjoying that perfect felicity, in which all the promises of God to his people centered. This is a conclusive proof of the immediate happiness of believers after death; if this be the true interpretation, and after having maturely considered the other interpretations of the passage which some learned men have given, the author hesitates not to say that he considers them as absurd, and has no doubt but the apostle meant to lead his readers to meditate on the happiness of Abraham, Moses, Joshua, and Job, and all others, who had on earth lived by faith in the promises of God, especially the great promise of a Saviour, and eternal salvation by him; had patiently waited, laboured, and suffered, in the obedience of faith, and in consequence were, at the time when the apostle wrote this, inheriting the promises of God, of blessings through Christ to all believers. "Assurance of hope," should be distinguished from "the assurance of understanding," and "the assurance of faith." He, who so understands the Gospel as to perceive the relation of each part to all the rest, and its use as a part of one grand design, in something of the same skilful manner that an anatomist understands the use and office of every part of the human body in relation to the whole, has "the full assurance of "understanding;" and those things which appear inconsistent, useless, or superfluous, to others, he perceives essentially necessary to the system, or great design. The man who is fully convinced, that this consistent and harmonious, though complicated, design, is the work and revelation of God, and has no doubt but the things testified are true, that the promises and threatenings will be fulfilled, and that Christ will certainly save all true believers, has "the full assurance of faith;" though he may, through misapprehension, or temptation, or other causes, doubt of his own personal interest in this salvation. But he who, beyond doubt or hesitation, is assured that he himself is a true believer, interested in all the precious promises, sealed by the sanctifying Spirit, and "a par"taker of the glory that shall be revealed," has "the "full assurance of hope." The "full assurance of "faith" is the duty of every one; for he who doubts the truth of the testimony, or the faithfulness of the promises of God, questions his veracity; but "the full assu"rance of hope" must be obtained and preserved by diligence; and, though the want of it may generally be traced to a criminal source, yet it is not the proximate duty of every one; indeed of a very few. A man may question, whether the paper in his possession be a genuine bank-bill, or a counterfeit; and yet have no doubt, either of the ability, or willingness, of the directors of the Bank to honour every genuine bank-bill. "The full assurance "of hope," in the highest meaning of the words, is attained by comparatively few, and is seldom, if ever, preserved, without some degree of diminution, or variation, through the remainder of life; but a prevailing assurance of acceptance, and of final salvation, is the privilege of all diligent and consistent Christians; and is, in them, seldom greatly interrupted, except by misapprehension, or by peculiar temptations and conflicts, or by being betrayed into sin.

V. 13—15. There could be no reason to doubt of the Lord's performing his promises to those who trusted in him, and waited for him; for the covenant ratified with Abraham in some respects typified, and in others was substantially the same with, that made with every believer; and when God gave the promises to "the father of the "faithful," he at length was pleased to confirm them with an oath, showing his irrevocable purpose of accomplishing them; and, as he could swear by no greater, he sware by himself, and so pledged the honour of his great name and all his perfections, as the security of that engagement. (Notes, Gen. xii. xv. xvii. xxii. 16—18.) Accordingly, Abraham patiently waited the Lord's time; and the promised blessings to him and his seed were at length vouchsafed. When old and full of days, he died, and was personally blessed in God as his "exceeding great Reward;" his posterity also increased; the promises made to them were accomplished; the Messiah at length came, and all the nations of the earth were about to be blessed in him.

V. 16—18. It is customary for men to swear by those that are greater than themselves, whom they call on to witness their attestations or engagements, or to avenge their unfaithfulness, if they fail of them. When important concerns require it, and the omniscient God is thus reverently and uprightly appealed to, it may be considered as an act of worship to him; and an oath, for the confirmation of covenants and treaties, is the means of terminating disputes of every kind, by establishing mutual confidence between the parties, from the persuasion, that men in general will not defy the vengeance of heaven by deliberate perjury. The Lord therefore, in condescension to the weakness of man and his proneness to unbelief, and purposing to give his people the most abundant assurance, that his counsel respecting their salvation was immutable, confirmed the promise and covenant respecting it with the most solemn ratification of an oath. That so by two immutable things, even the Word and the Oath, or, as others understand it, 'by the immutable counsel and inviolable 'oath' of "God, who cannot lie," either by being deceived, or induced to deceive others, or by seeing cause to alter his purposes, they all, (in the apostle's time, and consequently in all times,) who had fled for refuge from the wrath to come, to lay hold on the hope of pardon and eternal life set before them in the Gospel, might have a firm ground for assured hope, and the powerful consolations which spring from it. These persons, to whatever nation they belonged, were the "heirs of promise," the spiritual children of Abraham, and interested in the covenant ratified to him and to his seed, (Notes, Rom. iv. Gal. iii.) and therefore the oath sworn to Abraham irrevocably confirmed the spiritual blessings of that covenant to each of them. (Note, Luke i. 67—80.) In order to ascertain that they were of this number, it was needful to inquire whether they, having discovered their danger of falling under the curse of the broken law, and under the wrath of God, had renounced all other confidences, and broken through all hinderances, to flee for refuge, (as the man-slayer speeded towards the appointed city,) to the free mercy of God, through the redemption of Christ, according to the covenant of grace; laying hold on this Object of a sinner's hope by faith, and by a humble persevering reliance on the promises of God through Jesus Christ, manifested by its genuine effects. They who had thus "fled for refuge, "to lay hold on the hope set before them," had a source of strong consolation given them in the oath and covenant of God; and their conscious unworthiness, depravity, and weakness; their experience of the deceitfulness of their hearts; their conflicts with inward and outward enemies; and the various temptations, trials, and persecutions, to which their profession would expose them, rendered such security, consolation, and hope in God, needful to them even as the anchor is to the ship. By this hope they would

CHAP. VII.

The superiority of Melchisedec's typical priesthood, above that of Aaron, proved and illustrated, 1—10. It was intended that the priesthood should be changed, and consequently, that the ritual law of Moses should be disannulled, when the Messiah came, that a better covenant and priesthood might take place, 11—18. This was needful; for the more perfect state of the church, and for the salvation of sinners, to the uttermost, and for ever, 19—28.

---

be preserved in their proper station, without being driven from their profession, or duty, by any storms; while others would be induced to apostacy by worldly fears and hopes, or be drawn aside by manifold delusions, even as the ships that have no anchor, will be driven by the tempest from their station, on the rocks or sands, forced out to sea, or dashed in pieces one against another. No anchors, however, can at all times secure the ship from driving or being wrecked; but this hope in the divine promise, oath, and covenant, was so sure in itself, and kept the possessor so steadfast in his adherence to the truth and cause of God, that it always ensured him from final ruin, and in proportion to its vigorous exercise, secured him from temporary failures, and against the storms of incumbent temptations. For it "entered into that within "the veil," and fixed the heart in a stable union with, and joyful expectation of, those things which were in the true Holy of Holies, in heaven itself, and caused the believer to stay himself on the power, truth, and love of God to sinners in Christ Jesus, to bring him to the enjoyment of that felicity. For thither its great Object, Jesus the divine Saviour, had already entered, and continually ministered in the Father's presence, for the benefit of all believers, being their Fore-runner and Representative, who, as their High Priest, had on earth atoned for their sins, by the sacrifice of himself; and who, being risen from the dead, was gone before them to heaven, to prepare a place for them, to remove all obstacles to their admission, to take possession in their stead, and to reign and plead in their behalf, being constituted a High Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec, of which order the apostle was about to discourse more fully.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The principles and rudiments of the doctrine of Christ should be accurately understood, before men attempt to learn the sublimer mysteries of the Gospel; yet they ought not always to be confined to them, but should be led on towards perfection, in knowledge, experience, and holiness. Even the fundamentals of "repentance from "dead works, faith towards God, the resurrection of the "dead, and eternal judgment," should not always engross men's whole attention, but every part of the truth and will of God should, in due order and proportion, be set before, and enforced on, the professors of the Gospel. Much less then should we perpetually be discoursing or disputing about "baptisms and laying on of hands," and other externals, which have their place and use, but often occupy far too much of the attention and time of those who might be more profitably employed. We cannot but lament to see those, who once made a credible profession of the Gospel, turn back into the world and sin, and thus in a measure "crucify to themselves the Son of God "afresh, and put him to an open shame;" as if upon trial they found nothing in his salvation worthy of their constant regard! In general, we should warn and pray for such persons; but there are cases, in which we must let them alone, as having no prospect of their being renewed to repentance. We should beware, and we ought to caution others, of every approach to so tremendous a precipice; yet, in doing this, we should keep close to the word of God, and be careful not to wound and terrify the weak, or discourage the fallen and penitent. Knowledge, gifts, convictions, and very strong impressions, must precede or an apostacy of this kind cannot take place; great obstinacy and malignity must follow, before we are warranted to conclude it fatal or final. The general invitations and promises of the Gospel include all who are humbly willing to embrace them; humiliation and self-condemnation, when united with some hope and cries for mercy, are such tokens of God's renewing a man to repentance, as should be pointed out to him for his encouragement in expecting forgiveness; on the other hand, the self-confident should be taught, that knowledge, gifts, terrors, subsequent joys, and high affections, are no certain evidence of a man's conversion, without brokenness of heart, hatred of sin, a spiritual mind, and faith which worketh by love; and that they who do finally apostatize were never created in Christ Jesus, whatever man might judge of them. But they, whom it is indeed impossible to renew unto repentance, are commonly the last to think themselves in so awful a state; and such as are most harassed by fears of this kind may generally be assured that this is not their case, whatever they have been, or done, unless they actually run into ungodliness and wickedness through total desperation.

V. 7—12.

A negligent and unfruitful profession of the Gospel tends directly to the brink of that dreadful precipice above described; for when abundant means of grace, and even the ordinary strivings of the convincing Spirit of God, leave men unchanged, and produce not the fruits of holiness, which prove that they have received blessing from God, and are blessed of him; they are often given up, like waste land, to bear briers and thorns only; their state is nigh unto cursing; and the end of all unfruitful profession will be "the furnace of fire, where is wailing "and gnashing of teeth." Let us then fear, with humble caution and watchful prayer, in respect of ourselves, and let us hope the best of others that the case will admit.

Whilst we warn such as are in evident danger, we should encourage those, in whom we see the things which accompany salvation. Ministers should frequently specify these in an experimental and distinguishing manner; and concerning such matters their hearers should examine themselves frequently and seriously, instead of perplexing them selves about those texts, which were inserted to serve as beacons to warn the presumptuous against fatal rocks, and not to affright the humble and cautious. Of those "things which accompany salvation," none is more free from ambiguity, than laborious, self-denying love to the name of the Lord shown by ministering with persevering affection to his saints: and, though God is no man's debtor, and will reward no works which proceed from pride and self-righteousness, however splendid and laborious they are, yet he is not unrighteous, nor will he forget one service, that springs from humble grateful love: he hath spoken, and will be as good as his word, that "not a cup of cold water, given to a disciple from regard "to his Lord, shall in any wise lose its reward." We should therefore desire, that we, and all who are called Christians, may give the same diligence in such good works, as the most eminent saints in the primitive ages did. This is the scriptural way of acquiring and preserving the full assurance of hope, to the end of our lives. Many have thus by faith and patience inherited the promises; but no slothful professor of Christianity has any evidence that he is following them.

V. 13—18.

The privileges of the Gospel belong to the diligent and fruitful, who walk in the steps of Abraham, to whom the promises were made. These obtain an inward testimony, by the powerful operation of the Holy Spirit; and give abundant proof in their lives, that they are the children of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise. This inward seal confirms to them personally that covenant, which God hath ratified with an oath to the heirs of promise in general. Because their infirmities are many and their trials great, their condescending and compassionate Father is "willing more abundantly to show them the immu-"tability of his counsel;" that, by his faithful word and irrevocable oath, "they might have a strong consolation, "having fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before "them." Indeed, the Lord having sworn by himself, that he hath no pleasure in the death of a sinner, but that he should repent and live, holds out abundant encouragement to all, whom he warns to flee from the wrath to come, and invites to "lay hold for refuge on the hope set "before them." And, as he "cannot lie," the destruction of the unbeliever, and the salvation of the believer, are alike certain. Let then such, as have fled to Christ, and have their hope sealed to them, in "the love of God "shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Spirit," rely confidently on the power, truth, mercy, and covenant, of God, amidst all the opposition of earth and hell. (Notes, Rom. viii. 29—39:) let them pray for faith and hope equal to their security: thus let them cast anchor within the veil, staying their souls on the word of God, and on the mediation of their great High Priest, in all dangers, afflictions, and temptations: let them follow the steps, as well as trust in the merits, of the great Fore-runner of his people: let them by faith realize his appearance before the Father's throne for them, as their constituted High Priest and King: and thus let them "set their affections on things above," and wait patiently for his appearance, when they also shall most certainly appear with him in glory.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—3. The apostle had repeatedly referred to the prophecy, that the Messiah should be "a "Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec," (Ps. cx. 4;) signifying that his priesthood would resemble that of Milchisedec, and not that of Aaron: he therefore next proceeded to illustrate that prophecy, and argue more explicitly from it, as compared with the scriptural account of this extraordinary person. (Note, Gen. xiv. 18.) Being king of Salem, probably Jerusalem, and priest of the most high God, by an appointment of which we have no information, he came to meet Abraham, after he had vanquished the invading kings who had carried Lot captive from Sodom: and, as the priest of the most high God, he blessed Abraham, and received of him a tenth part of the spoils taken from his conquered enemies. His very name, being, by interpretation, "king of righteousness," and doubtless corresponding with his character and administration, marked him out as a type of the Messiah and of his kingdom. (Note, i. 8, 9.) The name of his city signified Peace, and, as king of peace, he typified Christ, "the Prince of peace," the great reconciler of God and man, and of men to one another, in perfect consistency with the interests of righteousness, and the honour of the divine justice: and the union of royal authority with the priestly office, (which were divided between the family of Aaron and that of David, in the case of Israel,) plainly pointed to the royal priesthood of the Messiah. We have no account of Melchisedec's parentage, or pedigree, as in the case of the priests appointed by the law, who were all required to prove their descent from Aaron; and exact rules were given concerning their marriages, for this, as well as for other reasons. But Melchisedec was introduced into the sacred history as a priest of the most high God, who had no father, or mother, or 4 Now consider how great this man was, unto whom even [h] the patriarch [i] Abraham [k] gave the tenth of the spoils.

6 But he, whose * descent is not counted from them, [o] received tithes of Abraham, and blessed him that [p] had the promises.

7 And, [q] without all contradiction, [r] the less is blessed of the better.

8 And here [s] men that die receive tithes: but there he receiveth them, of whom it is witnessed that [t] he liveth.

9 And, as I may so say, Levi also, who receiveth tithes, [u] payed tithes in Abraham.

10 For he was yet [x] in the loins of his father, when Melchisedec met him.

11 If therefore [y] perfection were by the Levitical priesthood, (for under it the people received the law,) [z] what further need was there that [a] another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron?

12 For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity [b] a change also of the law.

13 For he of whom these things are spoken, pertaineth to another tribe, [c] of which no man gave attendance at the altar.

14 For it is evident that [d] our Lord [e] sprang out of Judah; of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood.

genealogy, that he might the more exactly typify that High Priest, who, as the Son of man, had no human father, as the Son of God was without mother, and who was appointed to the priesthood, and without deducing his pedigree from Aaron. Moreover, nothing was said of Melchisedec respecting the beginning of his life, or the end of his days, and priesthood, that he might resemble the Son of God, whose existence is from eternity, to eternity, and who hath had no predecessor, and will have no successor in his efficacious, meritorious, and perpetual Priesthood. In all these respects the silence of the Scripture being intentional, and referring to the great Antitype, is mentioned in language taken from the instruction to be conveyed, rather than from historical fact, of which learned men have brought instances from other writers of antiquity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4—10. The argument, arising from the fact that one of Abraham's contemporaries was superior to him, was very conclusive against the perpetual obligation of the Levitical law, and the perpetuity of the Aaronic priesthood, and that of the covenant made with the nation of Israel at Sinai. The apostle, therefore, exhorted the Hebrews to consider how great a person their inspired lawgiver had represented Melchisedec to be, not so much in respect of his regal authority, as of his priesthood, when even Abraham the patriarch, and honoured father of their whole nation, who was not one of Melchisedec's subjects, or in any other way connected with him, owned his superiority, and paid him tithes as the representative of the most high God! The Levites indeed were ordered in the law, as the Lord's tribe, to take tithes of their brethren the descendents of Abraham, of which the priests had a tenth part for their portion: but Melchisedec, who was not of Abraham's family, received tithes of that patriarch himself: nay, as the priest of God, he pronounced the benediction upon him, to whom the promises concerning the Messiah, and all nations being blessed in him, were made. Now it was well known and certain beyond contradiction, that the inferior character was to be blessed, in this authoritative manner, by the superior and more honourable, as children by their parents, and the people by the priests. (Marg. Ref.) So that some one higher than Abraham, or Aaron, or any mere man of his race, was evidently to be expected, as a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. Under the law indeed mere sinful dying men took tithes of their brethren, and so one generation after another rose up to receive them: but in the case of Melchisedec, one received tithes of Abraham, the Representative of all his posterity, concerning whom it was only witnessed that he lived; by which it was intimated, that a Priest should arise, to whom the whole Israel of God would pay their devoted homage, and from whom they would receive the blessing; so that, "to speak it in "a word," the apostle might say, that even Levi, and all the priests descended from him, paid tithes to Melchisedec, for they were in the loins of their father and representative when Melchisedec met him. This sufficiently proved the inferiority of the Levitical priesthood to that of the Messiah; yea, its absolute dependence on him, and subserviency to him. Indeed, it may be said, that CHRIST also was in the loins of Abraham; but his divine nature, his miraculous and immaculate conception, and his being the intended and predicted Antitype, sufficiently show that he was excepted, as the seed to whom especially the promises were made. This argument of the apostle illustrates the nature of our union with Adam, and representation by him, and our participation of the consequences of his apostacy, as well as the method of our recovery by "the second Adam, the Lord from "heaven."

15 And it is yet far more evident: for that [f] after the similitude of Melchisedec there ariseth another priest, 16 Who is made, not after [g] the law of a carnal commandment, but after [h] the power of an endless life.

17 For he testifieth, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.

18 For there is verily [i] a disannulling of the commandment going before, for [k] the weakness and unprofitableness thereof.

19 For [l] the law made nothing perfect, but * the bringing in of [m] a better hope did; by the which [n] we draw nigh unto God.

20 And inasmuch as not without an oath he was made Priest:

V. 11—17. If God had designed that the most perfect state of the church on earth should be under the Levitical priesthood, and if complete salvation could have been obtained by that institution, without reference to the priesthood of the Messiah, what occasion was there for another Priest to arise, and of another order? Or why should the Holy Spirit dictate such a prediction, and excite such an expectation? The ten commandments, indeed, and many other parts of the law, were given before Aaron was appointed to the priesthood, or expressly mentioned as the intended high priest and progenitor of the sacerdotal race; but the Aaronic priesthood was introduced before the whole was completed, and received its final confirmation: the appointment of that priesthood constituted an essential part of it, and was so inseparably connected with its ministrations, that scarcely any part of it could be exactly performed without them. Thus the people received the law, along with the Aaronic priesthood, the termination of which must render the observance of it impracticable by necessary consequence. The change of the priesthood must therefore imply a change of the law too; and the appointment of a High Priest after the order of Melchisedec must abrogate the ceremonial law, and terminate the legal dispensation. For it had been expressly and repeatedly predicted that the Messiah should arise from another tribe, even that of Judah; (Marg. Ref.) and though most of their kings had been of that tribe, yet none of them had ever presumed to officiate at the altar, except Uzziah, who was severely rebuked for his temerity. (Note, 2 Chr. xxvi. 16—21.) Thus distinct were the kingdom and the priesthood kept under the law, whilst their union, in the Person of the Messiah, of the tribe of Judah, was also predicted in the most explicit manner. Indeed, it was evident, and sufficiently proved, that "Our Lord" and Saviour, to whom the apostle called his brethren's attention, was descended from Judah, and of the family of David, of which Moses in the law had said nothing concerning their admission to the priesthood; so that the prediction and its accomplishment concurred in proving that the Aaronic priesthood and the Mosaic law were abrogated, and of no further validity or efficacy. The prophecy of the Messiah, as a Priest after the order of Melchisedec, made this evident, even to a demonstration; yea, more evident than any other argument could do; as this Priest was not constituted after, or according to, the law of Moses, or any of its prescriptions, which were in themselves carnal commandments relating to mere externals, and incapable of securing spiritual excellency to the appointed high priests; but He was constituted, "according to the power of an endless "life." For though Christ willingly died for the sins of the people, yet that was a part of his priestly office, and he had power to resume his life, and to preserve it for ever; that so he might perpetually execute his office, as the only one to whom it belonged, and who alone was capable of duly performing it.

V. 18, 19. This prediction before-mentioned, and its accomplishment, implied a disannulling, or abrogating, of the preceding commandment, concerning the priesthood, sacrifices, and purifications. And this was intended by the Lord, because they were in themselves weak and unprofitable: for though they had a temporary and typical use and benefit, in respect of the nation of Israel, till the coming of the Messiah, and to believers as means of faith and grace, yet they had no inherent efficacy to purge the conscience or the affections, and they did not at all profit those who rested in them. For the ceremonial law made nothing perfect, either in the state of the church, or the hearts and consciences of the worshippers; but the introduction of a better hope, even that of acceptance with God, through the sacrifice and intercession of Christ, brought the church to its highest state of liberty, and its worship to the most entire spirituality, which its condition in this world admits of, and provided most effectually for the complete justification, the inward peace, and the sanctification of all believers. For by that hope men are allowed to draw near to God, even to his mercy-seat, with humble boldness, and are not wholly excluded, as the Gentiles during the law, or kept at a great distance, as the Israelites themselves were. The concluding words may be rendered, "The bringing in of a better hope is "that, by which we draw near to God." The original word signifies something more than bringing in, and implies that this "better hope" was brought in, even under the old dispensation, by the promises and prophecies of the Messiah, and by the types of the law, though more fully and clearly when Christ had actually come, and finished his work on earth, and entered into his glory. "The weakness and unprofitableness of the ceremonial "law," either to justify or sanctify those who rested in the outward observance of it, and did not by faith look to the things prefigured by them, was exactly parallel to the Christian sacraments, when the opus operatum, the mere attendance on the 'outward and visible sign,' is depended on, while 'the inward and spiritual grace,' the things signified in them, are disregarded. To such persons they are "weak and unprofitable," but to believers they are means of grace, and solemn and acceptable acts of spiritual worship.

V. 20—22. The very great superiority of the Priesthood of Christ, to that of Aaron, was evident from another particular. JEHOVAH appointed the Levitical priesthood "without an oath," by which he showed that that appointment was revocable, and that it would not always continue. But, in constituting the Messiah to be a perpetual High Priest, he most solemnly confirmed the appointment with an oath; thus declaring most evidently that it was never to be disannulled. In proportion therefore to this immense difference, it was to be concluded that Jesus was the Surety of a better covenant than that of Aaron. The word rendered "Surety" signifies a person that is bound with another for the payment of a debt, or the performance of an engagement. Jesus, the Surety of his people, became answerable for their debt of sin, and engaged to satisfy divine justice, and magnify the holy law, as their representative, as well as to bring them to that repentance, faith, and holiness, which are requisite to their participation of the blessings of his covenant, and, by entering into this engagement, and fulfilling it in their behalf, he became the Surety of the Father to them for the performance of all the promises of the covenant, being authorized and exalted, in human nature, to confer on them all the blessings stipulated therein. The word, rendered testament, is commonly rendered covenant: its import hath been repeatedly considered, and we shall have occasion shortly to speak of it as used for a testamentary appointment. The better covenant, of which Jesus is the Surety, is not here contrasted with the covenant of works, by which every transgressor is shut up under the curse; but distinguished from the Sinai-covenant with Israel, and the legal dispensation under which the church had so long continued; for the covenant of works had no connexion with the Aaronic priesthood or the ceremonial law, which exhibited in shadows the blessings of the covenant of grace. But the covenant, of which Jesus was Surety, was far better than that of which the high priests of Israel were typical sureties, and brought the church, and every believer, into far clearer light, more perfect liberty, and more abundant privilege, than that could do. The temporary legal covenant with Israel must therefore be abrogated; or, being fulfilled, and having answered the purposes for which it was appointed, it must become invalid; as a lease, when the term of it is expired, or a bond, when it is paid and cancelled. This was requisite, in order that the irrevocable priesthood of Christ, and the better covenant ratified to him, might be openly introduced, and established for the benefit of the nations of the earth. (Notes, Ex. xix.)

V. 23—25. The sacred writer here adduced another proof of the superiority of the Messiah's priesthood above that of Aaron: in the latter case there were many priests; because, being sinful, dying men, they were soon removed from their station, and others succeeded them in it; and the office passing so frequently from one to another strongly marked its weakness and inefficacy. But the Person of whom the prophet had spoken, and concerning whom the apostle was discoursing, possessed an unchangeable priesthood, that was never to pass out of his hands, and never would be liable to interruption or cessation. For as his death was the appointed sacrifice for the sins of all his people, so heaven was the true sanctuary, in which his subsequent ministrations were to be performed, and there possessing immortality, he must exercise his priestly office in the most perfect manner, till the consummation of all things. On which account he is able, not only by his omnipotence, but in virtue of his priestly character and sacrifice, to save perfectly, to the end, in all possible emergencies and extremities, from all guilt, pollution, and temptation, in all dangers, and against all enemies; every one, and the whole company, of those through all ages and nations, who come to God as sinners for salvation by him, believing in his name, depending on his atonement and intercession, and asking all blessings for his sake, and as the free gift of God through him. This he is able to do, because he is not like a mere man, who undertakes to protect or deliver another, and perhaps dies in the critical season; but he ever liveth and reigneth as a Priest upon his throne, to make intercession for those who come to God by him; to plead his merits and sacrifice in their behalf; to present their persons, services, and prayers, for acceptance, through the ransom of his blood; to interpose between them and every one that would lay any thing to their charge; to protect and deliver them by his almighty power, and to give all things to them from his unsearchable riches.

V. 26—28. The considerate inquirer into this most interesting subject would perceive, that such a High Priest as Christ could alone suit the case of lost sinners, who were to be restored to the favour and image of a holy God, in a manner consistent with the glory of his name, and peculiarly suited to display that glory. Such a one became, or was proper for, them, as was perfectly holy in his nature, harmless and spotless in his own obedience, that no charge might be brought against him; undefiled in his ministrations, separate in disposition and conduct from the sinners in whose behalf he was to interpose, and made higher than the heavens, and all their glorious inhabitants: that the dignity of his Person and the pre-eminence of his exaltation might give efficacy to his ministrations, and manifest the justice and holiness of God in saving sinners for his sake, and through his merits. He must be one, who had no need to offer sacrifices for himself at all, or repeatedly in behalf of others, as the Levitical priests, (who were the coadjutors of the high priest,) did daily, and the high priest did on every return of the great day of expiation. But such a High Priest could not be found, except Jesus, whose one oblation of himself, being of infinite value, rendered further sacrifices for ever needless. For the law made infirm and sinful men high priests, whose persons and services always needed atonement and forgiveness, and many of whom were men of very bad characters; but the word of the Lord, which he had ratified with an oath, and which had been spoken long after the giving of the law, and reached far beyond it, had appointed the eternal Son of God to that office, who was in all respects competent to it, as he alone could be; and he was moreover consecrated or perfected to it for evermore. It was therefore evident, that the Levitical priesthood was intended to typify, and prepare the way for, that of Christ; which was purposed in due time to supersede and disannul it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18.

Every part of scripture was intended, in one way or another, to honour our King of Righteousness and Peace, our glorious High Priest and Saviour; and the more accurately we examine it, the fuller will be our conviction that "the testimony of Jesus is the Spirit of prophecy." May we then learn in simplicity to trust in him, and submit to him, to copy his righteousness, to seek the peace of his kingdom, to devote all that we are and have to his service, and to expect blessings from him alone! May we go forth in our spiritual conflicts, at his word, and in his strength; ascribe all our victories to his grace; and desire to be met and blessed by him in all our ways! Patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and angels, own him to be far better and greater than they all; preceding events and dispensations, from the beginning, prepared the way for his appearance, and introduced his royal priesthood: those institutions, which had divine authority and eminent usefulness for the time, after his coming were disannulled, "because of the weakness and unprofitableness of them;" for a better hope was then introduced, by which we draw nigh to our offended God, and call him, "Abba, Father." No further change shall now take place in the priesthood, or the worship of the Church, by any future revelation from God; but he will "overturn, overturn, overturn," the kingdoms of the earth, till that of our Melchisedec be every where established. As the Surety of a far better covenant than that connected with the Levitical priesthood, he hath given his Church and every believer the greatest advantages for following after perfection. May he stir up the hearts of his ministers and people, and pour out his Spirit, throughout all his Church, that more spiritual worship and holy obedience may every where abound; and that the congregations and services of his saints on earth may more resemble those of heaven!

V. 19—27.

It becomes us to aspire after a degree of spirituality and holiness, as much superior to those of old testament-believers, as our advantages exceed theirs. No man who knows God, and his holy law of love, and who understands the evil of sin, and the difficulty of saving sinners to the glory of God, could desire the continuance of a priesthood, "according to a carnal commandment;" which appointed those to that office who were themselves sinners, and needed to "offer sacrifices for themselves first, and "then for the people;" nor could they wish those to retain that station, who generally filled it. But now, that the Son of God is made the High Priest of his believing Israel, even such a High Priest as became us, being "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and "made higher than the heavens," we may well rejoice that he is consecrated for evermore, and that he hath an unchangeable priesthood. As he is "able to save to the "uttermost, all who come to God through him," let the vilest of sinners approach in this way to the mercy-seat of our forgiving God, seeing "he ever liveth to make inter-"cession for them." None need be dismayed, but they who will not come unto God, or who will not come in the name of his beloved Son; and the case of those will soon become hopeless, how great soever their present presumption may be. But let believers meditate on the power and grace of their great High Priest, and on his universal and absolute sovereignty; and let them copy his holy, harmless, and undefiled conduct, and separation from sinners; then they may confidently expect, that he will "save them to the uttermost," and 'deliver them, 'in all time of their tribulation, in all time of their wealth, 'in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment.'

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1, 2. The principal matter, or the substance, of what had been discoursed on was this, that Christians had such a High Priest as became, and was needful for them; who, having finished his work on earth, had ascended into the heavens, and was exalted to pre-eminent dignity and authority, at the right hand of God, in that place where he displays his glorious majesty, and which may be called his royal throne; (Note, Is. lxvi. 1.) Thus Christ was constituted the minister, to officiate in holy things, or in the most holy place, of which that in the tabernacle had been a type; and in this office he presided over the "true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched," by his almighty power, and which was not constituted by human skill or labour, as the tabernacle in the wilderness had been. Some explain "the true tabernacle," of heaven exclusively, as signifying the same with the sanctuary; others interpret it of the human nature of Christ, in which he tabernacled among men, and in which he officiates as High Priest in the holy of holies above; yet, as his human nature is needful to constitute his Person as High Priest, rather than to be the place of his ministrations, the figure seems harsh. But as the whole tabernacle comprised the inner and the outer sanctuary, and as the high priest alone went into the former, while the other priests officiated in the latter, in subordination to him, whose typical services rendered theirs accepted; and as the tabernacle was an emblem of the whole Church of God, (though it typified the human nature of Christ also;) it seems most obvious to explain "the true tabernacle," to signify the whole Church of the redeemed on earth and in heaven as one, by its union with Christ Jesus; for believers, separately and collectively, "are the habitation of God through the Spirit." Christ ministers personally in the holy place above, as sole High Priest; he presides over the whole true tabernacle, and so the prayers and services of the spiritual priesthood on earth are rendered acceptable and efficacious, through his meritorious intercession in heaven.

V. 3—6. (Note, v. 1.) As every high priest, according to the law, was appointed to offer gifts and sacrifices. so it was requisite that this Person, even Christ, should have somewhat to offer, that the Antitype might correspond with the type; and indeed for still more cogent reasons. He therefore assumed human nature, appeared on earth, and there gave himself a Sacrifice to God for the sins of his people, and then he ascended into heaven, to appear before God, as with the blood of the sacrifice, in their behalf; all which exactly corresponded to the method prescribed to the high priest on the great day of expiation. (Notes, Lev. xvi.) It was not proper for him to continue on earth, after he had offered his one all-sufficient sacrifice; for in that case he would not have been a priest; seeing, in respect of the legal services, there were priests appointed to perform them: Christ, not being of the priestly tribe, could not properly have interfered in them; and heaven was the appointed sanctuary, in which he must perform the rest of his meritorious and efficacious ministrations; being the true holy of holies, the place in which JEHOVAH displays his glory, and dispenses his blessings from the mercy-seat. The priests, indeed, who offered sacrifices in the earthly sanctuary, ministered in the worship of God after a ritual, which was formed to be an exemplar and shadow of heavenly things; this had been intimated to Moses, when he was charged to form every thing relative to the tabernacle according to the exact pattern shown to him in the mount. (Note, Ex. xxv. 40.) The various particulars respecting Christ and his salvation, which were typified by the tabernacle, its furniture, and worship, have already been explained. (Notes, Ex. xxv. xxxi.) There seems no reason for restricting the meaning of this charge to the human nature of Christ, seeing his Person, priesthood, sacrifice, and intercession, were evidently predicted in the directions given to Moses on that occasion. Instead of interfering with the priests in the typical services of the temple, Christ had obtained a far superior ministry, of real intrinsic value and efficacy, in the heavenly sanctuary, in which he was as much superior to the priests after the order of Aaron, as the covenant, of which he was the Mediator was a better covenant, founded and established on better promises, than the Sinai covenant with Israel. It has repeatedly been observed, that all unbelievers continued personally under the covenant of works, and that believers were personally interested in the covenant of grace, by faith in the Messiah that was to come. The Mosaic dispensation contained in it a typical Gospel, and its ordinances were to believers means of grace, 7 For if that first covenant [p] had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for the second.

8 For finding fault with them, [q] he saith, Behold, [r] the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make [s] a new [t] covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah:

9 Not according to [u] the covenant that I made with their fathers, in the day when [x] I took them by the hand, [y] to lead them out of the land of Egypt; because [z] they continued not in my covenant, and I [a] regarded them not, saith the Lord.

10 For [b] this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; [c] I will * put my laws into their mind, and write them † in their hearts: and [d] I will be to them a God, and [e] they shall be to me a people:

11 And [f] they shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, [g] Know the Lord: [h] for all shall know me, [i] from the least to the greatest.

12 For [k] I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more.

13 In that he saith, [l] A new covenant, [m] he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is [n] ready to vanish away.

as well as acts of worship. But the covenant here referred to was that made with Israel as a nation, securing the possession of Canaan, and various temporal benefits, to them on prescribed conditions; and the promises of all spiritual blessings, and of eternal life, to believers of all nations, and through all succeeding ages, which were openly revealed by the Gospel, and ratified through Christ, are of infinitely greater value than any temporal advantages to a single nation could be.

V. 7—13. The Hebrews might learn from their own prophets, that their national covenant and the legal dispensation were not intended to be perpetual; for if that covenant had been free from defect, and suited to bring the Church to the highest state of perfection, to which it was to be advanced on earth, there would have been no place for a second, or occasion of introducing it, or proposing any plans for another covenant, as the Lord never changes his methods without reason. The Mosaic law, indeed, and the Sinai-covenant, were well suited to introduce the promised Messiah and the Gospel dispensation, and to form, as it were, a proper scaffolding for that magnificent edifice; yet they did not secure the sanctification and salvation of the people; nor did they even prevent such national apostacies, as were a forfeiture of all their privileges. About the time of the Babylonish captivity, therefore, the Lord, by his prophet Jeremiah, reproved the nation of Israel for their violations of his covenant, and promised to make a new covenant with his people. The passage here quoted has already been fully explained, and a few hints must here suffice. (Note, Jer. xxxi. 31—34.) The words translated from the Hebrew, "although I was "a husband unto them," are here rendered, "and I re-"garded them not." Learned men have endeavoured to prove, that they may be rendered either way; but the translation here adduced from the Septuagint is not the most obvious meaning of the original; as, however, both propositions contain truth and instruction, the difference is to us immaterial. The prophecy was fulfilled in the conversion of multitudes of Judah and Israel, in the primitive times of the Gospel: but it is also fulfilled to all the spiritual Israel, who are really a holy nation, as Israel according to the flesh was relatively: the repentance, faith, divine and efficacious teaching, and sanctification of the chosen people of God, as well as their complete forgiveness, were provided for, in the better promises of this new covenant, and thus their holy obedience, their final perseverance, and their eternal salvation were secured.—The apostle, therefore, inferred conclusively from this prediction, that the promise of a new covenant had in effect made the first old, or antiquated; and this was as much as to say, that it was decaying, and about to vanish away. So that the abolition of the national covenant made with Israel, and the abrogation of the Mosaic law, should have been expected at the coming of the Messiah, according to their own prophets.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

Whilst we bless God, that of his plenteous mercy he hath provided for us lost sinners such a High priest, as suited our helpless condition; that he hath accepted his one oblation of himself; that he hath exalted him to the right hand of his Majesty in the heavens, to be a minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle; and that he hath made a better covenant with him, in behalf of his true people, and established it on better promises, than those given to Israel; let us see to it, that we draw nigh to him in this appointed way, as spiritual worshippers, in humble faith, and submission to his righteousness, relying on his mercy and truth, and praying for all his promised blessings. If it were dangerous for those who had the example and shadow of heavenly things to deviate in the least from the divine prescriptions, how can they escape condemnation, who have the clear discovery of the heavenly things themselves, yet worship other mediators, prefer human traditions, come to God in their own name, as if righteous persons, or refuse to come at all, as if sufficient or their own felicity? In every part of our worship and obedience, we should keep close to the only and perfect standard of Scripture, and every deviation must be proportionably injurious: but mistakes in the way of a sinner's access and acceptance cannot but prove fatal in the end, if not previously discovered and rectified.

V. 7—13.

We should often inquire, whether the new covenant be really sealed and ratified to us? for, though the Gospel-dispensation is faultless, and though the Lord hath, as it were, taken us by the hand, to lead us forth from pagan and antichristian idolatry, yet he will have no special regard to us at last, unless he now put his laws into our minds and write them in our hearts, as the principle of genuine repentance and willing obedience, unless we expect our happiness from him as our God, and worship him spiritually as his people; and unless we are taught by his Holy Spirit to know him in such a manner, as uprightly to fear, love, trust, and obey him. Thus all true Israelites, from the least to the greatest, are taught of God, and sealed as his people; and thus they are assured, that he hath been merciful to their sins, and will remember their iniquities no more. This "righteousness shall be for "ever, this salvation shall not be abolished," and the blessings of this irrevocable covenant will be the eternal portion of every true believer. But all other things, whether they be worldly vanities, external privileges, or forms and notions of religion, will soon decay, wax old, vanish away, and leave those who have trusted in them most miserable for evermore.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1—5. The apostle, knowing the excessive and dangerous attachment of the Hebrews to the legal ceremonies, proceeded more particularly to show their typical reference to Christ. The first covenant had indeed ordinances of divine worship, the observance of which constituted a considerable part of the legal righteousness of Israel, as a nation: and it had a sanctuary, built of such materials, and decorated with such magnificence, as this present world affords, and as carnal men admire. For Moses, at God's command, caused the tabernacle to be erected, which, besides the courts, and the porch, consisted of two parts: in the first division, called "the holy place," or the sanctuary, were the candlestick, the table, and the shew-bread; and within the second veil, in the holiest of all, were the ark, and the other things here mentioned. (Notes, &c. Ex. xvi. 32—34. xxv—xxvii. xxxvii—xl. Num. xvii.) The golden censer, on which the high priest burned incense within the veil, on the day of expiation, seems to have been left in the most holy place during the rest of the year. The rod of Aaron and the golden pot of manna were within the holy of holies, and by, or near, the ark, as the word may be rendered; but they seem not to have been put within it.—(1 Kings viii. 9.) The typical import of all these things has been shown; and it is not necessary to speak of them particularly in this place, even as it was not for the apostle. The golden altar of incense is not mentioned in this catalogue; for what reason we know not; but the conjecture of some expositors, that the words, rendered the golden "censer," meant that altar, is groundless; for that was stationary in the first sanctuary, and was not used by the high priest on the day of atonement, who burned incense on a portable censer within the veil.

V. 6, 7. When all the particulars above mentioned had been prepared, according to God's appointment, the ordinary priests performed the several parts of their office in the first sanctuary at all times, without further limitation. But the high priest alone was allowed to go into the most holy place; nay, he was not allowed to enter thither more than once, or on one day, in the year; nor even on that day, till he had offered sacrifices for his own transgressions, and those of the nation, and then he took the blood of the sin-offering within the veil, to sprinkle before the mercy-seat. (Notes, Lev. xvi.) Thus, out of Israel, that holy nation, one holy tribe was selected; of that tribe, one holy family; and of that family one person to be "holiness to the LORD:" yet even this person, so carefully selected from the whole race of men, might not approach God on a mercy-seat without atoning blood, and only one day in a year, on pain of death for his presumption, if he transgressed these rules! The word rendered errors seems to denote all those sins, for which sacrifices were appointed; indeed, all but those presumptuous sins which were punished by death. Some commentators mention carrying the blood of the sacrifices into the temple, to sprinkle it before the veil, as one of the services performed by the ordinary priests; but no blood was carried into the tabernacle, except that of the sin-offerings for the high priest, or for the congregation; and this was done by the high-priest himself. (xiii. 11. Notes, Lev. iv.)

V. 8—10. By all those restrictions and limitations, which kept even the worshippers of Jehovah at so awful a distance, the Holy Spirit, by whose inspiration they were revealed and recorded, conveyed this important instruction; namely, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest. This instruction must be constantly inculcated, as long as the first tabernacle was standing, and the ceremonies of that worship continued in force. For the temple, being formed after the pattern of the tabernacle made by Moses, and having the same ministrations performed at it, might be considered as the continuation of it; and "the first tabernacle" is distinguished from that "greater and more perfect tabernacle," afterwards mentioned, (11, 12.) So that the holy places, in which the priests of Aaron's family ministered till the coming of Christ, are evidently meant. A few believers indeed, under the divine teaching, saw a little concerning the way of access to God, of communion with him, and of admission into heaven, through the promised Redeemer; but the Israelites in general looked no further than the external forms; and scarcely any person conceived an idea, that sinners of every nation should have that boldness of access to God through Christ, and all the privileges and hopes, which believers enjoy under the Christian dispensation. The difficulty, of guilty polluted rebels being thus admitted into the presence and favour of a holy God, was declared by those appointments; but the sacrifice and priesthood of the incarnate Son of God at once disannulled them all; when he hung upon the cross, the veil of the temple was rent, his ascension into heaven, and intercession there, opened the way to the mercy-seat; by his doctrine the way into the holiest was made manifest, and thenceforth it was only necessary that sinners should be made willing, by regenerating grace, to avail themselves of such an invaluable privilege. The legal ordinances therefore, especially those of the great day of atonement, were figures for the time that they lasted, (or, as some render it, "of the present time," the happy period thus prefigured being then arrived;) in which were offered various gifts and sacrifices, that could not give the worshippers genuine solid peace of conscience, or make a perfect reconciliation between the sinner and his offended Judge. The offerers, who rested in them, and did not by faith rely on the promised Saviour, could not obtain forgiveness of sins, or spiritual blessings; but were only exempted from temporal punishment, and admitted to external privileges, as members of the kingdom and Church of Israel, which was in a peculiar sense under the government of Jehovah. And as to the other ordinances of that covenant, which were connected with its sacrifices, they consisted principally of regulations concerning meats and drinks, and divers baptisms, or washings with or in water, as typical of sanctification, and such like institutions, which were carnal in themselves, though for wise purposes they were imposed till the coming of the Messiah, which was to be a time of reformation, by the introduction of a more simple and spiritual worship. They could therefore be of no use to the Jews, who rejected Christ out of zeal for them, and it was absurd for the Hebrew Christians to adhere so pertinaciously to them. The Holy Ghost, &c. This is a most express attestation to the divine inspiration of Moses, which should not pass without special notice, in these days of skepticism on this subject.

V. 11—14. After long expectation, the promised Redeemer was come, to be a High Priest, capable of procuring and bestowing to future ages, and to all eternity, 15 And for this cause he is [e] the Mediator of [f] the New Testament, that by [g] means of death, [h] for the redemption of the transgressions that were under [i] the first testament, [k] they which are called might receive the [l] promise of [m] eternal inheritance.

16 For where a testament is, there must also of necessity * be the death of the testator.

17 For [n] a testament is of force after men are dead: otherwise it is of no strength at all while the testator liveth.

the blessings of salvation on all believers, and fulfil to them all the ancient promises of God. This he was appointed to do, by officiating as a High Priest, in a greater and better tabernacle than that prepared by Moses, or even the temple built by Solomon, or any made with hands; that is to say, in one, not builded after the manner of men, or even like the lower creation, being the contrivance of infinite wisdom, and the work of almighty power. This may be explained either of his holy human nature, in which he tabernacled on earth, and officiates as Priest in heaven, or of the heavens themselves, where he appears in the presence of God for us. Nor did he attempt to atone for sin by the blood of goats, bulls, or calves, and to enter into the most holy place with it; but, having shed his own most precious blood on earth, as in the court of the sanctuary, he entered in, once for all, into the true holy place in heaven, to plead the merit of it before the Father's throne, as the complete atonement for all the sins of his people; having thus purchased for them "eternal "redemption" from wrath, and sin, and all its consequences, and being assured that no further atonement would ever be required in their behalf. For if the blood of bulls and goats, and such irrational creatures, could avail to expiate the guilt of the nation, or of individuals, on the day of atonement, or on other occasions, (Notes, Lev. xvi.) and if the ashes of an heifer mixed with water, and sprinkling those who were unclean through the touch of a dead body, could produce a typical external sanctity, by which they might be admitted into the congregation of the Lord, (Notes, &c. Num. xix.) how much more efficacy might be supposed in the blood of Christ, actually to remove guilt and defilement! The exalted dignity of his divine nature, the entire purity of his human nature, the honour put on the law of God by his most perfect obedience, and the voluntary offering of himself, under the immediate influences of the eternal Spirit, as a spotless sacrifice to divine justice in the stead of sinners, concurred to render it glorious in God, for his sake, fully to pardon, and freely to accept, all who were interested in him by faith. If then there was the least efficacy in external expiations and purifications, through the appointment of God, and because they showed the guilt and pollution of sin, and typified the method of its removal, so that it became proper for God, through them, to confer temporal benefits on criminals, how much more efficacious must the blood of Christ be, to purge the believer's conscience from the guilt of those evil works, which were committed by such as were dead in sin, and deserved death, or that really polluted the soul, even as the touch of a dead corpse did the body! As, therefore, it was abundantly suited to render the exercise of mercy consistent with the most perfect justice and holiness, and honourable to God to accept the services of sinners who believed, so, when apprehended by faith, it would remove the burden of guilt from the conscience, and give the trembling sinner peace, confidence, and comfort in approaching, worshipping, and obeying the living God; and Christians therefore could have no occasion to cleave to the abrogated typical expiations of the Mosaic law. Some expositors, by "the "eternal Spirit," suppose the Deity of the Son to be meant; but this seems rather to be implied in the word CHRIST; and as the holiness and obedience of our Saviour, his miraculous powers, and the supports given to his human nature, are constantly ascribed to his immeasurable unction with the Holy Spirit, sealing his appointment to his mediatorial offices; and as he was carried through his last scene of sufferings by his most perfect zeal and love, which also gave value to his sacrifice; so the Holy Spirit seems to be intended, and his eternal Deity, (as well as the everlasting value and efficacy of Christ's atonement,) is attested by the epithet here employed. The Levitical services were all shadows of heavenly things; the expiations were, therefore, types of some real expiation. 'Now 'what expiation is there in the whole universe, if the 'Sacrifice of Christ is excluded?' (Macknight.)

V. 15—17. Because of the unceasing and inexhaustible efficacy of his sacrifice, Christ was appointed to be the Mediator of the new covenant. He had undertaken the cause of sinners, which must otherwise have been relinquished as desperate, as he alone was capable of offering a sacrifice of sufficient value to make a real atonement; and he had come into the world in human nature for that purpose, in order by means of his death to atone and pay a ransom to God for the transgressions, which had been committed by believers under the old covenant, or the legal dispensation; even they who lived before his coming, as well as all others who were called by the grace of God to faith in him, might receive the promise of an eternal inheritance, (Notes, Rom. iii. 21—26.) For the temporal inheritance alone was secured to the Israelites by their observance of the legal expiations, and they among them, who sought and obtained spiritual and eternal blessings, were made partakers of them through the anticipated efficacy of Christ's redemption. Yet that grace was finally confirmed to them by his death: so that, in this respect, the covenant he mediated might also be considered as a Testament, by which a man bequeaths certain legacies to persons specified therein, to be given to them in consequence of his death. Thus Christ might be considered as having acquired, in his mediatorial office, a conditional right to dispose of spiritual and eternal blessings, as by his will and Testament; these he bequeathed to all such as should apply for them in faith; and though, by a special favour, some were made partakers of them, in consequence of his unfailing engagements to assume human nature, and make redemption for their transgressions, yet even their right to them was incomplete till after his death, and all others must be admitted to claim them on that ground only. For when a Testament is made, the death of the testator must of necessity take place, before the legacies can be claimed; it is of no validity till he be dead; for, as he may change it at pleasure while he liveth, so it hath no force till afterwards. Thus Christ died, not only to purchase the blessings of salvation for us, but to give efficacy to his testamentary disposal of them; though he is different from all other testators, in that he rose again, and ever liveth to be the executor of his own testament, for the benefit of all that are interested in it. Thus the passage has generally been interpreted; but this is the only passage in which the original word is expressly used in Scripture for a testament, or the will of a dying person. The change of the meaning also from covenant to testament seems unprecedented: the Mediator "of a "testament," "the blood of a testament," are expressions to which it is difficult to annex any precise ideas; and the Sinai-covenant can hardly in any sense be called a testament. Several modern expositors have therefore endeavoured to establish another interpretation. 'For this 'reason, of the new covenant he is the Mediator, or 'High Priest, by whom its blessings are dispensed, and 'also the Sacrifice, by which it is procured and ratified; 'that, his death being accomplished for obtaining the par'don of the transgressions of the first covenant, believers 'of all ages and nations, as the called seed of Abraham, 'may receive the promised eternal inheritance. For 'where a covenant is made by sacrifice, there is a neces'sity that the death of the appointed sacrifice be pro'duced. For, according to the practice of God and man, 'a covenant is made firm over dead sacrifices; seeing it 'never hath force whilst the goat, calf, or bullock, ap'pointed as the sacrifice of ratification, liveth. Because, 'from the beginning, God ratified his covenants by sacri'fice, to preserve among men the expectation of the 'sacrifice of his Son; hence, not even the covenant at 'Sinai was made without sacrifice, or blood.' (Macknight.) It appears to me, that the original will admit of this interpretation; but the nature of this work does not admit of my enlarging on the criticisms by which it is supported. On the one hand, the cavils which have been raised against the apostle's reasoning as inconclusive, if the first interpretation be adopted, and on the other hand, the venerable names which have sanctioned it, with other circumstances of a similar nature, render me afraid of too confidently preferring either interpretation. I cannot, however, on the whole, but think that the latter exposition is the most obvious, and consonant to the apostle's general way of reasoning.

V. 18—23. To prefigure the necessity of the blood-shedding of Christ, even the Sinai-covenant had not been dedicated, or ratified, without blood. For after the law of ten commandments had been delivered from the mount, and Moses had spoken every precept to the people, according to the outlines of that law, (on which their national covenant was to be established,) and they had consented to it, he wrote them in a book, and proceeded to the solemn ratification of the covenant, as a typical mediator between God and the nation. (Notes, Ex. xxiv.) The apostle specified some particulars, which are not found in the history, probably taking them from the traditionary usages of his people on similar occasions. To prevent the blood from coagulating, it was customary to mix it with water, that it might sprinkle the better, (which was an apt emblem of the two-fold benefit of Christ's atonement,) and then putting scarlet wool upon a stalk of hyssop, they sprinkled the blood with it. (Notes, Lev. xiv. 7. Ps. li. 7.) The Hebrews also knew, that Moses sprinkled the tabernacle and all its furniture with blood, to consecrate them for the worship of God. (Marg. Ref.) In short, it was a general rule, that almost every thing was by the law purified with blood, which showed, that nothing could be clean to a sinner, not even his religious duties, except as his guilt was expiated by the death of a sacrifice of sufficient value for that end, and unless he continually depended on it. And indeed it was absolutely an universal rule, that without the shedding of blood, no kind or degree of sin could be pardoned, or the punishment due to it be remitted. It was then necessary, by the appointment of the law, for the exemplars, or types, of heavenly things to be purified by the sacrifice of innocent animals, and by the application of their blood, or they could not be acceptably used in the worship of God; but it was necessary, for more durable and immutable reasons, that the heavenly things themselves should be purified by an atonement of superior excellence, even by the One sacrifice of the death of Christ, which was infinitely more valuable than all of them. In order to his efficaciously interceding for sinners in heaven, and opening for them the way to the mercy-seat, that they might commune with their reconciled Father in his ordinances, and at length be admitted into heaven; it was necessary that Christ should on earth, in our nature, shed his blood, and die a sacrifice on the cross; that he might have the infinite merit of that sacrifice to plead

24 For Christ is not entered into [b] the holy places made with hands, which are [c] the figures of the true; [d] but into heaven itself, now [e] to appear in the presence of God for us:

25 Nor yet that he should [f] offer himself often, [g] as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with blood of others:

26 For then must he often have suffered since [h] the foundation of the world: but now once, [i] in the end of the world, hath [k] he appeared to put away sin by [l] the sacrifice of himself.

27 And [m] as it is appointed unto men once to die, [n] but after this the judgment:

28 So Christ [o] was once offered [p] to bear the sins of many: and unto [q] them that look for him, shall [r] he appear the second time, [s] without sin [t] unto salvation.

before the throne, in behalf of all who should come unto God by him: otherwise mercy shown to sinners would dishonour the justice and holiness of God, and their admission into heaven, would, as it were, defile that holy place.

V. 24—26. Christ had not entered into a "a wordly "sanctuary," made by the hands of men, to be the figures of the true, for which the blood of animals might be a suitable consecration: but he had entered into heaven itself, to appear in the immediate presence of God, as the Advocate for rebels and enemies, and in order to procure them full pardon, abundant grace, and eternal life; and a sacrifice of proportionably superior value was necessary, that he might perform this ministration to the glory of God, and the salvation of his people. This had been provided, in the sacrifice of himself: and there was no need, that he should frequently repeat his atoning sufferings and death, after the manner of the high priest; who every year went into the holy place with the blood of others, even of the animals slain for sin-offerings: for in that case Christ must often have suffered, since the first entrance of sin soon after the foundation of the world, when the efficacy of his gracious interposition in behalf of sinners began. This he must have done, if the sacrifice had been of small, or even of finite, value; as it would have been, if he were only a mere man, or a mere creature. But, on the contrary, the intrinsic and infinite value of his sacrifice appeared, in that, after he had been predicted and promised for four thousand years, and sinners had all along been saved by faith in him; he at length appeared in human nature, once, in the last period of the world, when the concluding dispensation was to be introduced: that by the One sacrifice of himself he might make an all-sufficient atonement for sin; and both provide for the full pardon of all the sins of the numberless multitudes of believers, through every age and nation; and also for the destruction of sin out of their hearts and nature, by their gradual sanctification: that so they might at last be made as righteous, holy, and happy, as if they never had been sinners. So vast was the value and efficacy of his one oblation!

V. 27, 28. As by the sentence denounced on the human race in Adam, the surety of the covenant of works, it had been "appointed for men once to die;" (from which Enoch and Elijah alone had been excepted, nor was that favour to be hoped for by any others, till the end of the world;) and as it was also appointed to all men, without one exception, that after death they must appear in judgment before God, and receive an eternal recompense of their conduct during their lives on earth; which judgment must be unto condemnation to all sinners, who have not previously obtained a pardon; and as without shedding of blood there can be no remission of sins, nor could the legal sacrifices really atone for them; so Christ, the second Adam, the Surety of his people, had once offered himself "to bear the sins of many," even of all the multitudes that ever did or ever shall believe in him, that thus he might fully expiate them, and make way for their entire pardon and complete salvation. So that, though they are not exempted from the stroke of death, they are delivered from the penalty, the sting, and the consequences of death; they will at length be made conquerors over that terrible enemy, and thus be justified in Christ at the day of judgment, and inherit eternal life through him. He therefore needed not to appear on earth again in the likeness of sinful flesh, to be "numbered "with transgressors," and be "made sin for us;" but he will at last appear in another form, in all his mediatorial and personal glory, as the omnipotent, omniscient, and righteous Judge of the world; in order to complete the salvation of all those who believe in him, wait for his coming, and prepare to meet him, by faith, hope, love, and patient obedience. It is generally supposed, that some of the expressions used in the latter part of this chapter allude to the ceremonies used on the great day of atonement; particularly the scape-goat bore, or carried away, the sins of the people into the wilderness; and the high-priest, when he had entered into the holy of holies, in linen garments, came forth to the people in his splendid sacerdotal robes, to pronounce the blessing upon them. 'Did he not appear the first time without sin? Yes, certainly, as to any inherent guilt; for the Scripture says, "He had no sin." 'What then is the meaning of this 'opposition, that at his first coming "he bare our sins," 'but at his second coming "he shall appear without sin "unto salvation?" 'These words can have no other imaginable sense but this, that at his first coming he sustained 'the person of a sinner, and suffered instead of us; but 'his second coming shall be on another account, and 'he shall appear, not as a Sacrifice, but as a Judge.' (Tillotson.) tuary of the Mosaic covenant, point out to us Christ as our Light, and the Bread of life to our souls, and remind us of his divine Person, his fruitful Priesthood that flourishes for ever, his perfect righteousness, and his all-prevailing intercession; "which things the angels desire to "look into," with admiring praise and adoration. At what a distance hath sin placed us from our holy Creator, when all the preparatory sacrifices of the law still left the worshippers secluded, and in a sense banished, even from the presence of God on his mercy-seat! All these sacrifices and services could no more purge the guilty conscience, than distinctions in meats, and "divers baptisms," could cleanse the polluted heart, or new-create the fallen nature of man. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, that the way into the holiest is now manifested, by the coming, sacrifice, and ascension of our great High Priest! Now we sinners of the Gentiles may come with more boldness to the throne of grace, than Israel's pontiff himself could; and now the gate of heaven is thrown open to all believers. Eternal redemption, and the promise of eternal inheritance, are purchased for us by the blood of Christ, who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God. This effectually purges the most guilty conscience from dead works to serve the living God, whilst the grace, that seals the pardon, new-creates the polluted soul. May we then be made partakers of this heavenly calling, and seek remission of our sins, only through the shedding and sprinkling of the blood of the New Testament, which God hath enjoined unto us!

V. 15—28.

We must never presume to approach God, except upon a mercy-seat, and in the name of our great High Priest, who is entered into heaven, to appear in his presence for us. All our hopes and blessings must be sought as the purchase of the agonizing, yet voluntary, death of our gracious Saviour, the legacy of his dying love, and the gift of his royal munificence to rebellious creatures. We must ascribe even our sanctification, and all our real good works, to the same all-procuring cause, and attend on divine ordinances, and offer our spiritual sacrifices as sprinkled with his blood, and so purified from their defilement. Nay, we must expect admission into heaven, as the place which he has prepared for us, through the presenting of his blood, for the ransom of our souls, and the purchase of our inheritance, which would otherwise have been contaminated by our entrance into it. Thus we should in all things learn the inestimable value of the one sacrifice, which Christ once appeared on earth to offer for us, that we may know our interest in his covenant, and be constrained by his love to the most devoted and unreserved obedience. In this manner we shall be reconciled to the appointed stroke of death, and look forward to judgment with cheerful hope; and so wait prepared for his coming the second time without sin, to perfect our salvation. But as no wisdom, learning, virtue, wealth, reputation, or authority, can exempt one of our race from the sentence of death, so nothing can deliver a sinner from condemnation at the day of judgment, except an interest in the atoning sacrifice of Christ; nor will one be saved from eternal punishment, who hath despised, refused, or neglected this great salvation: for though the criminal suffers many painful effects of his offences previous to his trial, yet the sentence of the law is not executed, nor the threatened vengeance inflicted, till he hath been arraigned, convicted, and condemned, at the appointed tribunal.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1, 2. As the Hebrews would be backward in acceding to the apostle's inferences, concerning the inefficacy of the legal expiations, he proceeded still further to argue with them on that important subject. He observed, that the ceremonial law had only a shadow of the good things to come to the church by the Messiah, and not so much as the very image of them: its ordinances rather resembled, faintly and obscurely, the way of salvation through Christ, and the several blessings conferred on believers through him, as a shadow, or the rude sketch of a picture, does a man, than gave a lively or adequate idea of them, as the reflection in a mirror, a good portrait, or statue, does of the person thus represented. So that the sacrifices, which were constantly offered every year on the great day of atonement, could not make the very persons, who came into the courts of the temple on that solemn occasion, free from the guilt of their offences, or perfectly accepted with God. He was pleased, indeed, to exempt Israel from punishment, and to continue to the nation their external benefits, while they adhered to the prescribed worship; but they, who were actually pardoned and saved, received those blessings by faith in the promised Messiah. This must be allowed to have been the case; for if these sacrifices could have completely atoned for the sins of the people, would they not have been discontinued, as no further necessary? Seeing the worshippers, having been once purged from their guilt, would have no more been burdened with such a conscience of sins, as required more and further sacrifices to take it away. This is the privilege of Christians; for the sacrifice of Christ, being of intrinsic and infinite value and efficacy, there is no occasion that it should be repeated: but believers, having once had their consciences purged from dead works by faith in his blood, are perfectly justified and accepted unto eternal life: thenceforth they seek no other sacrifice; they are no more brought under condemnation; they continually apply, in the exercise of penitent faith, the unfailing efficacy of that atonement to their consciences; and thus they preserve inward peace, connected with humiliation and tenderness of conscience, notwithstanding the remains of sin in their hearts, and the guilt which they thence contract in their daily conduct. "Would they not, &c." (2.) Some render this "they would not have ceased to "be offered." That is, they would have continued to be offered, being efficacious and adequate; whereas it was plain, from the apostle's previous reasoning on several things contained in the Old Testament, that this was never intended. But the reading with an interrogation is founded on the best authority, and is most satisfactory. If any sacrifice had been offered of sufficient efficacy to atone for sin, there would have been no need for a continual repetition of it; and that repetition showed the inefficacy of the most solemn legal sacrifices. On the contrary, when the one sacrifice of Christ had been offered, the legal sacrifices were virtually abolished; no other sacrifice was required; no repetition was necessary; the end was fully answered; nothing, except faith in him, was needful; and the appointed ordinances were no longer prefigurations, but memorials, of his one all-sufficient atonement.

3 But in those sacrifices there is [d] a remembrance again made of sins every year.

V. 3, 4. The apostle's argument implied, that no sacrifice could really atone for sin, or bring sinners into a state of acceptance with God unto eternal life, which did not make full satisfaction to his offended justice, and render it honourable to him to remit the punishment of it. But the legal sacrifices were so far from being thus efficacious, that they did not suffice for the individuals, or the generation of Israel, who presented them, even in respect of a permanent exemption from temporal judgments: for the most solemn of them, at the day of atonement, was rather an annual remembrance of their sins, than a removal of the guilt of them: so that they had only a respect to the year that was past; and the same remembrance was made of sins, when the day returned the next year. For indeed it was not possible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sin, by making an actual atonement to divine justice for it. As divine appointments, such sacrifices might be a suitable acknowledgment of guilt, and profession of repentance, and reliance on God's mercy, on account of which he might bear with the Israelites, and give them temporal benefits; and they aptly typified the sacrifice of Christ. But they could not possibly render pardoning mercy, in its most plenteous exercise, consistent with the infinite justice and holiness of God, without which nothing could possibly take away sin, according to the apostle's reasoning in this place. The same argument equally proves, that the blood of a mere man, or of a mere creature, cannot take away sin. A guilty creature deserves wrath for his own crimes: if a perfectly holy man had the full disposal of his own life and soul, and could be willing to devote them to destruction, in the stead of a single guilty person, his life might be an adequate ransom for the other's life, his soul for the other's soul; but this must be all: and, even in this case, we cannot conceive that God would appoint, allow, or accept, such an atonement. If the most exalted of mere creatures should willingly assume our nature, and suffer temporal death, in its most horrible forms, for our salvation, we must perceive that the atonement would be of very small value, when compared with the guilt to be pardoned, and the punishment to be remitted, for the sake of it; nor could this render it consistent with the perfect justice of God, to pardon the atrocious and innumerable rebellions of so many millions, and to give them eternal life, on so inadequate a consideration. If, "without shedding of "blood, there could be no remission," it must have been, because God saw that sin fully deserved his wrath and the curse denounced against it; and that it could not consist with perfect distributive justice to remit the punishment, except through a vicarious sacrifice: and if the blood of bulls and goats could not possibly take away sin, it must have been, because they were not a sufficient satisfaction to divine justice; or, in other words, a sufficient declaration of God's holy hatred of sin, his judgment of its desert, and his determination to maintain the honour of his broken law, in order to render it consistent with his glory finally to pardon sinners on account of it. Now it must be evident, that the crucifixion of Peter, or of Paul, even if they had been free from sin, would have exhibited nothing decisive in this matter; there would have been no equality between the sufferer, or his sufferings, and the criminals to be pardoned, and the punishment to be remitted for the sake of it: and the case must still be the same, how high soever we ascend in the scale of created being. But when "God manifested in the flesh," became the Sacrifice, and his death upon the accursed tree the ransom, when "God "purchased the church with his own blood," the Sufferer being of infinite dignity, his voluntary sufferings were of infinite value. The perfect justice and holiness of God, and the honour of his law, are as legible in the cross of Christ, as his love to sinners: infinite purity and infinite mercy are in perfect and eternal harmony, while unnumbered millions of rebels who deserve the final wrath of God are pardoned, and made heirs of eternal felicity, through this satisfaction of inestimable value. We see, that this was an expedient adequate to its object; and that such a sacrifice would suffice for the sins of the whole world, if all men were willing to come to God through it. It is necessary for us to insist upon this, not only as comprising an unanswerable argument for the real Deity, and the proper atonement, of Christ; but, because many, who profess to believe both these truths, under colour of blaming metaphysical exactness in stating doctrines, and affecting to treat the orthodox reformers, doctrinal puritans, and modern preachers of the Gospel, as men of narrow minds, advance many things contrary to the apostle's reasoning in this passage: as if Christ's sacrifice derived all its efficacy from the appointment of God, and not from his personal Deity and excellency; (which was "the altar that sanctified the gift;") and as if, had the Lord so pleased, an inferior sacrifice might have equally answered the purpose. But surely they forget, that God appointed the sacrifices of bulls and goats, as well as that of his Son: yet it was not possible for the former to take away sin, but the latter at once effected it, because of its intrinsic value. 'Divine appointment and acceptation—'must not be assigned as the only cause, that the oblation 'of our Saviour's body was thus available for the expiation 'of the guilt of sin; for then no reason can be given why 'he might not have accepted of the blood of bulls and 'goats, and much more of any ordinary man. But the 'great reason, why "the blood of bulls and goats could "never take away sin," is this, that they could never 'answer the great ends of punishment, by rendering it 'consistent with the honour of the governor, and with the 'ends of government, to admit the substitution of them 'in our stead. By the obedience of our Lord Jesus 'Christ unto the death, in our stead, the ends of punish'ment are very signally obtained, and that with more 'advantage to God's glory, than if the punishment of our 'offences had been inflicted upon us; and so God by it 'may be truly said to have been satisfied, seeing that 'justice is truly satisfied, when all those ends for which 'the punishment of an offender could be desired are 'obtained. 1. God, by this dispensation, hath given us 'the best and most effectual example, to deter us from 'sin. If he, who was the well beloved Son of God, 'found it so dreadful to lie under the burden of the pu'nishment of sin for some hours; how must the sinner 'sink under that burden, when it is laid upon his shoulders "for ever?" 'Also, if on this account "God spared "not his own Son," 'we may be sure he will not spare 'his stubborn enemies. 2. God, by this method, hath 'taken a most excellent way for the reformation of the 'sinner. 3. God, by this dispensation, hath sufficiently 'consulted the preservation of his honour, and secured 'the reverence and observation of his laws, seeing he 'hath, by this example, let all men know, that though 'he be a God of great long-suffering and mercy, he will 'by no means clear the sinner, or suffer sin to go un'punished. But that none of these ends could be at all 'obtained by the substitution of a bull, or goat, or ram, 'to suffer in our stead, must be extremely manifest; for 'this would rather tempt men to conceive that God's 'displeasure against sin could not be great, and that he 'was not much concerned for any satisfaction for the 'violations of his laws, when such slight matters were by 'him thought sufficient expiations for them.' (Whitby.)

V. 5—10. To prove his doctrine in the most unanswerable manner, the apostle referred the Hebrews to a remarkable prophecy of the Messiah, which showed that his coming was the necessary consequence of the inefficacy of the legal sacrifices, and of God's purpose of saving sinners. (Note, Ps. xl. 6—8.) The Messiah, speaking concerning his coming into the world, remarked, that JEHOVAH had no delight in the sacrifices of the law; (Notes, Ps. l. 7—15. Is. i. 10—15:) but that he had "prepared a body for him." The words in the Psalm are, "mine ears hast thou opened," or "bored." (Ex. xxi. 5, 6;) and it hath perplexed many to determine why the apostle, writing to the Hebrews, should quote from the Septuagint, where that translation seems to deviate from the original. But he probably supposed that the words conveyed the true meaning, though not the literal rendering of the passage; and that the production of the holy human nature of Christ was the preparation for his mediatorial obedience, which the Holy Spirit intended by the expression, "mine ears hast thou opened." When JEHOVAH had no satisfaction in the legal sacrifices, not merely because the people rested in them in a formal and self-righteous manner, but especially because they did not sufficiently display the honour of his justice in pardoning sinners, the eternal Son declared his readiness to come into the world in human nature for that purpose; according as it had been written of him in the volume of the book, or in the opening of the roll of prophecy, in which he had been promised as the Seed of the woman. Now the apostle argued from this, that the opposition between the sacrifices, in which JEHOVAH had no pleasure, and the obedience of Christ to his whole will, in which he would be fully satisfied, was an evident intimation, that he intended to remove the former, in order to establish the latter in its full glory, and as the only ground of sinners being pardoned and saved. By this will of God, perfectly performed by Christ, in his obedience unto the death upon the cross, Christians were sanctified and consecrated to

God, as accepted and spiritual worshippers, through the offering of his body once for sin, with which his mediatorial obedience had been completed. ‘From this memorable passage of the fortieth Psalm, we learn that the only expiation for sin, which God ever appointed, is the sacrifice of his Son in the human nature; that all the sacrifices, which he appointed to the Israelites, were nothing but emblems of the sacrifice of Christ; and that the sacrifice of Christ being offered, the emblems of it are now fitly laid aside, that under the Gospel dispensation there might remain to mankind no sacrifice, having pretension to take away sin but the sacrifice of Christ, expressly established by God himself, as the meritorious cause of our pardon.’ (Macknight.)

V. 11—18. Every priest of Aaron's order stood as a servant at his work, offering repeatedly the same ineffectual sacrifices: some of the priests did this every day, and the high priest did it every year on the day of atonement. But this person, or this priest, even Christ, after the offering of one sacrifice, (because that was of infinite value and eternal efficacy,) sat down as a royal Priest upon his throne at the right hand of God; from that time waiting the fulfilment of the prophecy, or promise, which engaged that all his enemies should be put under his feet. For by his one oblation he had provided effectually for the perfect justification unto eternal life of all those, who received his atonement by that faith that springs from regeneration, and is evidenced by the sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience, and who were thus set apart and consecrated to the service of God. To this the Holy Spirit had borne testimony in the scripture, which has been before quoted: (Note, viii. 7—13:) according to the covenant there spoken of, when the laws of God are written in the heart, every kind and degree of sin will be for ever pardoned; for Christ by his one offering hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified; and where such perfect remission is vouchsafed, there needs no more sacrifice for sins. For though justified persons continually contract new guilt, and their best services want forgiveness, yet they never fall from a justified state: the sacrifice of Christ continually applied to, in the exercise of penitent faith, preserves their peace; and if the exercise of these graces be intermitted through temptation and sin, corrections, rebukes, and terrors, bring them back again to the same remedy: and thus their justification is, as it were, a permanent act of God, continued in their daily pardon and acceptance for Christ's sake, through life even unto death, and so in judgment and to eternity.

V. 19—22. The apostle, having closed the argumentative part of his epistle, proceeded to apply his doctrine to practical purposes. As believers had liberty and access with boldness, into the immediate presence of God, in the most holy place, and to the mercy-seat, even beyond what was permitted to the high priest himself under the law, it behooved them to make use of this privilege; for they were in no danger of being punished as presumptuous, notwithstanding their sinfulness and the holiness of God, how often soever they came before him; provided they humbly depended on the blood of Jesus, by which this privilege had been procured for sinners. They might now have access into the holiest "by a new way." The original way of acceptance and communion with God, through the righteousness of works, had been finally shut up by the entrance of sin: (Note, Gen. iii. 24;) and the typical sacrifices could not open another way, as the restrictions and exclusions before stated evidently showed: whilst even the partial admission of the high priest, being preceded with recent sacrifices and blood newly shed, showed that the way unto the Holiest was not yet manifested. But the blood of Jesus is always, as it were, newly shed; it never loses its efficacy, and may at any time, and by any sinner, be presented in faith before the mercy-seat; and it never fails to procure to all, who thus plead it, a free and acceptable access to God. This way is also living; as Jesus, the High Priest, ever liveth to intercede before the throne of God for us, as the way itself gives life, as it were, to those that come in it, and as it leads to eternal life. (Note, John xiv. 6.) This new and living way Christ hath consecrated, authorized, and set apart for this purpose, that we may come to God in the holiest, upon a mercy-seat, "through the veil, that is, his flesh." JEHOVAH displayed his glory above the mercy-seat, in the holy of holies, before the coming of Christ; but this glory was covered and concealed by the veil; that is, the harmony of infinite holiness, with pardoning mercy in the divine conduct and character, was not clearly discovered or understood. But when the human nature of Christ, the Son of God, was wounded and bruised for our sins, the veil was rent from top to bottom, the obscurity was removed, and "a just God and a Saviour" was openly revealed to mankind, displaying his glory from the mercy-seat, and exercising most abundant grace to the vilest of sinners, in a manner most honourable to his infinite purity. Having such a Way to God, and such a High Priest over the true sanctuary, it was not proper that the Hebrews should stand at a distance, as if afraid to approach, or averse to the most cordial reconciliation and friendship. The apostle therefore joined himself to them, and called on them to accompany him in drawing near to the Lord, with fervent desires, large expectations, and continual prayers and thanksgivings, with sincerity and integrity of heart, as real penitents, and upright worshippers, fearing nothing but hypocrisy; and, "in full assurance of faith," most firmly believing that God would accept the persons and services of all those who came to him in this appointed manner. For, though they might properly examine themselves, whether they were true believers or not, and so admit a doubt of their own sincerity or personal acceptance; and therefore "the full assurance of hope" could not always be a duty, any more than always attainable; yet they must never allow themselves to doubt of the truth of the testimony of God, or his faithfulness to his promises; so that "the full assurance of faith" was always their duty, though in that, as in other things, they would be liable to come short of it. In order to come in this manner, they must "have their hearts sprinkled from an evil "conscience," by a special reliance on the atoning blood of Christ, to take away their sense of guilt and fears of wrath, and to give them solid peace, connected with the purifying of their consciences from error, ignorance, partiality, and stupidity, or whatever might render them quiet in the allowance of any kind or degree of sin, and the cleansing of their hearts from all corrupt and carnal affections. Their "bodies also must be washed with pure "water," as the priests were washed with water before they were admitted to enter upon their office, and continually washed themselves in some measure before they officiated; and as divers washings were appointed to the worshippers by the law, so the use of water in baptism was to be a constant memorial to Christians, that their outward conduct should be pure and holy before men, as well as their hearts and consciences cleansed in the sight of God. Thus they would approve themselves to be spiritual worshippers; and, whilst they derived comfort and grace from their reconciled Father, they would adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour in all things.

V. 23—25. The apostle further called upon the Hebrews, to unite with him in holding fast the profession of their faith and hope in Christ, without wavering in it, faltering about it, or shrinking from the persecutions to which it would expose them; being assured that God would vouchsafe them the present supports, and the future felicity which he had promised, and depending on his faithfulness for them. And moreover, they ought to consider one another's interests, dangers, and situations, and by what means they could be of service to each other; especially they should endeavour, by their example and exhortations, to stimulate one another to the more vigorous and abundant exercise of love, and the zealous practice of good works. Nor ought they, from fear of the reproaches and persecutions of their enemies, to forsake the assembling of themselves together, on the Lord's day, or at other times, to worship God in his ordinances, and to hear his word, as the manner of some Christians was, who were induced, through timidity or lukewarmness, to decline such attendance on public worship. On the contrary, they ought to exhort one another continually to be bold, constant, and diligent, in their holy religion, in honouring God before his enemies, and in seeking their own and each other's edification, and establishment in the faith. This they should the more resolutely perform, as they might clearly see the signs of Jerusalem's approaching desolation, which the Lord Jesus had mentioned in his predictions of that catastrophe, and which was evidently approaching. (Notes, Matt. xxiv.) This epistle was written only a few years before that event, and as it would be a critical deliverance of Christians from the persecutions of the Jews, so it would be peculiarly terrible to apostates.

would be tempted to apostacy, not only by the virulence of their persecuting countrymen, but by their own undue attachment to the legal sacrifices. So long as they supposed that the blood of bulls, lambs, or goats, could take away sin, they might hope for safety in renouncing Christianity, and so escaping persecution; and thus they might be induced to "sin wilfully, after they had received the "knowledge of the truth." The whole argument shows, that the apostle principally intended a wilful, deliberate, and pertinacious apostacy, not the effect of ignorance or sudden surprise, but against the convictions of their own consciences, and in a presumptuous and obstinate manner, though he expressed himself in such language, as might also warn the readers against every kind of wilful and presumptuous sin. The persons spoken of were such, as had "received the knowledge of the truth," and were so enlightened in respect of the evidences and doctrines of Christianity, as to make a credible and intelligent profession of it, even in the time of the apostles. When this had preceded, a wilful renunciation of Christianity to return to Judaism, either from a determined purpose of escaping persecution, or from proud and carnal enmity to the humiliating and spiritual truth of the Gospel, would generally be fatal. In respect of such apostates, "there "remained no more sacrifice for sin;" the legal sacrifices had lost all their validity and efficacy to avert even national judgments since the death of Christ, which was the Substance of all these shadows; so that the Jewish nation was devoted to speedy destruction, for crucifying their Messiah and rejecting his Gospel; nor could their most exact and zealous attention to the legal expiations procure the least respite from their approaching miseries, or any alleviation of them; and the apostates wilfully chose their portion with that accursed generation, "after having received the "knowledge of the truth." Nor could it be expected, that they would ever be "renewed to repentance" of this atrocious and presumptuous wickedness; for they must have witnessed so many miracles, and even have exercised such gifts of the Holy Spirit themselves, that it might be supposed they had committed the blasphemy against that divine Agent, by ascribing his operation to some satanical influence, and that they would be given up to final impenitence and unbelief, and be wholly excluded from the benefit of Christ's efficacious sacrifice. So that nothing would remain for them, either as individuals or as a part of the Jewish nation, in respect of their temporal or their eternal state, but a certain, inevitable, and most terrible expectation of the judgment and vengeance of God, and of his indignation, like flaming fire, to consume them as his implacable enemies, and sacrifices to his offended justice, in the same manner that the fire on the altar consumed the typical sacrifices. There seems in this passage to be a peculiar reference to the unexampled miseries, which came soon after on the Jewish nation, and to their desperate rage and fury in the midst of them: and this horror of conscience, connected with desperation and all its tremendous effects, (as in the case of Judas,) might be expected to be most common among apostates from Christianity, who had done violence to their own convictions, and sinned against their better knowledge with presumptuous enmity, when they saw matters evidently coming to those extremities which Christ had predicted. But this horror and despair were only a shadow of the unspeakable anguish to which they would at length be reduced, when the insulted Saviour should proceed to execute vengeance upon them, from which they would see that it was impossible to escape. Sometimes apostates have perceived their desperate condition before death, and, in all the horrors and blasphemous rage of damned spirits, have served as beacons to warn others not to imitate their conduct. Probably there were few or no instances of such enlightened and deliberate apostates being restored; perhaps several of them had been known to be given up to the most tremendous horrors of conscience, and it was peculiarly proper to state this matter in such strong language, for the benefit of others. Yet this did not imply, that any penitent would fail of obtaining mercy, or that any one would be excluded from the benefit of the Saviour's sacrifice, who humbly, earnestly, and perseveringly sought it, into whatever sins he had been betrayed. The persons spoken of are considered as adversaries, which cannot properly be applied to the case of any trembling, weeping, praying penitent. It was not probable, that such apostates as were described would, in the peculiar circumstances of those times, return to seek forgiveness by faith in the blood of Christ; and their danger consisted in being given up to final obduracy or desperation. These things indeed were written to warn those who wavered in their profession; not to affright the fallen, or to discourage the penitent. The passage therefore can have nothing to do with the case of persons called Christians in these days, who had not previously received the knowledge, either of the evidences or doctrines of Christianity; but who, through the ignorance and the artifices of wicked men, were led to doubt, or deny, the truth of the Scriptures, without any of the peculiar aggravations of these primitive apostates. Some of these persons, being afterwards "renewed to repentance," have assuredly believed the Gospel, experienced the power of its truth in their hearts, and produced the fruits of it in their lives; yet Satan has taken advantage of the sound of this and similar passages, and of some unguarded things that expositors have said upon the subject, to harass them with perpetual apprehensions, that there remained no benefit for them in the sacrifice of Christ, because they once doubted the truth of Christianity, though they now value that salvation more than all the world. Some cases of this kind have fallen under the writer's cognizance; and in this day of skepticism and infidelity, in which multitudes aspire to the reputation of free-thinkers by never thinking seriously at all, there may be many others of the same kind; for when Satan can no longer buoy up men in unbelieving presumption, he endeavours to drive them into unbelieving desperation; and he never fails to harass those to the utmost, whose destruction he cannot compass. To obviate such conclusions, these passages have been enlarged on, and shown to be totally inapplicable to the case under consideration. Even when the Gospel has been renounced, after far clearer knowledge, and with much greater malignity, than in the case before stated, the apostacy cannot be fatal, unless it be final. It is the peculiar honour of God's mercy, and of the redemption of Christ, that none are excluded, who are willing to accept of them in the prescribed manner: "Him that cometh unto Christ, he "will in no wise cast out," whatever he hath before been guilty of: but when professed Christians are tempted to apostacy, they may well fear, lest God should be provoked to give them up to final obduracy and a reprobate mind. 'The apostle lays it down as certain, that God will not 'pardon sinners, without some sacrifice or satisfaction. 'For otherwise it would not follow, from there remaining to apostates no other sacrifice for sin, that there must 'remain to them a dreadful expectation of judgment.' (Macknight.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28—31. The sacrifices of the law were principally appointed for sins of ignorance, infirmity, or inadvertency; but presumptuous transgressors were excluded from that benefit. (Marg. Ref.) He, therefore, who despised the law of Moses, and deliberately violated its plain commands, in contempt and defiance of the authority and vengeance of God, was punishable with death, and excluded from mercy, when the fact had been legally proved; even though the crime were such as might otherwise have been pardoned through a trespass-offering. But of how much severer vengeance would they be adjudged to be deserving, who had renounced the Gospel, in that wilful, contemptuous, and presumptuous manner, which had been described! They had indeed, as it were, trampled upon the Son of God, with insolent defiance and disdain, by doing all in their power to dishonour him, and to provoke him with the most desperate ingratitude and impiety: they had esteemed that precious blood, which purchased all the blessings of the new covenant for sinners, and ratified it to all that believed, and by the shedding of which Christ had been sanctified, or consecrated to be the High Priest and Advocate of sinners in the heavenly sanctuary, as if it had been an unclean thing, less holy than the blood of goats, or as vile as that of a malefactor! Some indeed apply the word sanctified to the apostate; who had been admitted into the church, as set apart for God, and consecrated to his service by professing faith in the blood of Christ, which he afterwards vilified. This may refer to those blasphemies against Jesus of Nazareth, which were often required of such as renounced the Gospel, in order to avoid death or other sufferings; and which apostates would commonly use, in order to gain confidence with the party which they had joined. They had moreover done despite to the Holy Spirit, the divine and gracious Author of spiritual life, and all its consolations in the souls of sinners. They had acted in direct opposition to the convictions of the Holy Spirit, and to his strivings with them. In renouncing Christianity, they traduced, with most virulent reproaches, that religion, which was adorned by the holy fruits of the Spirit in the lives of its professors: and above all, by ascribing his miraculous power to satanical agency, even contrary to their own knowledge; they acted as if they were determined to provoke him in the most despiteful manner possible. So that the authority and mercy of the Father; the Person, love, and atoning blood of the Son; and the Person and operations of the Holy Spirit, were alike insulted and blasphemed by them, after having professed the Gospel, and having been baptized "into the "name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost," yea, most of them at least, after having received the Holy Spirit by the laying on of the hands of the apostles! and what punishment could be too severe for such accumulated guilt? Nor should any man, when tempted to so atrocious a crime, flatter himself with hopes of impunity, from the immensity of the divine mercy; seeing God had declared that vengeance belonged to him as his peculiar prerogative; and that he would judge his people, being determined to punish with most decided severity, the crimes of such as renounced his worship, or committed wickedness to the disgrace of their profession. (Notes, Deut. xxxii. 35—44.) And it would be found, and might be known, to be a terrible thing, beyond all expression or imagination, to fall into the hands of the living, the eternal, and almighty God, as sacrifices to his justice, and objects of his vengeance and abhorrence, without any oblation or Mediator, to appease his indignation. This was about to be the case of the Jewish nation; and it would peculiarly be the doom of wilful and malignant apostates from Christianity. 'The epithet of living, is given to God, in 'this passage where his vengeance is spoken of, to show, 'that as he lives for ever, he can punish for ever; a con'sideration which adds to the terribleness of his ven'geance.' (Macknight.)

V. 32—34. The apostle here proceeded to caution the Hebrews by other topics. To fortify their minds against temptations to apostacy, or other wilful sins, they ought frequently to recollect the former days of their profession; and to consider what they had ventured, suffered, and renounced for Christ, and how they had been supported and comforted under their trials. When they were first illuminated in the knowledge of the gospel, (Notes, 2 Cor. iv. 3—6;) and had been admitted into the Christian church; they were speedily called, as soldiers to the combat, to contend with persecutions and afflictions. Some of them were made a public spectacle to their neighbours, by the malicious accusations brought against them, and the disgrace, derision, and punishment laid upon them: and others were the companions and witnesses of the cruelties inflicted on those who were so used; and thus were called to unite sympathy with their afflicted brethren, to alarms on their own account. Among those whom the apostle especially addressed, were several that had shown compassion to him some years before, when he was bound at Jerusalem, and in his subsequent imprisonment: and when, on that or other accounts, their property was seized and confiscated, they bore it, not only patiently, but joyfully; having abundant consolation from the assurance that they had in heaven a better and more enduring inheritance, which could not be taken from them, but would be their substantial felicity for ever: for they possessed in themselves, independently of all external things, the pledges and earnests of that expected blessing.

V. 35—39. None of those who had acted hitherto in an honourable and consistent manner, should at length cast away their confidence in Christ, or renounce the profession of his name, which they had boldly made; and to which so gracious and abundant a recompense was promised. Some indeed who once seemed to be zealous believers had apostatized, and the rest would surely be tried greatly; and they had need to have their minds armed with patient resignation and persevering constancy: that, having done the will of God, by steadfastly cleaving to Christ, and obeying, they might afterwards receive the promised gift of eternal life. For in respect of their final deliverance from trouble, as well as to the coming of Christ to take vengeance on the Jewish nation, and thus to deliver the christian Church from the persecutions which they endured from that quarter, the words of God by the prophet might properly be applied. (Notes, Hab. ii. 1—4:) and the just, by faith, would live, as had been predicted, while proud unbelievers would be cut off and perish: but if any man, who had made the most plausible profession of faith in Christ, should draw back in the time of trial, and finally apostatize, the Lord declared, by his apostle, according to the tenour of his whole word, and speaking after the manner of men, that "his soul should have no "pleasure in him," that is, he would utterly reject and entirely abhor him. Many of the Hebrews had thus evidenced the insincerity of their profession by apostacy; and others began to forsake the assembling of themselves together, who needed to be reproved and warned; but the apostle trusted that he himself, and they whom he immediately addressed, were not of the same character with those who drew back to perdition, but such as had "believed to the saving of their souls; even such as were partakers of living faith, and would be kept through it by the power of God, unto salvation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

So precious are the blessings which come to us through the Gospel, that all sacrifices and ordinances, however varied and multiplied, could only be an indistinct shadow, and not so much as an exact image of them: and, in like manner, the most nervous language, the most lively expressions, and the most fervent affections, fall immensely beneath their real excellency. The righteousness brought in, and the sacrifice once offered, by Christ, are of eternal efficacy, and his salvation shall never be abolished: they suffice to make all "the comers thereunto perfect:" the worshippers, once purged by his atoning blood, need seek no other sacrifice; nor will they, by the conscience of guilt, be ever driven to adopt such expedients, as call sin to remembrance, yet cannot possibly take it away; but daily applying to the great propitiation, they derive from it both strength and motives for obedience, and inward comfort, notwithstanding their sinfulness. Most certain it is from these chapters, that God will not pardon any transgression without such a sacrifice as can really expiate the guilt of it. And if those sacrifices, which were of his own appointment, could not take away sin, because they could not satisfy the demands of his justice, let none suppose, that human inventions, self-imposed penances, prayers, tears, amendment, moral virtues, alms-deeds, or any other device or performance, can avail in the behalf of those, who put them in the place of the sacrifice of the Son of God: "for if righteousness," in any way or degree, "come by "the law, then Christ died in vain."

fallen man, for whom no sacrifices or contrivances could in the least avail, he, according as it had been written of him in the volume of the book from the beginning, with infinite compassion to our deserved misery, came, in our nature, to accomplish the will of the Father, and to "bear "our sins in his own body on the tree." Thus, by one sacrifice for sins, he effected the glorious and gracious design, and now seated on the right hand of God, he henceforth expects till all his enemies shall be put under his feet. What then remains, but that we seek an interest in this sacrifice by faith, and the seal of it to our souls by "the sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience?" Thus, by the law being written in our hearts, we may know that we are perfectly justified, and that God will no more remember any of our sins and iniquities.

V. 19—25.

Having "access with boldness into the holiest by the "blood of Jesus;" by "the new and living way which he "hath consecrated for us," through the rending of the veil by his crucifixion for our sins; and having such a High Priest over the house of God, let us not stand at a distance, or turn away from him, who beseeches us to be reconciled: let us in the first place, beware of hypocrisy, that we may "draw near "with a true heart:" let us watch and pray against unbelief, that we may come "in the full assurance of faith," as knowing this to be the appointed and only way of acceptance and salvation: let us apply his blood to purge us from guilt, and seek for his promised grace to cleanse us from all our filthiness; that so, our hearts being sprinkled from an evil conscience, we may lay aside the body of the sins of the flesh, and henceforth walk in newness of life. Thus we shall be enabled to "hold fast the profession of our faith "without wavering," whatever temptations or seducing examples we may meet with, as knowing that he is faithful who hath promised; and with composed and cheerful minds, we shall be enabled to consider the cases of our brethren, that we may animate them to love and good works. But if they were not to be excused, who, in the time of severe persecution, forsook the assembling of themselves together, how shall we answer it to God, if, in these favoured days, we indolently absent ourselves from the assemblies of his saints, and neglect to honour him by attendance on his ordinances? Against such evils we should exhort others; and we ought ourselves gladly to suffer the word of exhortation, as knowing that soon the day of death and of judgment approacheth.

By negligence, pride, or carnal self-love, or by gradually yielding to the fear of man, professors of the Gospel are left to "sin wilfully, after they have received "the knowledge of the truth;" and, though the fallen, the weak, and the trembling should be encouraged, yet we cannot too awfully alarm the secure and presumptuous; as every deliberate sin against light and conscience is a step towards the tremendous precipice here described. Neither the mercy of God, the sacrifice of Christ, nor the love of the Spirit, will profit that man who "tramples under foot "the Son of God," treats his atoning blood with insolent contempt, and does despite to the Spirit of grace. For such daring rebels and apostates, "there remains no more "sacrifice for sin, but a certain fearful looking for of judg- "ment and fiery indignation, to consume" them as the enemies of the Lord. To him belongeth vengeance, and his righteous recompenses of the crimes committed by hypocrites and apostates will be more terrible than the doom of Sodom, or even than that executed upon the devoted Jews. However men may now despise these warnings, they will at length know that it is "a dreadful thing to fall "into the hands of the living God," and to hear him say, "It is a people that hath no understanding; therefore he "who made them will have no mercy on them." Let then every professed Christian "give diligence to make his "calling and election sure:" let us all remember our convictions, affections, and purposes, when we were first enlightened, and how we thought that we should be willing to endure or part with any thing, if we could but obtain peace with God and a good hope of salvation; and let us remember our consolations and supports under former trials. And if we have been called to "endure a great "fight of afflictions," and have suffered reproaches and losses with fortitude and cheerfulness, from a persuasion that we had "in heaven a better and a more enduring sub- "stance," let us not disgrace our former conduct, or "cast "away our confidence, which hath great recompense of "reward." For we still have need of patience, whilst we wait the accomplishment of God's promises, in obedience to his will. But the time is short: he that cometh will soon come, and will not tarry beyond his appointed season; and he will shortly end our sorrows and conflicts, by removing our souls to heaven; yea, he will speedily come to raise the dead, and perfect our salvation. Let us then show that we are justified through faith, by living and walking with God in dependence upon his promises, and in obedience to his commands, because we are satisfied with the security of his word. Thus we shall possess the assurance, that "we are not of them who draw back to "perdition, but of them that believe to the saving of "the soul."

been the grand peculiarity of JEHOVAH's worshippers, from the beginning of the world. This induction of examples he prefaced by a definition of faith; in which he did not confine his views to one single exercise of that fundamental grace, but took in all the variety of its actings, in the whole of a believer's experience and conduct. Where the principle, from which faith springs, is implanted by the regenerating Spirit of God, it leads a man to receive the truth concerning justification by the merits of Jesus Christ, according to the measure of light afforded him; but it will also embrace the whole word of God, and expect its accomplishment as to all the extent, in which he hath spoken and promised. This divine faith is "the sub-"stance of things hoped for:" crediting the testimony of God, resting on his promises, and expecting the accomplishment of them, it gives the object hoped for at some future period, a present subsistence in the soul, as if it were already possessed; for the believer is satisfied with the security afforded, and acts under the persuasion that God will not fail of his engagements. Thus he gives up present advantages, and endures present hardships, in obedience to God, and in waiting for his promise; even as men give ready money for an estate in reversion, or endure present labour in hope of future ease and indulgence.—But faith has not only respect to the good things hoped for: it is also, "the evidence of things not seen." The things revealed to faith, but invisible to sense and undiscoverable by reason, may relate to the past, the present, or the future: to God, and to his works of creation, providence, and redemption; to his omniscient presence and his future judgment; to the world of spirits, and the eternal state of happiness or misery: to the law and its sanctions, or the gospel and its privileges; and, in short, to a vast variety of particulars which cannot be enumerated. But faith is the evidence, the internal conviction, or demonstration, of them all. To unbelievers they appear false, dubious or visionary; as they have no medium by which to obtain satisfaction about them: but believers take the plain testimony of God as a truth already demonstrated, and which requires no further proof: their argument is this: "God "hath said it, and it must be true." And, in proportion to the strength of their faith, their judgment and conduct are influenced by this realizing conviction, with reference to things revealed; even as if they were the objects of sight, or capable of strict demonstration. The believer uses his powers of reasoning, to obtain satisfaction concerning the evidence, that such or such matters are divinely revealed; and to determine the meaning of the words, in which the revelation is conveyed. But when these previous questions are answered, he most rationally says, "God hath determined this point: and though I once thought otherwise, as multitudes still do; yet infinite knowledge and truth have decided against our prejudices and erroneous opinions, and I submit to the divine teaching.' He is not so absurd, as to attempt to invalidate the testimony of God by his objections, or to give force to it by his arguments. He does not suppose that divine revelation must be level to man's comprehension, or coincide with his speculations: he expects, believes, and adores mysteries, but knows that contradiction is not mystery; nor can any evidence prove a real contradiction to our senses, or certain knowledge, to be a divine revelation; so that mysteries above reason he humbly receives, but absurdities contrary to it, he ascribes to misconstruction or imposture. This definition of faith will be illustrated by all the examples in this chapter. The apostle further observed, that by faith all their pious progenitors, and other eminent persons in former times, had obtained a good report, or an honourable character in the word of God: by faith they were all justified, and the same was the principle of all their holy obedience and eminent services, and patient constant sufferings in the cause of truth and holiness.

V. 3. The heavens and the earth, and all things in them, as well as the regular order with which they are governed and directed, might, indeed, be proved by argument to be the contrivance and work of God; yet men's reason had never come to any satisfactory and practical conclusions in this matter; so that, "by faith" crediting the word of God, we believe, and understand to good purpose, that the worlds were contrived, framed, created, and arranged in their present order by the omnipotent command of God; so that the things which we now behold in such resplendent beauty, were made of those "which do "not appear." They were produced from the chaotic mass, which was without form and void, by that powerful word, which first called the chaos out of non-existence. This was effected in the six days' work of creation; and the satisfactory assurance which believers derive from the scriptural account of the original of the world, being contrasted with the discordant hypotheses and endless disputations of ancient philosophers and modern theorists, exhibits a very striking illustration of the proposition, that "faith is the evidence," or demonstration, "of things "not seen." (Notes, Gen. i. ii.) 'This world, which 'we see, was not made of any appearing or existing 'matter, but from nothing, contrary to the axiom of all 'the philosophers, 'From nothing nothing is made.' This 'indeed never could enter into the mind of any philo'sophers, not even of those who wrote that God created 'the world. Therefore the whole of this is of faith.' (Beza.) Nothing can possibly be more unphilosophical, or indeed absurd, than the notion of the eternal preexistence of that chaos, from which God created the world: yet I apprehend Beza had firm ground for asserting that none of the philosophers had perceived this, or without revelation would have perceived it. Most commentators consider this verse as a decided proof that God created the world from nothing; which, no doubt, is the doctrine both of reason and revelation. (Note, Gen. i. 1.)

V. 4. The original word, rendered "more excellent, signifies also a greater, or more complete, sacrifice. Cain brought the meat-offering alone: Abel brought that, and the firstlings of his flock also. By faith embracing the promise of a Redeemer, who was to come, Abel, as a sinner, penitently, humbly, uprightly, and obediently, presented unto God the typical sacrifice, which had been appointed, and he was accepted; but Cain, in self-will, self-wisdom, self-righteousness, impenitence, unbelief, and rebellion, brought a formal acknowledgment to God of his obligations to him for temporal benefits, but not the atonement for his sins. He seemed to say, with modern infidels and skeptics, 'In what is my sacrifice inferior to 'Abel's? Why should he be so bigoted, as to think God 'will accept none, who do not come in his peculiar way! 'I, being sincere, shall be as favourably received with my 'sacrifice, as he with his: and indeed it seems more 'rational to present the first fruits of the earth, than to 'slay an innocent lamb, to be burned upon the altar.' Yet God rejected his offering: and his rage and enmity against Abel, the accepted worshipper of God, produced the same horrid effects, which similar principles have in every age been producing, in cruel persecutions, and multiplied murders of believers, by proud formalists and hypocrites. But God himself attested, that Abel was righteous before him, and that his oblations were accepted: so that, being murdered by Cain, he still speaketh to us; declaring that sinners can come to God only by penitent faith in the great Propitiation; that faith is uniformly connected with righteousness and upright obedience: that believers have their portion in a better world, and not on earth; that they must expect no favour from proud unbelievers and Pharisees; and that their blood shed by persecutors calls from the ground to heaven for vengeance. (Notes, Gen. iv. 1—14.) Abel 'offered a sin-offering, as well as a 'meat-offering. Whereas Cain, having no sense of sin, 'thought himself obliged to offer nothing but a meat-'offering. In this character of Abel, Paul had our Lord's 'expression in his eye, "the blood of righteous Abel." (Matt. xxiii. 35.) 'As in after times God testified his 'acceptance of particular sacrifices, by sending down fire 'upon them, we may suppose that it was in that man-'ner that he testified Abel's righteousness upon his offer-'ing. Flesh not being permitted to men till after the 'flood, Abel must have thought it unlawful to kill any an-'imal, unless God had ordered it to be killed as a sacrifice.' (Macknight.)

V. 5, 6. (Note, Gen. v. 22—24.) By faith, Enoch was so peculiarly favoured of God, that he was translated to heaven, without seeing death, or experiencing its painful stroke; his body having been changed and rendered incorruptible, that he might immediately enter on his full felicity. So that he was not found on earth by those who sought him, as the sons of the prophet sought Elijah; for the Lord had taken him to himself. (Marg. Ref.) But, before this took place, he had received some evident testimony, that God was pleased with him, and probably this was made known to his contemporaries. St. Paul here quotes the Septuagint, where the words translated in our version, "he walked with God," are twice rendered, "he pleased God." The general meaning is, no doubt, the same, though the language is less emphatical, and the apostle seems to have been unwilling to interrupt his argument, by noticing the variation. Enoch had walked with God for a long season, but this was the effect of that faith by which he pleased him; for it is, and always was, impossible, for fallen man to please God, except by faith, seeing every one who cometh to God, to worship and serve him, "must believe that he is;" he must realize his invisible being, presence, and perfections, which can only be done by faith, exercised on the Revelation which he hath given of himself; otherwise some imaginary deity, some idol, will be substituted in his place. Moreover, he must believe "that God is the Rewarder of them that diligently "seek him;" but as all men deserve condemnation for their sins, and even their best services need forgiveness, so no one can know, or on good grounds conclude, that God will reward his services, or accept him in them, unless by receiving the testimony of revelation, either immediate, traditional, or written. This Enoch doubtless did, and so he believed in God, and came to him by faith in his word and promise, according to his appointment, and thus was accepted and graciously rewarded. But this differs widely from a mere assent to a conjecture, or a conclusion of reason, concerning the existence of a God, without any just notions of his character, will, or worship, and an attempt to please him in ways of man's devising. This many suppose to be all the faith which the apostle here means; though it accords to the religion of no one person mentioned in this chapter, except that of Cain, who doubtless had this kind of faith, and came in this manner, but "with "him God was not well pleased."

V. 7. (Notes, Gen. vi—ix.) The Lord, by immediate revelation made known to Noah his purpose of destroying the inhabitants of the whole earth by a flood of water, and warned him to prepare for such an event. These "things "were not seen as yet;" nothing of that kind had ever happened; no token of such a deluge appeared; unbelief might conclude it impossible, or exclaim against it as inconsistent with the justice or goodness of God. But Noah had faith, and that was in him "a demonstration of "things not seen:" he verily believed that such a deluge would come; he expected that omnipotence would execute the sentence denounced by infinite justice, and fulfil the word of unfailing veracity; he therefore reverenced with holy awe the majesty of God, and was moved with fear of falling under his displeasure: he was aware that unbelief and disobedience would expose him to future vengeance, as well as involve him in the common calamity; and therefore he was prepared to employ any means of deliverance, that the Lord should see good to appoint. Accordingly, when directed and commanded to prepare an ark, he did not hesitate to obey in the most entire and unreserved manner, though the labour and expense of building so vast a vessel must have been enormous, and though the undertaking must have exposed him to all kinds of ridicule and obloquy imaginable; and he might be sure that the unbelieving world would deride him as a visionary, and a fanatic for so singular a conduct. But he obeyed in faith, he ventured all consequences, and exercised the needful self denial; he waited the Lord's time, and preached, though unsuccessfully, to the men of his generation; he expected safety in the ark, though Omnipotence alone could secure him in such a vessel, through so tremendous a deluge. Thus he was preserved, and preserved his family also, from the common destruction of mankind, to repeople the earth; his example and admonitions concurred in condemning the world, and in showing the justice of God in thus punishing their universal and incorrigible wickedness; and, by the same faith, he relied on the promise of God concerning the Messiah, and became "heir "of the righteousness of faith," and of eternal salvation through him. This may be shown to be an exact representation of the manner, in which believers, being warned by God to flee from the wrath to come, are moved with fear, take refuge in Christ, part with all for his sake, are often made the instruments of salvation to their families also, condemn the world, and become heirs of the righteousness of faith. (Notes, Phil. iii. 7—9.) A Jewish writer introduces Noah, from the ark, expostulating with those who were perishing, because excluded. They plead, that they had used various means of securing themselves, in case the deluge should come, though they had declined his invitation to come into the ark: but he silences all their pleas at once, by saying, that they had refused to avail themselves of God's appointed way of preservation, and every other method must be unavailing. "How shall ye "escape, if ye neglect so great salvation?"

V. 8—10. (Notes, &c. Gen. xii—xvii.) Next in order of time to the two principal characters of the old world, and the progenitors of the new world, and even superior to them in eminence, was Abraham, the father of Israel, of many nations, of the Messiah, and spiritually of all believers. When he was first selected to be the repository of the promises, he was called, and commanded, to leave his native country and all its attachments, and to go out into a place which he was afterwards to receive for an inheritance, that is, in his posterity: this command was connected with several promises to him and to his seed; by faith he substantiated the blessings hoped for, and was satisfied concerning the things not seen; he therefore implicitly obeyed the call of God, and went forth, not knowing whither he was to travel. But he was satisfied that he was following the special guidance of God, under his immediate protection; and he therefore disregarded the objections, persuasions, or contempt of those, to whom such a design must have appeared, to the last degree, visionary and irrational. By faith in the promise of Jehovah, he continued likewise to sojourn as a stranger in that land which was promised to his posterity, without having any inheritance in it, or even building a house there; but passing his days as a traveller, dwelling in tents, that were easily removed, shifting frequently from one place to another, yet within the land of Canaan, except as he was forced out of it by famine. Thus he spent his life, even after the birth of Isaac, and afterwards of Jacob, who were the heirs with him of the same promises, and who imitated his example in this manner of life, and in believing obedience to the commandment of God. For he was not desirous of building, or inhabiting, a city in Canaan, or elsewhere; because he expected one of a more excellent nature, which alone has foundations that can never be removed; even the permanent, secure, and blessed city of God, where he displays his glory, and communicates unalloyed felicity, of which He is the Architect. His wisdom and love formed the stupendous plan, and his omnipotence executed it, for the glory of his own name, and the eternal residence of those whom he delighteth to honour and bless; and what can those magnificent cities be, which proud worms have erected, compared with that, the Builder and Maker of which is the almighty and everlasting God? Abraham expected Canaan for his posterity, and a mansion in heaven for himself. If this was the faith of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and this their expectation, can we suppose that such of their posterity, as "obtained a good report by "faith," did not believe the same truths, and expect the same inheritance? Nay, can we reasonably doubt whether this were the popular creed and hope of Israel, through successive generations, to the time of Christ? We cannot: unless we can suppose that the Sinai-covenant, in which national advantages were secured to the people, on condition of national obedience, could operate, as the fabled waters of Lethe, to make them entirely forget all preceding revelations made to their forefathers, and transmitted to them, and all the obedient confidence, which their forefathers had placed in those revelations? In fact, there is not one age in the history of Israel, from the origin of the nation to the termination of the New Testament, of which we have any remaining records, but in those records, the belief of a future state of just retributions, a future judgment, and a state of supreme blessedness to the righteous, may not be clearly discerned, and pointed out.

V. 11, 12. Sarah was at first unbelieving, when a son was promised to her in her old age; but she afterwards was enabled to rely on the faithfulness and power of God to perform his word, though contrary to the ordinary course of nature: and, in consequence of this faith, she was supernaturally strengthened to conceive and bear a son. Thus, in answer to the expectation of the faith, both of Abraham and Sarah, there sprang from one father, (who apparently was in this respect even as a dead person, from whom no offspring could have been expected,) such an immense multitude, that they were as the stars of heaven, or even absolutely innumerable as the sands on the seashore. This principally refers to the descendants of Abraham by Isaac and Jacob; but those descended from him by Ishmael and the sons of Keturah render the fulfilment of the promises to him, in this respect, still more surprising. (Notes, Gen, xvii. 15—21. xviii. 9—15. xxi. 1—7. xxv. 1—4.)

V. 13—16. Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, and Jacob, persevered in faith, and the obedience of faith, even unto death, and departed, expecting the performance of God's promises to them and their posterity. For they had not received the promises, or the things promised; either the inheritance of Canaan, or the coming of the promised Seed, during their lives. They had endured many hardships and trials, without any such peculiar advantages as might answer the singular favour, which the Lord declared that he bore to them. But they had "seen them afar off, "and were persuaded" that they would be performed in due season; they embraced them by faith, as their portion and the inheritance of their posterity; and they gave up present advantages for the sake of them "confessing that "they were strangers and pilgrims upon earth." (Notes, Gen. xxiii. 4. xlvii. 9.) Now they, who considered themselves, during their whole abode in this world, to be strangers in a foreign land, and travellers through it, plainly declared that they were going home to their native country, the residence of their Father and their most beloved friends, and the place of their permanent abode and enjoyment. Indeed, if, weary of this wandering life, they had purposed to return into Mesopotamia, they might have found an opportunity of doing it, and might there have settled among their relations; but this would have been an act of unbelief and disobedience, and a renunciation of the promises. Whereas, by sojourning in a strange land unto death, they declared their supreme desire and hope of a better country than could be found on earth; even of that heavenly inheritance, which Canaan typified. As, therefore, they were willing to renounce all other prospects to follow God in obedient faith, for the sake of an eternal and invisible inheritance; and as he had prepared such an inheritance, or permanent glorious city, for them; so he was not ashamed, or did not disdain, to be called their God, their Friend, and their everlasting Portion. Whereas the advantages which they had on earth from their believing dependence on him were too transient and little, to answer to such a relation; seeing they were neither sufficient for their final felicity, nor for the glory of his divine munificence.

V. 17—19. (Notes, Gen. xxii. 1—19.) It was peculiarly to be noted that in the grand instance, in which Abraham had been tried how far he would carry his unreserved obedience to the Lord, he had been influenced by the same powerful principle of faith; even when, in his determined purpose, he had offered up his beloved Isaac as a burnt-offering, in whom God himself had, as it were, laid up the promises: so that he might have thought he was about to render the performance of them impossible, by obeying this hard and mysterious command. But he left this to God, assured that he was able to restore his son to life, from the ashes to which he was about to reduce his body; though no instance of a resurrection from the dead had ever occurred. And in fact he did receive him back, as from the dead; seeing he had for three days lain under the sentence of death. This, in a most expressive figure, represented the crucifixion and resurrection of Christ, the only begotten of the Father, thus delivered for us lost sinners, to bleed and die, and bear the wrath of God for us, by love which passeth knowledge. Some indeed explain the last clause, of the supernatural conception and birth of Isaac, which, by a figurative manner of speaking, might be called receiving him from the dead: but the other interpretation is far preferable.

V. 20. Isaac, (as well as Rebekah and Jacob,) was reprehensible in the circumstances of the transaction which is here referred to; (Notes, Gen. xxvii.) yet he blessed his two sons, in a firm belief that God would fulfil his promises to his posterity. He also spake by the Spirit of prophecy; and he most entirely believed, and acquiesced in, the discoveries made of the future condition of the posterity of both Jacob and Esau, though his own purposes were thus disannulled. In a firm belief and assured persuasion, that the promises made to Abraham and to himself would be accomplished, (though under an error, the effect of a criminal partiality for Esau, he mistook the heir of these promises,) he blessed Jacob, supposing that it was Esau: but subsequent events convincing him of his mistake, he confirmed the blessing pronounced on Jacob, which he afterwards more deliberately ratified; and he also foretold many important particulars concerning Esau and his descendants.

V. 21. (Notes, Gen. xlvii. 28—31. xlviii.) Jacob, when his death approached, pronounced a prophetical blessing on each of his twelve sons, but that which respected Ephraim and Manasseh is here especially noted. God revealed to him his future purpose concerning their posterity, and in a firm belief of his word Jacob blessed them: and, though weak and infirm, he expressed his confidence in God, and his gratitude to him, by worshipping him, leaning on the top of his staff. Thus the Septuagint render the words, which, in our version, are translated the bed's head, and the variation is immaterial. Learned men have shown that the same word, by changing merely the vowel-points, will bear either signification.—‘We have here a lively example of that substance, (Note 1,) which was before com‘memorated. As Jacob, dying a stranger in Egypt, dis‘tributes the kingdoms of the Canaanites to his twelve sons ‘in no other manner than he would have done, had he ‘reigned in peace at Jerusalem. But how true and solid ‘this “faith, the substance of things hoped for,” was, ‘appeared by this, that after many years, the whole con‘cern being committed to the lot, than which nothing ‘seems more fortuitous, the event confirmed Jacob's testa‘ment.’ (Beza)—This learned writer here includes the blessing which Jacob pronounced on all his sons, as well as that on Joseph, with Manasseh and Ephraim. (Notes, Gen. xlviii, xlix.)

V. 22. Joseph, &c. (Notes, Gen. l.) Joseph, though lord of all the land of Egypt, yet, believing the word and promise of God concerning the posterity of Abraham, expressed his confident expectation, that they would be performed in the removal of the Israelites to Canaan: and he ordered his bones to be carried along with them, both as an expression of his faith, and to show that he desired to have his lot after death with the people of God, and not with the Egyptians.

V. 23. The parents of Moses also acted from the same powerful principle, of faith in the word and promises of God. When that eminent deliverer and lawgiver of Israel was born, they concealed him three months, from those who were appointed by Pharaoh to destroy the male children; for they perceived something uncommon in his appearance, which was supposed to indicate his future eminence. (Note, Acts vii. 20.) By faith they relied on the promised care and protection of God; and so they were not afraid of the king's commandment, but preserved the life of their son, at the peril of their own: and they acted from the same kind of faith, when they trusted Moses to the care of Providence in an ark of bulrushes; which believing expectation was answered in his preservation by Pharaoh's daughter, and his education in the court of Egypt to be the deliverer of Israel.

V. 24—26. In like manner, when Moses was grown up, even to the age of forty years, and was become very eminent among the Egyptians, he refused any longer to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, (though tradition reports that he was considered as heir of that prosperous kingdom:) but, believing the testimony and promises of God concerning Israel, and especially that respecting the Messiah, he would not take his lot among the Egyptians, for the sake of temporal advantages, however great. On the contrary, seeing God's peculiar people under the most cruel bondage and in the most abject condition, he openly avowed himself to be one of them: choosing rather to suffer the most distressing affliction with them, and to share the blessings promised to them; than to enjoy all the temporary pleasures, which his high station could have procured him, in the ways of sin and ungodliness. He likewise esteemed the reproach cast on Israel, for their expectations of a glorious Redeemer to arise from among them, under whose special care they professed themselves to be, as well as the disgrace of their condition, to be more valuable than all the immense treasures and revenues of Egypt; so that he renounced the latter, that he might partake of the former: for "he had respect unto the recompense of reward;" even the gracious and abundant compensation, which Christ confers on all those who are reproached for his sake. In consequence of this believing choice and purpose, he renounced all his prospects and indulgences in Egypt, and became a refugee, or a stranger and a humble laborious shepherd in Midian for forty years. (Notes, Ex. ii. iii.) 'Esteeming the scoffs cast on the Israelites, for expecting the Christ to arise from among them, in whom all the nations of the earth should be blessed, "greater riches than the treasures of Egypt." (Macknight.) "The recompense of reward," here mentioned, could not be temporal; for Moses came not into the land of Canaan; nor could he expect any greater blessing in that kind, than he might have had in Egypt. He therefore must have had respect to some spiritual and heavenly recompense.' (Whitby.)

V. 27. Moses evidently feared, when he forsook Egypt the first time: but this relates to his leaving that kingdom the second time, when he led forth the tribes of Israel. He was then strengthened in faith to disregard the wrath and power of king Pharaoh: he denounced the death of the first-born, left the tyrant's presence, as one who bade defiance to his menaces, and marched out of Egypt with great intrepidity; though he was fully aware, that Pharaoh, with his army, would pursue him: and when that actually took place, he boldly said to the affrighted Israelites, "Fear not, stand still, and see the salvation of the LORD. The LORD shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace." For he endured most constantly in delivering his messages, and in this emergency, though he had no visible protection against the vengeance of Pharaoh; because, (by faith, as the evidence of things not seen,) he saw the invisible God, as his almighty Defender, and rested assured that he was with him, to take care of and deliver him. (Notes, Ex. viii. xi. xii. 29—42. xiv. 5—14.)

V. 28. By the same efficacious principle Moses foresaw the destruction of the first-born in Egypt, and expected the exemption of Israel from that calamity, in the way that the Lord prescribed unto him. He therefore influenced his people to keep the Passover, with the sprinkling of the blood upon the door-posts, and the other significant ceremonies; lest the destroying angel should enter their houses also: by which they were preserved, and this made way for their deliverance out of bondage. The whole hath been shown to be a typical representation of a sinner's salvation by the death of Christ, and by faith in his blood. (Notes, Ex. xii. 3—28.)

V. 29. Moses, Aaron, Joshua, Caleb, and others, truly believed; and the rest of the nation, by the exhortations of Moses, were excited to a confidence in JEHOVAH's power and favour for present deliverance from Pharaoh. But it was chiefly by the faith of Moses, their leader, that the Israelites passed safely through the Red Sea; even as Noah's family were preserved in the ark by means of his faith, though they seem not all to have been true believers. Israel was the visible church of God, and the type of the whole multitude, who by faith pass through trials and death unhurt: but the Egyptians represented the enemies of God and of his people; and, copying Pharaoh's pride and presumption, they ventured into the sea, and perished; as all the enemies of the Lord will do at death, which delivers all believers from them. This does not therefore authorize us to suppose, that any of the persons, here mentioned by name, were destitute of justifying faith: as some have inferred from the subsequent unbelief of many, who passed safely through the Red Sea. (Notes, Ex. xiv. xv.)

V. 30. (Notes, &c. Josh. vi.) Joshua, and many of the Israelites, believing the promise of God, that he would deliver Jericho into their hands, obeyed his command, and induced their brethren to do the same, in respect of the extraordinary means used for that purpose. They expected God to perform his word, and they observed his directions, in marching round the city, and blowing the trumpets for seven days: and in this manner the walls fell down at the appointed time, and afforded them a safe and easy victory. The same principle would lead them to embrace the promises concerning the Messiah, and salvation by him: but in collective bodies there has always subsisted the difference between real believers, and mere professors, who concurred with them in the same external services.— 'As the land of Canaan belonged to the Israelites, by a grant from God, the Possessor of heaven and earth, it was proper that the first city, which resisted them, should be taken in such a manner, as to demonstrate the 'truth of their title. Thus were—all the Canaanites 'made to know the supremacy and power of the God of 'Israel, and how vain it was to make any resistance.' (Macknight.)

V. 31. In like manner Rahab, the harlot, hearing that God had denounced the destruction of the Canaanites, and that he had promised manifold blessings to Israel, was by faith induced to renounce her connexion with the enemies of God, and to seek admission among his people. At the hazard of her life she entertained, peaceably and as friends, the spies of Israel; and, assured that Jericho would be taken by the Israelites, she stipulated for her own life and that of her relations, as if that event had already taken place. Thus she escaped the destruction of her unbelieving citizens, who persisted in their enmity to God and to Israel. Doubtless she embraced the promises concerning the Messiah and spiritual salvation in the same obedient manner, when she was made acquainted with them; and thus she was incorporated among the Israelites, and became an ancestor of Christ. But the fruits and infirmities of her faith have already been fully considered. (Notes, &c. Josh. ii.)

V. 32—34. (Notes, &c. Judg. iv—xvi.) The history of the eminent persons, here mentioned in general terms, has already been considered. It would have exceeded proper bounds for the apostle to have spoken particularly concerning each of them, and of all that might have been adduced. They are not placed in the order of time in which they lived, but as they occurred to the apostle's mind: and the whole company of the prophets are mentioned in a word. By faith, crediting the testimony of God, and substantiating his promises, some of them, as Joshua and David, subdued the nations of Canaan and the neighbouring kingdoms, as the servants of God in the cause of Israel. (Notes, Josh. vi—xi. 2 Sam. v. 6—25. viii. x.) Others performed most eminent obedience to his commandments, or executed justice, and reformed the nation; and they waited for, and obtained, most remarkable accomplishments of the divine promises to them and their people. Some had even, in the exercise of faith in God, been enabled to stop the mouths of lions: Samson and David slew each of them a lion; and Daniel the prophet spent the night in a den of hungry lions. (Notes, Dan. vi.) Others quenched the violence of the fire. (Notes, Dan. iii.) Elijah was repeatedly delivered from the persecuting rage of Ahab, Jezebel, and Ahaziah; Micaiah from that of Ahab; and Elisha from the sword of the kings of Israel and Syria; and Jeremiah from that of Jehoiakim, and Zedekiah's princes. (Notes, &c. 1 Kings xvii. xviii. xix. xxii. 2 Kings i—vi. Jer. xxvi. xxxviii. 8—13.) Hezekiah and others were miraculously recovered from sickness; and Hezekiah's kingdom was restored from the utmost debility to a very flourishing condition, in answer to his confidence in God. Many instances occur in the history of Israel, of those who waxed valiant in fight, and turned to flight the armies of the aliens: yet it has generally been supposed, that there is a peculiar reference to the successes of Judas Maccabeus and his brethren, against the forces of Antiochus Epiphanes; when, from feeble beginnings, they arrived at great power, and defeated all that persecutor's devices, by faith in the promises and protection of the Lord. While we make a decided difference between the word of God and all other writings, there seems no impropriety in supposing, that the apostle had these events in his view on this occasion; as the historical facts respecting the persecutions of Antiochus and the victories of the Maccabees were well known among the Hebrews, and really formed an illustrious example of the efficacy and nature of faith.

V. 35—38. Through the same principle of faith, as exercised by the prophets and the persons concerned, women had received their dead children raised to life again, (Notes, 1 Kings xvii. 17—24. 2 Kings iv. 18—37.) Others were tortured with all the horrid ingenuity, which their cruel persecutors could exercise; and yet refused to accept of deliverance from their agonies, when offered them on condition that they would commit idolatry. They rather chose to expire in their torture, than to purchase life on such terms; because by faith they expected a better resurrection, even a resurrection to eternal life; which was far better than being restored again from the jaws of death, and living a while longer in this world, and better than the resurrections to temporal life before-mentioned. This is supposed to refer to the tortures and death of a woman and her seven sons, as recorded in the history of the Maccabees: (2 Mac. vii.) This is a most decisive testimony of the sacred writer, that his countrymen expected a resurrection to eternal life, and that the word of God warranted that expectation. Others, in different ages, had been tried by cruel mockings, and every kind of indignity and derision, with ignominious and painful scourgings, and with lingering sufferings in bonds and imprisonment; yet by faith they cleaved to God and their duty, amidst all that could be inflicted on them. Thus Micaiah, Jeremiah, and many others, had been abused; moreover, several had been stoned to death; and some had even been cruelly sawn asunder, as tradition reported that Isaiah had been. (Notes, 2 Kings xxi. 16. Is. i. 1.)—Others had been tempted, with the most complicated sufferings, and with conditional offers of deliverance, to sin against God: some were slain at once with the sword: whilst others were driven from their habitations, to wander as vagabonds, covered with undressed skins instead of suitable raiment; and to inhabit mountains, deserts, dens, and caves, instead of commodious houses; being destitute of friends, afflicted by complicated distresses, and most cruelly tortured, when they fell into the hands of their persecutors: yet they still trusted in God, and obeyed him with unremitting patience and constancy, in a realizing belief of his promises of support, comfort, and eternal salvation, and an unwavering confidence in them. Of these excellent persons the world, that used them with such contempt and cruelty, was not worthy; and therefore they were soon removed, in mercy to them, and in judgment to their enemies. The cases of David, Elijah, and many others recorded in scripture, may be alluded to: but doubtless many others occurred, during the persecuting reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel, of which particular accounts have not reached us; though some records or traditions concerning them might be extant among the Hebrews, when the apostle wrote. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 39, 40. All these persons had obtained a good report in the church, and many of them had been mentioned with honour in the word of God, though the world abhorred and execrated them: but faith was that principle, by which they were distinguished from other men, both in respect of God's acceptance, and their patient zealous obedience, or remarkable exploits and deliverances. Yet they received not that promise, which their faith especially embraced; they did not live to see the accomplishment of the promise concerning the Messiah, "in whom all nations "should be blessed," which was the grand promise made to Abraham, though they were saved by the anticipated efficacy of his sacrifice. For God, in his wise and righteous sovereignty, had reserved some better thing for his church under the Christian dispensation; (Notes, Luke x. 23, 24;) that these ancient believers might not be complete in their salvation and felicity, except in and by Jesus Christ, and by sharing those benefits, which were at length more openly revealed to his people: that so the whole church, by union with Christ, might be perfected in one body, and not in separate divisions; though the members of it had been scattered, as it were, through all the ages and nations of the earth. (Eph. i. 10.) Various interpretations have been given of this passage. Some suppose that the promise was that of "the better country," which the patriarchs desired, (13—16;) but unto which they were not admitted, nor will be admitted, till the whole multitude of heirs shall be collected together at the end of the world. Others, perceiving the contrariety of this interpretation to the general current of scripture, which uniformly declares that the "righteous entereth into rest;" that "it is "better to depart, and to be with Christ;" and that "when "absent from the body believers are present with the "Lord;" "blessed are the dead, who die in the Lord, "&c.;" confine the meaning almost wholly to deliverance from persecution! But was not the promise of a Redeemer, from the first fall of Adam, the grand promise to fallen man? This promise the patriarchs received, (17;) but they did not live to obtain the thing promised, (as the word in this verse implies.) They were indeed saved by faith in a Redeemer who was to come; but without those events, which the apostles testified as already past, their pardon and acceptance could not be ratified, or their salvation perfected. Thus the Old Testament believers could not be perfected, except by communion with the New Testament church, in the promised Saviour, and his righteousness, atonement, and intercession. (Note, Rom. iii. 24—26. Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The wisdom and goodness of God are peculiarly manifested, in the appointment of divine faith to be both the means of our interest in Christ for justification, and the efficacious principle of our obedience: and in neither case will any thing avail, but that faith which gives the soul, as it were, an appropriating hold of things hoped for, and an internal demonstration of things not seen. As men easily remove, and raise to a great height, vast bodies, by means of proper engines, which could not otherwise be done at all; so faith, exercised on the promise, truth, and power of God, would enable a feeble sinner to remove a mountain, if that were necessary for his safety and advantage. Without this, no man, since Adam's fall, has obtained a good report, or done any real and acceptable good works, according to the standard of God's word; but the worthies of the church are very different from the admired characters of the world. We know nothing to good purpose, concerning the perfections or works of God, or the eternal state, except by this evidence of things not seen: men's reasonings produce amusing speculations; but the sure testimony of God, received by faith, brings satisfaction to the soul. While we credit his account of the creation, we learn to adore and obey the Creator, with humble, thankful, and admiring hearts; which philosophers, ancient and modern, have scarcely appeared to do. But though faith receives the testimony of God concerning his creating and providential wisdom, power, and goodness; yet his truths and promises respecting redemption constitute its peculiar province. Believing his testimony concerning the future judgment and the eternal world; and even more than believing that we are sinners, exposed to condemnation and deserving of it, according to the tenour of his righteous law; we gladly receive the truth, concerning salvation by grace through the atoning blood of the divine Saviour, and wait on him for pardon, and every blessing, as his gift through Jesus Christ. Thus we are enabled by faith to plead a far more excellent Sacrifice, and to present more acceptable worship, than any Pharisee or infidel can offer unto God, according to the vain devices of his proud impenitent heart: we obtain the testimony of God in his word, and by his Spirit, that our persons and services are accepted with him: and, however we may be persecuted or driven out of the world, our felicity will be sure; and we shall wish to declare to all around us, and to leave it upon record for those that come after, that this is the only way to heaven, and that we are exceedingly thankful for having been taught to walk in it. We may not expect to escape the pangs of death; but we may hope to be with God, when no longer found on earth; as having pleased him, by coming in faith to his mercy seat, desiring his favour as our portion, and not only believing that He is, but that he is the gracious rewarder, even of sinners who diligently seek him; for without this faith it is impossible to please God. If we possess this evidence of things not seen, we shall hear with great interest the warnings of the oracles of God, concerning the future and eternal misery of the ungodly; we shall reverence the denunciation which unbelievers deride, object to, or blaspheme; we shall be moved with fear to flee from the wrath to come; we shall be encouraged in hope to make Christ our Refuge, and to leave all things, as comparatively worthless, to seek admission into this ark: thus we shall be safe, during the troubles of life, the terrors of death, and the solemnities of judgment, and when "the wicked shall be turned into hell, even all the people that forget God:" and we may in the mean time hope to be the instruments of saving our beloved children and relatives also. But then we must be contented to bear the reproach of singularity, enthusiasm, or hypocrisy: we must be unfashionable; and the world will condemn us, if our profession and behaviour condemn the world, as they certainly will, if we "become heirs of the righteousness which is by faith." We may by faith foresee the time, when our revilers will wish in vain that they were with us in the despised ark.

Exhortations to constancy, patience, and diligence; from the testimony of former believers, and with peculiar attention to the example of Christ; and from the loving intent, and salutary effect of the Lord's corrections, 1—13. To peace, and holiness, and jealous watchfulness over ourselves, and each other; enforced by the case of Esau, 14—17: to an obedient reception of the gospel, and reverential worship of God; from the superior excellency of the christian dispensation, and the proportionably greater guilt and danger of neglecting it, 18—29.

V. 8—19.

That is not justifying faith, which does not obey the command, as well as rely on the promise, of God: we too are called to leave many of our worldly connexions, interests, and comforts, to go in quest of a future inheritance; and if heirs of Abraham's faith, we shall "obey," and go forth, not knowing what things may befall us, or whither the Lord may lead us; we shall wait in the way of duty for the performance of his promises; we shall not take up our rest in the world, or be satisfied with its most splendid accommodations; but we shall seek for a city that hath foundations, whose Architect and Founder is the Lord of hosts. Our faith indeed, will not be always alike vigorous and efficacious; and its waverings will show, that we are not saved for it, though by it: yet, upon recollection, "judging him faithful, that hath promised," we shall be strengthened to expect the blessing, in defiance of apparent difficulties and supposed impossibilities, and thus shall be enabled for whatever is connected with the obtaining of the promises. If indeed we professed to seek a portion in the world, the advantages of religion might appear dubious; but we avow ourselves to be strangers in a foreign land, and upon our pilgrimage to our desired home, where our treasure and our hearts already are: we have not yet received the promises, but we see them afar off, embrace them, and wait in hope for their accomplishment; and we profess to be satisfied with the life of a sojourner and a pilgrim, and to wait till after death for our felicity. If, (like apostates,) we were minded to return to the country whence we came out, we might find an opportunity of doing it, perhaps with some secular advantage; but faith shows us, that it is devoted to destruction, with all those who choose their inheritance in it. We therefore desire a better country, that is "an heavenly;" and as God hath prepared everlasting mansions for us in the city of his special abode, in which he will make us most blessed for evermore; so his glory in our salvation, and our wisdom in choosing him for our Portion, will be most manifest in the event, whatever pre-a xi. 2—38.

sent appearances may be. This faith endures to the end; we must live by it, and die in it; and then have its expectations answered, and far exceeded. Whilst we live, our faith must be repeatedly and sharply tried, that we may be distinguished from mere professors of Christianity; but we may expect that we shall be strengthened in proportion to the trial: nor can we reasonably doubt of the power of faith to produce the most unreserved obedience, when we remember, that by this principle Abraham, when tried, offered his beloved Isaac as a burnt-offering at God's command, and trusted in him to perform all those promises, which his obedience seemed about for ever to disannul. Let us then inquire how far our faith has produced a similar obedience, when we have been called to acts of inferior self-denial, or to make inferior sacrifices to our duty. And whether we have given up what was called for, in an unreserved confidence that the Lord would make up all our losses, and even bless us by means of the most afflictive dispensations. For, as "He spared not his "own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he "not with him freely give us all things?" And what shall we deem too valuable to give up, at the call of such a merciful and bounteous Benefactor?

V. 20—31.

While we desire in faith to bless our children and worship God, during life and at the approach of death, and afterwards to have our lot with his people in the heavenly Canaan; and while we attend to every relative duty, trusting in the Lord and not fearing the wrath of man; let us particularly note the effects of the faith of Moses; and ask ourselves, whether we have been influenced to a similar judgment, choice, and experience. Have we by faith learned to prefer the sanctified affliction of the people of God, to the enjoyment of the pleasures of sin for a season? Do we deem it an honour and a privilege to be reproached for the sake of Christ; and prefer loss in his cause to the riches of this evil world, having respect to the great reward promised to those who are thus distinguished? All believers are not called to make the same sacrifices, or to endure the same trials, for righteousness-sake; nor have all the same measure of faith: yet without some experience, consciousness, and instances of this kind, we are not warranted to conclude that we are of his religion: for a common walking stick more resembles Aaron's fruitful rod, than the faith of many modern professors does the self-denying faith of Moses. But the subject is absolutely inexhaustible; we must by faith overcome the fear of man, as well as the love of the world; we must endure all sufferings, and venture all consequences, in the way of duty, as "seeing Him who is invisible." In all things our faith must respect the true paschal Lamb, and the sprinkling of his blood for deliverance from the destruction of the wicked; and we must conscientiously observe his ordinances, as means of grace to our souls. Then, by faith we may pass, at God's command, through seas of tribulation, and scenes of temptation or danger, during life and at death, in which all unbelievers must sink and perish for ever. By faith we must implicitly use every means, however unlikely, which God prescribes, in order to our obtaining the promises; trusting in him alone to render them effectual: nor will any perish with the enemies of God, who believe his word, and show it by love to his people, whatever former crimes they have committed, or in whatever situation they may be found.

V. 32—40.

Faith will enable a man to serve God and his generation, in whatever way he may be employed, whether in governing or reforming nations, or defending them, by crushing the power of iniquitous assailants; or in preaching the Gospel, and boldly testifying against the crimes of the most mighty and implacable of its opposers; or by working righteousness and obtaining promises in a more obscure station. It will influence a man to such prompt obedience, disinterested diligence, and warranted expectation, as will ensure all needful success in his undertakings. It will also prepare him for facing any dangers: and though we do not now expect to stop the mouths of lions, or to quench the violence of fire; yet we are authorized to look for proportionable supports and consolations, if called to end our pilgrimage by the hand of violence. But we are chiefly concerned in the spiritual warfare: and in this, "by faith, we shall out of weakness be made strong, "wax valiant in fight, and put to flight the armies of the "aliens." Though we do not hope to have our dead restored again to life in this world, yet faith will mingle joy with our tears, and teach us to refuse deliverance from suffering, by sin, whilst we hope for the better resurrection which God hath promised to his people. Trials of cruel mockings we may expect, even in these favoured days, though hitherto exempted from scourgings, bonds, and imprisonments. We seem not to have immediate cause to apprehend being stoned, or sawn asunder, or slain by the sword; yet we shall surely be tempted, and we cannot overcome temptation, except by that faith which supported the martyrs, and made them more than conquerors over the fear of torment and death. If then we are ready to shrink or droop under our lighter trials, let us think of those excellent men, of whom the world was not worthy, and reflect how destitute, afflicted, and tormented they were; and how they were driven out, and wandered as outcasts in mountains and caves of the earth. For as our advantages, with those better things that God hath provided for us, are so much superior to theirs; so should our obedience of faith, and patience of hope, and labour of love, be more distinguished. Let us then pray continually for the increase of our faith, that we may follow these illustrious examples, and be with them at length made perfect in holiness and felicity, and "shine "like the Sun in the kingdom of our Father for ever-"more."

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1. The apostle called on the Hebrews to consider themselves as surrounded with witnesses to the faithfulness of God, and the power and efficacy of faith, as innumerable as the drops of water in a cloud. The persons before-mentioned, and multitudes besides, seemed to look down from heaven, or even to come from thence, to compass them about, and to bear their testimony in the cause; as well as to be spectators of their conduct, in that arduous, perilous, and honourable race, in which they themselves had got so blessed a victory. Professed Christians ought therefore, with one consent, to lay aside every weight, (as men laid aside their superfluous garments, or most costly ornaments, when about to run in the Isthmian games, or to contend in the race on any occasion:) and not to burden themselves with worldly cares, interests, or indulgences, idolatrous attachments, or needless hurry of business, which might hinder their spiritual progress, and cause them to loiter, to move heavily, or to look back, and so endanger the loss of the race. They should also watch against, and seek a decided victory over, natural depravity, which would still continually beset them, and take advantage, so to speak, of every favourable circumstance, and especially of those sinful propensities, which on any account had a peculiar power against them. In particular they ought to use every means of conquering their unbelief; through which they were tempted to apostatize, from love of the world and fear of suffering. This was the sin which most easily beset them in those times of persecution: many had been cast down by it, many more were in danger, and they all would doubtless be vigorously assaulted on that side. It behooved them, therefore, to get rid of every encumbrance, and to seek the increase of their faith, and the crucifixion of their worldly lusts, that they might press forward with progressive earnestness and unwearied patience, in the persevering obedience of faith in Christ. This was "the race set before them," in which they must either win the crown of glory, or have everlasting misery and ignominy for their portion.

V. 2, 3. The apostle had indeed called the Hebrews to contemplate the conduct of those who had patiently run the race, and to consider the perils, difficulties, and sufferings, through which they had urged their course by faith. to seize the incorruptible prize: and they ought to realize their presence as witnesses for Christ, and spectators of their conflict. But they must look off, not only from the vain-glory of the world, the number and power of their enemies, and their own weakness and sinfulness, but even from these inferior luminaries; that they might behold that glorious Sun, from which even they received all the light that rendered them so resplendent. In order to their more full instruction and encouragement, they must look steadily to Jesus; not merely as one who had run his glorious race, and completed his work, by faith in the promises and covenant-engagements of the Father, but as "the Author and Finisher of faith" itself. He alone had opened the way for men to return to God, and to enter heaven by faith, when sin had closed for ever that of personal righteousness: from him, as the great Prophet of the church, the doctrine of faith had been delivered, which none could ever be authorized to change, add to, or deduct from: he alone, by his Spirit, produces faith in the hearts of his people, which he maintains, increases, and perfects, in its nature and fruits, till its work be finished. So that they must look to him for faith, as well as by faith: and though he needed not that faith, by which a sinner is justified, yet, in finishing his work on earth, he led his people the way to complete victory over every enemy, by a patient obedient reliance on the word of his heavenly Father. As he had in all things the pre-eminence, so he did not enter into his mediatorial glory, without having the precedency, in the measure of his sufferings, above all others that ever went to heaven. "For the joy set before him," of his own personal exaltation to the mediatorial throne; of the salvation of many millions of lost sinners from destruction; of bringing them to endless happiness, and of eternally glorifying the whole Name and all the perfections of God; he, with the utmost fortitude and constancy, endured all his other humiliating sufferings, from his birth in the stable to his agony in the garden; and at length most willingly submitted to be suspended on the cross, and there to expire in lingering tortures. And though this method of execution was peculiarly ignominious, and by the law pronounced accursed; and though his crucifixion was attended with unheard of circumstances of indignity, outrage, revilings, and derision; yet he disregarded the shame, as well as the anguish of it, as not worthy to be compared with the glorious event which he had in view. Thus, having endured, until his undertaking was finished, he was speedily raised from the dead, and exalted to "the right hand of the throne of God." The disciples ought therefore to look unto him, both as an example of constancy and patience; as the Author of their strength, encouragement, victory, and salvation; and as a glorious instance of the blessed effect of perseverance amidst reproaches and sufferings, in cleaving unto God, and being faithful unto death. For this case was so extraordinary, that they would do well to consider it, even with arithmetical exactness; and to estimate the dignity and excellency of the sufferer; the contradiction of sinners against him, who ensnared, reviled, opposed, and accused him, with most perverse enmity against his holy doctrine and example, and with malignant ingratitude for all his love; the intenseness and variety of his sufferings; the meek and composed fortitude with which he endured them; the love which moved him thus to suffer; and the most blessed consequences of his humiliation. When they were weary and faint in their minds, with trials and injuries from their malicious persecutors, such considerations would serve to quiet and encourage them, whilst they recollected that the holy Jesus suffered, to save them from deserved and eternal misery, and that sinners of the same nature with themselves inflicted these tortures; that he had much bitterness in his cup, which was not in theirs; that he was hated for his own sake, and they only because of their relation to him; and that his cross secured a happy event to all their conflicts and trials in his cause. In short, by looking to him, every kind of humiliating and animating topic would occur to their minds, to invigorate the exercise of their holy affections, and to repress the working of every carnal propensity.

V. 4—8. The Hebrews had indeed suffered the loss of their property, and even bonds and scourgings, for cleaving to Christ, and maintaining the conflict against sin and temptation: but they, whom the sacred writer addressed, had not yet resisted unto blood. Many of their brethren had chosen to die in this conflict, rather than yield the victory to their enemies by renouncing the Gospel: even men of like infirmities with themselves had endured more, by faith in the cause of God, than they had been called to do; and their sufferings for Christ were unspeakably less than his for them had been: so that they ought to be ashamed of their cowardice, if they grew weary, or fainted in the contest, because of their inferior trials. It would in that case appear, that they had forgotten the exhortation of the Lord, by Solomon, who addressed believers as his children, when he called on them not to despise his chastening, nor yet to faint under it. Whatever instrument was employed, they were thus taught to recognize the fatherly correction of God in their trials, and neither to disregard them with stoutness of spirit, and unfeeling contempt, as if they called for no humiliation, were capable of no improvement, had no meaning, and were easily supported; nor yet to faint, despond, turn aside, or seek relief by sin, when suffering under them; seeing the Lord correcteth all the objects of his special love, and sharply scourgeth every one, whom he receives as his adopted child into his family, and distinguishes by his peculiar regard. (Note, Job v. 17. Prov. iii. 11, 12.) If then the Hebrews endured their afflictions as fatherly chastisements, in a submissive spirit, and with due constancy, it would evidently appear that the Lord was dealing with them as with children: for, indeed, among men it might be inquired, "What son is he, whom his "father, on no occasion, chasteneth?" All need correction; all who are properly educated receive it; no wise and kind father wholly withholds it; and no children are entirely exempted from the pain of salutary discipline, except such as are indulged to their ruin. So that, if the professed people of God were not at all corrected, it might be inferred, that he did not own them as his children, but considered them as spurious members of the visible church, but not born of the Spirit, or educated for the inheritance of his saints. The allusion may either be made to such children as a man deems to be spurious, though born of his wife, because he suspects her of being unfaithful, and therefore will bestow no pains about them, or such as the real father neglects, because they are illegitimate, and he is ashamed to own them; but the former case seems more exactly to accord to the apostle's intent.

V. 9—11. The persons addressed had had fathers according to the flesh, who corrected them in their younger years: and though the chastisement seemed grievous to them, yet they did not leave them on that account, but rather learned to stand in awe of their authority, and to fear giving them further offence: and, when they were grown up, they became sensible that such discipline had been productive of good to them. Was it not therefore much more proper for them to submit to the Father of their spirits, the Creator of their souls, and the Giver of spiritual life; (Marg. Ref.) when that subjection was essentially connected with their salvation, and nothing but death could be the consequence of their rebelling against him? For indeed the corrections of their earthly parents, during the few days of their childhood, had been inflicted "after their own pleasure," and were often, in a great degree, the effect of their own passions, rather than of a prudent design for the good of their children: but their heavenly Father corrected them, though with apparent severity, during the short time of their continuance on earth, yet entirely with a wise and faithful regard to their profit; and in order to make them partakers of his holiness, by mortifying their pride and carnal lusts, and bringing them, through such discipline, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, to be conformed to himself in their judgment, dispositions and conduct. For by these means, he showed them the vanity of the world, the evil nature and effects of sin, the depravity of their own hearts, and the preciousness of his salvation: and so trained them up to humility, spirituality, simplicity, tenderness, submission, love, reverence, gratitude, compassion, and every holy affection. Now they were not to suppose, that these salutary corrections ever appeared pleasant, or matter of joy, to the persons who were enduring them: on the contrary, they always seemed for the present grievous, and caused much anguish; nor could they otherwise answer their intention. So that the sufferers often thought, that their trials did them harm, and would end in their ruin: yet afterwards, when the tumult of their passions had subsided, and they were able to digest the lessons which they received under them, they amply compensated for the anguish, by yielding the peaceable fruits of righteousness, and bringing them into a disposition quietly to submit to God, and meekly to bear the injuries of men; and by rendering them fruitful in all those good works, which evinced them to be justified, and at peace with God, and which tended to give them inward peace, joy, and confidence in him. Thus having been exercised, disciplined, or instructed, by sanctified afflictions, they would afterwards possess the benefit of them; even though for the present they seemed to irritate their corruptions, and tended immediately to make a discovery of the evils of their hearts, for their subsequent humiliation.

V. 12, 13. The considerations, above insisted on, should induce the Hebrews, both in respect of themselves and each other, to observe the counsel of the prophet, (Note, Is. xxxv. 3,) by endeavouring to counteract every disposition to faint, despond, or throw up their profession of the Gospel, amidst their persecutions. For they should consider them as fatherly corrections for their profit, submit to them as such, and seek to have them sanctified, and direct and encourage each other to take the same course. Thus they ought patiently and firmly to maintain their profession, and go on in the path of holy obedience; and, by proper instructions, admonitions, and counsels, oppose every false doctrine, and remove every stumbling-block: that so straight paths might be made for their feet, though the road itself was rough and thorny, lest any of those who were discouraged, or who, (like lame persons,) proceeded with difficulty and pain, should be turned out of the way, to seek an easier path, by concealing, or acting contrary to, their profession; (Note, Is. lvii. 14.) On the contrary, such persons should be healed, and confirmed by suitable encouragements and cautions, whilst there remained any hope concerning them.

V. 14. Whilst the persons addressed thus steadfastly adhered to the truth, and contended for it, they should also avoid all discord and resentment, and pursue peace with all men, even though it seemed to flee from them. They ought, as far as truth and duty would permit them, to live peaceably with Jews and Gentiles, and to bear or concede every thing for that purpose: and they should study to be at peace with each other, and with their Gentile brethren. This would greatly aid their following after holiness, and seeking nearer conformity to the spiritual law and perfect character of God, as exhibited in the example of Christ: nor must they even seek peace, so as to neglect the practice and pursuit of holiness, or by connivance at sin; for without holiness no man, of any religion, could see the Lord. None could behold his manifested glory, aud commune with him in comfort, whilst in this world, without "the sanctification of the Spirit unto obe-"dience;" nor could any one be capable of the beatific vision hereafter, or be admitted to it, without being made holy even as God is holy. It should be noted, that humiliation, brokenness of heart, and proper affections towards the Lord Jesus, are essential to the holiness of a redeemed sinner, and all else, however specious, must be counterfeit where these are wanting.

V. 15—17. It behooved Christians to look diligently, not only to themselves, but likewise to each other, both in respect of their principles and conduct: lest any one of them should fail of an interest in the special mercy and favour of God, or remain destitute of his sanctifying grace, and so be left to apostatize; and lest any root of bitterness, any unmortified lust in the heart, which seemed to be dead, should spring up and shoot forth its bitter and poisonous produce, in heretical doctrines or scandalous practices, to the trouble and disturbance of the whole body, and the defiling and corrupting of numbers, as frequently had been done. (Note, Deut. xxix. 18—21.) (Marg. Ref.) For instance, lest any one among them should commit fornication, under a mistaken notion of Christian liberty; or lest there should be some profane person, who so despised the peculiar blessings of the new covenant, as to barter them away for temporal advantages, like Esau, who for one meal of meat sold his birthright, (Notes, Gen. xxv. 29—34.) That example ought to be a warning to them, not to renounce Christianity for the sake of worldly ease, interest, or indulgence; for when Esau would afterwards have inherited the blessing, he was rejected both by the Lord, and by his father Isaac, (Notes, Gen. xxvii. 31—41.) so that he found no place or opportunity for repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears. The whole history of Esau shows, that he, at that time, neither truly repented of all his sins, nor sought to do it; but he was grieved and vexed at being circumvented by Jacob; he was sorry that he had made so foolish a bargain; he coveted the temporal advantages which belonged to the birthright, especially the dominion over his brother; he had altered his mind in that particular, and he sought carefully, and with tears, to induce Isaac to alter his purpose, to retract Jacob's blessing and to bestow it on him; but he sought this in vain, for it was then too late. This latter, however, even the change of mind in Isaac, which might induce him to retract the blessing pronounced on Jacob, and to confer it on him, seems to be the repentance which Esau sought with tears. Thus the time would shortly come, when they, who refused spiritual blessings for the sake of temporal interests, would become fully sensible of their madness and folly, and would be glad to reverse the fatal bargain; but that must be let alone for ever. This was another awful warning against apostacy; but it in no degree relates to the case of such as do truly repent of all their sins, or who seek repentance of God in prayer, carefully, and with tears; for this Esau never did. Indeed it chiefly respects the condition of sinners in another world, though it also includes the total desperation and tremendous horror of some apostates in this present life. (Note, &c. vi. 6—8 x. 26—30.)

V. 18—21. The apostle here recurred to his argument, that the superior excellency of the Christian dispensation would render it proportionably more criminal and perilous to reject it; (Notes, ii. 1—4. x. 28—31) for his discourse seems equally suited for the warning of avowed unbelievers, and of those who were tempted to apostacy. He did not speak of the state of individuals, as converted or unconverted; but of the different method in which God now spake to the nation, from that in which he delivered the law to their fathers. This he showed by an allusion to the two mountains, Sinai and Zion; for though God at length spake to his people from mount Zion and the mercy-seat, through the atonements and ministrations of the high priest, yet this was only in a typical and obscure manner; the way into the Holiest was not made manifest under that dispensation, but the law was delivered from, and the national covenant was ratified at, mount Sinai. That dispensation was at length abolished, and another introduced; the Lord therefore had not called them to assemble, and hear him speak to them from the material mountain, which was capable of being touched, (though their fathers had been forbidden to touch it,) from whence such tremendous displays of the divine glory had been made, when the law was given, and the terrors attending on it made the people entreat, that JEHOVAH would no more speak to them in that way, as they could not endure the things which were spoken. (Notes Ex. xix. xx.) Indeed the severe restraints laid on them, and the terrible things seen and heard by them, filled them with dismay, and even made Moses exclaim, that "he exceedingly feared and quaked," notwithstanding his typical office of Mediator, his peculiar sanctity, and the long and intimate communion with God that he had maintained, (Note, Ex. xix. 16—20).—The whole of this scene showed the impossibility of a sinner's coming before God with acceptance, according to the works of the law; the highly criminal presumption of attempting it, and the need of a Mediator and a better covenant; and it was to the apostle's purpose to call off the attention of the Hebrews from that dispensation to the Gospel, by every argument.

V. 22—25. The Hebrew converts to Christianity ought to consider themselves as summoned by the preachers of the Gospel to come to mount Zion, or as actually convened there, to hear the voice of God from the mercy-seat; they were professedly become inhabitants of the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, the place of the Lord's special residence with his covenant-people and accepted worshippers, of which Jerusalem had been but a feeble type; at least they were invited to enter, and become citizens of that favoured city. This meant the Church of Christ on earth, with all its special privileges, ordinances, and promises, as connected with the holy residence of God in heaven, and continually replenishing it with new inhabitants. (Marg. Ref.) They were also called to hear the voice of God, in the presence of an innumerable company of angels, who were all minis- "tering spirits to the heirs of salvation," whose happiness they were invited to participate, and whose worship they were called upon to join and emulate. Moreover, they were come to unite, (not with the congregation of Israel,) but with the assembly and Church of the first born, those who were specially devoted to God; his children, and heirs of the heavenly inheritance, whose names were not only enrolled in the genealogies or registers of the Lord's people on earth, but written in heaven as the elect of God, born of the Spirit, denizens of that heavenly city, and entitled to all its invaluable immunities. They were also called, and many of them were in profession come, to hear the voice of that God, as a Saviour and a Father, who was the impartial, omniscient, omnipotent, and righteous Judge of all men, and of all the world, and by whom all unbelievers would be condemned to everlasting punishment; yea, they were come to share the blessedness of "the "spirits of just men made perfect;" even of all the company of ancient believers, and of those who had died since the coming of Christ, and had thus been made perfect in holiness and felicity.---This is a most decisive proof, that the souls of believers enter into a state of perfect happiness when they die, as far as this can consist with being separated from their bodies.---They were also convened, as it were, to hear the voice of God speaking to them by Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant, which was founded on better promises, and ratified by nobler blood, than that mediated by Moses; even by the shedding of that blood, through the application of which the conscience, the heart, and the duties of sinners were cleansed, and the heavenly things themselves were purified; of which all the sprinklings of blood under the law had been mere shadows. Not only was this blood more efficacious than that of bulls and goats, but Jesus, by it, being dead, yet spake far better things than righteous Abel had done, (Note, xi. 4.) for, while the blood of Abel called from the ground for vengeance on the murderer, the blood of Christ, applied in faith, not only took away the guilt of all other sins, however atrocious, but even that of being his crucifiers; as multitudes of those, who had been immediately concerned in that most heinous crime, could thankfully witness. Their national guilt, therefore, could not preclude them from pardon, through this great atonement; and the Lord then invited and commanded them to believe in the name of his Son, and so to share all the before-mentioned most precious privileges. Let them therefore see to it, as they valued his favour and feared his vengeance, that they did not refuse the gracious call and proffered salvation of him who thus spake to them from his throne of grace, and by his beloved Son. For if they who refused to obey the voice of God speaking to them on earth, from mount Sinai, by Moses, but rejected his authority and brake his covenant, did not escape condign punishment; much more certainly and severely would they be punished, who turned away with enmity and contempt from him, who now spake to them from heaven, by the ambassadors of his Son, their Mediator and High Priest in the sanctuary above; for their guilt and condemnation must be proportioned to the grace and condescension which they refused and despised.---This shows, that by coming to mount Zion, &c. the apostle did not mean being true believers, but having the Gospel proposed to them, or having made a profession of it. They might therefore be said to turn away from God, whether they rejected his invitation, or after a time became apostates from Christianity; but men cannot be said to refuse what was never proposed to them.

V. 26—29. The voice of JEHOVAH, from mount Sinai, had been attended with tremendous earthquakes and convulsions; but many ages after that transaction, in an express prediction of the Messiah, he had promised, that he would once more shake the earth and the heavens also; (Note, Hag. ii. 6---9.) meaning that he would unhinge the whole civil and ecclesiastical state of the Jews, and abolish the Mosaic dispensation, in order to make way for the kingdom of Christ. The expression, "once "more," as referring to the change in the state of the Church and the world, which took place by the introduction of the Mosaic dispensation, with the extraordinary events attending that change, and to all other still more extraordinary changes, to be introduced at the coming of the Messiah, donoted the total removal of the things shaken, as of things made and constituted after the manner of this lower creation, to endure but for a time: this was to be only "once more," and then a constitution would be introduced of a heavenly nature, which could not be shaken or removed, but should continue to the end, and, in its effects, for ever. As, therefore, they who had embraced the Gospel were admitted into, and made partakers of, a kingdom which could not be removed; as others were invited to accept of these benefits, according to the dispensation which was now openly introduced; and as all grace was freely promised to every one who sought it in the appointed way; it was proper to exhort all of them "to have," that is, to seek for, and so obtain, "grace," that they might serve God, not merely as his professing people, but acceptably, as true believers and spiritual worshippers: and not only with joy, confidence, and gratitude, but with reverence of his majesty and authority, and a godly fear of deceiving themselves, of falling under his wrath or frown, or of dishonouring his name; as humbly conscious of their unworthiness, weakness, and depravity, and recollecting, that the God, whose people they professed to be, was a consuming fire, to destroy hypocrites, apostates, and enemies of every kind, however masked or disguised. (*Marg. Ref.) The apostle evidently meant some of his expressions for one description of readers, and others of them for those of a different character; though he left each to make the application to himself: but he peculiarly aimed to convince his countrymen, that unbelievers among them were doomed to the most tremendous vengeance of God, both national and personal, from which there could be no escape, except by believing in the Lord Jesus Christ, and cleaving to him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

While prophets, apostles, martyrs, and ancient believers, sing the praises of our redeeming God, they unitedly testify to us his faithfulness to his promises, and the preciousness of his salvation; and they exhort us to lay aside every weight, and to run with patience the race set before us. We should therefore seriously inquire, what are the weights which retard our course; what the sin, or sins, by which we are most easily beset, and peculiarly endangered; that we may seek for grace to enable us to lay aside the one, and to be upon our guard against all occasions of the other. Many, who seemed to set out well, lose the race, through the weight of increasing trade or affluence, with the peculiar snares, temptations, connexions, and encumbrances of them. This seems the easily-besetting sin of these days of liberty and peace; though all persons, in whatever state, have their peculiar dangers and hinderances, against which they are required to watch and pray without ceasing: nor can we "run with "patience the race set before us," unless we be crucified to the world, and daily employed in mortifying the whole body of sin, with all its affections and lusts; those especially, to which education, habit, or situation, give most advantage. We should imagine ourselves surrounded with this cloud of witnesses, as spectators of our conduct, animating us to run the race without fainting, and prepared to congratulate our success with adoring acclamations. Yet the eye of our souls should be principally fixed upon "Jesus, the Author and Finisher of our faith," from whose fulness they all received, by whose light they shone, and through whose strength they contended for and obtained the victory: and we should turn our attention from all other objects to fixed contemplation on his ignominious cross, and his glorious throne. The thoughts of the variety of his sufferings, from love to sinners, and his animating example of meekness and patience, cannot fail to exhilarate our drooping spirits with an assurance of his compassion, and tender regard to our good. We shall then see, that a joy is set before us also, at the end of our sorrows, for the sake of which we may cheerfully endure them; we shall perceive that it is reasonable to disregard the reproach and contempt of men, as the divine Saviour bore and sanctified this trial also: and the view of his glorious exaltation will inspire us with confidence in his power to protect, support, and comfort us, under all that we can suffer for his sake. Let us then frequently "consider "him, who endured the contradiction of sinners against "himself, lest we be wearied and faint in our minds." What are our little trials to his agonies, or even to our deserts? What indeed are they to the sufferings of many of our brethren, in different ages and places? We have not yet resisted unto blood in our warfare against sin, as many others have done; and we should be ashamed of our murmurings and impatience, when we have so little cause of complaint.

V. 5—13.

While we look to Jesus, to reconcile us to suffering, to set us against sin, and to eclipse the vain splendour of this worthless world, we should also learn to receive every affliction, which the malice or envy of men brings upon us, as a correction sent by our wise and gracious Father, who speaketh to us by his word, interpreting his providential dispensations as to children, and calls on us neither to despise, nor to faint under, his chastisements. We should consider them as precious favours, needful blessings, pledges of love, and the only spiritual good which he hath promised to give us without our praying for it. He never fails to chasten his children; though he often permits hypocrites to remain unmolested, because he means to destroy them. He will neglect the education of none whom he receives into his family; and he sets us an example how we should correct our children, not for our pleasure, but for their profit, not from passion, but in wise affection. Thus he "makes us partakers of his holiness," that we may be meet to share his felicity. Let us then endeavour to receive chastening from the Father of our spirits, as we expect our children to submit to our corrections: these momentary sorrows will be over in a few days: and though for the present they seem not to be joyous, but grievous, yet we shall afterwards experience the benefit and comfort of them in the peaceable fruits of righteousness, which have been produced and matured by our being exercised with them. Thus nauseous medicines yield the pleasant sensations of health, when the taste is forgotten; and delicious poisons cause extreme agony, when the relish of them is gone for ever. Let us then comfort ourselves and each other with these topics; that we may lift up the hands which hang down, and confirm the feeble knees: and let us carefully remove obstacles out of the way of pilgrims, and look well to the weak and tempted, lest they should be turned out of the way, instead of being encouraged to persevere in the course, amidst all its roughness and difficulty.

V. 14—17.

To avoid stumbling-blocks and offences, we should follow peace with all men, and leave no proper means untried to avoid contention, which numbers delight to kindle, and blow into a flame. As far as we can go, without sacrificing truth or duty, we shall find, that peace with men of all parties and descriptions will be favourable to our pursuit of holiness; without which no man of any sect can enter heaven, or enjoy the favour of God, or be capable of delighting in him, and his presence, worship, and service. Let us then look diligently to ourselves, that we are not deceived by notions or forms, and "fail of the grace of "God;" and let us watch over each other, that no root of bitterness may spring up, in our congregations or families, to disturb their peace and to defile the souls of many. Those loose notions especially must be zealously opposed, which give allowance to the flesh, from a perversion of evangelical principles; for a little of this leaven will suffice to leaven a whole lump. All professors of the Gospel should remember profane Esau; for they will all be tempted, more or less, to sell their birthright for worldly pleasure or advantage. But the time is at hand, when they, who thus renounce, or refuse, the salvation of God, for carnal indulgence, would be glad to inherit the blessing, and will be rejected; no place will be found for reversing the fatal bargain, though they should seek it carefully with tears; nor can any one, who wilfully rejects the Gospel for the love of this present world, know to what obduracy and desperation he may be given up, in the righteous judgment of God.

V. 18—29.

We have abundant cause for joy and gratitude, that we are not left under the terror and curse of the broken covenant of works, or under the darkness of the legal dispensation. The most holy man must tremble, yea, despair, if he were to be judged according to the law given from mount Sinai; and the vengeance of God would be far more tremendous than the fire and tempest there witnessed. But whilst we bless God, who speaks to us from the mercy-seat, and calls us to partake of the privileges of Zion's citizens, and the happiness of angels and glorified saints, through Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and the sprinkling of his precious blood, let us see to it, that we have good evidence of our names being written in heaven, with those of true disciples, and not merely on earth, with those of professed Christians: let us remember that our cause must be tried by God, the Judge of all, who will determine whether we do, or do not, belong to the church of the first-born: and let it be noted, that whilst the blood of Jesus speaketh nothing but mercy to the vilest, who truly believe, it will call for severer vengeance on those, who neglect, pervert, or despise it, than that of Abel did on his murderer Cain. Let all then see to it, that they do not refuse him, who speaketh to them from heaven, with infinite tenderness and love; lest they should fall from a greater height of privilege to a more tremendous depth of condemnation, than ancient rebels did: for how can they escape, who turn away from God in unbelief or apostacy, whilst he so graciously beseeches them to be reconciled to him, and to accept of his everlasting favour? No other dispensation is now to be introduced, till the consummation of all things; the kingdom which we are called to receive can never be moved; the inheritance of believers is secured against all enemies and disasters; all things pertaining to salvation are freely given in answer to prayer: let us then seek for "grace, that we "may serve God acceptably, with reverence and godly "fear;" remembering that he is greatly to be feared in the assembly of his saints; and that he is a consuming Fire, especially to hypocrites, apostates, and despisers of his salvation.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1—3. The Hebrew converts, after the day of Pentecost, abounded in love to each other, and in all the fruits of this holy affection: but many things would naturally occur to interrupt that entire harmony, and to stop the current of that liberality, which they at first showed. It was therefore peculiarly proper for the apostle to exhort them to "let brotherly love continue;" and to avoid every thing that interfered with their persevering attention to peace, kindness, and reciprocal affection, as became children of one family, and heirs of the same inheritance; and he probably meant to excite them to brotherly love towards the Gentile converts, against whom they were generally prejudiced. In particular he exhorted them not to forget to entertain strangers, especially such as were driven, or travelled, from home, for the sake of the Gospel, and who in general were destitute of other accomodation, and dependent on the hospitality of their brethren, though not personally known by them. To encourage this kind of charity, he reminded them, that some had entertained angels unawares, as Abraham and Lot. (Note, Gen. xviii. xix.) It hath been observed, that one of the three who came to Abraham was called Jehovah, and was doubtless the eternal Word and Son of God: but it was not necessary for the apostle to advert to that circumstance, when he merely suggested a hint on the subject. It was not indeed to be expected that the Hebrews would literally be visited by angels, in the form of strangers: but by hospitality to their brethren, for Christ's sake, they in fact received him, and would be rewarded accordingly: (Notes, Matt. xxv. 31—40:) and even if they were mistaken in the character of those strangers to whom they showed this kindness, their intentions would in no wise fail of a gracious recompense. Many of their brethren also were bound in prison for the sake of the Gospel; and they ought to remember the hardships endured by such sufferers, as if they were confined with them, that they might be excited to adopt every method of alleviating their sorrows, or procuring their release. In short, whatever adversity any of their brethren were exposed to, in their persons, connexions, or circumstances, they ought to sympathize with them, and endeavour to relieve them; recollecting that they were still in the body, and liable to similar afflictions; and that they would in that case expect the soothing lenient care of their brethren. All captives and afflicted persons might be included in the exhortation, but the household of faith was specially intended.

V. 4. Marriage, &c. Many persons, particularly they of the Church of Rome, explain this as an exhortation; "Let marriage be honourable in all things, &c.;" and doubtless the apostle meant, that it ought to be entered into, and behaved in, according to the holy commandments of God, that it might be honourable to the persons themselves and to their profession of the Gospel, as well as that the state should be had in honour and considered as undefiled. The particle but, however, introducing the second clause, shows that his primary meaning was to assert, that marriage in itself was honourable in all things, and in all persons, and the bed undefiled as to its own nature, though not incapable of abuse: for he contrasts marriage with the conduct of fornicators and adulterers, whom God will certainly judge, and condemn for their violations of his law. Some persons in the primitive times contended for the lawfulness of fornication, and most abominable sentiments and practices, in respect of polygamy and divorces, prevailed, not only among the Gentiles, but even among the Jews: while, on the other hand, some of both, and of the Christians, condemned marriage, or at least deemed it a less holy state than celibacy. This mystery of iniquity very early began to work, and the apostle, in a few most expressive words, guarded against both the extremes, which experience has always proved to be, in different forms, but almost equally, in effect, destructive to morality, the welfare of society, and the purity of religion.

V. 5, 6. The Hebrews were generally poor; many had sold their estates to relieve their brethren, after the day of Pentecost, and the goods of others had been plundered by their persecutors. The apostle strenuously exerted himself to procure them a liberal relief from the Gentile churches; but he here exhorts them, to let their whole conduct, discourse, and manner of life, be evidently at a distance from covetousness: neither being anxious about getting money, to lay up, or to expend in superfluities; nor yet to be tenacious of what they had, or averse to lay it out for valuable purposes. On the contrary, it was proper for them to be content, well-satisfied, and pleased with such things as they had at present, though mean, scanty, or precarious; assured that infinite wisdom and love chose their portion for them; and remembering the promise of God, that "he would not in any wise "leave them, nor in any wise, on any account, in any "emergency, or at any time, would he forsake them."—The emphasis of the original words, in which five negatives are used to increase the strength of the negation, according to the Greek idiom, can scarcely be retained in any translation. The words are quoted from the Lord's address to Joshua, though nearly the same are used in several parts of the scripture, (Marg. Ref.) They however, show that every believer, in similar circumstances, may rely upon the promises made specially to any person, as recorded in the Scripture. The Hebrews, therefore, cleaving to the Lord and his service, in the depth of poverty, and in the midst of their persecutors, might say with confidence "the Lord is my Helper," according to the frequent language of the Psalmist: and they might be assured that he would protect, provide for, and comfort them, in all possible emergencies: and never forsake them in life or death, but bring them safe to his heavenly rest and glory; and in this confidence, they need not fear what men could do, in any way, to impoverish, distress, or injure, them.

V. 7, 8. To encourage the patience and perseverance of the Hebrews even unto a violent death, if that were set before them, the apostle called on them to remember such as had presided over them, and spoken the word of God to them, but had been removed by martyrdom, or in some other way, as James whom Herod beheaded, and several others. They ought carefully to recollect their instructions and behaviour, to adhere to the doctrines which they had delivered, and to copy their vigorous faith and constant obedience; considering especially the conclusion of their course, and the manner in which they departed out of the world, and thinking of the composure and holy joy, with which they met the stroke of death, with whatever circumstances of torture or ignominy it was attended. For if they would end their conversation, or their Christian course of obedience, in the same happy and honourable manner, they must follow their example, and adhere to their doctrine and instructions. And though these useful persons had been removed, yet Jesus Christ, the great Head of the Church, was "the same yesterday, "to-day, and for ever," equally merciful, powerful, faithful, and all-sufficient. As the Son of God, he was possessed of all possible perfection from eternity; he had continued to exercise those perfections, for the good of the Church, through all preceding ages; nor was he less perfect and powerful, when manifested in the flesh, to "purchase the Church with his own blood." He continued the same, when exalted in human nature to the mediatorial throne; and when he shall come to judge the world, he will exhibit the same divine perfection and glory, and so to all eternity. The expression seems to be a periphrasis of immutability, a divine attribute, incommunicable to a mere creature: his Person is as immutable as his doctrine; his justice and holiness as his mercy and truth; and all kinds of persons will meet a Judge exactly of the same character, as he manifested when he appeared on earth as a Saviour. The Hebrews might, therefore, confide in him, to support and comfort them under their sufferings for his sake, even as he had those, who had so happily finished their course. 'That the apostle speaks here, not of their 'living, but dead guides, will appear, partly from his 'exhortation to remember them, the living guides being 'the objects, not of their memory, but sense; partly from the phrase, "have spoken," 'which intimates, 'that they had now left off speaking; and partly, from 'the ἐκβασις, or close of their conversation on earth.' (Whitby.)

V. 9—14. (Note, Eph. iv. 14.) The apostle exhorted the Hebrews to trust in Christ and cleave to him, according to the instructions of their deceased teachers; and not to be carried about with divers and strange doctrines, as the clouds are driven by the wind. Many innovations were started, by different descriptions of false teachers, which were all foreign to the simplicity of Christianity: but Christians should especially seek to have their hearts established in a single dependence on free grace, and in the experience of the sanctification of the Holy Spirit, which would both comfort them, and render them steadfast against every delusion. Whereas, if they paid any particular attention to distinctions of meats, or rested in the legal sacrifices and peace-offerings, on part of which the offerer and his friends feasted before God, as at peace with him, they would not arrive at stability. They could not indeed expect spiritual profit from such observances, seeing that they, who had heretofore been occupied in them, and had looked no further, had derived no saving benefit from them. But true believers had, in the atonement of Christ, the substance of all that had been shadowed forth by the sacrifices of the law. The flesh of many of these had been divided between the altar and the priests, who alone were to eat the most holy things. But such of the Hebrews, as continued to minister at the tabernacle or temple, and neglected the Gospel, had not the privilege of participating with Christians in feasting upon their spiritual sacrifice: of this the Lord's supper was the appointed memorial, and might perhaps be alluded to. An intimation of this might be implied in the prohibition of the priests eating any part of the most solemn sin-offerings, the blood of which was carried into the most holy place on the day of atonement, to expiate the guilt of the nation; for these were ordered to be burned without the camp. (Notes, &c. Lev. iv. xvi.) Wherefore Jesus also, that he might set apart, and consecrate to God, his people as a spiritual priesthood, by shedding his own blood as their sin-offering, previously to his entrance with it for them into the heavenly sanctuary, suffered death, not within the precincts of the temple, or even in the holy city, but without the gate, upon mount Calvary. Thus he was, as it were, cast out of the camp as accursed; that he might appear to be the true Sin-offering of which all others were the types. As, therefore, it was proper for believers to renounce all dependence on legal sacrifices, and the service of the sanctuary, to follow Christ, so they ought willingly for his sake to bear the reproach cast upon them on that account; and submit to be excommunicated and vilified by the persecuting priests and scribes, going along with Christ out of the camp of Israel, and enduring every indignity for his sake and after his example. Nor should they shrink from any hardships in his cause, even if they were driven from their houses, possessions, and cities, to become exiles and wanderers, or if they were immured in prisons; for, being strangers and pilgrims, they had on earth no continuing city or quiet settlement, but were seeking one to come, even heaven itself, from which they could not be excluded. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15, 16. The Hebrews needed no atonement but that of Christ; and therefore living on him by faith, they might disregard the legal oblations, and offer, at a distance from the temple, more acceptable sacrifices than burnt-offerings or peace-offerings, if, through the mediation of the great High Priest, they presented to God their continual and fervent praises and thanksgivings, adoring his manifested perfections, celebrating his wonderful works, and gratefully acknowledging his abundant loving-kindness towards them. This fruit of their lips would be more pleasing and honourable to him, than the fruits of the land or the firstlings of their cattle. (Marg. Ref.) At the same time they ought not to forget, nor neglect, to do good to their indigent brethren, or others in distress, by communicating to them according to their ability: for with such sacrifices, when offered from a principle of humble faith and love, God would be well pleased, as they were a proper expression of their gratitude to him, very honourable to the Gospel, and beneficial to mankind, and the fruits of his grace in their hearts. (Note, Phil. iv. 18.)

V. 17. The apostle, as a debtor to all men, had written to the Hebrews, to establish them in the truth; and he had called on them to remember and follow the faith of their deceased pastors: but he would also remind them, that they ought to obey those pious teachers and guides who now presided over them, and to submit to their instructions, admonitions, and reproofs, as ruling them with spiritual authority derived from the Lord Jesus. For they were appointed to watch for their souls, and to guard and caution them against all those errors and sins which might endanger them. They performed this important and difficult service, as men who must give an account, for every part of their conduct, to him who employed them; so that they could not deliver their own souls, without great vigilance, diligence, faithfulness, and impartiality, which would often constrain them to displease men. The people ought therefore to obey the word of God as spoken, and submit to his authority as exercised, by them; that they might be able to give up their account with joy, having been successful in their labours, and not with grief and anguish of heart, because of the untractable conduct of those to whom they had been sent; which would not be for the profit of those who occasioned grief to their faithful pastors, but infinitely injurious to them. This must principally relate to the account given before the Lord, as it were, from day to day, with joy or grief, by ministers, of the reception given to their message; for no misconduct of the people will occasion sorrow to the faithful servant of Christ, at the final day of retribution, though their salvation will be unto them a crown of rejoicing. The exhortation supposes the faithfulness of ministers, and that they exercise a scriptural authority in a proper manner; for no obedience and submission can be due to the usurped dominion of unfaithful stewards or blind guides.

V. 18, 19. It is plain from these verses, that the persons immediately addressed, to whom in the first instance the epistle was sent, would know from whom it came. The apostle desired them to pray for him and his fellow-labourers, as well as for their own pastors: for, however he had been calumniated, or suspected, by his nation, he trusted that he had a good conscience, tender, and duly informed, and that he was willing and desirous in all things, and among all persons, to act with integrity, and in a becoming manner. He therefore entreated their prayers for his protection, comfort and success: but, especially, that the providence of God would order things in such a manner, as to enable him to come among them the sooner: for he was persuaded many of them would be glad to see him; and he purposed to come as soon as he had fully regained his liberty and had opportunity, notwithstanding all that he had suffered in consequence of his last journey to Jerusalem. It is not known whether he accomplished this purpose or not.

V. 20, 21. After desiring the prayers of the Hebrews in his behalf, the apostle gave them a compendium of his most fervent supplications for them. He addressed himself to the Lord, (by a title never used but in St. Paul's epistles,) as "the God of peace," reconciled to believers, and ready to be at peace with all sinners that came to him in the appointed way, as the Author of spiritual peace in the hearts and consciences of his people, and the Lover of peace and concord in the church and among mankind; who "had brought again from the dead the great Shepherd "of the sheep," from whom all pastors derived their authority. Jesus, the great Proprietor of the chosen flock, to whom they had been given, had laid down his life to atone for their sins, and he continually sought them, and brought them home to his fold, where he protected and fed them. (Notes, Ps. xxiii. Is. liii. 6. Ez. xxxiv. Luke xv. 1—6.) In order to show that his ransom was accepted, and that he might perform his gracious work as the great Shepherd of his sheep, God the Father had raised him from the dead, "through the blood of the everlasting "covenant." For this may either refer to the reconciled love of God to his people, through the blood of Christ, or to his being brought again from the dead, because his sacrifice was sufficient and accepted, and so he became the Shepherd of the sheep; or to the blessings for which the apostle prayed, and which were bestowed "through the "blood of the everlasting covenant:" all these things may be contained in the words, and it is not obvious to determine which was principally intended. The blood of Christ purchased the blessings of the new covenant, and ratified it as unalterable; so that it was rendered perpetual to the end of time, and everlasting in respect of the salvation conferred according to it. The apostle entreated "the God of peace," through the mediation of the great Shepherd, and on account of the blood of the covenant, that he would make the Hebrews "perfect in every good "work to do his will," rectifying every disorder of their souls, and completely fitting them for every part of his "holy service; working in them," by his new-creating grace, "that which was well-pleasing in his sight," being according to his law and image, and for his glory, and therefore acceptable with him through Jesus Christ; to whom, even to "the God of peace," he ascribed eternal glory. (Marg. Ref.) The apostle prayed for them, under the full persuasion, that sanctifying grace and holy obedience would surely be attended with divine consolations, which he did not particularly mention.

V. 22—25. The apostle, as not being immediately placed over the Hebrews, or disposed to speak to them in an authoritative style, entreated them to take in good part the word of exhortation, warning, and encouragement, which he had sent them from love to their souls: for he had written a letter to them in few words, compared with the vast importance and the great variety of the subjects discussed in it. Timothy had, it seems, been confined in prison for preaching the Gospel, of which the Hebrews had heard; but the writer informed them that he was at length set at liberty, and that he purposed to come with him to see them, if they were not delayed. It appears hence that the apostle either was at liberty, or had a prospect of being speedily liberated, and that the spurious postscript falsely says, that Timothy was the bearer of the epistle. After this, he concluded with salutations, especially to the pastors and rulers of their churches, and from all the Christians in Italy, as well as those at Rome.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Brotherly love tends, in such various ways, to the benefit of the church, the comfort of believers, and the honour of the Gospel, that the enemy of our souls endeavours by every means to interrupt its exercise, and to work upon the remains of our corrupt affections for that purpose, with a vast variety of most subtle artifices, against which we should be perpetually upon our guard. Hence it is, that so little of this love is found in the church, though so much is read concerning it in the Scriptures, and that so many divisions and controversies prevail among those, who seem in a measure to have been taught of God to love their brethren! We best consult our own interest, when we are mindful to use hospitality, and to relieve or entertain our poor brethren, even though they be strangers to us: for thus we entertain Christ himself, whom all angels worship, and obey. When we are exempted from imprisonment, or other grievous adversities, we should take care not to forget how many are thus oppressed and bowed down, that we may sympathize with them in their sorrows, and help or comfort them according to our ability, being aware that we are liable to the same distresses, as long as we are in the body. Defilement and dishonour spring from contrariety to the law of God, which is perfectly suited to promote our present and future welfare: marriage therefore is honourable in all; nor can any defilement attach to it, except when the letter or spirit of God's commandments is violated by men's behaviour respecting it. But God doth, in this world, severely mark his abhorrence of those forbidden lusts, to which the depravity of the human heart leads such numbers; and he will surely condemn every impenitent fornicator and adulterer at the day of judgment, whatever disguise or excuse he may here use to cloak his wickedness. Christians, whether poor or rich, should, in all their words and actions, show, that they abhor covetousness. Having in heaven inexhaustible treasures, they should be well satisfied with mean accommodations here: and, as God hath promised "that he will never leave them, and in no case "forsake them," they have no cause to court the favour, or fear the frown of men, or to dread the want of things needful; but may courageously say, "the Lord is my "Helper, I will not fear what flesh can do unto me." The instructions and example of ministers, who have honourably and comfortably closed their testimony, should be peculiarly remembered by their survivors. Death, as it were, gives the last sanction to their doctrine and exhortations; and the happy event of their trials calls on others to follow their faith, and to consider the joyful end of their course; and ministers should have respect to this during their lives. But Jesus alone is an ever-living Friend, "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." Still he fills the hungry, encourages the trembling, and welcomes penitents of every class; still he rejects proud Pharisees, abhors painted sepulchres, and teaches all whom he saves to love righteousness and to hate iniquity: and, having called them by his grace, he will love them unchangeably and for ever. Indeed, all those, and those alone, will abide the day of his coming to judge the world, who would have met with favour from him when he taught on earth.

V. 9—16.

We should be careful not to be carried about with strange doctrines, but seek to have our hearts established by grace: for notions and forms never profit those who are occupied in them. Living by faith in Christ, and being consecrated to God through his blood, let us willingly separate from this evil world, and bear the reproach of proud formalists. We have here no continuing city; our pilgrimage will soon end; let us then seek an abiding mansion in the city of our God, and consider all temporal prosperity or adversity as of scarcely any consequence. As a spiritual priesthood, let us solace ourselves in this evil world, by offering to God, through Jesus Christ, our continual sacrifice of praise, "even the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to his "name." This, joined with the acceptable sacrifice of doing good to men for the Lord's sake, will be an anticipation of the joys of heaven, and a preparation for its work and worship.

V. 17—25.

Ministers should peculiarly remember, that they are called "to watch for men's souls, as those who must give "account;" for dreadful will be their condemnation, if they be slothful, selfish, or unfaithful; and Christians should obey and submit to their faithful pastors, and take in good part their loving admonitions, that they may give up their account with joy, and not with grief: for if such pastors lose their labour, their hearers will lose their souls. Men should also pray for ministers; who would generally walk more honourably, and labour more successfully, if the people were more earnest in praying for them; and when they see, or think they see, something amiss in those, who, upon the whole, have a good conscience, willing in all things to live honestly, they should pray the more fervently for them. Let us then approach the God of peace, who brought again from the dead the great Shepherd of the sheep, and, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, let us beseech him, for ourselves and each other, "to make "us perfect to do his will, working in us that which is "well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ," that we may glorify him for ever. Then every word of exhortation, and every dispensation of Providence, will do us good, the communion of saints will be maintained, and grace will be with us all.

GENERAL EPISTLE OF JAMES.

James, the son of Alpheus, the brother of Jude, and the near relation of our Lord; called also "James the less," probably being lower in stature, or younger, than the other James, is generally allowed to have been the writer of this epistle; (Marg. Ref. Notes Matt. xiii. 54—58. Luke xxiv. 13—24:) and they who have doubted of this, have assigned very slight reasons for their hesitation. It is recorded in ecclesiastical history, and The Acts of the apostles confirm the fact, that he generally resided at Jerusalem, superintending the concerns of the churches in that city, and in the neighbouring places, to the end of his life; which was terminated by martyrdom, the circumstances of which are differently related. He seems to have written this epistle, but a short time before his death; and it is supposed by some, that the sharp rebukes and awful warnings, given in it to his countrymen, stirred up that persecuting rage, which terminated his life: but indeed, it is peculiarly wonderful, that he should have been preserved so many years, in so perilous a situation; and it can be accounted for only by ascribing it to the Lord's immediate protection. The epistle is styled general or catholic, because it was not addressed to any particular church, but to the Jewish converts, throughout their dispersions; indeed with evident reference also to the unconverted part of the nation. This title, however, is not coeval with the epistle; but was prefixed to it, some ages after it was written; and to the subsequent epistles, in several instances with manifest impropriety. It is probable, that the apostle by means of the elders and Christians at Jerusalem, circulated copies of this epistle, by those strangers who came to the sacred festivals, from the several cities and countries where the Jews resided, and especially where there were Jewish converts to Christianity: and, as it was exclusively addressed to his countrymen, it seems for a long time to have been little known among the Gentile converts; so that its authenticity was doubted for a considerable time. 'While the second Epistle of Peter, the second and third of John, the Epistle of Jude, and the Revelation, are omitted in the first Syriac translation of the New Testament, which was made in the beginning of the second century, for the use of the converted Jews, this Epistle of James hath found a place therein. This is an argument of great weight: for certainly the Jewish believers, to whom that epistle was addressed and delivered, were much better judges of its authenticity, than the converted Gentiles to whom it was not sent; and who perhaps had no opportunity of being acquainted with it, till long after it was written.' (Macknight.) 'It is cited by Clemens Romanus four several times: and by Ignatius, in his genuine epistle to the Ephesians; by Origen, in his thirteenth homily upon Genesis, Eusebius saith, It was known to most, and publicly read in most, Christian churches: St. Jerom, that in process of time it obtained authority. Esthius notes, That they, who before doubted of it, in the fourth century embraced the opinion of them who received it; and from thence no church, no ecclesiastical writer, is found who ever doubted of it. But, on the contrary, all the catalogues of the books of the holy scripture, published by general and provincial councils, Roman bishops, or other orthodox writers, number it among the canonical scriptures.' (Whitby.) 'It appears to me, that the authority of this, and some other parts of the New Testament, having been early questioned by some primitive churches, affords an argument of their peculiar caution, that no other writings should be admitted into the sacred canon, however excellent; besides those which had an undoubted claim to that distinction: and justly challenges our deference to their judgment, who doubtless were most capable of deciding, and gave sufficient evidence of their care, as well as their capacity. The epistle before us, having passed through a severe and accurate scrutiny, appears to have been universally received; and accordingly has been transmitted down to the present age, as an authentic part of the oracles of God.' (Doddridge.) It is generally known that Luther in the earlier part of the reformation spoke very slightly of it, groundlessly supposing that it contradicted St. Paul's doctrine, in the grand subject of justification: but deeper experience, more exact investigation, more extensive observation, and a maturer judgment, induced him to retract his opinion: and at present no further doubt seems to be entertained among orthodox Christians, as to its divine inspiration and authority. It is not, however, so replete with the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, as St. Paul's epistles are in general; or indeed, as the other apostolical epistles: for it is supposed to have been written with a special design of counteracting those false teachers, who in different ways perverted those doctrines, and wrested them to their own destruction and that of other men. But the grand principles of Christianity are throughout taken for granted, and it will be found, on attentive consideration, entirely coincident with even St. Paul's doctrine, concerning grace and justification; though at the first glance, it may appear discordant: and it abounds with exhortations to the patience of hope, and the obedience of faith and love; with which various warnings, reproofs, and encouragements, are interspersed, according to the different characters of the persons addressed in it.

CHAP. I.

The apostle addresses the twelve tribes which were scattered abroad, 1. He exhorts them to joyful patience under trials, 2—4; and to ask wisdom of God in faith, and with an unwavering mind, 5—8. He counsels the poor and the rich, 9—11; and shows the happiness prepared for those who endure, 12. Men are tempted to sin, not by God, but by their own lusts, 13—15. Every good gift, especially regeneration, comes from the unchangeable God, 16—18. Cautions against pride, loquacity, anger, and malice, 19, 20: admonitions to receive the word of God in meekness, and to reduce it to practice, 21—25. The necessity of bridling the tongue, 26. The nature of true religion, 27.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. It is probable, that the apostolical authority of James was not disputed among those whom he more immediately addressed; so that he waived the mention of it, and only styled himself the servant of God and of the Lord Jesus. It appears from the Acts of the apostles, as well as from historical records, that he resided chiefly at Jerusalem; and he is said to have been the first bishop of that Church; though this is spoken inaccurately; for he possessed far more than episcopal authority, however that may be defined. He is supposed to have suffered martyrdom there not very long after writing this epistle, though the date of it is uncertain. He addressed himself to the twelve tribes, which were considered as still existing, though scattered by various calamities, and from different motives, into many distant nations of the earth; but he principally intended the Christians among them: and he simply greeted them, or wished them health and peace, without using the benedictions which preface most of the other epistles. Scattered. 'That is, to all the 'believing Jews, of whatever tribe, who were dispersed 'over the earth, to whom, it is probable, James, remaining still at Jerusalem, sent this epistle, by those who 'were used to meet at that city from all nations, at the 'festivals.' (Beza.) Some of all the other tribes still subsisted, as distinct from the Gentiles, and as generally incorporated with the descendants of Judah; and the nation was dispersed abroad in almost all parts of the known world, as is evident from the Scriptures themselves, (Marg. Ref.) as well as from the testimony of ancient writers. Greeting. James, who probably drew up the epistle of the council at Jerusalem to the Gentile converts, uses the same word. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2—4. Knowing the afflicted and persecuted condition in which his brethren were, the apostle exhorted them to esteem it altogether a cause of rejoicing, when they fell into divers temptations. Conscious of their weakness, they were in general warned not to run into temptations, and taught to pray not to be led into temptation: yet if the Lord saw good, that, notwithstanding their watchfulness, they should fall into such trials as might expose them to temptation, and give them an opportunity of resisting and overcoming it, they ought to consider it as a matter of unmingled joy, an occasion of evidencing the sincerity and strength of their love to God, and as a rich advantage to their souls, though painful for the time. For they might know, from the word of God and their own experience, that the temporary trial of their faith, by which its genuine nature and strength were proved, had a tendency in the event to work patience in their disposition and conduct, and to bring them into a resigned, dependent, waiting frame of mind, connected with meekness and perseverance in well doing. But, in order to derive the full benefit from their trials, they must allow patience to perform its perfect work, and submissively wait, in reliance on the promises of God and obedience to his commandments, till he saw good to deliver them, without being induced, by the number, variety, or duration of their sufferings, to use sinful means of deliverance, or grow faint and weary in well doing, or to manifest peevishness, discontent, or despondency. Thus patience, like a salutary medicine, would have its perfect operation, and bring them into so tractable, docile, meek, compassionate, and resigned a state of mind, so endear to them the love and sufferings of Christ, so wean them from the world, and so reconcile them to death, that they would be rendered complete and mature in every part of the Christian character, and in all respects meet and prepared for the duties of their several situations, and wanting nothing in order to the performance of every good work. (Notes, &c. Rom. v. 3—5. Heb. xii. 5—13.) Temptations. Or, Trials. Some expositors lay considerable stress on the distinction between temptations and trials; but the original word is the same as that in the Lord's prayer, which is rendered temptation. Indeed, every trial is, or gives occasion to, temptation; and every temptation is a trial of our hearts, and tends to show whether divine grace or corrupt nature has, at that time, the ascendency. (Notes, 12—15. Gen. xxii. 1.) The apostle, however, no doubt especially referred to the persecutions, for the sake of their Lord, to which Christians were then peculiarly exposed.

V. 5—8. By attempting to endure and improve their trials in a proper manner, as well as by a vast variety of other matters, many of those to whom the apostle wrote would experience and discover that they were very deficient in wisdom. When, therefore, any of them perceived this, and were conscious that they were not capable of distinguishing truth from error, or of ascertaining the line of conduct which they ought to pursue, they should immediately bring the case before God, and earnestly beseech him to be their Teacher and Counsellor, by the influences of his Spirit enabling them to understand, remember, and apply the instructions of his holy word; and to remove all prejudices and carnal passions which tended to mislead them. This any person might do with confidence; seeing the Lord was ever ready to give liberally to all who asked him, of whatever description they were; nor did he ever upbraid such humble petitioners for wisdom with the folly and sinfulness of their former conduct, or with any of their mistakes and want of teachableness. So that assuredly wisdom would be given to every one, who thus sought for it, in proportion to his wants, difficulties, and duties. (Marg. Ref.) But in order to obtain the blessing, they must take care to ask in faith, nothing wavering: they must not allow themselves to question whether this were the proper way of seeking wisdom, or doubt of God's faithfulness to his promises; but confidently rely on him to direct them in the right way. For he that wavered in his judgment in these respects, and was disposed to listen to carnal counsellors, or to halt betwixt God and the world, would be always fluctuating and variable, being tossed from one thing to another by every change of circumstances, or every gale of doctrine, as the wave of the sea is driven about by the wind. Such wavering professors of the Gospel, therefore, who were only religious by starts, and had no abiding realizing belief of the truth, or dependence on the promises of God, could have no good reason to expect that they should receive any thing from him, as they would scarcely have presented their prayers, under some sudden pang of devotion, but they would turn to other counsels and projects. Indeed, double-minded men must be unstable in all their ways, nor can any dependence be placed on them, whilst they are aiming to unite contrary interests, and are unsettled in their principles, for want of faith in the word of God. (Note, Gen. xlix. 4.) 'Let him come to God with firm adherence on 'him; a mind resolved, whatsoever comes, to stick fast 'to God; to use no means of delivering himself but such 'as are acceptable to him; never entertaining a doubt, 'whether God's ways or his own are to be adhered to for 'the obtaining of his ends; making no question of God's 'power and will to answer his requests, and therefore 'praying and depending on him quietly for an issue out 'of all. Whereas, doubting or wavering keeps men in 'a perpetual tempest and agitation of mind, always tossed 'from one dependence to another.' (Hammond.) "A "double-minded man," 'whose schemes are divided be'tween God and the world, and who cannot cheerfully 'and resolutely commit himself, in confidence of divine 'support, to be led whithersoever Providence shall please, "is unsettled in all his ways." 'He will perpetually be 'running into inconsistencies of conduct; and those im'perfect and undetermined impressions of religion, which 'he feels, will serve rather to perplex and torment, than 'guide and secure him.' (Doddridge.) The divided dependence, at some times apparently on God, and at others evidently on a man's own wisdom, resolution, or righteousness, seems also implied, as well as the divided aim and purpose. Such characters differ widely from weak believers, who constantly expect and seek help from God, and do not allow any doubts of his veracity and faithfulness, though they are harassed with fears lest there be something in their case, or manner of asking, which should exclude them from the benefit. Their language is, 9 Let [u] the brother of low degree * rejoice [x] in that he is exalted:

10 But the rich, [y] in that he is made low: [z] because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away.

11 For the sun is no sooner [a] risen with a burning heat, but it withereth the grass, and the flower thereof falleth, and the grace of the fashion of it perisheth; [b] so also shall the rich man fade away in his ways.

12 Blessed is [c] the man that endureth temptation: for [d] when he is tried he shall receive [e] the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to [f] them that love him.

13 Let [g] no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with † evil, neither tempteth he any man:

14 But every man is tempted, [h] when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed.

15 Then, [i] when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and [k] sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death.

"Lord, to whom shall I go? Thou hast the words of "eternal life?"

V. 9—11. In order to attain greater simplicity and stability in the faith, it was proper for believers to know in what they ought to rejoice. The brother of low degree, the real Christian, who was poor and afflicted in his outward circumstances, should not deem himself unhappy on that account; on the contrary, he ought to rejoice or glory, 'to comfort himself and lift up his heart,' (Beza:) because he was exalted, in an honourable relation to Christ, in being conformed to him as to his outward condition, and in being made a Son of God and an heir of heaven. But the rich Christian ought not to rejoice or glory in his riches, or at all trust in them for happiness: rather let him rejoice in that "he was made low" in the disposition of his heart, having been convinced of his guilt, depravity, and misery, and made humbly willing, as an indigent pensioner on the mercy of God, to ask for the blessings of salvation in the same way with the poorest of his brethren; and to consider himself as no wiser or better than they, but merely intrusted with a larger stewardship, of which an account must shortly be rendered. Being thus made low would be a solid ground for exultation, seeing that few rich persons were thus humbled and made "poor in "spirit;" nor would the cause for this joy be abated, even if they were made low in their circumstances also, through the rapacity of their persecutors. For all outward splendour and distinction must soon pass away, as the gaudy flowers that grow among the grass are withered by the scorching sun, and lose all their beauty and transient glory, even sooner than the green blade doth; and being withered, they perish, and are less valuable than the common herbage. Thus rich men flourish only to be cut down, they grow but to wither, and their transient distinctions issue in deeper misery and disgrace, if they proceed in their ways of avarice, luxury, pride, selfishness, or ungodliness, and are not made low by repentance, faith, self-denial, crucifixion to the world, and submission to the righteousness and authority of God. This is an obvious and apposite interpretation; nor does there appear that difficulty in these verses which many suppose. To render the passage, (by inserting a word needlessly,) "Let "the rich be ashamed, in that he is brought low," as some learned men do, would wholly destroy the energy and beauty of the contrast; and to explain it exclusively of the rich man, who was reduced to poverty for the sake of the Gospel, would imply, that no rich man, however humble, poor in spirit, liberal, and condescending to his poor brethren, could have any ground of rejoicing or glorying in Christ, and in the hope of glory, unless he voluntarily relinquished, or were forcibly deprived of his estate and possessions, and so reduced to entire poverty; a doctrine well suited to some orders of papists, but not at all to genuine Christianity. It is proper that some should be the Lord's stewards and almoners in outward things; but if they be made low, as humble, teachable, penitent believers in Christ, and thankful to be thus employed by him, let them rejoice in this humiliation of heart under these circumstances, which generally increase pride and self-exaltation.

V. 12. Whilst the world deemed those happy who enjoyed uninterrupted prosperity, though it served to increase their pride, malice, avarice, sensuality, and impiety, they were indeed to be congratulated as blessed, who endured temptations, and passed through various afflictive and trying dispensations with submissive constancy, and the persevering obedience of faith and hope. For after the Christian had been thus proved, and the reality of his grace manifested, and after his holy affections had been thus invigorated, and the temper of his mind improved, he would be honoured as a conqueror in the spiritual contest; not with a wreath of fading flowers, but with the crown of life; the honour, glory, and immortality, which the Lord had promised to them that love him, as reconciled to him and made to delight in him and his ways, by faith in Christ Jesus. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13—15. When trials become temptations and occasions of sin, no man should venture to say that he was tempted by God, as if he were the Author of transgression, or of the dishonourable event of the trial. (Notes, 2—4. Gen. xxii. 1.) The commandments and providential dispensations of God make trial of men's hearts, and tend to discover what dispositions prevail in them; where gracious affections are prevalent, through the power of the Holy Spirit, remarkable obedience and fidelity are the consequence of the trial; but when sin and Satan rule within, 16 [l] Do not err, [m] my beloved brethren.

disobedience must be the effect. Nothing, therefore, that is sinful in the heart or conduct can be ascribed to God, without the same absurdity as it would be to charge darkness and coldness upon the sun; for God cannot be tempted with evil; his absolute perfection and all-sufficiency render it impossible that there should be any inducement for him, in the most minute degree, to deviate from complete and entire justice, truth, wisdom, purity, and goodness; neither doth he in this sense tempt any man, by putting evil into his heart, suggesting it to his thoughts, or necessitating his commission of it. He is not the Author of the dross, though his fiery trial detects and exposes it. But every man is tempted to commit sin when the inordinate desires of his heart after worldly ease, honour, wealth, or pleasure, induce him to seize the bait with which Satan entices him: thus he is drawn out of the line of duty, as the fish is dragged out of the water when it hath been enticed by the delusive morsel that covered the hook. So that when lust, or vehement desires after any object which cannot be obtained without sin, is conceived in the heart, through the suggestions of Satan and the allurements of external objects, the purpose of indulgence is admitted and cherished; thus actual transgression is brought forth, and when this is completed, it bringeth forth death as its genuine offspring, and nothing but the mercy and grace of God, through Christ Jesus, can prevent the sinner's final destruction. This may be considered as the scriptural account of the original of moral evil, the natural history of the conception, production, and progeny of the first sin, and of every sin, except as repentance, through God's mercy, prevent the effects of them. But perhaps the apostle referred to the case of apostates, who, under persecutions, through love of the world, conceived the purpose of renouncing Christianity, which, being deliberately done and persisted in, ended in their final obduracy and destruction. It is egregious trifling, and manifestly absurd, to take occasion from the English word lust, which is often used to mean one particular sensual inclination, when impetuous and ungoverned, to limit the passage merely to sensuality, as if the impetuous and ungoverned desire of power, praise, wealth, or revenge, were not ἐπιθυμια, as much as the sensual inclinations. The word indeed is often used in a good sense, (Luke xxii. 15. Phil. i. 23. Gr.) and simply means a vehement inclination, whatever be the object.

V. 16—18. It behooved believers to be very careful not to mistake in this matter, lest they should be induced to listen to temptation, and wander from their duty, from an erroneous supposition that their circumstances would excuse their sins, or lest they should dishonour and offend God, by ascribing that misconduct to him, which was solely the effect of their apostate nature. Every thing truly good, of whatever kind, must be considered as a gift and bounty coming down from God, being beneficial in itself and perfect in its kind, like its great Author, who is the Father, the Source, and Fountain, of light, natural, moral, and spiritual; the Author of whatever is beautiful, excellent, and good, in all creatures and in the whole universe, as well as of all true knowledge, wisdom, holiness, and felicity, in those rational agents that never sinned, and in redeemed sinners. But nothing of a contrary nature comes down from him, "with whom is no "variableness, neither shadow of turning." The sun and moon, the two great natural lights which he hath made, appear to us to have several changes and turnings, whence originate summer and winter, day and night; but in fact these appearances arise entirely from our situation respecting them. Thus God is immutably the Fountain of good, and of nothing else; all good is to be ascribed to him, and sought from him; but the evil which we do or suffer, with all the changes which we experience, are from ourselves; the consequences of our having turned away from God, and of a change in our situation respecting him; and must not in any degree be ascribed to Him, who is unchangeably the same in his nature and perfection, without the least variation; and whose conduct proceeds upon the same unalterable principles of justice, truth, wisdom, and goodness, whatever effect it may produce on us, according to our character, behaviour, or state in his sight; and all sin, error, ignorance, and misery, must be ascribed to the mutability, frailty, and imperfection of created beings. It should also be remembered, that all the persons to whom the apostle wrote had been in themselves dead in sin and children of wrath; and that God, of his sovereign will and free mercy, had regenerated them by his Spirit, through the word of truth, (Notes, John iii. 1—8. 12. Eph. ii. 1—9. Tit. iii. 3—7.) in order that they might be consecrated to his service, as a kind of first-fruits of his creatures, more excellent and valuable than the rest of them; and as an earnest of a vastly larger increase from the Gentile world in that and future ages, even as the first-fruits, presented to the Lord, were the earnest of the future harvest, and brought a blessing upon it.

V. 19—21. As believers owed all the difference, in their state and character, to the sovereign grace of God, by means of his word, so it behooved all of them to be swift and ready to hear further admonitions, instructions, and counsels, from the same source, in a teachable and attentive manner, and to "be slow to speak;" not rash or dogmatical in their judgments and decisions, not hasty to assume the office of teachers, not allowing themselves to dispute of things beyond their depth, and not indulging a conceited loquacious humour, as speaking for the sake of speaking, or in the hope of obtaining applause, without due seriousness, modesty, recollection, and prudence. They should also be slow to wrath, not giving way to angry tempers, bitterness of spirit against opposers, or proneness to acrimonious controversy, under a mistaken notion of great zeal for the truth; on the contrary, they should be slow and backward to entertain, or express, any kind or degree of resentment, even against their most cruel persecutors; assured that the wrath of man was not a proper means of promoting the interests of religion in the world, or leading men to embrace the Gospel and lead holy lives. For such proud contentions and violent tempers tended to prejudice the minds of men against the Gospel; to disturb the peace, and corrupt the purity of the Church; to multiply iniquities, and in every way to hinder the knowledge and practice of the righteousness of God. The apostle therefore exhorted them to lay apart, and to cast off with abhorrence, as a filthy garment, all the sinful practices of their past lives, which were abominable in the sight of God, and especially to avoid and repress the "overflowings of malignity," which many indulged under a pretence of zeal; whereas they proceeded entirely from the predominancy of pride, wrath, envy, and other hateful passions. Thus they ought to be prepared to receive the word of God in a meek, docile, humble, and peaceable frame of mind; for it could profit them only, when it became an "engrafted word," or implanted word, living and growing in the soul by faith and love, as the principle of a new nature, changing all their views, dispositions, and affections, into conformity to its own holiness, and so producing suitable fruit in their lives; and being thus received and engrafted, it would be able to effect the complete salvation of their souls, as the means by which the Spirit of God began, carried on, and would perfect, his new creation of the soul to holiness.

V. 22—25. In order that the word of truth might produce these blessed effects upon the souls of those who heard it, they must be doers of it, and not hearers only. For if they were only hearers, however attentive, constant, or teachable, they might seem to be, their neglect of practising what they heard would prove, that the word was not engrafted in their hearts, and that they were putting a most fatal imposition on themselves; whether custom, curiosity, a love of speculation, or a vain confidence in knowledge without obedience, for salvation, induced them to attend. A man of this description, who heard the Gospel, and did not obey its call to repentance, faith in Christ, and a sober, righteous, and godly life, was like a person who gave a transient look at his natural face as reflected from a mirror, without attempting to alter what was unbecoming in his attire or appearance, who would therefore immediately depart, and soon forget what manner of man he was; and the glimpse which he had of himself would have no abiding effect on him. Thus the mere hearer might have short-lived convictions of his sinfulness; but, not liking the view given of his state, heart, and character, in the glass of God's word, and having no effectual desires of an entire change, he would soon lose sight of his transient discoveries, in the company, business, and pleasures of the world, and so remain ignorant of himself, and destitute of transforming grace. But whosoever looked, steadfastly and attentively into the word of God, with a real desire of learning from it his true state and character, and the way of acceptance and salvation, and continued with perseverance in this important inquiry, he, not being a forgetful hearer, but one that reduced to practice what he learned from time to time, though it cost him much humiliation and self-denial, would be blessed in his deed, or in his doing; for the Lord would in this way lead him into the knowledge of his truth and salvation, his obedience would evidence the sincerity of his faith, his sanctification would proportionably advance, as he became acquainted with God and with himself, and his gracious recompense hereafter would succeed his present peace and comfort. Some, by "the perfect law of liberty," suppose the moral law to be intended, in opposition to the ceremonial; and it certainly deserves that title in itself, as perfect obedience to it is perfect liberty, and every deviation from it is slavery; but then it cannot give liberty to us sinners. Others, therefore, suppose the Gospel to be intended; because by it we are set at liberty from condemnation and the bondage of sin. But divine revelation in general seems to be meant, as every part of it has its use in bringing the sinner to Christ for salvation, and in directing and encouraging him to walk at liberty, by the Spirit of adoption, according to the holy commandments of God. In the word of truth, as the law or rule of obtaining and enjoying liberty, the true Christian looks as into a mirror, that he may discover the remaining unholiness of his tempers, affections, words, and actions, in order that his soul may be purified from defilement, beautified with salvation, and transformed into the holy image of God continually more and more. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 26. So necessary was practice, in every particular, to the very existence of real Christianity, that if any man, among professed believers, appeared to be a devout worshipper of God, according to the doctrines and ordinances of the Gospel, and if his conduct in other respects were not reprehensible, yet, in case he habitually neglected to bridle his tongue, and so gave a loose to vain, polluting, ostentatious, or improper discourse, especially, if he uttered bitter, malicious, slanderous, or reviling words, in an unrestrained manner, under pretence of zeal against such as differed from him, and deceived his own heart, by one vain excuse or another, to think this was allowable, or consistent with the Christian temper, his religion was thus proved to be vain and worthless, his heart was not right in the sight of God, whilst out of the abundance of it such evil things habitually proceeded; but he was still "in the "gall of bitterness, and the bond of iniquity." This is the general interpretation, and nothing more is at all supposed to have been intended by the apostle. Yet men do not bridle horses, merely to restrain them from mischief, or from going in a wrong way, but likewise in order to rule and direct them in the right way, that they may be useful, and not merely inoffensive. Surely, then, the refraining from evil discourse, and not perverting the gift of speech, by which man is distinguished from all other creatures here below, is not the whole which is intended by "bridling "the tongue!" Beyond doubt, the proper improvement of that important talent is also meant; the tongue must be held in and kept from improper discourse, and directed to that conversation, which tends "to the use of edifying," and is suited to "minister grace unto the hearers." It will perhaps be found, that they, who have any regard to God and their duty, offend as frequently, by silence, when they are bound to speak, as by speaking, when they should be silent; but sins of omission are generally less regarded than sins of commission. How often do cowardice, indolence, and lukewarmness, make us silent, when holy courage, active zeal, and fervent love, would excite us to attempt a word in season, which God often most eminently blesses!

V. 27. Pure religion, the acceptable holy worship and service of God, free from corrupt mixtures, and undefiled by corrupt motives and carnal passions, as exercised in the sight of God, even the Father, with his approbation, by his adopted children in Christ Jesus, essentially consisted in disinterested, humble, self-denying love to men for the Lord's sake, and from love to him, and in taking pleasure, from such principles, in visiting orphans, widows, and other afflicted or destitute persons; to soothe their sorrows, relieve their wants, and afford them protection; counsel and comfort, in their distresses; and in keeping at a distance from the sinful pursuits, interests, pleasures, maxims, fashions, and pollutions, of this wicked world; so that a man might have no stain upon his garments, no blemish on his character, no guilt upon his conscience, on that account. Without some measure of this holy love, and this mortification to the world, no doctrines, forms, confidence, high affections, zeal, or apparent devotion, can prove a man an accepted worshipper of God. Our true religion is exactly equal to the measure in which these things have place in our hearts, experience, and conduct; and these are therefore the criteria of pure and undefiled religion, by which we should judge of it, in ourselves and in others, both as to the reality of it, and the degree in which it is possessed. But this holy love, and mortification to the world, can only be produced by faith in a crucified Saviour, and the supply of his sanctifying Spirit; so that no appearance of these things can be depended on, except they spring from, and are connected with, a professed belief of the Gospel, and a reliance on the mercy of God in Christ Jesus for salvation. (Notes, 1 Cor. xiii.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The servants of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ must consider themselves as employed to do good to the chosen tribes of the true Israel, through all their dispersions in this evil world. Divers temptations we must meet with; and if we fall into them without our own fault, and have only the distress of bearing them, without the guilt of yielding to them, we may deem it a great cause of joy to be thus proved and purified in the furnace, and made meet for future honour and felicity. For these painful, but short, trials tend to reduce the gracious heart into a more submissive temper, and a more cordial acquiescence in the will of God; and when patience, in its various exercises, is allowed to have its perfect work, it meliorates all the dispositions and affections of the soul; produces a peculiar simplicity, humility, and tenderness; corrects the harshness and roughness natural to us, and matures the fruits of righteousness to the greatest advantage. So that in this severe school the Christian makes his greatest proficiency, and becomes perfect and entire, in every part of his temper and conduct, according to the measure of attainment which may be arrived at in this world, and is defective in nothing requisite for the due performance of the services required of him. But in respect of this, and every other part of our conduct, we shall feel that we lack wisdom, in proportion as we become acquainted with ourselves; nor shall we, if we reverence the Scriptures, seek it in the schools of philosophy, or from the counsels of the wise men of this world; but we shall ask the precious boon of

CHAP. II.

Cautions against partial regard to the rich, and against contempt of the poor, as contrary to the law of love, 1—9. The transgression of one commandment violates the whole law, 10—12. No mercy will be shown to the unmerciful, 13. As love, shown by words alone, is worthless; so faith without works is dead and unprofitable, 14—20. This is illustrated by the examples of Abraham and Rahab, 21—26.

God, and obtain the substance, while others are deceived with an empty shadow. As the Lord “giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not,” and hath engaged that wisdom shall be given to them that ask him for it, so every man, who feels his want of heavenly wisdom, may apply to him for this inestimable benefit without fear of being refused. Did we fully avail ourselves of this privilege, how greatly should we be enriched with divine knowledge! And how prudently should we conduct all our concerns, and avoid every snare and device of our enemies! But pride, prejudice, and a carnal mind, co-operating with unbelief, not only preclude multitudes entirely from these treasures, but in some degree prevent all of us from drawing from them so copiously as we otherwise might do. If men be divided in their judgment, between a dependence on the promises of God in the use of appointed means, and other methods of seeking wisdom; if they do not really believe that the Lord will be as good as his word; or if they question whether heavenly things are decidedly preferable to earthly; no wonder that they are like the waves of the sea, which are driven with the wind, and tossed; and if they receive nothing of God, they have none to blame but themselves. Whilst we see so many of these double-minded men on every side, who are unstable in all their ways, we are reminded to pray for the increase of faith, that we may waver no more, but trust in the Lord, and cleave to him alone.

If there were any substantial satisfaction in earthly things, there might be some speciousness in attempting to serve God and Mammon; but as all below is “vanity and vexation of spirit,” the poor believer may well rejoice in being exalted to an interest in Christ, and in the prospect of glory in heaven, though he have all kinds of hardships by the way; and the rich have at least equal cause for rejoicing, if God hath humbled them before his mercy-seat, though the world despise and hate them on that account; nay, though they should be stripped of their possessions for the cause of Christ. For the fashion of this world passeth away, and all its magnificence and show of happiness fadeth and withereth, like the flower of the grass, and most miserable are those rich men, who fade away in the pride of ungodly prosperity. But blessed are they, who patiently endure trials, and manfully resist temptation; for “through much tribulation shall they enter into the kingdom of God;” and, having been tried, they shall receive the unfading crown of glory, which God hath promised to them that love him. But let not hypocrites who are tempted under their trials to renounce the profession of the Gospel, or believers, who through unwatchfulness are overcome in some sharp conflict, venture for a moment to say or think that they are tempted by God; “for he cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man.” And if any one should dare thus foolishly to charge God with being the Author of sin, in any way, or on any pretence, he may surely expect some dreadful rebuke for his presumption. For when the depravity of the heart hath influenced men to hearken to Satan's enticements and catch at his baits, and so sin hath been conceived and finished, and condemnation justly incurred, it is no less than blasphemy, to throw the blame upon the righteous providence or holy commandments of God. Such inferences from important truths, ill understood, should be carefully avoided, whilst we remember that every good and perfect gift cometh down from the unchangeable Father of Light, the inexhaustible Fountain of wisdom, holiness, and felicity. But if we be Christians indeed, the Lord hath, according to his determinate purpose and “the counsel of his own will,” begotten us with the word of truth; we should therefore give him all the glory of this happy change, and consecrate all our faculties to his service, that we may be “a kind of first-fruits of his creatures.”

V. 19—27.

It behooves us all to be “swift to hear, slow to speak, and slow to wrath,” even when apparently religious zeal prompts a different conduct; for “the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God;” but is the scandal and bane of every society in which it is indulged. Let us then lay apart all filthiness, and the overflowings of maliciousness, that we may receive with humble teachableness, and maintain with meekness and love, the sacred truths contained in the holy scriptures, which, being engrafted in the heart, are effectual to the salvation of our souls. But, while we are swift to hear the word of God, let us take care to be doers of it, and not hearers only, lest we deceive our own souls; many such are found in most congregations, who deceive scarcely any body but themselves. The word of God is a faithful mirror, to show us the deformity and pollution of our souls, and a monitor, to teach us how we may remove them, and adorn ourselves with the beauties of holiness. Happy would it be for mankind, were they, in general, as assiduous in seeking this inward, durable, and spiritual adorning, as they are in decorating their poor mortal bodies, that they may appear comely in the eyes of their fellow-worms! Transient glimpses, however, and notional discoveries, leave mere hearers unchanged, and a large majority choose to go away from the sermon, and forget what manner of persons they are.—But “whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty,” and meditates continually on the holy word of God, not as a forgetful hearer, but as an obedient believer, shall be blessed in his deed; for in this way he shall find out whatever in his heart and conduct needs repentance, forgiveness, and the “sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience:” thus Christ will become more precious to his soul, and by his grace he will daily grow more "meet for the inheritance of the "saints in light," and have more abundant anticipations of their holy felicity. But words must be attended to, as well as actions; for, whatever appearances there may be of true religion, in the creed, worship, and outward conduct of any man, yet, if he bridle not his tongue, he deceiveth his own heart, and all his religion is vain. No wonder that disputatious, contentious, and noisy talkers about forms and doctrines disrelish this epistle, when the unbridled license of their tongues exposes them to an unqualified charge of total hypocrisy in the very opening of it. But, while we depend on God's mercy in Christ Jesus for all things pertaining to salvation, let us remember the essential nature of pure and undefiled religion before God, even our Father; let us show our love to him, by "visiting the fatherless and widows in their affliction," and seek grace from him to preserve us unspotted from the world. For nothing "availeth in Christ Jesus, but faith "which worketh by love," purifieth the heart, subdueth carnal lusts, and obeyeth God's commandments.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—4. While the persons whom the apostle addressed held the doctrine of Christ, and professed faith in him as "the Lord of glory," most glorious in himself, and the Source of all that was honourable in men, they ought to take care not to show respect of persons, giving honour to some and despising others, on account of their external circumstances and appearances, without estimating the real excellency of their characters, or the contrary: for this would be very inconsistent with professing themselves the disciples of the lowly Jesus. For instance, if any person, adorned with rings on his fingers, and costly garments, as one of high rank in the community, should come into their assembly, when they were met for the worship of God, as the Jews did in their synagogues, and another should, at the same time, enter, in mean and worn-out clothes, as a poor man, and they should pay great attention to him in gay clothing, accommodating him with some chief place in the synagogue, and contemptuously order the poor man to stand in some inconvenient place, or to sit on the ground at their feet, without further inquiry into their characters and conduct, would not this prove that they were partial in forming an opinion in themselves concerning others, and were become judges, who were misled by vain reasonings and imaginations, by unjust thoughts and corrupt affections? For their conduct would show, that they deemed wealth and splendour, however acquired, to be honourable; and poverty, however incurred or supported, to be disgraceful: forgetting that the Lord of glory was pleased to be poor for the sake of sinners, to enrich them with eternal felicity. Some expositors, supposing that the passage thus interpreted, could scarcely consist with rendering honour to civil superiors, as required in other scriptures, have endeavoured to explain it of partiality in deciding causes, in favour of the rich and against the poor; because some courts of justice used to be held in the Jewish synagogues. But had the apostle intended to point out so gross an iniquity, he would doubtless have spoken of it with far more decided severity. If such partiality were used in their determinations of those matters, that came before the churches, it would certainly be condemned by what he said: yet the language does not seem to relate to judicial proceedings of any kind; but to an improper respect shown towards some, and contempt expressed towards others, merely on account of their external appearance.—No doubt this is very reprehensible, and the effect of a carnal judgment, how common soever it may be: nor does civil respect to superiors, or to those in authority, render such difference of conduct towards the rich and the poor in religious concerns, at all necessary: especially when the rich have nothing but their wealth and splendour, to recommend them; and the poor are persons of pious character and good behaviour. As places of worship cannot be builded and maintained without much expense, it may be proper that they, who contribute towards defraying it, should be accommodated accordingly: but were all professed Christians more spiritually minded in such matters, less disparity would be made, and the poor would be treated with more attention and regard, than they commonly are in worshipping congregations. And we may conclude, that if the apostle could witness what takes place generally in our days, in this matter, and give his opinion of it, he would repeat the censure, that we were become partial in ourselves, and judges influenced by evil thoughts, corrupt reasonings, and erroneous calculations.

V. 5—7. The apostle called the attention of his brethren to the subject, by inquiring whether they did not know that "God had chosen the poor of this world." Were not his people generally of that rank in life, with only a few exceptions? If the Lord had therefore chiefly blessed the Gospel for the conversion of the poor, it must be evident, that he had appointed that lowly state for his chosen people, as the safest, most comfortable, and advantageous for them; as most conducive to their progressive sanctification, most favourable to their inward peace, and most suited to show forth the power and blessed effects of his grace bestowed on them. For he could have given them the riches and honours of this world, if he had seen that these would have done them good; but he had chosen them to be "rich in faith," interesting them in all the unsearchable riches of Christ, and in all the precious promises of the scripture, and had nominated them to be heirs of the kingdom, which he had engaged to bestow on all those who were taught by his grace to love him and his holy ways; which comprised such a confluence of honour, authority, greatness, riches, and enjoyments, as no earthly kingdom could ever pretend to. (i. 12.) It was therefore evident, that the Lord peculiarly honoured and favoured men of low condition: whereas his worshippers despised the poor, and slighted them, as if beneath their notice! (Notes, Prov. xvii. 5. Luke ii. 1—14.) Did they not also know that rich men were generally oppressors and persecutors, and dragged them before their iniquitous tribunals, to condemn them for their religion? And did they not often hear them blaspheme the name of Christ, from which they were called Christians, and whom they considered as worthy of all honour and worship? Could they then imagine that the enemies of Christ and his church, and persons of the vilest characters, ought to be treated with more respect, on account of their wealth alone, than their poor brethren and neighbours were entitled to? This implies, that the apostle principally referred to the case of such rich persons, as occasionally came to their assemblies, to whom vast attention was paid, whilst the poor were despised; whereas the latter were far more likely to profit by the word preached than the former; and he does not seem to have meant, that the rich, who were stated attendants on their assemblies, and godly persons, ought to have no degree of superior regard shown them, provided the poor were not despised and undervalued.

V. 8—13. The apostle reminded his brethren, that they would do well, if they attended to and fulfilled the comprehensive scriptural precept, of loving their neighbours as themselves, in the several parts of their conduct towards each other. This might be called a royal law, because of its pre-eminent excellency and permanent authority, and because it was the law of Christ their King, respecting their conduct towards one another and all men. (Marg. Ref. and notes on the texts referred to.) It is of vast importance to observe how often this abstract of the second table of the law is referred to in the New Testament, as a rule of conduct to believers; as it is alone sufficient to show the fatal mistake of those who deny the moral law to be the rule of our duty. But if Christians had respect of persons, treating the poor with contempt, and paying court to the rich, they evidently committed sin and acted unjustly, and, consequently, were convicted by the law as transgressors, as they did not show an equal love to their poor brethren. For if they were obedient in all other things to the law, and only offended in one single particular, they were guilty of all; that is, they broke the law, and fell under its condemnation, as certainly, though not so deeply, by transgressing one precept, as if they had broken them all, even as a man is liable to the sentence of death by the law of the land, who offends in one capital matter, though he be clear in all others. The chain consisting of many links is broken, when any one link is broken. According to the covenant of works, a single violation of any one command, brings a man under condemnation, from which no obedience, past, present, or future, can deliver him: and, according to the covenant of grace, the allowed, known, and habitual transgression of any part of the moral law, as given to us from the hands of a Mediator, proves a professed Christian to be impenitent, a hypocrite, an unreconciled enemy, and a rebel against God; and that his obedience in other respects is not the result of a sincere regard to the authority and glory of God: for if it were, the same principle would induce him to a constant endeavour and purpose of obeying every commandment. The authority, which prohibited adultery, forbade murder also; and the same was the case with every other requirement of the law; therefore a violation of any one of them constituted the man a transgressor, and implied rebellion against the Law-giver. Some would perhaps object, that they "were not under "the law, but under grace;" and therefore they might be in a state of acceptance, though the law condemned their conduct in various particulars: but though this in a certain sense was indeed the case with true believers; yet it behooved them, in every respect, to speak and act as persons who were to be judged according to "the perfect law of "liberty." (Note, i. 25.) For the whole tenour of revelation, and the Gospel itself, by which men were set at liberty from condemnation and every yoke of bondage, would condemn all those who did not repent, and forsake every sin, and obey the commandments of God in sincerity and simplicity, from faith and love to the Lord Jesus. So that if they habitually allowed themselves in the practice of any known sin, the Gospel would adjudge them to be unbelievers; they especially who showed no mercy to their neighbours, inferiors, and dependents, would certainly have judgment without mercy, and be punished with the utmost rigour of the law. As no man could be a true believer, whose heart was not humbled and softened into a compassionate, forgiving, kind, and loving disposition. (Notes, &c. Matt. v. 7. vi. 14, 15. xviii. 21—35.) The exercise of mercy indeed might be ascertained by its "rejoicing "against judgment," and by any one's taking pleasure in abating from the demands of rigorous justice, and showing kindness to those who had no legal claim to favour. Thus God deemed it his glory and joy, to pardon and bless those who might justly have been condemned at his tribunal, and his grace taught those who were partakers of his mercy, to copy it in their conduct towards their afflicted and offending brethren: and all, who were not taught to show mercy to others, must expect to be dealt with according to the severity of justice, in respect of their eternal state. What then must be the doom of the cruel oppressors and iniquitous tyrants of the human species?—Some explain the expression, "mercy rejoiceth against "judgment," to denote the cheerful expectation of a future judgment, with which the exercise of mercy to others inspires the true Christian's heart: but, though this may be implied, yet it seems not to be the proper meaning of the passage, or construction of the words; for to "glory "against," or "to rejoice against," does not properly denote, to rejoice and glory in expectation of an event, but to rejoice and glory in obtaining the ascendency or victory over a competitor, as mercy is figuratively represented to do over the severity of God's judgment, when they are justified and saved, who deserve to be condemned.

V. 14—18. It is plain that the apostle here argued against those who substituted a notional belief of the Gospel for the whole of evangelical religion, and who were ready to answer exhortations and reproofs, (as many now do,) by saying, 'We are not to be justified by our works, 'but by faith; we believe, and have all things in Christ.' He therefore inquired of them, what it profited a man, "though he said that he had faith, and had no works" of true piety and holiness, to which he could appeal as the fruits and evidence of it: "Could faith save him?" No doubt true faith, interesting men in Christ's righteousness, atonement, and grace, saves their souls; but then it also produces holy fruits, and is evinced to be genuine by its effect on their hearts and lives: whereas a speculative assent to any doctrine, or a historical belief of any facts, essentially differs from this saving faith. The worthlessness of such a dead faith is here shown by an apposite illustration: If any poor Christians were destitute of proper clothing or food for the day, and so in immediate distress, and in danger of perishing, and a professed Christian, who was able to relieve them, should avow much brotherly love, and express a cordial wish and desire that they might be furnished with raiment and support by some kind friend, but at the same time should give them nothing towards the supply of their urgent necessities, would any man be so destitute of common sense, as to suppose these unmeaning expressions constituted that most excellent grace of "brotherly love," which Christ and his apostles so greatly insisted on and extolled? Or would a poor starving person be persuaded to account it any better than a cruel mockery of his misery? What then would such a love profit either the possessor or his poor brother? Thus faith is most excellent and advantageous, when genuine and efficacious; yet that faith, which has no good works springing from it, is dead and worthless, and as it is inactive and unfruitful, so it can by no means justify the possessor, being alone, and separated from repentance, love to God and man, and every other holy affection. It would therefore be most absurd to suppose that the Lord would approve such a faith, when no poor Christian would value love of exactly the same kind. So that a Christian, who was more attentive "to the work "of faith and labour of love," than to the disputatious profession of certain doctrines, being questioned by one of another stamp, might say to him, "Thou hast faith, and "I have works; show me, therefore, thy faith without "thy works," if any conceivable method can be found of doing this, and in the mean time, 'I will proceed to show 'thee, and all around me, that faith in Christ influences 'and rules in my heart, by the works of a sober, right'eous, and godly life.' Most copies read "show me "thy faith by thy works, and I will show thee my faith "by my works." 'Thou professest to believe, and disgracest that profession by thy conduct; but do not expect 'to be considered as a believer, till thou showest thy faith 'by the good works of a holy life: and thou censurest

19 Thou [x] believest that there is one God; [y] thou doest well: [z] the devils also believe, and tremble.

20 But wilt thou know, [a] O vain man, [b] that faith without works is dead?

21 Was not [c] Abraham our Father [d] justified by works, [e] when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar?

22 * Seest thou how [f] faith wrought with his works, and by works was [g] faith made perfect?

23 And [h] the scripture was fulfilled which saith, [i] Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness: and he was called [k] the friend of God.

24 Ye [l] see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only.

25 Likewise also, [m] was not Rahab the harlot [n] justified by works, [o] when she had received the messengers, and had sent them out another way?

26 For [p] as the body without the † spirit is dead, [q] so faith without works is dead also.

‘me, as not sufficiently exact, or zealous in respect of faith; but I deem it better to evince it by my works, than by disputing about it.’ Either reading warrants the same inference; namely, that there is no possible way to show that we really do believe in Christ, except by being “zealous of good works,” from evangelical motives, and for evangelical purposes; and where good works are evidently wanting, the most confident profession of the most orthodox creed, can only prove a man to be a well-instructed hypocrite, who has received a system of doctrine into his understanding as true, but has never been so convinced of its excellency, as to admit it into his heart experimentally, as the influential principle of his conduct towards God and man. ‘A wicked opinion having sprung up, even in the apostle's days, by misunderstanding Paul's arguments, Peter, John, James, and Jude, aimed, in their epistles, principally at this end, to vindicate the doctrine of Paul from the false consequences charged upon it, and to show that faith, without works, is nothing worth. But indeed Paul does not speak of faith at large, but only of that living, fruitful, and evangelical faith, which, he says, “worketh by love.” ‘As for that faith, void of good works, which these men thought sufficient to salvation, he declareth positively against it. Peter calls it wresting, (2 Pet. ii. 16.) because Paul was in truth of the same opinion with the other apostles, and held eternal life impossible to be attained by any faith which had not the attestation of a holy life.’ (Augustine.)

V. 19, 20. To show the vanity of such a faith as did not influence the heart and conduct, the apostle mentioned the fundamental article of all religion, the existence of one God as the only Object of all worship and service. Now the professed Christian, before described, believed this important truth, but without making any practical use of it. No doubt he acted more properly in believing this truth, than they did who denied it; but of what advantage could this be to him, seeing the very devils believed it also? Nay, they trembled at the thoughts of the omnipotent power and righteous vengeance of the one living and true God; yet they continued implacably to hate his perfections, government, cause, and service. If any man therefore believed all the truths of the Gospel in the same manner, with the utmost exactness, he could not know them more accurately, or assent to them with greater certainty, than devils did. Would not then the vain antinomian disputer be at length convinced by the testimony of an apostle, and such irrefragable arguments, that faith without works was dead, worthless, and useless; like a dead tree, fit only to be cut down and cast into the fire; or a dead corpse, to be buried out of sight, that its putrefaction might not annoy the living? It is vain to say, as some have done, that devils are not under a dispensation of mercy, and therefore they have no ground for appropriating the revelation and promise of salvation to themselves. For the apostle is not speaking of the different circumstances of fallen angels and fallen men, but of the difference between dead, inactive, inefficient faith, and that “faith which worketh by love;” and his argument proves, beyond all doubt, that a faith, which is of no better kind than that of the devils, cannot possibly profit the possessor, however he may be circumstanced; for this plain reason, because it is not that faith to which the promises are made.

V. 21—26. The apostle next proved his assertion by examples. Was not Abraham, the father of the Israelites, and spiritually of believers, justified by works, when, at God's command, he did not hesitate to offer his beloved Isaac for a burnt-offering? (Notes, &c. Gen. xxii. Heb. xi. 17—19.) Did not his works evidence the reality and holy efficacy of his faith, and prove him accepted before God? The attentive reader must see in what a powerful manner his faith in the promises of God operated to produce good works, in obedience to his commands, in the most trying circumstances, universally, and without reserve; and thus “by works was his faith made perfect,” as the tree is in its perfect state when grown to maturity, and loaded on every branch with abundance of valuable fruit. Thus the scripture was fulfilled, which declared that “Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness;” in consequence of which he was admitted to such a state of peace and intimate communion with God, that he was honoured with the privileges and appellation of his “friend.” (Marg. Ref.) Abraham's justification by faith took place many years before he was commanded to sacrifice Isaac; but his obedience in that respect proved him to be a sound character, and justified him as a true believer, and a devoted servant of God. So that it was evident there was a good and important sense, in which “a man was justified by works, and not by faith only,” as his works must be appealed to for the justification of his professed faith before men; and as they will be adduced before the tribunal of God to distinguish true believers from hypocrites; nor will faith justify any man before God, who is not thus justified before the world by his works also. Not that this will be a second justification by works in the sense for which many contend, as the merits of Christ, depended on by living faith, can alone justify a sinner before God from first to last; but the good works of the true believer, from the time when he received Christ to that of his death, how long or how short soever that space may be, will suffice to distinguish his living faith from the dead faith of mere professors, to justify him against every charge of hypocrisy, and to prove him entitled "to the gift of God, even eternal life through Jesus Christ." In like manner, even Rahab, who had been a harlot, was justified by works, when her faith wrought by love to the people of the Lord, and she entertained the messengers and dismissed them in peace, at the hazard of her life, (Notes, Josh. ii. Heb. xi. 31.) for this conduct proved her faith to be living and influential; it showed that she did indeed believe with her heart, and not merely by an inefficacious assent of the understanding. For as the human body, when destitute of the spirit or soul, is a mere dead corpse, without motion or activity, however exactly formed in every part, and thus differs essentially from a living man; even so faith, without works, is a dead carcass, not only worthless, but polluting and offensive. It is unnecessary to use further arguments to prove the consistency of James' doctrine with that of the apostle Paul. St. Paul evidently meant that faith alone interested a sinner in the mercy of God, through the merits of Christ, for justification; but the faith, of which he spake, wrought by love constraining to obedience, and was connected with a new creation unto holiness. St. James meant that no faith, which was not productive of good works, could justify a man before God: that a speculative assent, or an indolent reliance, separate from repentance, diligence in the use of appointed means, and holy obedience, was dead and unprofitable; and that, consequently, there was a sound sense, in which a man might be said to be justified by his works, and in perfect consistency with "his faith being imputed to him for righteousness," as in the case of Abraham. But St. Paul opposed those who objected to the doctrine of justification by faith, and St. James wrote against such as perverted it. Both views of the subject are useful to the humble, upright, and attentive; but the Lord sees good, that the self-wise, the proud, the heedless, and the licentious, should have somewhat to cavil at and stumble over. Indeed, the same interpretation, which is necessary to render one part of these verses consistent with another, at the same time renders them consistent with the doctrine of St. Paul concerning justification by faith. (23.) 'It is a different thing to say that the faith which is without works is dead, from saying that faith is dead without works; as if faith derived its life and power from works, which is not less absurd, than if we should say that the body is dead without sense and motion, as if sense and motion were the cause of life; when we should say that the body, which is without sense and motion, is dead; for the cause is understood from the necessary effects, and works are the evidences and effects of living faith, and not the cause of it.' (Beza.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The Lord Jesus is the true Fountain of honour, and they are the most honourable who best serve him and most resemble him, whatever their external rank or appearance may be. But how difficult is it for us to divest ourselves of carnal reasonings and corrupt prejudices in such matters! and to give decent respect to superiors, without a partial regard to the affluence and splendour, which too often are the appendages, or heralds, of vice and folly. But if this does not become the disciple of the lowly Jesus, it is still more criminal to treat the poor with contempt, because of their mean garments and indigent circumstances, when perhaps they are adorned with wisdom and grace, angels delight in ministering to them, and Christ rejoices over them to do them good. We should watch and pray against so corrupt a judgment, and such evil thoughts, in all cases, but especially in the worship of God, before whom the rich and the poor meet together, and are regarded entirely according to their characters, and not in the least according to their rank. It is greatly to be desired, that every degree or appearance of the evil here reproved could be removed from our congregations, and that we should more constantly remember that "God hath chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to those who love him." The poor should hence learn to seek these riches and honours, and the assurance of them, with increasing earnestness; to be contented in their low estate, to rejoice in their spiritual privileges, to be cheerful in the humble duties of their station, to be thankful for their advantages, and to pray for their rich neighbours, that they may not be put off with a perishing inheritance. The rich also should learn to rejoice with trembling in their perilous pre-eminence, not to trust in their earthly treasures, and not to despise their poor brethren, but to seek the true riches, and to improve their talents with a constant recollection of the time when they must give an account of their stewardship. For soon the condition of the wealthy oppressor, persecutor, and blasphemer of Christ, and that of the poor despised believer, will be reversed, when the latter will be comforted, and the former tormented, for evermore. (Notes, Luke xvi. 19—31.)

we have respect of persons, we commit sin and are convicted as transgressors, even though we be not guilty of any gross violation of justice and truth. If our obedience be sincere, it will be universal, as far as we are acquainted with our Lord's will, for the same authority is affronted whatever command is broken. In vain do men urge that they are not under the law, whilst they allow themselves in known sin; the very Gospel will consign them over to the righteous vengeance of God, and all the curses of the law will be executed upon them, with a tremendous increase of punishment, for having "sinned on that grace might abound." But the hard-hearted, selfish, implacapable, and oppressive professor of Christianity, has the greatest cause to tremble; for if "he shall have judgment without mercy, who hath showed no mercy," the meanest slave, that ever was whipped and worked to death, must be considered as happy, compared with his haughty cruel tyrant; and this will sufficiently appear, "when the earth shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain.

V. 14—26.

Vain men, while neglecting judgment, mercy, and the love of God, quiet their conscience, and ward off reproof, by talking of faith, of mercy, of salvation; but God will no more regard their heartless assent to truth, or their indolent presumptuous reliance on his mercy, than their hollow expressions of love to their poor destitute neighbours. Let no man deceive himself: faith, being alone and not productive of good works, is no better than the faith of devils, and will leave the possessor in their company to all eternity. Would we be, with Abraham, "the friends of God," we must both believe his promise, trust his mercy, and obey his commandment; or else publicans and harlots will enter heaven before us: and a believing Rahab shall be justified by her works, and distinguished from all open unbelievers, and those whose faith was dead, before the assembled world, when many disputers for orthodox creeds, which they have disgraced by their lives, shall have their portion with the workers of iniquity, "in outer darkness, where is weeping and gnashing of teeth."

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. The word, here rendered "masters," signifies teachers: some ought to be teachers but none ought to domineer, assume authority in the Church, or indulge a censorious arrogant temper. 'When the apostle forbids many to be such, he seems to allow that some may; and consequently I think "teachers" ought to be explained in an innocent sense.' (Doddridge.) An arrogant, self-preferring, dictatorial temper, whether it led men, without a proper call or suitable qualifications, to aspire to the office of teachers, or whether it induced them to assume pre-eminence in other ways, was the general object of the apostle's reprehension; though the former, as the effect of such a temper, seems to have been principally intended. Many converts to Christianity would be desirous of the distinction of teachers, with a view to the credit and pre-eminence of that office, or from a mistaken idea that they could not glorify God, and do good to man, in other stations; while perhaps they were not aware of the weight and difficulty of the work, and the solemn account which must be given of it. But they ought to know, and seriously consider, that teachers must stand a greater or more strict judgment than other men, and that false, unfaithful, ambitious, and selfish teachers, would be subject to a greater and more awful condemnation than other sinners. This is also in a degree applicable to the case of censorious, assuming, and domineering persons in any station. (Notes, Matt. vii. 1—6. Luke vi. 37, 38.) Indeed, even true believers, though preserved from final condemnation, if employed as teachers, must expect to be called to a more strict account than their brethren; and as their conduct would be more severely scrutinized by men than that of others, so they would be more sharply rebuked and chastened by God for their offences, in order to the display of his glory, and the prevention of scandals in the Church; so that every attempt to force themselves into eminent and conspicuous stations, would ensure a larger measure of painful and mortifying trials. (Note 1 Cor. xi. 31—34.) Nor could any man expect to behave so as to escape correction or condemnation; for in many things all offended, without excepting the apostles themselves; all frequently tripped or stumbled in their walk, though they did not utterly fall; and the more men were advanced and distinguished, the greater would be their dangers, the more noticed their transgressions, and the more needful their rebukes and chastisements. Especially it would be found extremely difficult for them to speak so much, and so often, as the public and private duties of the ministry required, without often uttering unadvised words, dishonourable to God, injurious to men, or the result of pride, anger, or some selfish passion. So that idle and evil words must be multiplied, in consequence of men's improperly entering into the pastoral office; nor could any wholly escape this guilt; though such as were duly called to the service might expect proportionable grace and mercy. (Notes, Is. vi. 5—8. Matt. xii. 34—37.) If indeed any man were able to bridle his tongue, so as not at all to offend in his words, he must be a perfect man, able also to govern, restrain, and use all the appetites, senses, and members of his body, "as instruments of righteousness," in subserviency to the glory of God and in obedience to his will, seeing he was found able to govern the most unruly of them all. (i. 26.) No man actually attained to this absolute perfection; for in many things all offended; but the degree of a man's wisdom and grace might be ascertained, by the measure in which he was enabled to govern his tongue: so that, if nothing in principle or practice proved the contrary, he, who most avoided all improper words, and spake most to the glory of God and the edification of men, must be deemed the most eminent Christian: whereas falehood, boastings, revilings, and corrupt conversation, brought a man's character into suspicion or disrepute, whatever else seemed to be good in it. The Jews at that time, even when grossly ignorant and vicious, were exceedingly prone to consider themselves as called and qualified to be the religious teachers of mankind; (Rom. ii. 17—21:) and, probably, the apostle saw, that many of the Jewish converts to Christianity were influenced, by the remains of the same disposition, to aspire prematurely, from questionable motives, or without proper qualifications and weight of character, to the office of teachers or ministers, which he counted it needful thus to repress.—The word, rendered condemnation, means judgment, in many places at least. (Matt. vii. 2 Acts xxiv. 25. Rom. v. 16. 1 Cor. xi. 29. 32. Gr.)

V. 3—6. To show the importance of the subject, the apostle observed, that the estimate must not be made according to appearance, but by the effect. The horse, though a powerful and spirited animal, might be directed by the bit in his mouth according to the will of the rider, and his whole body followed that guidance; whereas, if that were omitted, great danger and mischief would ensue; and the ships, though of vast bulk, and driven by violent winds on the impetuous ocean, might be directed by a very small helm according to the motion of the pilot's hand. Even so the tongue, though a little member, boasted and gloried of being able to do great things: when properly bridled and directed, it could produce the most blessed effects, but if neglected, the most fatal consequences must follow. For let any man consider how vast a quantity of fuel a small match, or even a spark of fire, would suffice to kindle, and what tremendous conflagrations might follow; and hence learn the importance of the tongue; which is, in fact, a fire to destroy all before it, and a world of iniquity, comprehending, in the abuse of it, all the wickedness of the universe, in miniature, or rather in embryo. Its situation and office among the members is such, that it defileth the whole body, and inflames or gives vent to all those corrupt passions, by which men are instigated to commit the several vices, of which the other members are the instruments. Nay, it setteth on fire the whole circle of nature, through every generation, and produces the most extensive and prolific mischiefs all over the earth; being indeed set on fire of hell; as the devil, working on the various lusts of man's apostate nature, and exciting men to vent their abominable thoughts by their tongues, disseminates from one to another, all over the earth, atheism, infidelity, heresies, blasphemies, impiety, lies, slanders, emulations, lewdness, and discords, whence all kinds and degrees of atrocious and destructive crimes proceed. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7—12. Every kind, or nature, of living creatures, however monstrous, ravenous, fierce, or venomous, has been and is subdued by the reason, courage, and persevering efforts, of the human species, by which means the mischiefs, which otherwise would have been occasioned by them, are in a great measure prevented; but no man could ever find out a way to subdue the tongue, or to hinder wicked men from corrupting the principles, polluting the imaginations, and inflaming the passions of others, by their mischievous discourse. No one, however wise, powerful or excellent, has ever been able, by laws, punishments, arguments, or any other method, to stop the progress of this evil, which effects far more tremendous desolations, in communities, churches, and families, and does far more to make men miserable, here and hereafter, than all the venomous and voracious creatures in the world combined together can do. The word, rendered tamed properly means subdued. It could scarcely be said that all, kinds of sea-monsters, crocodiles, and serpents, had been tamed, or rendered tractable, by men; but they have all been brought under subjection in one way or anoth whereas no efforts could ever prevent the malignant effects of the unbridled tongues of ungodly men; for the tongue is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison, the chief instrument by which the desperate wickedness of men's hearts is propagated to poison the principles, and inflame the corruptions of multitudes around them. With the tongue, indeed, true Christians blessed and praised God, according to the honourable use for which it had been created, and many did this outwardly, who were destitute of true piety; yet with this same member some of them slandered, reviled, anathematized, and imprecated vengeance on other men, from the malignity and pride of their hearts, though men were first created after the image of God, still retained his natural image, and were capable of being renewed to a conformity to his holiness! So that out of the same mouth the language of love, gratitude, and adoration of God, and that of enmity and rancour against men, proceeded!—Some might pretend that they thus vented their indignation against opposers of the Gospel from zeal for the truth, and against error; but these things ought not by any means to be so, and every Christian, who acted in such a manner, belied his profession, and yielded to the suggestions of Satan and to his own corrupt passions. Indeed, it was an absurdity which could not be paralleled; for no fountain from the same opening sent forth water, sometimes sweet, at others bitter; sometimes fresh, and at others salt, and every plant produced uniformly its natural fruit, and no other. But pious, pure, loving, candid, sincere, humble, and edifying language was the genuine produce of a sanctified heart, and none, who understood Christianity, would expect to hear curses, lies, boastings, and revilings, from a believer's mouth, any more than they would look for figs upon a vine, or olive-berries on a fig-tree. (Marg. Ref.)—Curse, &c. (9.) 'Perhaps the 'apostle in this glanced at the unconverted Jews, who 'often cursed the Christians bitterly in their synagogues.' (Macknight.)

V. 13—16. The apostle had rather digressed from his subject, but he was showing the consequences of an assuming temper and an improper desire to be teachers. If, therefore, any of those, into whose hands this epistle might come, were, or desired to be thought, persons of superior wisdom and capacity, and endued with much knowledge of the Gospel, let them not think themselves buried in a private or obscure station, or indulge a proud, aspiring, and discontented spirit; but let them show forth by the general tenour of a good conversation, in the several relations and employments of life, their works of piety, equity, purity, and mercy, "in meekness of wisdom," exercising that prudence which is characterized by a meek and quiet spirit, and inseparably connected with it, and with a readiness to forgive and to be at peace with all men. (Notes, 2 Tim. ii. 24—26.) But if any of them indulged bitter envyings, or proud, fierce, and malevolent zeal for their party or sentiments, in their hearts, and so rivalled others for pre-eminence, reputation, or authority, as to censure, revile, and calumniate them in a vehement and malignant manner, and to take pleasure in contending and quarreling with such as differed from them, let them not absurdly glory in these tempers and behaviour, as if they arose from extraordinary zeal, boldness, or faithfulness; neither let them defame the truth, by pretending that such were the necessary effects of embracing, professing, and earnestly defending it, or that those were lukewarm, who did not dispute for it in this violent manner. For this wisdom, though it would have numbers of injudicious admirers, even among apparently religious people, did not descend from above, (i. 5,) but was "earthly," as it sought earthly distinctions and advantages, and was of an earthly origin; it was also "natural," the result of such principles as unregenerate men are actuated by; and it was "devilish," being at first derived from the devil, and constituting the image of his pride, ambition, policy, sagacity, envy, malignity, and falsehood. The word, rendered sensual, is elsewhere translated natural, and I apprehend it should be so rendered in this place; for it seems rather to relate to man's natural depravity in general, than to his sensuality in particular, to which ambitious disputants are commonly less addicted than to malignant passions. (Note, 1 Cor. ii. 14—16.)—The apostle added, that where envy and strife are found, there is of course confusion and every evil work; for those passions, when given loose to by one man, are excited in others, till churches, communities, and families, are thrown into confusion, and all species of crimes are perpetrated, whilst men are blinded and hurried on by their violent resentments and prejudices.

V. 17, 18. On the contrary, "the wisdom which is "from above," even that wisdom, which God gives to his people in answer to their humble and believing prayers, "is first pure," in respect of its objects, motives, and tendency; it relates to the holy and purifying truths and precepts of scripture, and tends to holiness of heart, language and conduct. As far as it can consist with this, and with steadily avowing the truths, and obeying the commandments of God our Saviour, this wisdom is peaceable; the possessor of it is disposed to give up every thing for peace, except truth and duty, and these he will firmly adhere to, but in a peaceable and loving manner It is also gentle, and influences men to be slow to anger, candid, calm, forbearing and courteous. Moreover, it is easy to be entreated, and persuaded to what is reasonable, or forgiving, and to listen to the words of truth and equity, though spoken by an inferior, a child, or an enemy; and it is full of mercy, compassion, tenderness, and all good fruits. (Note, Gal. v. 22, 23.) It is likewise "without partiality," in judging of persons or actions, free from bigotry for one party or against another, and from contending for one part of religion, to the neglect and disparagement of others, or producing that partiality to the rich, and that prejudice against the poor, which the apostle had before reproved, (Notes, ii. 1—6.) Finally, it is free from hypocrisy, leading a man to a greater regard to the acceptance of God, than to the good opinion of men. (Notes, &c. 1 Cor. xiii.) Heavenly wisdom, according to St. James's description of it, is nearly allied to that love, for which St. Paul contended; and we may observe of both, that they are described as they are in themselves, and that every man may ascertain the reality, or the degree of his attainments in them, by the effects of them on his temper and conduct. For, whatever bigots and zealots may imagine, "the fruit of righteousness," or that good seed whence this blessed fruit grows here on earth, "is sown "in peace;" men of peaceable, loving tempers, preaching the Gospel, adorning it in their lives, and watering it with their prayers, sow the seed, which God blesseth to the conversion of sinners and the propagation of true religion in the world. It is sown in peace, not amidst a great noise and disturbance, and "by those that make peace," who are both peaceable and peace-makers in the church and in the world. (Note, Matt. v. 9.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

Did men duly weigh the importance and difficulty of the sacred ministry, the account which must be given of it, and the trials and temptations to which it exposes them, they would be less forward, than they sometimes are, in aspiring to that distinction. Indeed, every conspicuous station must be connected with many painful and mortifying events; and numbers, who intrude into them, will receive the heavier condemnation on that account. If then, the glory of God, the good of mankind, and an evident call in providence, did not require the contrary; a wise and humble man, possessed of much self-knowledge, and knowledge of human nature, and the state of the world and the church, would choose obscurity and privacy, to be out of the way of temptation, to shun the danger of dishonouring the gospel, and to escape trials, as much as this present state will admit. For in many things we offend all: and though a well-informed christian will readily acknowledge, that his rule of duty is perfect, he will also know that in fact no man on earth lives up to it. But nothing is more arduous, than the proper government of the tongue; and though the minister, who is satisfied that Christ hath sent him to preach the gospel, will trust in his abundant mercy and all-sufficient grace; yet he will also perceive, that no outward appendages of the work can counterbalance the additional danger of contracting guilt, to which that work exposes him. Facts abundantly prove, that more professed Christians succeed in bridling their senses and appetites, than in duly restraining their tongues: and whilst we contemplate with grief and astonishment the horrible effects produced by this unruly evil, "this world of iniquity, this deadly prison, this "fire that sets the whole course of nature" in a flame, in every part of the earth, and hath done so through all the ages of time; and while we recollect with admiring gratitude and joy, that the Lord makes use of this very member, when he has filled the heart with holy affections, to spread the word of truth and righteousness throughout the earth; let us particularly inquire, what use we make of our tongues. It behooves us to bridle them, that they may obey the dictates of our enlightened understandings and holy affections, as the well-managed horse does the rider; or as the ship is turned by the helm in the hand of the pilot: that neither pride, passion, lust, or levity, nor yet any temptation, may lead us to speak corrupt or unadvised words, or any thing contrary to the glory of God and the edification of men. As no man is able to subdue and tame the tongue, no, not his own tongue, without the help of divine grace; we are reminded to beg of God to do it for us: for "the things, which are impossible with man, are "possible with God." Depending on his grace, let us take heed to bless, and curse not; let us aim at a consistency of conversation and conduct, and see to it that our love to men proves the sincerity of our professed love to God; and that our conduct, out of the place of worship, corresponds with our language and professions in it. For many things are even among Christians, that ought not to be so, FROM [a] whence come wars and *fightings among you? V. 13—18.

Instead of seeking the reputation of wisdom and knowledge, by ostentatiously aspiring after pre-eminence, let us be careful to "show out of a good conversation our "works with meekness of wisdom;" avoiding all bitter envyings and strife in our hearts, as well as in our words and actions, not glorying in such things as are indeed a shame to any man, or scandalizing the truth by disgraceful contentions about it. Such wisdom is common enough in the world, and in the visible Church, and it thrives here, being in its proper soil and climate; for it descendeth not from above, but is earthly, natural, and devilish, producing confusion and every evil work. May the Lord then bestow upon us the wisdom which is from above; may the purity, peace, gentleness, docility, and mercy, manifested in all our actions, and the fruits of righteousness abounding in our lives, evince that God hath replenished us with this most excellent gift! May we avoid all partiality, respect of persons, narrow prejudices, and a half religion, as well as hypocrisy; and, in our words and works, be employed as peace-makers, to sow that good seed, which yields the fruits of righteousness on earth, to the glory of God and the salvation of men.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. The apostle is generally supposed in this place, to have addressed the unconverted Jews, to whose conduct his language is peculiarly applicable, according to the history of those times. Indeed, we can scarcely conceive that persons, continuing members of the Christian Church at so early a period, were guilty of the enormities here mentioned, though the passage is applicable enough to nominal Christians in subsequent ages. But the apostle seems to have cautioned his Christian brethren against envy, strife, and ambition, which gained ground within the Church, by the example of their nation, and the still more tremendous effects which sprang from the same cause among them. He, however, employed such language, as would be a direct and pointed address to those Jews that might happen to read his epistle, when he inquired, "whence wars and fightings" among them originated; seeing the nation was divided against itself, and was split into parties, which destroyed each other by most furious contests, while their continual insurrections were drawing down destruction on them from the Roman power. Did not these calamities arise from their lusts, or their pleasures? that is, from those corrupt passions which they sought their pleasure in gratifying? These lusts warred in their members; either the members of the corrupt nature, the old Adam, in which one lust warred against another, as all could not be gratified, and each strove for the mastery; or their carnal passions, working within, and overcoming the feeble resistance of reason and conscience, made use of the members of the body as weapons or instruments of unrighteousness, for perpetrating their criminal purposes. They lusted after, and eagerly craved, worldly prosperity, and the several things connected with it, but they did not possess them; and, in consequence of this disappointment, they were ready to murder, or actually did murder, such persons as stood in their way, yet they could not after all obtain the advantages which they so inordinately coveted; this, therefore, rendered them still more violent, and intestine discords and public insurrections were excited; but instead of prospering by them, they were only the more impoverished and distressed, because they sought not the desired benefit from God by prayer. This seems to refer to the eager desires of the Jewish nation after temporal prosperity, and liberty from the Roman yoke, and to the violent and impious measures which they adopted, in order to obtain them; for these things only increased their miseries, and were hastening their destruction, because they trusted not in God. Some of them, however, it might be supposed, kept up the form of religion, and prayed for liberty from their oppressors, and for temporal prosperity; but they did not receive what they asked for, because they asked amiss; their very prayers were dictated by carnal affections, they were presented in a formal manner, and by those who continued to reject their Messiah, vainly expecting a temporal deliverer, whom they would gladly have welcomed. So that they only asked for worldly advantages and possessions, and in order that they might spend and waste them in gratifying their passions.

V. 4—6. The Jews were still the professed worshippers of God, and the nation had been espoused to him by special covenant; idolatry, therefore, and other direct violations of the national covenant, were spiritual adultery; and the rejection and crucifixion of the Messiah was the grossest instance of that crime that could be committed. They moreover idolized worldly interests and pleasures, in the most excessive manner, as if these had been their portion, and religion no further valuable than as it subserved that primary object. It is also probable, that many nominal Christians had renounced, concealed, or belied their profession, from regard to the world, to such a degree as to merit the severe rebuke contained in this address. Both descriptions might justly be called "adulterers and adul-"teresses," in respect of their unfaithfulness to that God, whose professed worshippers they were, though perhaps not guilty of adultery in the common acceptation of the word. And did not they, to whom the oracles of God were committed, know "that the friendship of the world "was enmity with God?" This was so evidently the case, that if any man resolved to live upon friendly terms with the world, he must be the enemy of God. The world, or mankind in general, being under the influence of Satan, and consequently governed by unholy maxims, the result of a carnal judgment and dispositions, the man, who will at any rate be upon good terms with the world, must not profess the truth, attend on the ordinances, or keep the commandments of God, or be zealous for the honour, cause, and Gospel of Christ, in that manner and measure, which every believer is bound to. The friendship of the world, implies an intimate alliance with the determined enemies of God, which no man can maintain, without habitual rebellion against him, to please his enemies. To live in friendship therefore with the world, denotes that a man is carnally-minded, at enmity with God, unregenerate, unpardoned, and unreconciled, whatever his notions, convictions, or professions, have been and are. This must be the case, till Satan, the god and prince of this world, is dethroned, and mankind in general become true Christians. The servants of Christ are indeed friends to the world, or to men in general, and desirous in every way of doing them good, far beyond what any other persons are; but they cannot possess the friendship of the world in any measure, without acting contrary to the spirit of their profession. Did then the Jews, or the inconsistent professors of Christianity, suppose that the Scripture spake in vain, without truth or meaning, in all those numerous passages, which describe the ungodliness, selfishness, carnality, pride, and malignity of the human heart, and declare that the spirit, which naturally "dwell-"eth in us, lusteth to envy," or enviously? Since it was evident, from the whole tenour of the Old Testament, that the natural disposition of fallen man, as instigated by Satan, so eagerly covets worldly things, as to envy all those that possess them, and thus prompts to ambition, contention, hatred, fraud, injustice; and that it leads them to envy, or to hate, those who love God, as Cain envied, hated, and murdered his brother Abel. Must not then such persons be enemies to God, his truths, ways, cause, and people? Could they hope to reconcile the friendship of so wicked a world with that of God? Or would they deem themselves his people, whilst evidently under the power of this envious spirit? Some expositors, not finding any text, in the Old Testament, expressly declaring that "the spirit which is in us lusteth to envy," and not satisfied with the general tenour of the Scripture on that point, read the last clause as a separate interrogation; "Do ye think that the Scripture speaketh in vain against "this worldly mindedness? Or doth the Spirit that dwell-"eth in us lust to envy?" That is, doth the Holy Spirit, which dwelleth in all Christians, or that new nature which he createth, produce such fruit? But the meaning is nearly the same. The apostle would further remind them, that God giveth his people more grace, than to leave them slaves to such vile passions: and, having begun to sanctify their hearts, he gives them more and more of the transforming influences of his Holy Spirit, to deliver them gradually from every evil temper, and to make them spiritual in all their affections and dispositions. So that, whilst he fighteth against the proud, the self-sufficient, the ambitious, the scornful and obstinate, the self-willed, the impenitent, and unbelieving; he showeth favour, and communicateth grace, to the humble and lowly, who are supplicants for spiritual blessings at his mercy-seat. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7—10. From the preceding reproofs and arguments, the apostle took occasion to exhort the unconverted Jews, or nominal Christians, who should read his epistle, to submit themselves to God. For he would certainly fight against the proud, as his peculiar enemies and competitors, till they were either brought to submit to him, or destroyed; and, as he was waiting to be gracious to the humble supplicant, let them be persuaded to submit to his teaching and authority, to own the justice of his judgments and threatenings, to plead guilty, and cast themselves upon his mercy; to resign themselves to his will, and to obey him as his willing subjects. In order to this, it behooved them to resist the devil, and to reject his suggestions, whether immediate or by his agents, which tended to excite their carnal passions, or to prejudice them against his holy salvation and service; for if they resisted the tempter resolutely, in dependence on the grace of God, and opposed to his suggestions the plain truths, promises, instructions, and precepts of Scripture, he would be driven from them by the power of the Lord, and flee away as a vanquished enemy. Let them also draw near to God, as in Christ Jesus, and upon a mercy-seat, by believing prayer, seeking reconciliation to him; and he would draw nigh to them, to support, sanctify, comfort, and bless them. But at the same time, they, who were living ungodly and wickedly, or practising any kind of sin, must cleanse their hands from it, by repenting of it, forsaking it with abhorrence, and renouncing all the carnal pleasure or profit connected with it. (Note, Is. i. 10—20. Marg. Ref.) Also the double-minded or hypocritical professors, (Note, i. 8.) the men, who cleaved to the world and its friendship and interests, neglecting God and his will, must purify their hearts, in dependence on the mercy and grace of the Gospel, from every pollution, that they might be prepared, in the fear and love of God, and by all holy affections, for a life of humble and devoted obedience. Instead therefore of proceeding in a thoughtless course of sin, or a formal and unfruitful profession of Christianity, "let them "be afflicted, and mourn, and weep," on account of the dishonour which their sins had done to God, the mischief which they had occasioned to men, and the danger to which their own souls were exposed; and because of the rebellious ingratitude, contempt, and enmity, of which they had been guilty, especially in their opposition to Christ and his salvation. Their carnal mirth and laughter, as well as their scornful derision of divine things, ought, without delay, to be turned into mourning and godly sorrow, and their worldly joy into heaviness, depression of spirits, self-abasement, brokenness of heart, and serious concern for their souls. For if they humbled themselves inwardly, and in the sight of God, by unfeigned repentance, submission to his righteousness, and acceptance of his salvation, he would certainly lift them up from their dejection, heal their wounded spirits, comfort them with his reconciled love, exalt them to most valuable privileges, and enrich them with everlasting glory and felicity, as well as exempt them from the miseries which were about to come on their nation.

V. 11, 12. The apostle next warned his brethren, or those who professed and appeared to be Christians, to avoid detraction, slander, and uncharitable judgments on each other's motives, actions, characters, or state. As these things were expressly forbidden in the divine law, (Notes, Ex. xx. 16. Lev. xix. 16—18.) the man, who thus reviled, slandered, or decided against his brethren, did in fact judge and condemn the law itself, as if it were unjust, unnecessary, or unfit to be obeyed. This conduct, therefore, was indeed no less a presumption, than for a man to quit his station as the subject of God, who should be a doer of the law, and to usurp the place of a lawgiver and judge, whose office it was to determine what ought to be commanded, to prescribe to men their conduct, to call them to account for it, and to pass sentence upon the guilty. But there was one Lawgiver, who was fully authorized and qualified to enact laws for his church and for the universe, to enforce them, and to vindicate their obligation and honour; being able to destroy the obstinate transgressor, and to detect the masked hypocrite, as well as to save the humble penitent; and to whom all authority and judgment belonged. Who then was the poor worm, the vile sinner, that, forgetful of his own deserts, dared to usurp the throne of judgment, as if he were the competitor of Christ, and to decide on the actions, and denounce sentence against the persons of his brethren, in a dictatorial manner, and according to his own rules, as if that were his province and duty? (Notes, Matt. vii. 1, 2. Rom. xiv. 1—13.) Nothing can more completely demonstrate any proposition, than this passage demonstrates that the moral law is the believer's rule of duty, and that every word or action, which dishonours the law, is rebellion, if not blasphemy, against our one Lawgiver and Judge; at the same time that it exposes, in a most striking manner, the wickedness of that presumptuous, rash, and censorious way, in which zealots and bigots condemn and anathematize those who in any respect differ from them, to the immense scandal of the Gospel and disturbance of the church; and this conduct in fact is often connected with antinomian tenets, and is perfectly congenial to them. The coincidence of St. James' exhortation with that of the apostle of the Gentiles, in the fourteenth chapter of his Epistle to the Romans, is well worthy our special notice; for it is generally supposed, that James here refers to the same subject, namely, the difference of opinion and conduct between the Jewish and Gentile converts, concerning meats and days and the other ceremonies of the law.

V. 13—17. The apostle here proceeds to reprove and expose the self-sufficiency, worldly spirit, and unbelieving, irreligious language, which were manifested by many, in another way. The expression, "Go to now," or, "Come "now," here implied strong disapprobation, and a call to any one to consider the absurdity or baseness of his conduct. The persons reproved were eager in pursuing worldly advantages, pleased with the sagacious plans which they had formed for obtaining them, and sanguine in expecting success; but they neither considered the shortness and uncertainty of life, nor their entire dependence on God in every thing. Thus some would say, 'We shall set out 'to-day, or to-morrow, and go to such a city, where we 'purpose to reside for a year, and by carrying on such or 'such a trade, we expect to enrich ourselves.' Whereas they could not know what might take place respecting them, even on the morrow, or for a single day. (Notes, &c. Prov. xxvii. 1. Luke xii. 13—21.) For indeed what were their lives to be compared unto, but a vapour, or luminous meteor, which, gliding through the air in the night, may perhaps appear beautiful for a moment, but then vanishes for ever? So short, unreal, unsubstantial, uncertain, and fading, was human life, and all the splendour, prosperity, or enjoyments, that attended on it; though an eternity of bliss or wo, to each of them, must be determined according to their conduct during this fleeting moment! They ought therefore to say, with serious recollection, submission to God, and indifference about earthly things, 'If the Lord will, I shall live, and do this 'or that: it is in the line of my duty; and if he spare my 'life, I shall go about it according to his commandments, 'and in dependence on him; and he will succeed the de'sign so far as it is for my real good.' But as the persons reproved "rejoiced in their boastings," concerning the policy of their schemes, and their prospect and confident expectation of success, they must be reminded, that "all "such rejoicing was evil;" the result of a proud, carnal, unbelieving, and ungodly disposition; a self-idolatry, as well as an idolizing of the world, and a forgetfulness of God, of death, and of a future judgment. This heathen temper and conduct was less excusable in them than in the Gentiles; for, having the word of God and the instructions of his ministers, they could not but know that they ought to be spiritually minded, and "to acknowledge God in all their ways:" if therefore they knew, in this and other things, what the good and perfect will of God was, and yet did not obey it, their omission would be emphatically sinful, and expose them to severe rebukes or final condemnation. This is a rule universally applicable, and every man ought most carefully to consider it, in respect of sins of omission, which the conscience does not so readily remonstrate against, as it does against those of commission. (Notes, Luke xii. 47, 48. John xiii. 17.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

All the wars, murders, massacres, persecutions, oppressions, and bloody contests, that ever desolated the earth, or harassed the church, originated from the lusts of man's apostate nature, and the perverse pleasure which he takes in breaking the commandments of God. The carnal affections of the heart having cast off the rule of reason and wisdom, anarchy and civil war takes place in the soul; while one member of the corrupt nature wars against the rest, and they in turns prevail and are gratified; and while the members of the body are the instruments of their pernicious purposes, and obey the dictates of the tyrant of the hour. This being, in one way or another, the case with the unnumbered millions of the human species, (except the remnant of those who are born again,) we need not wonder at the confusion, crimes, and miseries, which have, in every age, abounded in all parts of the world, though we ought to mourn over them. But satisfaction cannot be found in ungodliness, whatever method the carnal mind may select in order to obtain it. In respect of spiritual blessings, it may be said of many, "ye have "not because ye ask not, or because ye ask amiss;" yet all who ask in sincerity will surely receive: and humble, believing prayer is the best means of obtaining all desirable success in temporal things. But if men ask worldly prosperity and affluence, that they may gratify their lusts, and waste the bounty of God in violating his commandments, their requests will either be rejected, or they will receive the things for which they prayed as a scourge, or a curse. Alas! how many nominal Christians might be addressed in the apostle's words, "as adulterers and adulteresses," both literally and spiritually! And yet, how would they be disgusted and enraged, if a minister were to accost them in such language, however justly and scripturally applied! But, in whatever terms the offensive truth be conveyed, we are bound to delare, most perspicuously, that "the friend"ship of the world is enmity against God, and that who"soever will be the friend of the world is the enemy of "God." Such a profession of the Gospel, as gives no offence to a world that lieth in wickedness, will leave a man to perish with the enemies of Christ. Let us then endeavour to be friends to mankind, and to do good to all men, and at the same time to disregard the friendship or enmity of the world, to refuse conformity to its vain fashions, to separate from the intimate society of ungodly men, and to profess the truths, and obey the precepts of Christ, without inquiring how far we may do it without incurring reproach, contempt, opprobrious names, or other kinds and degrees of persecution. The envious, ambitious, and aspiring spirit of ungodly men is totally contrary to the Christian temper, and the influences of the Holy Spirit; and "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none "of his." The Lord giveth grace to his people, though he often denies them wealth and honour, and he will give more grace to those, who long to have all sin mortified, and their hearts completely sanctified; but he resisteth the proud, as his rivals and personal enemies, while he communicates the blessings of his special favour and grace, exclusively, to the poor in spirit and the broken in heart.

V. 7—17.

If any of our fallen race desire to be happy here and hereafter, let them submit themselves to God, and seek his grace and favour; let them resist the devil and reject his temptations, and he shall flee from them; and let them draw near to God upon his mercy-seat, and he will draw near to save and help them. But repentance must be shown "by works meet for repentance;" the sinner, who comes to God, must cleanse his hands from the allowed practice of every transgression, however secret, gainful, or pleasant to corrupt nature; and the double-minded must cleanse his heart from hypocrisy, partiality, and worldly lusts, earnestly calling upon God to enable him for these things, which would otherwise be entirely impracticable. All sin must be wept over or lamented, either here in godly sorrow, or hereafter in wailing and gnashing of teeth; men may defer this inseparable consequence of wickedness, but they cannot escape it. Well may we then call on the gay triflers around us, to "be af-"flicted, and mourn, and weep," as well as on the haughty and presumptuous, "to humble themselves under the mighty "hand of God, that he may exalt them in due time;" for this is the only road to everlasting honour and felicity; nor will the Lord refuse to comfort one godly mourner for sin, or to exalt one who abases himself before him. But while ministers and Christians, in their several places, protest against ungodliness, impenitence, pride, unbelief, and all iniquity, they should carefully avoid calumniating, reviling, and judging others, or deciding either on their state or conduct, except when their duty to them, or to others, renders it unavoidable. Alas! there are too many professed Christians, who seem openly to quit the place of the Lord's servants and doers of his commandments, to set up for judges, and to prescribe to their fellow-servants, or decide on their eternal state. Such men speak evil of the divine law and defame it, while they vent their own passions under the colour of zeal for the truths of the Gospel. But let us leave them, and all others, to their own Master, remembering that "there is one Lawgiver, "who is able to save and to destroy;" and let us be careful to judge ourselves, that we may not be condemned by him.—Let us also watch against the worldly spirit and conduct so common among professors of the Gospel, who scheme, purpose, and speak, as if they were to live here for ever, as if this were their rest and portion, and as if God were not in all their thoughts. Let us remember, that our life is but "a vapour, that continueth a little while and then "passeth away," just when and as the Lord pleaseth, that the world is full of vexation and disappointment, and that we have nothing to do on earth, but to secure the salvation of our souls, to glorify God, and to serve our generation. Then we shall cordially say, "If the Lord will, we shall "live, and do this or that," and keep at a distance from the self-conceited, and foolish boastings of ungodly men. Let us learn also to reduce all our knowledge to practice, remembering, that in all things, to him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin, heinous and aggravated sin.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—6. The apostle here evidently meant a direct address to the unbelieving Jews, among whom were, in general, the rich and great men of the nation. He wrote but a short time before the destruction of Jerusalem, and those desolations which Christ had predicted, and his disciples expected; and as the more prosperous of his countrymen rejected the Gospel from regard to their worldly interests, and were become most atrociously wicked, he foresaw the speedy termination of all their enjoyments, and the most grievous temporal calamities about to overwhelm them, as well as the event of their crimes in future misery, if they continued unbelieving and impenitent. He, therefore, called on them to come and attend to his words, and to consider the danger of their condition, that they might weep and howl with most doleful lamentations, on account of the complicated miseries that were even then coming upon them. As to their treasures, they would not at all profit them in the day of the Lord's vengeance. (Notes, Is. ii. 20. Zeph. i. 18. Matt. vi. 19, 20.) Their corn, or other perishable goods, which they had avariciously hoarded, were corrupted, or they would be of no more use to them, than if they were entirely decayed. Their costly garments, which they kept in splendid wardrobes, were consuming by moths, and there was such a curse upon them, that they would soon be of no value. Nay, even their gold and silver, which should have been brightened by circulation, were laid by till they were tarnished, as with rust, and the very appearance of their money would bear witness against their covetousness; whilst, in consequence of heaping it up, their enemies would have the richer plunder; the anguish of having it torn from them would be a torment to their minds, and their guilty consciences would upbraid them with the crimes by which they became rich, and the bad use which they had made of their abundance; so that they would be tortured, as if the rust of their metals were converted into a caustic to burn their flesh like fire. Indeed, with much wickedness and great labour, they had amassed treasures for the last days of their city and nation, when God was about to execute tremendous vengeance upon them for their personal and public iniquities, and when riches would no more profit them than in the hour of death and at the day of judgment, which was in fact to "treasure up wrath against the day of wrath." For, behold, the hire of their poor labourers, who had reaped their harvest, and toiled to increase their wealth, had been fraudulently withholden, and it cried for vengeance from heaven upon them; (Marg. Ref.) So that the bitter and loud complaints of the oppressed, against their cruel tyrants, were heard by "the LORD of Sabaoth," or of armies, who was about to send the Roman armies to execute his judgments on them for their iniquity. They had indeed lived for a time luxuriously and delicately, and had rioted in sensuality, as cattle in a rich pasture; and the pride and carnality of their hearts had been nourished by prosperity and self-indulgence, as in a day of slaughter when many sacrifices were offered and a great feast was made; or rather, as the ox is fattened for the day of slaughter, and even enjoys his luxuriant pasture securely to that very time. But, above all their other crimes, the Jews had iniquitously condemned and crucified, with the suffrage, as it were, of the whole nation, that "Just One" who had come among them, even Jesus Christ the righteous; they still perpetuated that enormous crime, by persecuting his meek and harmless followers: hitherto he had not resisted them, and they had no pretence for their outrageous enmity and cruelty to him and his disciples. But he was about to come and execute most terrible vengeance upon them.

V. 7—11. After the preceding awful warning and sharp reproof of the wealthy Jews, who were the principal opposers of the Gospel, and peculiarly exposed to the approaching judgments of God, the apostle addressed himself to his poor, afflicted, and persecuted fellow-Christians, whom he exhorted to bear their sufferings with resignation and constant perseverance, till the coming of the Lord. He primarily meant the providential coming of the Lord Jesus, to deliver them from the persecution of the Jewish rulers, and to execute vengeance upon that devoted nation; yet he might intend to lead their thoughts forward to the hour of death, and the coming of Christ to judgment. (Notes, Matt. xxiv. xxv.) They might observe, that the husbandman, when he has tilled his ground and sown the seed with great labour and expense, does not reap the harvest immediately, but waits patiently for some months, amidst the fluctuations of the weather, and continually renewing his labour, as occasion requires, till the Lord, on whom the increase entirely depends, is pleased to send the former and the latter rain; (Marg. Ref.) and at length the crop ripens, and his toil and waiting are amply compensated by the harvest. Thus ought they to wait, with patient hope and persevering diligence, not yielding to weariness or desponding fears, but stablishing their hearts by faith in the promises of God, against all temptations to draw back or to turn aside; for the time of their waiting would not be long, as in every sense the coming of the Lord approached, and a most glorious and precious harvest would soon amply repay all their losses, hardships, and sufferings. They ought not, therefore, to grudge one another the transient advantages which they possessed, or to give way to envy, discontent, repinings, or resentment, lest the coming of the Lord should be to their condemnation instead of their redemption. For they must carefully observe, that the Judge, even then, as it were, stood before the door, and was about to enter. Very soon would he decide between his true people and mere professors of Christianity, as well as execute vengeance on their enemies; and they ought to prepare for his coming, and leave him to plead their cause, without attempting to avenge themselves, or groaning under injuries and distresses, or murmuring for want of such transient benefits, as all temporal possessions must be. Instead therefore of copying the fierce passions of their unbelieving countrymen, who were ready to rage under their calamities like a wild bull in a net, they ought to study and imitate the example of the ancient prophets, by whom the Lord had sent his word to their nation, and who had been abused, reviled, and even put to death, for their faithfulness; yet they had persevered with calm confidence in God, and submission to his will, and with a meek and compassionate fortitude among their enemies. They ought also to remember, that the apostles of Christ, and other faithful ministers of the New Testament, and all experienced Christians, counted those happy, who patiently endured affliction and persecution, not such as were exempted from suffering, or turned aside to avoid it. (Note, i. 12.) They had often heard of the patience of Job, under the most complicated and aggravated distresses that could be imagined; and how he steadfastly adhered to God, and determined to hope in him in his utmost extremity, notwithstanding the excessive confusion into which his temptations had thrown his mind; and they perceived that the end of his afflictions, and the temporal and spiritual advantages which he derived from them, sufficiently demonstrated that the Lord was most tenderly compassionate and propense to mercy, even when he most heavily afflicted, or sharply tried, his believing servants. This had not appeared during Job's calamities, but it was manifest in the event of them; and they also would find the same in the event of their trials, provided they endured them patiently, and persevered in faith and obedience. (Notes, Heb. xii. 5—12.)

V. 12. Above all things, the apostle called on those whom he addressed to beware, lest their trials and provocations should lead them to swear in a passionate, rash, or profane manner, in their own justification, and to escape persecution, or by any customary oath, according to the general custom of the Jews, but in direct opposition to the express command of Christ. On the contrary, in their ordinary conversation, and at all times, when a solemn appeal to God, as an act of religious worship, was not proper, they ought simply to affirm or deny, and to establish their assertion or engagement by a serious repetition of it, when necessary. At the same time, their veracity and punctuality ought to be so approved, that every one might be ready to credit, and confide in them without hesitation, or requiring the security of an oath; otherwise they would fall under condemnation for swearing falsely, without necessity, or without due reverence of God, or of an oath.—The Jews are recorded to have been remarkably guilty of common swearing at this time, which might induce the apostle to enter this solemn protest against it. (Notes, Matt, v. 33—37. xxiii. 16—22.)

V. 13. Whilst worldly men, under their afflictions, either yielded to bitter complaints and desponding murmurs, or sought relief in sensual indulgence, or tried to extricate themselves by sinful means, Christians should be excited by their sorrows to pray more frequently, copiously, and earnestly, that they might receive from God comfort, deliverance, and a sanctified use of their afflictions. On the other hand, when any of them prospered, or was cheerful in spirit, they ought to express their joy in the voice of praise and thanksgiving, and by singing the psalms which inspired men had written for that use, or such songs of praise as they or other Christians had composed for similar purposes, instead of running into the excesses of carnal rejoicing, or singing those frivolous, polluting, or profane songs and odes, which were used by ungodly men, when they attempted to be merry.

V. 14, 15. Sick persons, also, should send for the elders of the church, many of whom were at that time endued with miraculous powers, that they might pray for their forgiveness and recovery, anointing them with oil in the name of the Lord Jesus, as expecting a cure from his power and love. And when this was done, in that faith by which miracles were wrought, the prayer offered in behalf of the sick person would be the means of saving his life, and the sins committed by him, for which the chastening was sent, would be pardoned. (Notes, Mark vi. 13. xvi. 17, 18.)—As miraculous cures are not now expected, so the symbolical action of anointing with oil cannot properly be retained. It need scarcely be observed, that the extreme unction, used by the church of Rome, totally differs from the anointing recommended by St. James; for it is never administered till the sick person is supposed to be at the point of death, and no hope is entertained of his recovery; so that a spiritual benefit alone can be proposed by such a ceremony, which indeed serves only as an opiate, to quiet and stupify the consciences both of the dying and of the living.—It cannot be supposed that these miraculous cures could be performed at all times; but there seems to have been some impression on the mind of the person who wrought the miracle, and a peculiar exercise of faith in Christ for that purpose. But it might be proper for Christians always, when they were sick, to send for their pastors, to counsel and pray for them; though the visiting of the sick, by ministers exclusively, is not so particularly spoken of in Scripture, as might have been expected. When indeed this charitable service is performed with prudence, tenderness, and faithfulness, it may be very useful, especially to believers, and to those around them; but the indiscriminate visiting, praying with, and giving the Lord's supper to, sick and dying persons, without particular and appropriate instructions and exhortation, as it is too commonly managed, is doubtless of extremely bad tendency, and is a relict of popish superstition and formality; for it not only gives a false quiet to many of those who have then first begun to think about God and their souls, but it encourages others to procrastinate, under a deluding imagination, that a confession, a prayer, a ministerial absolution, and the sacrament, will set all right at last, without any previous diligence in the duties of a godly life.—If, however, nothing but a miraculous cure was sought, there could be no sufficient reason why the elders of the church, rather than others, who were endued with miraculous gifts, should be sent for.—The plural number is used, and where it could be obtained, the presence of more than one minister would be desirable; but it cannot be supposed that this was indispensably necessary. That any difficulty should be found about the persons intended by "the elders of the church," would have been inconceivable to the author, had he never read any thing on the subject except the New Testament. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16—18. The apostle next exhorted Christians to confess their faults to one another: this may mean, either mutual acknowledgment of the faults into which they had fallen, in their conduct towards one another, which would tend greatly to peace and brotherly love, if it were practised; or a communication reciprocally of their experiences, and a confession of those things which burdened their consciences: which, when prudently managed, would make way for them to counsel, encourage, and exhort one another, and be a direction to their prayers for each other, and thus tend to their inward peace, and the healing of their souls, as well as to the removal of the chastisements which they had incurred. But this does not at all resemble the practice, which the church of Rome hath absurdly grounded upon it, of the laity being required to confess all their secret sins to the priests, in order to their being pardoned and absolved. Thus that order of men (who are in themselves no less ambitious, interested, and prone to vice, than other orders in society,) is put in possession of the secrets of families, nay, of councils and princes, of which they have made abundant use, to their own aggrandizement, and enslaving the laity, and for many other mischievous purposes. Thus, also, they have discovered the weak and vulnerable side of almost every individual, which hath opened the way to their attempting and committing crimes of every kind. But the confession of sins, spoken of by the apostle, is no more that of a layman to a priest, than that of a priest to a layman: it is reciprocal between Christians one among another, and voluntary, that it may be regulated according to prudence and propriety, for the benefit of mutual exhortations and prayers. To encourage his brethren to this beneficial practice, the apostle showed them the value and efficacy of prayer. When a righteous person, a true believer justified in Christ, and, by his grace, walking before God in holy obedience, presented an effectual fervent prayer, (one that was wrought in his heart by the energy of the Holy Spirit, exciting holy affections and believing expectations, and so leading him to be fervent and earnest in pleading the promises of God at his mercy-seat, in behalf of himself or others,) it "availed much" in obtaining the blessings thus sought, being the means through which God was pleased to work his own gracious purposes, as really as any other which he employs for that end. Elias, or Elijah, for instance, was a man of the same sinful nature with others, and he was no more exempt from human passions and infirmities, when he executed his ministry, than the apostle and his brethren were; yet he prayed, (under the influence of the prophetical Spirit, out of zeal for the glory of God, and to prevent the total apostacy and idolatry of Israel,) that it might not rain on the land, and in answer to his prayer there was no rain for three years and a half; and at length the calamity was terminated in answer to his prayers for rain, after he had slain the priests of Baal. (Notes, 1 Kings xvii. xviii.) This example seems rather to favour the opinion of those, who suppose the apostle to refer to "the prayer of faith," as it respected miraculous interpositions; but the efficacy of that prayer, which is in all ages presented under the teaching and influences of the Holy Spirit, is, throughout the scripture, so fully declared, that the exclusive interpretation is inadmissible.

V. 19, 20. Among other works of love, which believers ought to attempt by faith and prayer, the recovery of such nominal Christians as had run into dangerous heresies, or fallen into sin, was peculiarly to be attended to, especially as many evils of this kind had taken place among them. If any one therefore had turned aside from the truth, and had got into some destructive path, and one of his brethren had been instrumental to his conversion, so that he was at length become a true Christian, he should consider himself as under far greater obligations to the person who thus restored him, than if he had wrought a miracle to heal his sickness, and preserve his life. And the man, who had been employed in this good work, ought to deem it a far more desirable service, than if he had been enabled to work miracles for the recovery of the sick; seeing he had been employed by the Lord in saving an immortal soul from eternal destruction, and of bringing a perishing transgressor to Christ, that his atoning blood might cover the multitude of his sins, never more to appear in judgment against him, or to prevent his admission into eternal happiness. Neither this, nor any other good work, could cover the multitude of the man's sins who performed it, by inducing God to pardon him for the sake of it: for the most successful minister needs self-denying diligence, lest, "after having preached to others, he himself should be a cast-away;" and the whole plan of the Gospel runs counter to such an idea. 'Surely it cannot be the apostle's intention to tell us, that the turning of a sinner from the error of his way will conceal, from the eye of God's justice, a multitude of sins committed by the person who does this charitable action, if he continueth in them. Such a person needs himself to be turned "from the error of his way," in order that his own soul may be saved from death.' (Macknight.) In no sense, or way, can it be said, that our good works, of whatever kind, "cover the multitude of our sins," or any of our sins, without either implying, that they purchase for us an indulgence or dispensation to continue in sin, or that they are efficacious in atoning for sin; either alone, or along with the blood of Christ. The words are quoted from the Proverbs; the context there evidently excludes this interpretation and the use afterwards made of them by St. Peter, by no means favours it. (Notes, Prov. x. 12. 1 Pet. iv. 8.) 'He shall save a soul from eternal death; and shall be the means that the many sins of that convert shall, through his true repentance, be forgiven, and not imputed to him.' (Bp. Hall.) The zeal and diligence thus shown might indeed be an evidence of grace, and conduce to a man's enjoying the comfort of the pardoning love of Christ, notwithstanding his manifold defects; yet this falls vastly short of the energy of the apostle's words, and seems not at all to have been in his thoughts; so that many learned men have laboured in vain to put this construction upon them. As there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, zealous Christians cannot want any inducement of this kind, to animate them in attempting so blessed a service, when they have any prospect of success: nor can they need any of their own works to cover the multitude of their sins, who know the all-sufficiency of the Saviour's atoning blood. But the apostle meant to show his brethren that this was a far more important usefulness, than even healing the sick by miracle could be, though nature would prompt them most to covet or value miraculous powers, and they might be led to overlook or neglect a much more charitable work.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The rich, luxurious, and haughty, yea, all, who now scornfully refuse to mourn for their sins, will soon be forced to weep and howl under the miseries which are coming upon them. All their idolized treasures will soon corrupt and perish, except as they will rise up in judgment against them, and torment them as fire, by increasing their condemnation. The doom of unfaithful stewards will then be very dreadful: but the cruel injustice and oppression, with which many treat their dependents and labourers, by whose toil and ingenuity they are enriched, and whom they leave to penury and distress, will cry for most tremendous vengeance in the ears of "the LORD of hosts." What then will it avail them, that they have "lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton," and cherished their carnal hearts, as the fatted ox for the slaughter? They have only heaped up perishing treasure, to leave it behind them, or "fared sumptuously every day," as a prelude to lifting up their eyes in hell, being in torments. Such warnings, however, when impartially given, will expose the servants of Christ to their contemptuous indignation, and hence prosperous sinners have often been excited to condemn and murder the righteous and unresisting disciples, as the Jews did the Lord of glory himself. But let the poor and afflicted Christian patiently wait for the coming of his Lord, as the husbandman waits for the precious fruit of the earth: for the good seed, which he now sows in pain, and waters with tears, will spring up, and soon ripen to a harvest of eternal joy. Let us then patiently continue in well-doing, having our hearts established with grace, and realizing expectations of the great day of retribution. It does not become Christians to grudge one against another, or to envy, repine, despond, or dispute: rather let us prepare to meet our Judge, who "standeth at the door," that we may not be condemned at his coming: for all our eternal interests are secure, if we have trusted them in his hand: and all else is a mere vanity, that will soon be done with for ever. May we then follow prophets and apostles, as they followed Christ, in patiently suffering affliction and meekly bearing injuries: for they and they only are and will be happy, who endure amidst tribulations even unto the end. The event will clear up the darkness of all the Lord's dealings with his people: and, whatever they or others have thought during the continuance of their trials, in the end it will appear as evident in the case of every one of them, as it did in that of Job, nay, far more illustriously evident, that "the Lord is pitiful and of tender mercy," and that they are happy, who patiently trust in him and keep his commandments.

V. 12—20.

It is peculiarly important to the interests of genuine piety, that all who profess the Gospel should reverence the name of God, and keep at a distance from swearing, and the profane language which abounds in the world, and from that insincerity which is intimately connected with it, that their yea may be yea, and their nay, nay. Indeed, such as neglect these things have little reason to conclude that they shall escape condemnation when the Judge appeareth. The voice of prayer should always accompany that of our lamentations, when we are afflicted; and our joy should be expressed in the language of praise and thanksgiving. We should receive pain and sickness as the chastisement of the Lord, and seek relief from him, whatever instruments or means we employ for that purpose. The counsels and prayers of the ministers and disciples of Christ are peculiarly desirable on such occasions: and we ought more earnestly to seek the pardon of our sins, and the healing of our souls, than the removal of our bodily sufferings. Christians may profitably confer together con-concerning their conflicts, sins, and temptations, that they may encourage, warn, counsel, exhort, and properly pray for, each other: and they should never be backward to confess those offences that they have committed against their brethren, or to forgive such as have been done against them. We ought greatly to desire, and highly to value, the prayers of our fellow-Christians, and to abound in supplications for them, "as the effectual fervent prayer of "a righteous man availeth much." Nor ought we to be discouraged from this duty by the consciousness of our weakness, unworthiness, or sinful passions, as they, who of old received such signal answers to their prayers, were men of like passions with us: and we have as good reason to expect that God will answer our humble believing requests, for such things as he hath promised, and as are really for our good and for his glory, as Jacob, Moses, Elijah, Hezekiah, or Daniel had, or any other person who wrestled with him and prevailed. In the use of all proper means, every one of us should seek the spiritual good of our children, relatives, friends, enemies, and all around us, and the conversion of sinners, as well as the recovery of such as have wandered from the way of truth and holiness; considering, that if in one instance only, during the course of our whole lives, and after ten thousand disappointments, we are made successful instruments in saving a soul from death, and covering a multitude of sins, the event is of so vast importance, as abundantly to repay all our toil, anxiety, and disappointment, being far greater than the preservation of the lives of multitudes, or promoting the temporal prosperity of whole nations. (Note, Luke xv. 8—10.) Let us then, in our several stations, keep these things in mind, and spare no pains in so charitable a service; and the event will prove that "our "labour was not in vain in the Lord."

THE

PETER.

We have had repeated opportunities of considering the character and apostleship of Peter, who wrote this epistle and that which follows, as far as are made known by the holy scriptures. Much additional information concerning him, however, has been conveyed down by tradition, and by ecclesiastical history: but a large proportion of this is absolutely incompatible with the Acts of the apostles, and many things in St. Paul's epistles; much more is dubious; and the pretensions of the church and bishop of Rome, as grounded on these records and traditions, are so absurd and extravagant, as to deserve little notice, or to require any further refutation. It is not absolutely certain that Peter ever was at Rome; though it is highly probable that he went thither, towards the close of his life; and that he was there put to death by crucifixion, at, or near the same time, when Paul as a Roman citizen was beheaded, during Nero's persecution. He wrote this epistle, probably some time before, to the Christians in the different provinces of Asia Minor. Many indeed have endeavoured to prove that, as the apostle of the circumcision, he addressed the Jewish converts only; but Peter was distinguished, not only as the chief preacher to the Jews on the day of Pentecost, but also as the first preacher to the Gentiles. And as Paul, the apostle of the uncircumcision, wrote to the Hebrews, and in all his epistles addressed the Jewish as well as the Gentile converts; we may well suppose, that St. Peter addressed the Gentile as well as the Jewish converts: though perhaps with a peculiar reference to the case of the latter. Indeed, the contrary opinion is founded on some passages in the epistle, which are capable of another, and far more natural, interpretation; but the apostle's language in other places cannot at all consist with it. It also seems evident, that he wrote to the very churches, which had been founded by St. Paul, to corroborate his testimony, and to confute those who pretended that his doctrine differed from that of the other apostles; and he sent the epistle by Silvanus, St. Paul's faithful and constant coadjutor. The epistle is dated from Babylon, in the remains or vicinity of which city, it is probable a Christian church had been planted, perhaps consisting principally of the descendants of the Jews, who remained in those regions after the Babylonish captivity. For no satisfactory reason can be assigned, for supposing, as many have done, in ancient and modern times, that Babylon signifies Rome. Language of this kind suited the nature of St. John's Revelation; but was wholly unsuitable to the date of the letter. We here find the same great doctrines, with which St. Paul's epistles are replete, applied to the same practical purposes. And it is peculiarly remarkable for the sweetness, gentleness, and humble love, with which it is written; which indeed forms a striking contrast to the domineering pride and severity, that characterize the pretended successors of this sacred writer. Various opinions have been entertained of the time when the epistle was written; but, as no certainty seems attainable, it is dated according to the author's opinion on the subject, in which, however, he is by no means confident.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. The churches, here addressed, were situated in Asia Minor, (as distinguished from the continent of Asia,) and Asia, (as mentioned separately,) was the proconsular district, of which Ephesus was the capital city; so that they were chiefly the churches which had been planted by St. Paul, and the evangelists that accompanied or helped him. As the apostle called the persons to whom he wrote "strangers," some have laboured to prove that they were proselytes of the gate, who had embraced the Gospel, as Cornelius and his friends are supposed to have been before their conversion. Others confine it to the Jewish converts, who, living at a distance from the promised land, among the Gentiles were thus called. But as Christians are "strangers and pilgrims upon earth," and as the sojourning of the patriarchs, or of the Jews, in foreign nations, was a type or emblem of this pilgrimage, (ii. 11.) it is more natural to understand it of believers in general, who were pilgrims or strangers in every city or country where they lived, and who were scattered through the nations, to be as "lights in the world, and as the salt of the earth." These the apostle addressed as "Elect," or chosen in Christ, "according to the foreknowledge of God." (Notes, Rom. viii. 28—31. Eph. i. 1—12. 2 Thes. ii. 13, 14.) This eternal purpose and special love of God the Father had been rendered effectual, "through sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience," begun in regeneration, and carried on in the continued mortification of their whole sinful nature, and the progressive renewal of their souls to the holy image of God, thus preparing them for evangelical obedience; and this was accompanied with "the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus," or the continual application of the virtue of his atonement to their consciences, by divine faith, for the removal of their guilt, and the rendering of their persons and services accepted with God; as the blood of the legal sacrifices was applied by sprinkling it around the altar, and before the mercy-seat, or as the blood of the sacrifices was sprinkled on the people, when the covenant was ratified with Israel at mount Sinai. (Marg. Ref.) To these persons the apostle wished, and prayed, "that grace and peace might be multiplied," according to the salutation generally used by St. Paul. (Note, Rom. i. 7.) Thus they were taught, at the opening of the epistle, to ascribe their salvation to the electing love of the Father, the redemption of the Son, and the sanctification of the Holy Spirit, and so to give glory to one God in three persons, into whose name they had been baptized. Elect, &c. 'Those who in their outward profession, and in the due judgment of charity, are justly reputed for the elect of God, according to the eternal decree and good purpose of God the Father.' (Bp. Hall.) Sprinkling, &c. 'Men are not easily convinced of the deep stain of sin, and that no other laver can fetch it out but the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ. Some, that have moral resolutions of amendment, dislike at least gross sins, and purpose to avoid them, and it is to them cleanness enough to reform in these things; but they consider not what becomes of the guiltiness that they have contracted already, or how that shall be purged. Be not deceived in this; it is not a transient sigh, or a light word, or a wish of, God forgive me; no, nor the highest current of repentance, nor that which is the truest evidence of repentance, amendment; it is none of these that purifies in the sight of God, and expiates wrath. They are all imperfect, and, stained themselves, cannot stand and answer for themselves, much less be of value to counterpoise the former guilt of sin. The very tears of the purest repentance, unless they be sprinkled with this blood, are impure; all our washings, without this, are but the washings of a blackamoor, it is labour in vain.' (Arbp. Leighton.)

V. 3—5. (Note, Eph. i. 3.) St. Peter, as well as his beloved brother Paul, opened his subject, by calling on his fellow Christians to join with him in blessing God for his distinguishing mercy and grace, under the character of "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." "Of his abundant mercy," or the greatness of his compassionate love to the guilty, the polluted, and the wretched, even such as were "dead in sin and children of wrath, he had regenerated them," (Notes, John iii. 1—8. Eph. ii. 1—10.) and from this gracious change, wrought in them by his divine power, their repentance, faith, and obedience, had originated. Thus, as the children of God, they had been taught to entertain "a lively," or living "hope." They were no longer left to be influenced principally by any of the hopes which worldly men indulge, of obtaining satisfaction in temporal things; or to the presumptuous and inefficacious hope of mercy and salvation, by which formalists and hypocrites are deceived: but they were made partakers of a well-grounded hope of salvation, which was an active living principle in their souls of patient and cheerful obedience. This regeneration, and the hope resulting from it, were consequences arising from "the resurrection of Christ." His vicarious sacrifice having been accepted, he had been raised from the dead, to prove that he was the Son of God, and that he had done his work on earth, and in order to the performance of his mediatory office in heaven; that by communicating, through his intercession, the Holy Spirit, to give efficacy to the preaching of the Gospel, sinners might be raised from the death of sin, by a continuation, as it were, of that power which restored to life the dead body of Christ. (Notes, Eph. i. 19, 20.) Thus they had obtained a title to an inheritance, which was of a very different nature from those which worldly men sought for, as well as a warranted hope of it, and a meetness for it. For earthly inheritances are corruptible in themselves, and in respect of their possessors; defiled, in respect of the means by which they are obtained, the use which is generally made of them, and the persons who possess them; and fading, as to the very trivial comfort, honour, or distinction, which they confer. But the inheritance to which the regenerate were entitled, and for which they hoped, is incorruptible in itself, and they will be rendered incorruptible and immortal to enjoy it; it is undefiled, in respect of its pleasures, and the character of all those who partake of them; and unfading, as to its satisfaction, glory, and splendour, which will be unalloyed, unsullied, permanent, uninterrupted, always increasing, and eternal. This inheritance was "reserved in heaven," out of the reach of all enemies and changes, in the place of perfect holiness and felicity, "for them," even for all the elect, or the regenerate, who "were kept," as in a strongly fortified and garrisoned castle, by "the power of God," engaged by covenant to fulfil his irrevocable promises, and the purposes of his everlasting love. So that, having entered, through Christ the Door, into this strong tower, by faith, and still exercising faith on the promises of God, and on his perfections as engaged to perform them, and this faith being preserved from failing, through the continual intercession of Christ, and grace bestowed by him, they were sure of being preserved in all dangers, and protected against all enemies, internal and external, unto complete salvation. This was in all respects prepared and ready for them, though the appointed season of it was not yet arrived; so that it still remained, as it were, veiled: but it would be revealed, manifested, and publicly conferred on them, at the last time, even at Christ's coming to raise the dead, to judge the world, and to destroy all ungodly men. A lively hope, 'living in death itself. The world dares say no 'more for its device, than dum spiro, spero: (while I 'breathe, I hope;) but the children of God can add, dum 'expiro, spero; (when I expire, I hope.) It is a fearful 'thing when a man and his hopes expire together.' (Arbp. Leighton.)

V. 6, 7. In the earnests and hopes of eternal salvation, true Christians greatly rejoice, or, at least, were required to do so. This was the genuine effect of their faith, in proportion to its strength; though at the present, for a transient season, they might be, and often were, "in heaviness," and even dejected, through a variety of afflictions and trials in their outward circumstances, through the remaining sinfulness of their hearts, and the harassing assaults of Satan: (Notes, James i. 1—3. 12—15.) These troubles and conflicts interrupted their rejoicings by short intervals; but they were needful, in order to their best good and for the glory of God: otherwise he would no more have appointed such trials to them, than a kind and wise father would needlessly afflict his beloved child, or a physician would prescribe nauseous medicines, without occasion, to his dearest friend. The intent of all these troubles was, to make a proper trial of their faith, that it might be proved to be genuine. They professed to believe in Christ, and to love him; and it was proper that the sincerity of their profession should be ascertained, that they might be distinguished from hypocrites. This was effected by persecutions, afflictions, and temptations, as gold is distinguished from base metal, (as well as purified,) by being cast into the furnace. But the faith of Christians was immensely more precious than gold, which is of a perishing nature, and can only purchase perishing things; whereas faith interested the soul in the unchangeable promises of God, and entitled it to eternal felicity. It was therefore proper that this faith should be tried in the fire of tribulation, by which the dead faith of hypocrites was generally consumed, as they commonly renounced Christ to escape the cross, and secure worldly advantages: but the living faith of the regenerate was thus manifested to be genuine, by their steadfastly cleaving to Christ and his will, at any price, their faith indeed being increased and purified by the trial. They would also have the comfort of it, and God the glory, at present; and it would be "found to praise, and honour, and glory," in the presence of the whole creation, when Christ shall appear to judge the world; when no degree of applause, or weight of glory, could excite pride, as they would do whilst sin remained in their hearts. To this joyful event all true believers looked forward with serious preparation.

V. 8, 9. The Christians, to whom St. Peter wrote, had, in general, never seen Christ during his humiliation, and they were not at present admitted to see him in his glory: yet they loved his Person, his divine perfections, his human excellencies, and his mediatorial suitableness; they were earnestly desirous of his favour and salvation; they were thankful for his unspeakable love, and the benefits conferred on them; they rejoiced in his exaltation, and were zealous for his glory; and this led them to cleave to him and obey him; to love his people, ordinances, truths, and commandments; and to give up whatever intervened between him and their souls, or was his rival in their affections. This love of an unseen Saviour sprang from faith in him; they believed the testimony of God by his apostles concerning him and his glorious excellencies; and concerning what he had done and suffered for sinners, and his power, grace, and truth. In this faith they had intrusted their souls into his hands, and depended on him to cleanse and save them. From this faith, "working by "love," they derived a joy, that was in its nature so excellent, holy, substantial, and satisfactory, that it could not be expressed by words, as it was "full of glory," or glorified; of the same nature and effects with the glory and felicity of heaven: and they shared this joy, in proportion to the degree of their living faith and obedient love; whilst they inwardly delighted in the salvation which was wrought by him, and in their enrapturing discoveries of the glory of God, harmoniously uniting with the everlasting felicity of all believers in Christ; and whilst they possessed the earnests of this felicity, in the graces and consolations of the Holy Spirit, and in communion with the Father and his beloved Son. This faith, love, and joy, in respect of an unseen Saviour, constituted the peculiar experience, and formed the distinguishing character, of real Christians, who thus were assured that they should receive that salvation of their souls, which was the end proposed by them when they believed; and they were continually receiving that salvation, in the earnests, comforts, and sanctification of it, amidst their trials, and proportioned to the degree of their faith and grace. (John xx. 29.)

V. 10—12. The salvation, to which men were called by the preaching of the Gospel, had been predicted by the prophets from the beginning; so that their writings were peculiarly worthy of the attentive consideration of Christians. These ancient servants of God had themselves, most earnestly and diligently, investigated the meaning of their own predictions; not being able fully to understand what that grace was, which was intended for those who should live after the coming of the Messiah. They therefore searched, as miners do for the precious metals, that they might discover when, and in what manner of time, those things would occur, which the Spirit of Christ, who dwelt in them, did intend by the predictions which he suggested to them, for they did not know the full import of their own words, while they testified, so long before, that the Messiah would pass through a variety of complicated sufferings, even unto death; and that he would afterwards be glorified, in his personal exaltation, and in the extent, peace, and duration of his mediatorial kingdom, the happiness of his subjects, and the destruction of his enemies. (Notes, &c. Ps. xxii. lxix. Is. liii. Dan. ix. 24—27.) The Holy Spirit is here spoken of as a distinct Person, and as the Spirit of Christ, not only in that he spake of him, but as sent forth by him long before his incarnation.—The same order was evidently observed, both in the express prophecies of Christ, and in all the typical persons, events, and institutions, that related to him; his sufferings were uniformly represented as introducing his glory, and the glories of his kingdom. The prophets had been immediately instructed, that they should not live to witness the accomplishment of their own predictions; and that neither they nor their contemporaries would derive the principal benefit of their ministry, or enjoy the privileges announced by them; but that they were labouring for the benefit of future generations, whilst they declared those great events, which had at length taken place, and had been reported to the Jews and Gentiles by the apostles of Christ, who had preached the Gospel to them; whose ministry was attested by the miraculous operations of the Holy Spirit, and rendered successful by his efficacious influences; and who was sent down from heaven to bear testimony to the performance of those prophecies, which he had of old inspired. Indeed, these mysteries of redemption contained such displays of the wisdom, power, truth, justice, holiness, and mercy of God, that the angels desired, with great earnestness and persevering attention, to bow down to look into them, and to join in adoration of the divine Redeemer, like the cherubim, who were represented as bowing down to look upon the ark of the covenant. (Marg. Ref.) They, as it were, left the glories of heaven, to study the divine perfections, and to learn new songs of adoring praise, in the stable at Bethlehem, in Gethsemane, on mount Calvary, and from the Church, which “God manifested in the flesh,” had “purchased with his own blood.” (Notes, Eph. iii. 10. 1 Tim. iii. 16.)—The Spirit of Christ. (11.) ‘That is, say the Socinians, the Spirit in them, which spake of Christ, &c. But in this sense he might as well have been styled the Spirit of Antichrist, or of the false prophets, because he also spake of them. All the ancients agree in the other sense, that Christ spake by his Spirit in the prophets, they being inspired with his grace, and taught by his Spirit; their words sprang from the divine Word moving them, and by him they prophesied. He spake in Isaiah, in Elias, and in the mouth of the prophets. So the fathers. Shall holy prophets be so desirous to know the time when these things should happen, and holy angels to look into these glorious revelations; and shall we, to whom, and for whose happiness, this Gospel was revealed, neglect, not only to obtain, but even to know, this great salvation?’ (Whitby.)

V. 13—16. As the salvation of Christ had attracted the attention of prophets from the beginning, as it was preached by apostles with the holy Spirit sent down from heaven, and as angels desired to look down unto it, so it behooved those who were so highly favoured to avail themselves of their advantages, and to make suitable returns, with all diligence and alacrity. They ought therefore “to gird up the loins of their minds,” (Notes, Luke xii. 35. Eph. vi. 14;) by laying aside all carnal prejudices and superfluous cares, with such occupations, desires, and pursuits, as might prevent their clearly understanding, cordially choosing, and cheerfully obeying, the word of the Gospel, and using all means of removing impediments, of invigorating holy affections, and of animating themselves and each other, in diligently serving and patiently suffering for Christ. (Note, Heb. xii. 1—3.) They are also especially required to be “sober,” serious, considerate, moderate, and temperate in all things, vigilant, and steadfast in the faith; “hoping perfectly,” or, “to the end,” that, notwithstanding all inward conflicts and outward discouragements, the Lord would fulfil his promises, and bring them to his eternal glory; entirely relying on his omnipotence, omniscience, and infinite perfections, to protect, uphold, new-create, and save them, in all cases and against all enemies. Thus they should hold fast the blessed hope of that grace, or free unmerited favour, which will be brought to all true Christians, and be publicly conferred on them, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed, to judge the world and destroy the wicked, (Notes, 2 Thes. i. 7—10.) They had indeed been children of disobedience and of wrath, but, being born of God, they had become “children of obedience,” and disposed to obey their heavenly Father. This was their profession and character: and, in consistency with it, they must not order their conduct and discourse, or form their plans, in any respect, according to the maxims of the world, or the lusts which they had obeyed and indulged, when they were ignorant of God and true religion, as both Jews and Gentiles had done, while unregenerate, being destitute of any humbling or spiritual knowledge of divine things. But as this blessed change had taken place in them, by the efficacious calling of God, who, being perfectly holy in himself, had purposed to make them happy in his holy service and favour, so they ought now to be holy in every part of their temper, conduct, and conversation, in imitation of his holiness, and in conformity to it. This had been required of Israel under the law; (Notes, Lev. xi. 44. xix. 2;) and without this, they could not comfortably walk with God, acceptably worship him at present, or enjoy heaven at last.

V. 17—21. Seeing they, to whom the apostle wrote, now professed themselves the worshippers of God, and called on him as the Father of the Lord Jesus, and their Father in him: they ought to remember, that "without "respect of persons, he judged according to every man's "work." (Notes, Acts x. 34, 35. Rom. ii. 11.) They should not therefore suppose, that any name or form would avail them; or that he would approve of any man, because he had been a Jew, or was now called a Christian; for he would certainly judge of every man's profession and character by his works, appoint hypocrites their portion with unbelievers, and finally condemn every worker of iniquity. (Notes, James ii. 14—26.) Nay, if believers did any evil thing, God would not connive at it because of their relation to him; but he would surely visit them with sharp rebukes and corrections, and refuse them his consolations, till they had deeply repented of it. It therefore behooved them to pass the whole time of their pilgrimage in this evil world, in fear, as well as in hope: not doubting of God's faithfulness to his promises, or giving way to discouraging enslaving dread of his wrath; but being humbly jealous of themselves, and watchful over their own hearts; fearing lest they should be deceived and come short, lest they should dishonour God, or incur his awful rebukes, and lest they should fall into temptation; and uniting their confidence in the Lord's mercy with reverence of his majesty, holiness, and authority. For the Christian's best state of mind is, a due proportion of humble fear and believing hope, at an equal distance from presumption and despondency: without hope, a man is like a ship which hath no anchor; without fear, he resembles one without ballast. The fearless professor is defenceless, and Satan takes him captive at his will; whilst he, who desponds, has no heart to avail himself of his advantages, and surrenders at discretion. They, to whom St. Peter wrote, were exhorted to fear always, as well as to hope to the end; especially as they knew at what a price they had been redeemed. Once they had lived in a vain unprofitable manner, ordering their whole conversation according to traditions received from their fathers. The Jews rested in their legal ceremonies, and the traditions of the elders; and the Gentiles in the absurd fables and idolatrous worship, which had been transmitted to them from their ancestors: and both were at an immense distance from spiritual religion. But they were redeemed from this state of slavery and wretched imprisonment, into which they had been sold for their crimes; not only by power exerted, but by a price paid for them as a satisfaction to the justice of God, that he might be honourable in delivering them. This price had not consisted of corruptible things, such as silver and gold, the treasures which men generally most value; but it had been paid with the blood of Christ, the Son of the living God, which was indeed most precious, by reason of his divine nature and excellency: so that it was sufficient to render it glorious to the justice and law of God, for the sake of it to show mercy and give grace to sinners of every nation and description. (Note, John i. 29.) For this was the Lamb of God, without the least spot or blemish of sin, of whose purity and excellency, as well as his sufferings unto death, the innumerable multitude of paschal lambs, and daily burnt-offerings, under the law, had been no more than shadows. He had indeed been fore-ordained to this work, (which none else could have performed,) "from before the foundation of the world," in the eternal counsels of God; and he had been promised as soon as sin had entered: but he had not been personally manifested, "to take away sin by the sacrifice of him-"self," till these last times; in consequence of which he was now openly proclaimed by the preaching of the Gospel, as the Saviour of all men, Jews or Gentiles, who came to him. For the whole benefit was intended for those, who, by his grace and through his intercession and atonement, relied on the mercy, truth, and power of God for salvation: being assured, that he had raised the crucified Jesus from the dead, and conferred on him the predicted glory, (11;) for this very purpose, that sinners, when made sensible of their guilt, and their entire inability to justify, sanctify, and save themselves, or to appear before their just and holy Judge, might fix their faith and hope on God, as reconciled to all believers in his Son, and for his sake engaged to fulfil all his promises to them. Fear, &c. (17.) 'Why should he, that hath assurance 'of salvation, fear? If there is truth in his assurance, 'nothing can disappoint him, not sin itself, it is true: 'but it is no less true, that if he do not fear to sin there is 'no truth in his assurance. It is not the assurance of faith; 'but the mispersuasion of a secure and profane mind.' (Arch. Leighton.)

V. 22, 23. The souls of those whom the apostle addressed, like those of all other men, had been polluted with ungodliness, pride, malice, selfishness, and worldly lusts: but they had "purified them" from the prevailing influence of these pollutions, as well as from the guilt of their actual sins, in the method which God had appointed for that purpose. They had been shown by the word of truth their need of this purification, and taught in what way it might be effected: and "in obeying the truth," by repentance, faith in Christ, and the use of the means of grace; they were thus cleansed from their filthiness and idols, and the several faculties of their souls were purified and sanctified to serve God in righteousness and true holiness. This purification had been effected, "through the "Spirit," who first quickened, convinced, and humbled them, and so led them to repent, believe, and obey; and afterwards they had sought further degrees of holiness, in dependence on his gracious and powerful influences, and in compliance with them: so that they indeed were active in this matter, but He had given them both the will and the power. One peculiar effect and evidence of this purity of heart consisted in "unfeigned love of the brethren." They had thus been led to love the image of Christ in his people, and to esteem them highly, though once they would have despised and hated them: they had learned to love their company, to sympathize in their sorrows, to rejoice in their comforts, to do them good, and to live at peace with them. This they did unfeignedly, by choice and in uprightness, and they evinced it by giving up their own interest or indulgence for their benefit. Their love of each other was in this respect far different from that hollow show of friendship and affection which prevails in the world, and which is chiefly expressed by insincere professions and unmeaning compliments. (Notes, Rom. xii. 9. 1 John iii. 18.) As they had then attained to a measure of this disinterested love, let them see to it, as of the greatest importance, that they loved one another more and more; in the use of the same means, and in dependence on the same Spirit, let them seek more entire purity from every selfish, envious, or malevolent affection, that no anger, bitterness, prejudice, or carnal passions, might warp, debase, or interrupt their mutual love, and that it might grow more fervent and intense, and be manifested in more self-denying endeavours to promote each other's temporal comfort and spiritual advantage.

V. 24, 25. This brotherly love was indeed in some sense natural to them, not as men, but as Christians, as they were all children of one family, and nearer related than any earthly brethren could be. For they were born again, not of corruptible seed, as all the human race are born of Adam's fallen nature, to sicken and die, and so to return to corruption and dust in respect of their bodies; whilst the soul, unless regenerate, must sink into misery; nor yet were they merely distinguished from others as the natural posterity of Abraham, which was only a corruptible seed; but they were born again by means of an incorruptible seed, even by the word of God implanted in their hearts by the Holy Spirit. This, being immutable and eternal truth in itself, lived and would abide for ever, in the effects produced by it on their hearts, according to the promises of God, being the seed of a divine life, and powerfully operating a total change in the judgment, dispositions, and affections of the soul. So that all, who were born again, (however before separated and distinguished,) were thenceforth brethren by an enduring and eternal relation, which will flourish, when all other relations shall be dissolved, or lost in total enmity. For "all "flesh," all that is born of Adam's fallen nature, is as grass; "and all the glory of man." whatever any of the human race ever boasted of, or rejoiced in, was but as the gaudy flower of the grass; whether it were royal or noble birth, genius, wisdom, learning, accomplishments, wealth, magnificence, or splendid actions, or even the glorying of the Jews in being the children of Abraham; for the whole must soon wither and be cut down, and end in the grave and in hell. But the word of God abideth for ever; its truths, promises and threatenings, will be accomplished to eternity, and its effects in the souls of the regenerate will be eternal also; and, as this word had been by the Gospel preached to them, they ought to bless God for their privileges; to seek an increasing experience of its efficacy; to value this distinction above all others; and "to love "one another with a pure heart fervently," without respect to their Jewish or Gentile extraction, or any external distinctions, of whatever kind. 'It is grossly contrary to 'the truth of the Scriptures, to imagine that they, who are 'thus renewed, can be unborn again.' (Arbp. Leighton.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

As we, if true Christians, are strangers on earth, we should expect contempt and unkindness for the men of this world, and continually prepare for our removal to our eternal home; and we should remember that we are scattered into different countries, cities, and families, as witnesses for God and his truth to those among whom we live. All the redeemed were "elected according to the "foreknowledge of God the Father;" but this cannot be known by them, except "through the sanctification of "the Spirit unto obedience;" and when a simple dependence on the atoning blood of Christ unites with a holy hatred of all sin, and a disposition to obey all the commandments of God, and to delight in them, we may be sure that we are the objects of his everlasting love, and that grace and peace will be multiplied unto us, till they be perfected in the felicity of heaven. "The lively hope "of an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and unfa"ding," which springs from regeneration, is inseparably connected with faith in a crucified and risen Saviour: it ascribes all salvation to the abundant mercy of God, and excites the possessor to love and practise holiness; it is peculiar to the real Christian, and it totally differs from the vain confidence of formalists, Pharisees, Antinomians, and enthusiasts, of every description. If we thus hope for an undefiled felicity, and habitually prepare for it, we may well rejoice, that it is "reserved for us in heaven," and that we are kept, as in a castle, by the power of God through faith, unto salvation, which is made ready, and will be openly revealed, when the mystery of God shall be finished.

V. 6—9.

The lively and assured hope of an inheritance in heaven gives substantial joy to the soul, and must be had recourse to in all our troubles for support and animation; yet we cannot but be sometimes in heaviness, when we are called to struggle with manifold temptations, to conflict with inward enemies, to walk in darkness without sensible comfort, or to endure afflictions in body, mind, or circumstances. Even they, who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, do on such occasions "groan, being burdened;" and though "the Lord does not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men," yet his wise love often appoints sharp trials for his people, because he knows them to be necessary, in order to humble and prove them, to show them what is in their hearts, and to do them good at the latter end. When this is the case, or his glory in any way requires it, they will be in heaviness for a short season; but neither their trials, nor the peculiar distressing circumstances connected with them, will be sharper, more numerous, or of longer continuance, than it is needful they should be, in order to try their precious faith, that it may "be found unto praise and honour and glory, at "the coming of the Lord Jesus." In the intervals of their temptations and conflicts, when they are composed enough to make observations on their experiences, they can find that they really do believe in and love an unseen Saviour, and show that faith and love by cleaving to him, and aiming to obey him, in the midst of their troubles; and this causes them to rejoice in his all-sufficiency and grace, in his glory and blessedness, and in admiring his infinite loveliness, and loving kindness, with a joy which is unspeakable, and which forms a sweet antepast of the heavenly felicity; tuning their hearts to the songs of the redeemed, and preparing them for their holy employments. Thus, by the way, they receive in part "the end of their "faith, even the salvation of their souls."

V. 10—16.

While we discourse freely on evangelical and experimental subjects, numbers, either ignorantly or maliciously, charge us with holding novel doctrines, and introducing a new religion; but in fact these principles were first published, as soon as sin entered into the world, though they have passed, so to speak, through several enlarged editions. Concerning these things the ancient prophets inquired and searched with great diligence, that they might know something of the grace preparing for later ages; and for four thousand years, "the sufferings of "Christ, and the glory that should follow," formed the great subject of revelation, in multiplied types, promises, and predictions At length the desire of nations appeared, finished his sufferings, and entered into his glory: then apostles bore testimony to the same important truths, and the Holy Spirit was sent down from heaven to authenticate their testimony, whilst angels desired to look down into these things, as eclipsing all former displays of the harmonious perfections of their God! And shall not we then search diligently those Scriptures, which contain the joyful and interesting doctrines of Salvation? Or shall we neglect the means of appropriating to ourselves its everlasting benefits? Far be this from us! Rather let us throw aside all carnal encumbrances, and use every method of bringing our minds into a proper frame for attending to this grand concern, and of doing the work of our great Master with alacrity and industry. Let us study to be sober in the midst of a giddy, sensual, and intoxicated world: let us hold fast the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end, and show ourselves the "obedient children" of God, by avoiding conformity to the world, and by taking care not to "fashion ourselves according to the former lusts "in our ignorance," but especially watching and praying against those sins, to which we were then most prone or accustomed; and thus let us aim to become holy in all manner of conversation, even as God, who hath called us, is holy; for he sanctifies all whom he saves, and "with-"out holiness no man can see the Lord."

V. 17—21.

The God whom we worship is no respecter of persons, but doth now, and will at last, "judge according to every man's work." He will detect many hypocrites, whom his servants never suspected, and some who never suspected themselves; and he will condemn many, as workers of iniquity, who called Him their Father, and Jesus their Lord and Master. Knowing these things, and aware of the deceitfulness of our hearts, the subtlety of our enemies, and the manifold delusions which are propagated on every side, we should pass the time of our sojourning in this perilous world in humble, watchful, and jealous fear, which will best secure us against fatal deceptions, and preserve us from dishonouring God, and exposing ourselves to his fatherly corrections. It behooves us also frequently to remember, that all the riches of the world could never have saved one soul from eternal destruction. Why then should we covet such perishing treasures? But how vast are our obligations to the Lord Jesus, the spotless Lamb of God, whose precious blood was freely shed to ransom our souls, and to obtain eternal salvation for us! May we by him believe in God, who raised him from the dead and gave him glory, that our faith and hope might rest on the infinite perfection and love of God, for all things pertaining to our salvation. In this view, how absurd does the conduct of all those appear, who cleave to "the vain "conversation delivered to them by tradition from their "fathers," and avow a determination never to change the religion which they have inherited from them! If this principle had been adhered to, Christ must have died in vain; for Jews and Gentiles must have agreed in rejecting the Gospel, to cleave to the traditions, superstitions, or idolatry, of their elders and ancestors.

V. 22—25.

It is highly important that men should seriously consider, and be deeply convinced, that their souls must be purified from pollution, or they will inevitably perish; that there is a work and duty for them to attend on in this matter; that they can do nothing in it, except by "obey-"ing the truth;" that they cannot obey the truth but by the Holy Spirit, whom God hath promised to give to those that ask him; and that unfeigned love of true Christians is the proper test and standard of evangelical purity of heart. If we have attained to this infallible evidence that the good work is begun within us, let us see to it, that we love one another with a pure heart fervently; thus it will be more and more evident that we are "born again "of incorruptible seed, by the word of God, which liveth "and abideth for ever." As this needful and most blessed change is wrought by the sacred word of divine life, it is of far greater importance to us to search the scriptures daily, to use every means to become acquainted with them, and to bring others in our families or congregations acquainted with them, than to speculate about the manner in which they are rendered effectual to this end. All other distinctions will soon be lost in the difference between the regenerate and the unregenerate; all other glory will wither, and terminate in everlasting shame and disgrace; all other unions will be dissolved and perish. But they, who are one in Christ Jesus, and are beautified with his salvation, will be united in perfect love, glory, and felicity, for ever. As this word of the Gospel, which is the seed of eternal life, is preached to us also, let us see to it, that it dwells in our hearts, and brings forth holy fruit in our lives, and then we shall "not be ashamed or confounded, world without end."

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—3. From the truths stated in the preceding chapter, the apostle took occasion to exhort his brethren to "lay aside," as a cast-off garment, which they had worn too long, all kinds of malice, guile, hypocrisies, insincerity in their profession, or flattery and compliment in conversation, with all envyings and slanders; that, with the simplicity of new-born infants, they might desire and relish the uncorrupted doctrines and precepts of God's word, as the new-born babe craves the nutrimental milk of the breast, and wants no other sustenance; that thus they might grow, by this wholesome food for their souls, in knowledge, faith, hope, love, and every holy affection, and not always be as children, or become dwarfs, who are seldom healthy, comfortable, comely, or useful. This might be expected from them, and even from those that had lately been converted; "if so be," or since, "they had "tasted that the Lord was gracious." The apostle here applied to Christ, as the context proves, what the Psalmist had spoken of JEHOVAH. (Note, Ps. xxxiv. 8.) The Lord is merciful and kind, whether men believe it or not; many have inefficacious notions of his mercy, without any experience or taste of it, and these notions commonly embolden them in rebellion; but regenerate persons believe that he is gracious; they apply to him in that behalf, and thus they taste and relish his grace, and have an earnest of their future felicity, even "the "witness in themselves" of his mercy and truth.—Malice, &c. (1.) 'The apostles sometimes name some 'of these evils, and sometimes others of them; but they 'are all inseparable as one garment, and all comprehend'ed under that one word, "the old man," which the 'apostle there exhorts to put off. (Eph. iv. 22.) "The "word," is both the incorruptible seed, and the incor'ruptible food of that new life of grace, which must 'therefore be an incorruptible life. Though it seem a 'poor despicable business, that a frail sinful man, like 'yourselves, speak a few words in your hearing; yet, look 'upon it as the means wherein God communicates hap'piness to them that believe, and works that believing 'unto happiness: consider this, which is a true notion, 'and then what can be so precious? (Arbp. Leighton.) The word sincere, shows with what diligent care the true doctrines and principles of the sacred word should be distinguished from all corrupted and mutilated systems, even as a parent would guard his beloved child from infectious or poisoned nutriment, though it assumed the name, form, and colour of milk.

V. 4—6. The apostle, having been educated a Jew, and writing to Jewish converts as well as to others, retained the typical language of the Old Testament, concerning a temple, a priesthood, and sacrifices. The temple had been the centre of JEHOVAH's worship; there he displayed his glory from the mercy-seat, and dwelt among his people; there he received their worship, and communicated his benefits; there alone God met sinners and blessed them, and penitent believing sinners approached God, to glorify him; for every accepted service had reference to the worship at the temple. Thus Christ and believers, as one with him, form a spiritual temple, in which God dwells with them and blesses them, and sinners come to God and glorify him. In allusion to this type, Christ is called "a "living Stone," (as elsewhere "living Bread.") This metaphor showed his power, stability, and permanent sufficiency in his Person and mediation, to sustain the whole weight of the glory of God, and the salvation of his people, which was to be builded upon him; and the epithet "living," whilst it showed that the expression was figurative, pointed out the quickening efficacy of his grace on the souls of those who had been dead in sin, and intimated that he ever liveth to make intercession for his people, and to maintain their cause. This Stone was disallowed of men, both Jews and Gentiles, so long as they continued unregenerate, because men are naturally ignorant, self-wise, self-righteous, carnal, and at enmity with God, so that they cannot receive his humbling, holy doctrines and salvation; but it was chosen of God, to be the Support, Cement, and Ornament of the whole spiritual building, and was most precious in itself, and perfectly fitted for that purpose. (Note, Matt. xvi. 18.) All therefore, who were born again, and thus enlightened, humbled, made in a measure spiritual, and taught to seek reconciliation unto God, came to Christ, to build their hopes and souls on him whom men despised, that they might be made a part of this holy and living Temple, continually applying to Christ, and to the Father through him, for his salvation, and the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit. Thus they, as "living stones," by life derived from Christ, became meet to be built up as a part of this spiritual house, consecrated to God, and his holy habitation. (Notes, 2 Cor. vi. 16. Eph. ii. 20—22.) But, to show more fully the import of this figurative language, it was proper that the subject should be illustrated by another metaphor; for, by thus coming to Christ, they were washed, anointed, arrayed, and consecrated, as a "holy priest-"hood," to draw near and minister unto God at his temple; they did not indeed presume to offer atoning sacrifices, but they were consecrated to offer spiritual sacrifices, even prayers, supplications, praises, thanksgivings, good works, and liberal contributions to the poor, especially their indigent brethren, and even their very bodies, as devoted to the service of God. (Notes, Rom. xii. 1. Phil. iv. 18. Heb. xiii. 15, 16.) These sacrifices, though defective and defiled, and offered by sinners, would yet be acceptable to God, because honourable to him, when presented through Jesus Christ, and by faith in his atoning sacrifice, and his intercession as their High Priest within the heavenly sanctuary. This accorded to a remarkable prophecy, the explanation of which has already been given. (Notes, Is. xxviii. 16. Rom. ix. 33.)

V. 7, 8. Unto those who believed, Christ was precious, as the Foundation of all their hopes, their chief Glory, and most valuable Treasure, for they saw such excellency in him, experienced such comfort from him, and so entirely depended on him for salvation, that they were prepared to renounce every thing, even life itself, rather than come short of an interest in him. But, on the other hand, they who continued disobedient, (among whom were the Jewish rulers, scribes, and priests, the supposed builders of the temple,) constituted an awful accomplishment of another scripture. (Notes, Ps. cxviii. 19—24. Matt. xxi. 40—44.) Notwithstanding their proud and obstinate rejection of Christ, and opposition to him, he was made the Head and Chief Corner-stone; and they could only stumble and be broken on him, as a Rock of offence, who was to believers a Refuge and a Rock of salvation. This was the effect of their unbelieving prejudices against the word of the Gospel, and their rebellious disobedience to the commands of their promised Messiah, to which they had been appointed in the righteous judgment of God, who purposed to leave them to their pride and enmity, and to glorify himself in their destruction, as it was evident by the prophecies fulfilled in that event. (Notes, Is. viii. 12—15. Rom. xi.)

V. 9, 10. "A chosen generation," referring to the covenant with Abraham and his posterity; "a royal "priesthood," referring to the covenants with Aaron, as to the priesthood, and with David, as to the kingdom; and "a holy nation, a peculiar people," referring to the national covenant with Israel, at the giving of the law.—To explain all this, as some do, with great labour and learning, to mean, that nominal Christians are, exactly in the same sense, "a chosen generation," &c. as Israel was of old, is such a confusion of the typical prophecies contained in the Old Testament, with the accomplishment of them in the true Israel, or the whole body of true believers, as addressed in the New Testament, that to admit it would subvert the whole system of interpretation adopted throughout this work, and which, on mature reflection, even on the objections of opponents, the author is daily more and more assured is the true one. He would not notice these interpretations, but from a fear, lest it should be thought that he had not duly considered what men, eminent for learning, had said against that exposition which he decidedly adheres to. Israel, as a typically chosen generation, was cast off from being the peculiar people of God; but Christians, as the spiritual seed of Abraham, and as born again in consequence of their election in Christ, were indeed "a holy generation," nay, "a royal priesthood." A small company of Israel, compared with the whole nation, officiated as priests, and they were not of the same tribe to which the kingdom was allotted; but in Christ the kingly and priestly offices were united, and through him believers became both kings and priests, being every way dignified and made honourable, called to exercise a spiritual dominion over those passions to which others are enslaved, and to obtain victories over Satan, the world, and sin, and appointed heirs of the kingdom of heaven. They also constituted "a holy nation," incorporated under the government of Christ; subject to his holy laws, sanctified by his Spirit, conformed to his image, and safe under his protection; and they were "a peculiar people," purchased with the blood of Christ, redeemed from worse than Egyptian bondage, favoured with peculiar privileges, and formed to a peculiar character and conduct. (Note, Tit. ii. 14.) In all these respects they were appointed to show forth the praises of the Lord, by their spiritual worship, their profession of his truth, their holy conversation, and exemplary conduct. To this the apostle exhorted his brethren; the Lord had called many of them out of the total darkness of Pagan idolatry, and the rest from the comparative darkness of the Mosaic dispensation and Jewish formality, into the clear light of the Gospel, to behold the marvellous displays thus given of the divine glory, and to partake of his astonishing love to sinners. This he had done, in order that they might be his witnesses and worshippers, to render him the glory due to his name; and to declare his virtues or energies, even the efficacy of his grace, in their holy tempers and actions. They had formerly been a people of no name or excellency, but they were now become the people of God, and had obtained that mercy for the pardon of their sins, and the salvation of their souls, to which they once were strangers. The prophecy, thus applied, being elsewhere referred to the calling of the Gentiles, shows that the Jewish converts were not exclusively addressed. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11. The apostle exhorted his dearly beloved fellow-Christians, who were so highly honoured and peculiarly favoured, to consider themselves "as strangers and pilgrims," who were journeying through a distant land to their heavenly inheritance, (Notes, &c. i. 1. Heb. xi. 13—16,) and to abstain from "fleshly" or carnal "lusts," and not allow themselves to hanker after any unlawful, inexpedient, or inordinate animal pleasures, much less to indulge in them, but to keep at a distance from sensuality, and to bridle and restrain all their appetites, and inure them to subjection, as well as to avoid all other carnal desires after things forbidden, or any earthly object. For such lusts warred against men's souls, to the destruction of immense multitudes; nay, they warred against the souls of Christians; and by their strivings against the spirit, or the regenerate part, and their temporary prevalence in their affections and conduct, often wounded and weakened them. Covetousness, pride, envy, and other aspiring and malignant passions, as much militate against the salvation of men's souls, and oppose the believer's growth in grace, as sensual propensities can do; "they war against "the soul," and are numbered by the apostle Paul among "the works of the flesh," (Notes, Gal. v. 16—21.) it cannot therefore be proper to explain the words of St. Peter restrictively of the animal appetites, as warring against the rational powers of the soul. The whole natural man is depraved; and in the regenerate, the conflict is not between the body and the soul, but between the new and the old nature, called "the flesh and the spirit;" and the warring against the soul relates to the destructive tendency of fleshly lusts, the indulgence of which, in any way, is hostile to the soul, and wars against its salvation, or its peace, purity, and vigour.

V. 12. It was incumbent on Christians to maintain an honourable and becoming conversation, in all respects, among their Gentile neighbours; that whereas, through their carnal enmity and ignorant prejudices, they were led to invent and propagate slanders concerning them, as if they were evil-doers, or malefactors guilty of crimes injurious to society, because they would not join in the established idolatry among them, they might silence their calumnies, and soften their prejudices, by their evident and abundant good works. Thus their example, in the presence of their enemies, would concur with the preaching of the Gospel, in promoting the conversion of the Gentiles; and "in the day of their visitation," when the Lord should please to call them also by his grace to glorify his name, the holy lives of his people would be owned as the means of that happy change. (Notes, Matt. v. 13—16. Acts xv. 14.) Day of visitation. (Notes, Gen. xxi. 1, 2. Luke xix. 41—44. Marg. Ref.)

V. 13—17. (Notes, Rom. xiii. 1—8. Tit. iii. 1.) The words rendered "every ordinance of man," may signify every human constitution. God has appointed magistracy as his ordinance, for the peace and good order of society; but the peculiar form of it is left to human prudence, under the direction of Providence. So that Christians are required to submit to that government which is established in the countries where they reside, without attempting any alteration, except in a peaceable and legal manner, according to their rank in the community. The apostle wrote when Nero was the Roman emperor; but he was led to use the more general name of king, as his epistle was intended for the use of all future ages. This savage tyrant, who was at length put to death as the enemy of mankind, but not till he had slain multitudes of Christians by his persecuting cruelty, and among the rest the apostles Peter and Paul, (as it is generally supposed,) was the "supreme," whom Christians must submit to and honour! And the governors of provinces, deputed by him and the Roman senate, together with other subordinate magistrates, must also be obeyed. The intention of civil government was to "punish evil-doers," and to protect and honour those who did well; and, in general, the administration even at that time would be productive of much good, though in many things the end of government was doubtless counteracted, for which the rulers would be accountable to God. But in respect of Christians, it was his will that by their good behaviour, in all godliness and honesty, as peaceable subjects, notwithstanding the oppressions which they suffered, they might put to silence the ignorant slanders of foolish and wicked men, who reviled them as seditious persons and enemies to the state, because they would worship God, and would not join in idolatry. They ought indeed to consider themselves "as free" from the ceremonial law, from condemnation, from Satan's yoke, and from human impositions, in respect of God's worship: but they must by no means use their liberty to veil maliciousness, to cover over any sinister and selfish designs, or to find a pretence for gratifying revenge on those who had injured them; but in all things to act as the servants of God, in willing obedience to his commandments, which formed the most perfect liberty that could be enjoyed. Let them, therefore, in obedience to him, show a proper respect and honour to all men, according to their rank and authority in society, and not scruple the customary tokens of subjection in all things lawful; let them at the same time reserve their especial love for the brotherhood, or their fellow-Christians; and, whilst they feared, worshipped, and reverenced God supremely, let them honour the king, as far as consisted with their other duty. (Note, Matt. xxii. 15—22.) It is almost impossible that there can be a worse supreme Governor, than he who ruled the vast Roman empire when this was written by divine inspiration. The comprehensive brevity of the closing verse has been greatly and justly admired by competent judges.

V. 18—25. (Notes, Eph. vi. 5—9. Col. iii. 22—25. 1 Tim. vi. 1, 2. Tit. ii. 9, 10.) Peter exhorted servants to obedience, even in stronger language than his beloved brother Paul had done. These were generally slaves, and many of them to heathen masters, who used them very cruelly. The word signifies domestics, who, being more constantly under the eye of their masters than other slaves, are supposed to have suffered more from their violent passions. Yet the apostle directed them to be subject to their masters with all fear, with a due respect to them, as placed over them by Providence, and with a fear of offending or dishonouring God. This conduct should be observed, not only to such masters as were kind and humane, and who would be pleased on reasonable terms, and be gentle even when offended, but also to the froward and morose, who would be angry without cause, and use severity when displeased. For it would be grace, or the effect and evidence of grace, acceptable to God and worthy of man's commendation, if, from a conscientious regard to the authority and will of God, they patiently and meekly endured such treatment as was grievous to be borne, when, not having been faulty, they were unjustly punished. Indeed, what glory or honourable distinction could it be, for professed Christians to be patient, when they were beaten or scourged for their faults, seeing many of the Gentile slaves submitted quietly in this case? But if they behaved well, and were beaten by their proud and passionate heathen masters, and yet bore it without peevish complaints or purposes of revenge, still persevering in meek endeavours to do their duty, this indeed would be acceptable with God, and be rewarded by him as a distinguishing effect of his grace. For Christians were called thus to do good to all men, and to endure ill usage from them, and still to proceed with alacrity in doing well, amidst ingratitude, revilings, and injuries, without being wearied out by any kind or degree of evil done to them: because Christ, when he suffered in their stead, left them, in this, and in all other respects, an example, that they should follow his steps, that in the same Object, to which they looked for pardon and righteousness, they might learn how to act in the most trying circumstances. He indeed had done no kind of sin, and perfect wisdom, love, and holiness, were displayed in all his works, nor was there any guile in his words: so that the contempt, malice, and cruelty, with which he met, were the base returns for the greatest kindnesses, and the unworthy treatment of consummate excellency. Yet when he was reviled as if guilty of the most atrocious crimes, he did not retort the reproachful language, though most justly deserved by his enemies: and even when he suffered all kinds of indignities and tortures, till they terminated in his death on the cross, he did not so much as menace his crucifiers, though all power was vested in him. On the contrary, he prayed for them, saying, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what "they do," and thus he "committed himself to him who "judged righteously," and left him to justify his character, plead his cause, and punish his enemies. This example Christians were peculiarly bound to consider and imitate, because the Lord Jesus, when he thus suffered, acted as their holy and divine Surety; and pitying their misery when they deserved, and were exposed to, the wrath of God, he voluntarily bore the guilt and punishment of their sins as imputed to him, and expiated them by his death on the accursed tree; in order that through his grace, and the encouragements of his Gospel, they might become dead to, and separate from sin, and live unto righteousness, as the obedient servants of God. Thus, through the ignominious stripes which he, (holy and glorious as he was,) willingly endured for them, and by the scars of those wounds which he received for their sakes, the diseases of their souls were healed, which were far worse than the livid marks left on their bodie from the cruel scourgings inflicted on them, in which they were conformed to their divine Lord: and the consideration of his scourgings and livid scars was suited, in the most affecting manner, to reconcile the poor slaves, while suffering under the cruel usage of their masters, to their hard lot, when their Redeemer, the Holy Jesus, the Lord of glory, had thus suffered for their salvation. These things indeed related to all Christians, though especially addressed to slaves; for they had, without exception, been as sheep going astray, and must have fallen a prey to the roaring lion that sought to devour their souls; but they had been sought out by, and brought back to, the good Shepherd, who laid down his life for the sheep; and thus they were safely lodged in his fold under his care, and become partakers of his love, who, as the Bishop, or Overseer of their souls, watched over them, and was become their omniscient, omnipotent, and most holy Protector. (Notes, &c. Is. liii. Ps. cxix. 176. Luke xv. 1—6.) Some expositors call the things, which the apostle here speaks concerning Christ, a digression from his subject, and the effect of the fulness of his heart: but I apprehend, that the Holy Spirit led him thus to write, that ministers might learn, from his example, to inculcate practical matters from evangelical principles.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—3

The apostles with one consent declare the necessity of "laying aside all malice, guile, hypocrisies, envies, and "slanders," in order to receive with meekness the instructions of Christ. We need not then wonder, that there are so many unfruitful hearers of the word, and that others are so little edified, when we observe how much these apostolical injunctions are neglected. But let those, who are as new-born infants in the family of God, and who have "tasted that the Lord is gracious," avoid all those who would mislead them into controversies, which are commonly conducted with malice, envy, deceit and detraction, and let them beware of all hypocrisy: that so their spiritual health may be preserved, a vitiated appetite prevented, and a desire after and relish of the holy word and the example of Christ, 8—18. The case of those to whom Christ, by his spirit in Noah, had preached, who yet perished in the deluge; and that of Noah and his family saved in the ark; an emblem of the destruction of the wicked, and the salvation of those, who had not only the sign of baptism, but the thing signified by it, through a risen and glorified Redeemer, 18—22.

of God increased. They ought also to attend primarily to the more simple and easy parts of divine truth, which is the proper milk for young converts; that so, growing by it to maturity of judgment, experience, and grace, they may at length be able to digest the more difficult doctrines, which are suitable food for those who are of full age, and which will never be given to new-born babes, by those who know how rightly to divide the word of truth. But let no man rest in unexperienced notions: for even babes in Christ taste that he is gracious, and their experience of his love and mercy draws them to seek to him in all their further distresses, fears, wants, and temptations, and to rest on him as the Foundation of all their hopes. Thus they are coming daily to him, and are builded on him, as living stones, to be a spiritual house, and consecrated by him as a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through him: for true religion consists of doctrine, experience, and practice; and he who separates these destroys the whole. As the Lord hath laid this Chief Corner-stone, elect, precious, to be the Foundation of his living temple, they, who are taught to come to him, and rest their hopes on him, will surely be safe and happy: for the whole scripture declares, that "he who believeth "on him shall never be ashamed." But whilst our Emmanuel and his salvation are glorious in the eyes and precious to the hearts of all the regenerate, who deem it their chief honour to belong to him and serve him, men in general, continuing proud, carnal, and alienated from God, can see no comeliness or glory in them. Though he is made "the Head-Stone of the corner," yet modern builders in general make no account of him, but carry on their work, either in open opposition to him, or in manifest neglect of him. Thus they stumble at the word, being disobedient, and will perish more dreadfully than if he had never come to be the Saviour of sinners: "whereunto also they "were appointed." But let us inquire, whether we have the obedient faith of those to whom "Christ is precious:" for many profess his truths, who stumble at his precepts, and so in another way he becomes to them "a Rock of of-"fence," and an occasion of deeper condemnation.

V. 9—17.

Happy are they, of whom it may truly be said, "Ye "are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy na-"tion, a peculiar people!" If we aspire to these distinctions, let us be followers of God as dear children, let us abound in our spiritual sacrifices, and be careful to act up to the dignity and sanctity of our royal and priestly character, in all the concerns of life: let us obey the holy laws of Christ our King, and seek his honour, in connexion with the peace and prosperity of our fellow-subjects: and let us be careful to appear as "a peculiar people, zealous "of good works," whose great business it is, "to show "forth the praises of God, who hath called us out of dark-"ness into his marvellous light." Thus we shall best evince, that these blessings belong to us, and shall make the most suitable returns for them. Most of us well know, that once we were not a people devoted to the Lord, nor had we sought or obtained mercy from him: how vast then are our obligations to him, who hath made us his people, and shown mercy to us! It becomes us, therefore, as strangers and pilgrims, to abstain from all kinds of fleshly lusts, which continually war against the souls of men: nor can a believer, in any instance or degree, indulge them, without being wounded, weakened, defiled, and injured. But we should not only consider our own comfort and advantages: the honour of the Gospel, and the conversion of our neighbours, likewise demand our attention. Let us then study to have our conversation honest and honourable, amidst our enemies and slanderers; that, whereas they revile us as evil doers, our evident good works may refute their slanders, and be the means, if the Lord please, of bringing them also to believe in him, and to glorify his name: for if we, who had not obtained mercy, have at length obtained mercy, why may not they, who still remain ignorant and prejudiced, be made partakers of the same salvation? With this intent, and from other evangelical motives, we should submit to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake, obeying the king, and all placed in authority under him, praying for them, that they may have wisdom and grace to be faithful to their important trust, and for the preservation of our most excellent constitution; and endeavouring, as "the quiet in the land," by "well-doing to put to silence the ignorance of foolish "men, as free," with that liberty which the Son of God bestows through the Holy Spirit; but remembering that we are the servants of God, and must in no degree use our liberty to cloak any malicious or ambitious designs. By thus honouring all men, loving our brethren, fearing God, and honouring the king, we shall best adorn the Gospel, and most experience its comfort.

V. 18—25.

The view given by the apostle, of the behaviour of many masters to their unoffending slaves, may serve to convince us, how incompatible slavery is with the love of our neighbours, and animate us to protest in all proper ways against so grievous an oppression of our fellow-creatures: yet Christianity, among its other unparalleled excellencies, teaches men to behave honourably, and live comfortably, even in these circumstances of degradation and suffering. But if slaves, when thus unjustly and cruelly used, were directed to submit to their masters, and respect them, how inexcusable are those hired servants, who, professing the Gospel, do not obey good and gentle masters; who can endure no degree of frowardness in others, through the indulgence of it in themselves; and who will not bear a reproof, when they are most evidently culpable! Indeed, this would be no evidence of grace or acceptable obedience, though it would be better than answering again; but when, in any situation, we do well, and then suffer rebuke or ill usage, patiently, from conscience towards God, we manifest the reality of our grace, ensure a bounteous recompense, and have the honour of resembling our blessed Lord; and servants to unconverted masters, who without cause abuse and revile them, should rejoice in showing whose followers they are. Indeed, we cannot go through with our duty as Christians in any station, if we do not persevere in endeavouring to "overcome evil with good," copying the conduct of him who "suffered for us, and left us an example that we should "follow his steps." Our sufferings and reproaches can neither be so unmerited, or so great, as his were, who "when he was reviled, reviled not again;" who suffered without threatening, and "committed himself to him that "judgeth righteously." As therefore "he, his own self, "bore our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, being "dead to sin, might live unto righteousness," and that by his stripes our souls might be healed; and as we all were as sheep going astray, till divine grace brought us back to "the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls;" let us learn to copy his example when we are reviled and abused, as well as to rely on his merits, and keep close under his gracious protection and guidance.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—4. (Notes, Eph. v. 22—33.) The apostle next gave directions concerning the duties of wives and husbands, as a matter of great importance to the credit and success of the Gospel. In general, wives were commanded to be subject to their own husbands; and even they who were married to Gentiles, or other unbelievers, whether they had been converted since their marriage, or had sinfully brought themselves into so trying a situation, ought to obey this commandment in all things lawful. (Notes, Gen. iii. 16. 1 Cor. vii. 10—16. xi. 3—16.) This must be attended to in a conscientious manner, not only in order to lighten their own trial, and to "adorn "the Gospel," but with an especial aim at the conversion of their husbands, which was not so much to be expected from a disputatious attempt to teach them the Gospel, as from the silent, persuasive eloquence of a becoming deportment. Thus they might hope to win upon those who did not obey the word, but treated it with contempt and neglect; as the constant, obliging, amiable conduct and prudent discourse of their wives would tend to soften their prejudices, and conciliate their affections, and so induce them to pay more attention to the preached Gospel. For it would have a considerable tendency to their conviction, habitually to witness the excellent effects of Christianity, in the chaste, modest, and faithful conduct of their wives, as united with respectful fear of disobliging or grieving them, and reverential regard to the authority and commands of God. In this endeavour to promote the Gospel, they must not deem outward things, such as plaiting the hair, wearing golden rings and bracelets, or putting on elegant or becoming garments, to be "their adorning," in any degree; but they must value and seek for an inward beauty, residing in the heart as a hidden man, visible in its essence only unto God, and consisting of a renewal and sanctification of the whole soul into the divine image, through the incorruptible seed of the word, made effectual by the power of the Holy Spirit; for this alone would continue for ever, without decay, or being tarnished. This inward beauty and ornament of a sanctified heart, would especially be manifested by "a meek and quiet "spirit," which was in the sight of God very valuable; and he would certainly honour it, though men might undervalue it: indeed, it would be their best ornament in the sight of their husbands, and do far more to fix their affections and excite their esteem, than the studied decorations of becoming or fashionable apparel, attended by a froward and contentious temper. (Notes, 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10.) Outward ornaments, according to every one's rank in life, are not absolutely prohibited by such scriptures, as has been generally observed; but the frivolous affectation and vanity, which constitute the love of finery; the time, attention, and expense, wasted by those who are attached to such decorations, and the proportionable neglect of the inward adorning which uniformly connects with it, sufficiently prove that the more moderate and indifferent about such embellishments Christians are, from proper principles, and without preciseness and censoriousness, the more respectable and amiable they must appear in the eyes of all competent judges. 'The works of charity performed to 'the distressed, with the money necessary for purchasing 'ornaments of gold and costly attire, will render women 'much more beautiful in the eyes of God and man, than 'if they were decked with all the vain ornaments in 'which the lighter part of the sex delight.' V. 5, 6. The inward ornaments, which the apostle recommended, had been of repute in the church from the most remote antiquity; for thus holy women of old time, who trusted in the promises of God, and were interested in his salvation, had adorned themselves; not counting either their personal beauty, or their costly garments, their adorning; but in the meekness of wisdom they willingly obeyed God, by being in subjection to their own husbands. Thus Sarah, the honoured mother of the nation of Israel, had obeyed Abraham; and in token of her respect for his person, and the authority which God had vested in him, she was used to call him lord. It is remarkable, that in the instance where this is recorded, Sarah expressed such unbelief respecting the promise of God, that she was sharply rebuked for it; yet that is here passed over, and the only good word which she spoke on this occasion is mentioned to her commendation. This shows how readily the Lord pardons the sins, and how graciously he accepts the poor services of the upright. Many of the Christian women whom Peter addressed were descended from Abraham and Sarah, and the others would be accounted as her daughters, heirs of her faith, and imitators of her example, so long as they behaved well in their relative duties, and as professed disciples, and were not so afraid of the anger of their husbands, or others, as to deny Christ, or act contrary to his commandments, through unbelief and consternation of spirit; for this would be rather an imitation of Sarah, when through surprise she denied that she laughed, than of her faith and holiness, or her becoming subjection to her husband.

V. 7. On the other hand, the apostle exhorted husbands, professing the Gospel, to dwell with their wives in a rational and intelligent manner, which might evince the propriety of the authority being conferred on them. They ought to behave towards them, as became those who had the knowledge of God, and of true religion; who understood the ends for which marriage was appointed, and the manner in which pious persons ought to behave in that holy estate; and this would keep them from every thing unbecoming, unkind, unfaithful, or injurious to their temporal comfort, or spiritual improvement. As their wives were of the same nature, and conjoined in the most endeared and indissoluble union, which blended all their interests with those of their husbands, so the consideration of their inferiority in this relation, and the comparative weakness of their sex, which rendered them incapable of so great hardship and fatigue as men could endure, together with their manifold infirmities, as connected with child-bearing, should induce their husbands to treat them with the greater respect and tender regard, instead of exciting them to tyrannize over them. They ought therefore to show a peculiar esteem and affection for them, to take much satisfaction in their company, to honour them before servants and strangers, to support their credit in the family, to make a becoming provision for their wants, to lay no unreasonable injunctions upon them, and to show a great concern in every thing relative to their health, comfort, and reputation. And if they would be thought superior in knowledge or wisdom, they ought to show it, by not taking offence at trifles, and by giving up their own humours and inclinations to oblige their wives, and for their welfare. These things should be attended to, from the consideration that they were fellow-heirs of the free favour and gift of God, which is eternal life; and therefore, as companions in their pilgrimage, they ought to do all that they possibly could to solace, counsel, and assist each other by the way; and they should more attentively guard against all disagreements and domestic uneasiness, that nothing might occur to indispose them for prayer, in secret, with each other, and in the family. This being essential to the Christian's prosperity, was a matter of so great importance, that all things in their whole conduct ought to be regulated with reference to it. Perhaps it might also be intimated, that in case a Christian had an unconverted wife, he ought to study by kind behaviour to conciliate her mind, that so she might do nothing to interrupt the social worship of the family, but might be induced amicably to join in it.

V. 8—12. (Notes, ii. 23. Rom. xii. 10—20. 1 Cor. xiii. Eph. iv. 1—3. Phil. ii. 1—4.) These exhortations entirely coincide with those which have been considered in St. Paul's epistles. As the conclusion and substance of all his admonitions, the apostle exhorted them to be of one mind and judgment, as far as possible, in the great concerns of religion; to sympathize with each other in their personal trials and sorrows; to bear a brotherly affection to all their fellow Christians; to compassionate the miseries, and relieve the wants, of their unbelieving neighbours; to be friendly, obliging, affable, accessible, and condescending to inferiors, in their whole conduct; endeavouring to conciliate the affections of all men, by every kind of civility and concession, as far as could consist with their other duties; and by no means retaliating injuries or retorting revilings, but, on the contrary, blessing, and praying for, their contumelious and malicious enemies, and speaking kindly to them. In doing this, they might be encouraged and influenced by the consideration, that God had graciously called them, from being his enemies, and exposed to the awful curse of his law, by the grace of his Gospel, to inherit a blessing in time and to eternity; and therefore they ought to copy his love, who had "over-"come evil with good" in his dealings with them; and to pity the misery and blindness, rather than resent the injuries, of their enemies, who could not possibly deprive them of their felicity. (Marg. Ref.) This accorded to the advice given to young persons by the Psalmist: (Notes, Ps. xxxiv. 11—16.) For if any man desired to prolong his days, and live comfortably on earth, or to possess the hope of eternal life in heaven, he must learn to bridle his tongue from all wicked, abusive, or deceitful words, (Notes, James i. iii. 26;) to forsake and depart far from all evil actions; to do all the good he could; to seek peace with all men, and pursue it, though it fled from him. For the omniscient and omnipresent God watched over the righteous, and would take care of them; (Note, 2 Chr. xvi. 9. Ps. ciii. 17.) and he was ever ready to hear and answer their prayers: but he set himself, as a frowning Judge and an omnipotent Adversary, against all impenitent sinners.

V. 13—18. The apostle, with great animation, next inquired, who could or would harm them, if they copied the example of him, who is essential and perfect goodness; and were imitators of every one, who did good to others, as followers of Christ. In this case none could do them real harm; and this inoffensive, upright, and benevolent conduct would generally, in time, disarm the enmity of their neighbours. But if this should not be the case, (as Satan would attempt to instigate the natural enmity of men's hearts against the Gospel, and, by connecting it with the ambition, jealousy, resentment, political interest, or bigotry of rulers, to persecute the church,) and they should be called to "suffer for righteousness' sake," they ought to deem this a peculiar honour and happiness, (Note, Matt. v. 10—12.) Nor ought they to be dismayed at the rage, menaces, decrees, and power of their persecutors, which were "their terror," but which could only kill the body at most, and could not so much as touch that without the permission of God; and, therefore, they should not be so troubled about these matters, as by confusion of mind to be unfit for their duty, or in danger of listening to temptations, and denying Christ, as the apostle himself had done on a former occasion. To avoid this, they ought to sanctify the Lord God in their hearts, maintaining honourable thoughts of his perfections, fearing nothing so much as his displeasure, and trusting their souls, lives, liberty, possessions, reputations, and families, in his hands, as in a Sanctuary and a strong Tower, (Note, Is. viii. 13—15.) Instead, therefore of renouncing or concealing their religion, they were exhorted to be at all times ready and prepared to plead the cause of truth, and to show its excellency and authority to "every man, who asked a reason "of the hope that was in them," whether he were a magistrate, or a private person, and whatever motives induced him to the inquiry. They hoped in God through Christ for eternal life, and in this confidence they renounced present advantages, and exposed themselves to most grievous sufferings; what therefore was the ground and reason of their hope? This question they should be prepared to answer, by showing the evidences and design of Christianity, the need men have of forgiveness and sanctification, the nature of redemption by the blood of Christ, and of the new-creation of the Spirit unto obedience, and the promises, security, and seal of the new covenant. Thus they might evince, from the authenticated word of God, and their own experience of its effects, that they hoped for happiness on reasonable grounds, and acted wisely in renouncing, venturing, and suffering all things, for the sake of it. But cogent arguments alone would not suffice in this testimony; they must also speak with meekness, or modesty, humility, calmness, and love, and with fear, or a reverence for God and heavenly things, and a cautious guard over their own spirits, lest their mismanagement should disgrace the cause of the truth. And they must also "have a good conscience," purged from the defilement of guilt by the blood of Christ, that they might be satisfied as to the event, and as an enlightened monitor directing them in all holy conduct; that so their persecutors, who treated them as malefactors, might be ashamed of thus falsely accusing and violently opposing men, whose habitual deportment, as the disciples of Christ, was undeniably excellent. And though nature would be most ready to repine or rage at undeserved sufferings, yet, in fact, if God were pleased so to appoint, it was far more desirable, honourable, comfortable, and profitable, to "suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing," as the guilt would in this case belong to their persecutors, and the advantage would be wholly their own. For thus they would be conformed to Christ, who once suffered, being falsely accused of men as an evil doer, and treated by them with all possible cruelty and insult; but, in fact, he, being perfectly righteous, was made a sacrifice "for "sin, instead of the unrighteous;" for, having no sin of his own, and yet suffering for sin, it was evident he suffered for the sins of others. This he submitted to, from pure and unspeakable love, that he might bring rebels, enemies, and condemned sinners, unto God, as pardoned, reconciled, sanctified, and made friends and children; that they might be happy for ever in his favour, and he be glorified in their salvation, and by their worship and services. For, being thus put to death in the flesh in respect of his human nature, on the charge of blasphemy, he was speedily quickened, or raised from the dead, by the power of the Holy Spirit, and thus declared to be the Son of God, as he had avowed that he was. The resurrection of Christ, (and indeed many other things,) is sometimes ascribed to God absolutely, sometimes to Christ himself, and sometimes to the Holy Spirit. This is very easy and natural, if these three persons are one God; but how can it be explained on any other principle? (Marg, Ref.)

V. 19, 20. It need not be thought wonderful, that so many refused to believe in the risen and glorified Saviour, through the preaching of his apostles by the Holy Spirit, as the case had been the same of old. For Christ, as God, and with reference to his future incarnation, had gone, by his Spirit, (i. 11.) inspiring his servant Noah, to denounce the approaching deluge, and preach repentance to that incorrigible generation, who perished in their sins, and were in the prison of hell, (that is, the adults among them,) when the apostle wrote, being confined there till the judgment of the great day. For they had "some-"time been disobedient" and unbelieving, (ii. 7, 8.) even during the hundred and twenty years of God's long suffering, after the deluge was threatened, before it was sent. At that time Noah was occupied in preparing the ark, showing his faith by his works, and calling on them to repent and seek mercy from God. But they unanimously and obstinately rejected his message; and thus they were destroyed by the flood; whilst only eight persons had their lives preserved in the ark, being delivered from the waters, and carried above them: so that the floods, which drowned others, concurred in their deliverance. Various other interpretations have been given of this passage, but none, this excepted, in the least degree satisfactory.

V. 21, 22. The like figure, or the antitype of Noah and his family's preservation in the ark and by the water, at that time saved Christians, even baptism. Christ and his church are the true Ark; all within are safe; all without will be swept by the deluge of divine vengeance into destruction. Into this ark men enter by true faith; this faith Jews and Gentiles professed, when by baptism they entered the Christian church; and thus the baptismal water formed as it were the sign of their safety. Yet it was not "the washing away the filth of the flesh," or the mere outward ordinance of baptism, which could effect this; but it was "the answer of a good conscience towards "God;" when a man, by the regeneration of the Spirit, was able to profess repentance, faith, and purpose of a new life, uprightly, and as in the presence of God, and to answer such questions as were put to persons on those occasions. When Jews and Gentiles professed Christianity, they were thus received into the church, even as Gentiles had been into the Jewish church by circumcision; but the argument, concerning the baptism of infants born of Christian parents, is not at all affected by it. The apostle spake of baptism as the initiatory ordinance of Christianity; but he took care to remind men, that the inward grace of baptism, even regeneration, from which all holy affections and actions spring, alone could introduce them into the true church, the Ark of real security; and that no outward administration of the outward sign could effect this blessed translation into the kingdom of the Son of God. This salvation of believers was the effect of the resurrection of Christ, which evidenced the acceptance of his sacrifice, and made way for his exaltation, that he might confer as a Sovereign, by his power and through his intercession, the blessings which he had purchased by the shedding of his blood. (Notes, &c. Eph. i. 20—23. iv. 8—12. Phil. ii. 9—11.)

form real Christians to, a becoming and beneficial behaviour in all the relations of life; by a happy union of piety, purity, meekness, fidelity, and holy love. Every person ought to use proper means for the conversion of such as obey not the word, especially among their relations, and to aim habitually at gaining others to Christ, by every part of their conduct; but an obliging conscientious performance of their respective duties, by inferiors, will go furthest with superiors, and win most upon them. For when they see that religion teaches their wives, children, and servants, to behave better towards them than formerly, it interests their feelings, and shows them that there is an excellency in what produces such happy effects; and it is greatly to be wished, that there were more, who thus preached in every station, employment, and relation of life. In like manner, the inward and incorruptible adorning of wisdom and grace, shining forth "in a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price," constitutes the most durable beauty and amiableness, and will ensure esteem and affection, when all outward ornaments, (the memorial of our sins and shame,) with all that beauty which they are vainly meant to embellish, will not secure any one from contempt and aversion, whose conduct in life is disgraceful; and they will soon leave the poor body to the confinement and corruption of the tomb, and the soul, which is without holiness, to be for ever loathsome and abhorred of God. Let then all, who would be the followers and daughters of the holy women, who of old trusted in God, copy their fashion, seek their ornaments, attend to relative duties, do good, fear nothing but sin, and beware of every thing that might betray them into it; and let husbands, professing the Gospel, act towards their wives with that prudent and tender regard, which becomes those who know the word of God; which may ensure them respect from all around them, and tend to render them comfortable under their various infirmities. Thus they will be enabled to live together, "as fellow-heirs of the grace of life," and nothing will hinder their united prayers for a blessing upon each other, their family, and all who are connected with them.

V. 8—18.

As peace and love are necessary to domestic comfort, so are they to the prosperity of the Church. Christians should therefore study and pray to be "all of one mind, to have compassion one of another, to love as brethren, to be pitiful and courteous: and, instead of rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing," they should bless their enemies, after his example, who hath called them from their state of enmity to inherit a blessing. But 'how astonishing and lamentable is it, that when the way to happiness is so plainly delineated, so few should find it! What man is there, who does not desire life, and to live many days, that he may see good? Yet how few tongues are kept from evil! How few lips from speaking guile! How few decline from evil, and do good! How few seek peace, and pursue it! On the contrary, how much low cunning and artifice, and what discords and contentions reign among mankind! And how detestable and miserable do these perverse and ungovernable passions render us!' (Doddridge.) But happy are the remnant of the righteous! The eyes of the Lord watch over them, his ears are open and attentive to their prayers, and he delights in doing them good, whilst he sets his face against the workers of iniquity. Who then can harm those that are followers of God as dear children, and walk in his most holy ways? Their sufferings for righteousness' sake will prove an addition to their felicity; so that, fearing God, making him their Sanctuary, and abiding safe and comfortable under his protection, they need not be afraid of the terror of the wicked, nor be troubled by reason of their rage and malice. They should therefore always be ready to give a reason of their hope, to inquirers of every description; for it is founded on the most irrefragable argument; and indeed the true Christian alone can reasonably hope to obtain eternal happiness or escape eternal misery. Yet in pleading the cause of truth, in public or in private, we should be prepared not only with conclusive arguments, but with meekness and fear; that a humble, benevolent, peaceable conduct towards men, may evidently unite with a reverential awe of the majesty of God: for wrath, pride, bitterness, and irreverence, will prejudice men's minds against the truth, whatever ability is shown in defending it. Nor can this service be successfully performed, except by those who "exercise themselves to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man;" for nothing can be so well opposed to the enmity of the human heart against the truth, as the holy lives of its professors, which tend to make those ashamed, who falsely accuse their good conversation in Christ. If this, however, cannot be done, it is better to suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing, whatever our natural impatience may suggest; for "Christ once suffered "for sins, the Just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God."

V. 19—25.

Whilst we recollect the end proposed in the sufferings of the divine Saviour, let us inquire whether we are really brought unto God, as his worshippers, and in the temper of our hearts and conduct of our lives. For though his resurrection was attested by the same Spirit, whose divine power effected it, yet few even to this day receive him as their Saviour, and flee to him for refuge from the wrath to come. Nor need we wonder at this, if we consider what a vast majority were disobedient, when Christ, by the same Spirit in believing Noah, preached to the old world, while the ark was preparing, during the long-suffering of God; and how few were preserved from the flood: though it may well make us tremble to learn, that the obstinate rebels were cast into prison, never more to be released, as utterly unable "to pay the very last mite." Let us then enter the Ark which God hath provided, as the only security from the deluge of impending vengeance that will destroy a guilty world: let us beware that we rest not in outward forms; as if that baptism could save us, which only washes away the filth of the flesh, or any thing "but "the answer of a good conscience towards God." While we profess ourselves the disciples of Christ, and partakers of his grace, let us seek the true baptism of the regenerating and sanctifying Spirit of God, in behalf of our children and friends; and thus let us trust in his merits, power, love, and truth, who died for our sins and rose again for our justification; and "who is gone into heaven, and is "on the right hand of God; angels, principalities, and pow-"ers, being made subject to him."

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1, 2. Seeing that Christ, in human nature, and in the likeness of sinful flesh, had suffered with such constancy and patience for the sins of his people, (iii. 18,) his disciples were called on to arm themselves with the same mind; that a resigned, self-denying, meek, and steadfast frame of spirit, resulting from confidence in God, and love to him, hatred of sin, and realizing views of eternal things, might fortify their minds against despondency, terror, and weariness, and prepare them to resist temptation, and maintain the conflict against the world, the flesh, and the devil, with resolution and vigour, even unto death, and as resolved to suffer for the sake of Christ, if called to it; whereas, without this internal armour, they would surely faint in such a time of trial. As therefore Christ had "suffered in the flesh," when crucified once for their sins, but had risen from the dead to die no more, and had thus done with sin as imputed to him, so Christians, having "suffered in the flesh," in conformity to Christ, by the mortification of their carnal nature, through his grace and motives derived from his cross, had ceased from the practice of sin, expected no satisfaction from any forbidden indulgence, and were continually employed in resisting the influence of sin in their hearts, and endeavouring to prevent its breaking forth in their lives. (Notes, ii. 24. Rom. vi. Gal. ii. 20. v. 24.) The end or intention of this renewed judgment and conduct, and of the grace by which the change had been wrought, was, that the Christian "should no longer live the remnant of his time "in the flesh," or in the body, "to the lusts of men," or in order to gratify any of those inordinate desires of worldly things, by which men are naturally actuated, but that he should thenceforth live to the will of God, seeking his favour and glory, and doing his commandments. The word flesh is here used in different senses; it means, 1st, the holy human nature of Christ; 2dly, the depraved nature of man, the body of sin and death; and 3dly, the mortal body, in which the soul tabernacles during its continuance in this world.

V. 3—5. When the ends, for which men were sent into the world, were duly considered by Christians, it would appear that the time past of their lives might suffice to have "wrought the will of the Gentiles;" or to have wasted it in committing those sins, and pursuing those objects, to which the ignorant heathens were addicted. Some of those whom the apostle addressed had been Gentiles, and the rest had acted according to the manners of the nations, rather than as became the peculiar people of God: for they had habitually allowed themselves in various lascivious imaginations, dalliances, or secret practices, or in more gross lewdness: or they had been guilty of drunkenness and excess; and had frequented those riotous, luxurious, and dissipated revellings and banquetings, where intemperance was practised; and many of them had joined in those idolatries which were most detestable in themselves, and by the shameful and enormous licentiousness connected with them. The Jews, at that time, were exceedingly exact and scrupulous in avoiding all approaches to gross idolatry: it is not therefore at all probable, that the apostle meant this of converts from among them. Some had lived in one, some in another, and several of them in many, of these enormities: thus a great part of their lives had been misspent; and this reflection ought to render them the more diligent in serving God for the residue of their days. But their unconverted neighbours, especially the Gentiles, finding them separated from, and set against, their old pursuits, and that they would no longer join with them in their revels and "profusion of riot," were estranged from them, and looked on them as a precise unaccountable set of people: as therefore the conduct of Christians was a silent reproof of their excesses, they spake evil of them, 6 For, for this cause was the Gospel preached also [s] to them that are dead, [t] that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, [u] but live according to God in the Spirit.

7 But [x] the end of all things is at hand: [y] be ye therefore sober, [z] and watch unto prayer.

8 And [a] above all things have [b] fervent charity among yourselves: [c] for charity * shall cover the multitude of sins.

(or "blasphemed their religion," Gr.) and charged them with various crimes, of which they were not guilty. But whilst they thus unjustly judged and condemned Christians, they must speedily render an account of themselves to him, who was "ready to judge both the living and the dead," being even then possessed of all power and authority for that purpose. (Marg. Ref.) The apostle uses the first person, thus joining himself with his Christian brethren, probably as a less offensive manner of stating the subject, and as conscious, that, though free from many of the gross crimes here mentioned, he had yet spent too many years of his past life "according to the course of "the world," and "the lusts of men," and not "according to the will of God." Some indeed venture to change the text, without authority, and to read "may suffice you;" but the same principle might lead us to explain the words as addressed exclusively to the Gentile converts, because the Jews had never lived in "abominable idolatries." Think it strange. (4.) 'The Greeks used the word ξενιζεσθαι, to express that wonder, with which a stranger is struck, who beholds any thing uncommon or new.' (Macknight.)

V. 6. The Gospel had before this been preached to those who were since dead, (either being martyrs for the truth or dying in the course of providence,) for this very reason, viz. "that they might be judged according to "men in the flesh," and by the proud and carnal judgment of wicked men be condemned as evil-doers, and some of them even suffer death at their hands; but that at the same time, being quickened to a divine life by the Holy Spirit, they might live to God as his devoted servants, and his witnesses among their persecutors, and so be prepared for living with him for ever in heaven. Thus their transient afflictions, disgrace, and sufferings, soon terminated in perfect felicity; in the mean time, they glorified God in life and death, and were supported and comforted by him; and the Gospel had been the means of preparing them for these things, as it still continued to prepare others to glorify God, serve their generation, and then, after some fleeting sorrows, to be admitted to everlasting, uninterrupted joy, and unalloyed felicity. This seems the meaning of the verse, which is generally thought very obscure. Some explain it of those who were dead in sin, to whom the Gospel was preached; that, being quickened and converted, their old nature might be judged, condemned, and crucified, that so they might no longer live to the lusts of men in the flesh, but to the glory of God by the Spirit. Several other interpretations are given, but that above stated seems the most satisfactory, and it best connects the verse with the words which immediately precede. "The dead," there means such as had already died; "the quick," or living, those, who were then alive on earth; both of these Christ will judge. (Marg. Ref.) The Gospel was preached, in order to the salvation of the hearers; they who embraced it were condemned according to men, or by man's judgment, but they were accepted by God. The same had been the case with those to whom the Gospel had been preached, who were since dead, even those from the beginning who had been favoured with the word of God. The believers had been persecuted and condemned by men, but "they "lived according to God in the Spirit," or by the Spirit, while their persecutors, if impenitent, would be judged and condemned by the Lord.

V. 7. Christians must expect tribulations in the world, but they would soon be over, for the "end of all things "was at hand," and death was about to close their course of trials, or services; nay, judgment would not be so long delayed, as that the intervening space should, in the estimation of faith, be at all compared with eternity. It was therefore incumbent on them to be sober, considerate, temperate, in all kinds of animal indulgence, and moderate in all their worldly pursuits. They ought also to be vigilant, and to guard against the various assaults of their spiritual foes, and especially to be watchful, that nothing might unfit them for prayer, or lead them to neglect it, or to grow remiss in that duty and means of grace, on which the safety and prosperity of their souls so greatly depended. (Notes, Jam. v. 16.) Many expositors explain "the end "of all things," to signify the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, and the whole constitution of the Jewish nation in Church and state; but the Christians in Asia were far distant from Jerusalem, and were not so immediately concerned in those events, as in the speedy approach of death and judgment, to which the words most naturally lead our minds. (Notes, Matt. xxiv. 29—50.)

V. 8. (Notes, i. 22. Prov. x. 12. 1 Cor. xiii. Jam. v. 20.) The apostle here again enforced the exhortation to charity, or love of each other; and in doing this he referred to the proverb, that "love covereth all sins," or "the multitude of sins." As the love of God in Christ covereth the multitude of the sins of believers from his sight, so they ought to cast the mantle of love over the number of faults into which their brethren would fall, in their conduct towards them; and thus hide them from their eyes, by forbearing and forgiving one another, as Christ had forgiven them. (Eph. iv. 31, 32. Col. iii. 13, 14.) Thus the peace of the Church and the communion of the saints might be preserved, which otherwise must be interrupted; for there were so many things amiss in all, that unless love covered, excused, and forgave, in others, such mistakes and faults, as every one would need to be borne with in himself, Satan would prevail to excite perpetual divisions and discords among them. To suppose that charity or love will so cover, or make amends for, the multitude of the man's sins who exercises it, as to induce

God to forgive them, is subversive of the whole Gospel; for "if righteousness come by the law, then Christ died "in vain;" and the abuse of these words, which are very obvious and important in their true meaning, hath encouraged such numbers to neglect Christ, and continue impenitent in their sins, from a vain hope of being pardoned for the sake of a proud benevolence, or some selfish alms-deeds, that a particular and repeated protestation against it seems absolutely necessary. 'He commends 'mutual love, because it, as it were, buries innumerable 'trespasses, and so is a favourer and preserver of peace. 'For they who love one another, easily forgive each other's 'offences.' (Beza.)

V. 9—11. (Notes, Rom. xii. 6—13. Heb. xiii. 2.) In general, Christians were exhorted to show their love, by hospitality to strangers, without grudging, or inwardly repining at the expense to which it put them; and, more particularly, whatever gift any man had received of the Lord's free bounty, whether natural abilities, learning, influence, wealth, or spiritual endowments, he was required to employ and improve it for the advantage of his brethren, that so they might all reciprocally be useful to, and derive benefit from, one another, both in their temporal and spiritual concerns. Thus they would act as good, faithful, wise, and active stewards of those manifold talents, which God, of his abundant mercy and grace, had intrusted to them, for their own and each other's advantage. (Notes, Luke xvi. 1—12. 1 Cor. iv. 1, 2.) This especially, though not exclusively, concerned ministers, and those employed in managing the affairs of the Church. If any one therefore spake, either as a public teacher, or in private conversation, let him discourse in consistency with the oracles of God, which infallibly declare his truth and will to mankind; and if any man acted as a deacon, or in any other way ministered to the support and comfort of believers, or of the poor, let him do it to the best of his ability, as given to him of God for that purpose, and let him communicate to the relief of others, not as if he gave them any thing which was properly his own, but as imparting a portion of what God had, for this end, committed to his stewardship; that so God might be glorified, by their conscientious, cheerful, and becoming performance of their several duties, and improvement of their talents, from faith, and in a disposition to give the glory to him of all they had and did, and to ascribe to him, through Jesus Christ, all the honour of his parfections and wonderful works for evermore.— To restrict this merely to spiritual gifts, because the original word generally is used when these are spoken, (though there is no reason to suppose that it means them exclusively,) may be considered as one of the various ways, by which learned commentators endeavour to convince us, that a vast proportion of the Scriptures was written, not for our instruction, but for that of others, and that we need concern ourselves but little about it, Now this is precisely what a vast majority of professed Christians wish to believe. Hospitality. (9.) 'The primitive Christians were hospitable to all strangers; but 'chiefly to those who were of the same faith and com'munion. Believers scarce ever went without letters of 'recommendation, which testified the purity of their 'faith. This was sufficient to procure them reception in 'all those places where the name of Jesus Christ was 'known.' (Cruden.)

V. 12—13. The apostle here again exhorted his brethren to patience, fortitude, and cheerfulness, under their sufferings for the sake of Christ. He had before spoken of these, as intended to prove their faith, and purify their souls, even as the furnace tries and refines the gold. (Note, i. 7.) They ought not, therefore, to be surprised, or made desponding, or alarmed, by the fiery trial which God had appointed to try them, and which they must needs pass through, as if some strange thing had happened to them, which was not experienced by others of the Lord's people. On the contrary, they ought rather to rejoice at being conformed to Christ, by suffering from the same description of men, and for the same cause, in which he suffered; for their trials should be considered as pledges of love, and introductory to the participation of his glory, when that should be revealed at his coming, and they admitted to partake of it with exceeding joy. (Notes, Rom. viii. 17, 18. 2 Cor. iv. 8—18. 2 Tim. ii. 10—13.) If they were reproached, because they bore the name, professed the truth, and obeyed the commands of Christ, they were happy and favoured persons; (iii. 14.) as this evinced that the Holy Spirit, who is glorious in his eternal Deity, and the Author of all that is truly glorious or excellent in men, even of the divine image, the beginning of heavenly glory, rested upon them. (Marg. Ref.) Thus the glory of God was seen in their conduct and dispositions, and this excited the enmity of the carnally-minded; so that, on the part of their revilers and persecutors, the Holy Spirit and his operations, as well as Christ, and the Father who sent him, were evil-spoken of, and blasphemed; but on their part the Lord was glorified, as they patiently suffered for his sake the effects of that enmity which their holy profession and conduct had excited. The case, however, would be evidently different, if they exposed themselves to sufferings by their crimes, for this would be most dishonourable to God, and injurious to themselves. It behooved them, therefore, to be careful that none of them were brought before the magistrates, cast into prison, or condemned, for committing murder, or theft, or any other violation of wholesome laws; nay, that they did not incur reproach by intermeddling in the affairs of other men, whether they were of a private or public nature; or by passing their judgment and censures, or intruding into the management of those concerns which did not belong to them, as if they had been appointed, or were authorized and qualified to oversee and give orders to those employed. These were common reasons for men's suffering public punishment, or private reproach, and professors of Christianity might be drawn into such misconduct, and yet fancy they were persecuted for their religion! But if they avoided such imputations, and suffered as Christians for acting consistently with that honourable character, they ought by no means to be ashamed of the reproach or ignominy connected with their punishment, though it were imprisonment, scourging, or even a violent death; nay, they ought rather to praise and glorify God, for counting them worthy to suffer shame for his sake. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17—19. It was indeed to be expected that Christians would thus be called to suffer for Christ's sake; for the time predicted by him, when he would first begin his judgments, by sharply trying his professed disciples, or the family of God, was then arrived; and if such fiery trials must prove and purify the church, and purge out hypocrites from among them, before judgments were executed on the Jewish nation, and other open enemies, what would be the end of those who did not obey the Gospel? The persecutions, by which the church was tried, were introductory to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the tremendous ruin of the Jews, and preparatory to the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. (Notes, &c. Ez. ix. 6. Matt. xxiv. 9—13. John xvi. 1—3.) If then the righteous were saved with difficulty; if, notwithstanding their interest in Christ, and their conscientious, self-denying obedience, so many trials, dangers, conflicts, and sufferings were deemed needful for them; and if, according to their own feelings and apprehensions, they were often but just saved, and got to heaven at last through many narrow escapes, as a ship-wrecked mariner scarcely gains the shore on a plank, where would the impenitent sinner, and the ungodly despiser or opposer of Christianity appear at the day of judgment? What refuge from the wrath of God could he expect to find? Or how could he hope to escape the everlasting punishment with which he was threatened in the holy Scriptures? As therefore the trials of Christians were so trivial, compared either with the perdition of ungodly men, or the felicity prepared for the righteous, they ought, when suffering in the cause, and according to the will of God, to commit the keeping of their souls, (as well as the protection of their lives, and all their other concerns,) to his almighty care; who, being their Creator, had a propriety in them as his rational creatures, and who regarded them as his redeemed servants, new-created unto holiness, and interested in all the blessings of his covenant, and in his faithfulness to perform it to them. Taking care, therefore, to persevere in well-doing, and to suffer with meekness, patience, and constancy, without turning aside from their duty, either through fear, resentment, or worldly motives, let them trust themselves to his faithful care, who, being the Creator of the world, could not want power to support, comfort, deliver, and eternally save them, and who would certainly overrule every thing to their final advantage. 'The apostle cannot intend deliverance from the Roman invasion, in which so 'few of these Christians were concerned; nor merely deliverance from any of their persecutors, because he takes 'it for granted that the righteous would be saved, though 'with difficulty; whereas multitudes fell by persecution, 'even of these Christians in Bithynia, as appears by Pliny's letter. It is necessary therefore to understand it 'more generally, of the difficulty with which good men 'get to heaven, through this dangerous and ensnaring 'world.' (Doddridge.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The Christian soldier, in preparing for the battle, must

CHAP. V.

The apostle exhorts the elders to feed the flock of God, willingly, cheerfully, disinterestedly, and humbly; and to be examples to it; expecting from the chief Shepherd, at his appearance, an unfading crown of glory, 1—4: He requires the younger to submit to the elder; and all of them to be clothed with humility, casting all their care on God, 5—7; and to be sober and vigilant; and steadfastly by faith, to resist the devil, and bear tribulation, 8, 9. He concludes by prayers, salutations, and benedictions, 10—14.

peculiarly remember to arm himself with the same mind which was in Christ, the Captain of his salvation: that love, zeal, spirituality, hatred of sin, contempt of the world, fortitude, patience, meekness, and hope, may concur in determining him to venture and suffer all things for the glory of God, the good of men, and " the joy set be- " fore him." Thus, being crucified with Christ, by the virtue of his sufferings for us in the flesh, and deeming himself dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God, he will be enabled to resist temptation, to " cease from sin, and no " longer to live the rest of his time in the flesh to the lusts " of men, but to the will of God." Indeed we may all say, (though some far more emphatically than others,) that " the time past of our lives should suffice us, to have " wrought the will" of those who know not God; and we cannot but regret, if brought to our right mind, that so large a proportion of our precious time has been wasted to no purpose, whether we have escaped the grosser pollutions of the world, or have walked in its lasciviousness, lusts, excess, and riot, or in those revellings and banquetings, where God is no more regarded than amidst the abominable idolatries of the Gentiles. Very few of us indeed have avoided the luxurious and dissipated feasts and banquetings, which professed Christians generally make, and that often under pretence of commemorating some of the events relating to redemption; but, when we separate from them, and refuse to " run with them to the " same excess of riot," they think it strange, and revile us, as by our conduct we condemn them. This we must not mind; but, having shown them our reasons as far as we have opportunity, we must leave them " to him, who " is ready to judge the quick and the dead," to whom, if they continue impenitent, they will have a dreadful account to give at the last day. Vast numbers, who are now dead, have suffered the same revilings before us: the Gospel called them to separate from the wickedness of their former companions in sin, and to bear testimony against it: they were therefore " judged according to men in the " flesh," and by their carnal rules, to deserve reproach and persecution; but they lived according to God in the Spirit, and when they were removed out of the world, they were found meet to be partakers of the heavenly inheritance. Ours is indeed a favoured day in this respect; yet if the Spirit of life dwell in us, the world will judge us deserving of scorn and reproach, whilst God will graciously account us worthy of that glorious kingdom for which we suffer. But as the end of all things is at hand; as all our worldly pursuits, possessions, distinctions, and enjoyments, all our temporal trials, sorrows, and conflicts, our season of probation and preparation, and our term of usefulness, will speedily be over, so it behooves us " to be sober, and to watch unto prayer." The more ungodly men hate and revile believers, the greater care should they use to have fervent love among themselves, that, by mutual candour, long-suffering, and forgiveness, the multitude of offences may be covered, and so nothing may interrupt their peace and harmony. This blessed grace of love dethrones our natural selfishness, and, in connexion with faith in the promises of God, it induces us to " use " hospitality one to another without grudging," and to consider every gift, possession, or situation, as a talent committed to our stewardship, according to the manifold grace of God, to be used for the benefit of the church and the community. It also dictates our words, whether in public or in private, that they may be true, pure, kind, and instructive, " according to the oracles of God;" and it will dispose every one in his proper calling to minister, or communicate to others, " as of the ability which God " giveth, that God in all things may be glorified through " Jesus Christ."

V. 12—19.

When we consider the upright, harmless, benevolent, and useful conduct of true Christians, we are apt to think it strange that they must pass through such fiery trials, from the enmity of wicked men, and that God should permit them to be so injured and afflicted. We must not, however, indulge such thoughts, but prepare for tribulation, as the excellent of the earth have always been thus treated, and God hath purified all his gold in this furnace. We ought therefore to rejoice in being made " partakers " of the sufferings of Christ, that when his glory shall be " revealed, we may be glad also with exceeding" and eternal " joy." We may indeed deem ourselves happy, when wicked men discern " the seal of God in our forehead," and reproach us for the name of Christ, because " the " Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon us," and so they revile us, because we bear his image, belong to him, and glorify him. But we cannot be too careful not to give the enemies of the Gospel any just cause to revile or hate us; and though it is not common for professors of evangelical truths to suffer as murderers, thieves, or malefactors, yet they often bring odium upon themselves by a conceited officiousness, and by intermeddling with such matters as do not at all belong to them, especially in political matters, as well as by various other evident and palpable faults; and then many of them charge the reproach cast on them to the persecuting malice of their enemies! This we should watch against, and carefully distinguish between those things, which we suffer for the sake of Christ and of righteousness, and those that we bring on ourselves by our imprudence and misconduct. In the former case we suffer as Christians, and should glorify God in that behalf; in the latter we should be silent, or humbly confess our sin and folly as the cause of our sorrows. In vain do men expect to escape the trial of their professed faith; judgment will begin at the house of God; his people will be more severely chastised for their sins than other men are, and hypocrites will incur the deepest condemnation. They who would be saved, must strive, wrestle, labour, watch, pray, deny themselves, and take up their cross daily; and though all true believers will surely be saved, it will be with difficulty, and through many perils, conflicts, and tribulations. (Acts xxvii. 22. 31. 44.) What then will be the end of those, who obey not the Gospel of God? and where will the infidel, the profligate, the licentious, the oppressor, the persecutor, and the enemy of all goodness, appear, when Christ shall come to judge the world? If such sufferings are inflicted on the beloved children of God, what will be the doom of his implacable foes? And if such diligence and watchfulness only just suffice to ensure the believer's salvation, what will be the event of the slothful and heedless conduct of professed Christians in general? Let us then see to it, that we obey the Gospel, by a penitent faith working by love, and if called to suffer according to the will of God, "let us commit the "keeping of our souls to him, in well-doing, as unto a faith-"ful Creator."

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—4. The Elders were, in general, the rulers and teachers of the churches, (Marg. Ref.) and St. Peter, waiving the mention of his apostolical office, addressed them as one of the company, and as acquainted with the nature and difficulties of the service assigned to them. He had also been a spectator of the sufferings of Christ, in the garden and on the cross, and was appointed to bear witness of those interesting events, and of his Lord's resurrection, ascension, and subsequent exaltation. Moreover, he was fully assured, that, as a pardoned and justified believer, and as sealed by the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit, he was called to inherit, and would at length partake of "the glory, which shall be revealed," and publicly bestowed on all true Christians, when the Lord Jesus shall come to judge the world. As he therefore was employed in preaching the Gospel of salvation, through the sufferings of the Redeemer, whose steps he endeavoured to follow, in patiently bearing afflictions for the truth's sake, and as he was supported by the joyful expectation of future felicity to disregard present things, whilst from love to Christ he fed his sheep and lambs;) (Notes, John xxi. 15—19.) so he exhorted all those, who were appointed to the same work, to apply themselves diligently to the performance of it, with the self-denying tenderness and patient care with which the shepherd feeds and tends his flock. (Note, Acts xx. 28.) They ought to consider the congregations over which they presided, and among whom they laboured, as a part of the purchased and beloved flock of God, and therefore it would become them to take the oversight of them, not merely because a necessity was laid upon them, and they could not safely do otherwise, but willingly, from zeal to the glory of God and love to the souls of his people, and as men that were ready to encounter difficulties, face dangers, and endure losses, reproaches, and persecutions, in so good a work. And when the counsel of inspired persons, or other pious ministers, concurring with the wants and desires of the people, called on any person to engage in the pastoral office, he ought not to be so reluctant to it as some were found to be, partly from modesty and diffidence, yet not without a measure of unbelief, and undue regard to the ease, quiet, and safety of a private situation, the want of zeal and love, or the preference of more profitable employments; whence it became necessary almost to constrain them to engage in this arduous, laborious, and perilous work. Yet, at the same time, some improper persons of inferior stations might be induced to undertake it, from the expectation and desire of a better maintenance than they could otherwise obtain; and such as had been ordained, might be tempted to go through with their services, rather to earn their wages, than from better motives, and to modify their instructions in subserviency to their own interests; but such things must scrupulously be avoided, as the lucre thus sought would be most filthy and base, and the wages of the vilest prostitution. (Notes, John x. 12, 13. 1 Tim. iii. 3—8. Tit. i. 7.) For all true ministers should enter into that office, and perform its duties, "of a ready "mind," delighting in the work, and desirous of glorifying God, and of being his instruments in doing good to the souls of men, considering their own temporal interests as a matter of a very inferior nature, and even their maintenance, merely as necessary in order to the due performance of their office, and not an object to be proposed by them, in undertaking it. Nor ought they to assume a lordly authority, or aspire at secular power and honour by means of their ministry, as if they had dominion over the faith or consciences of those who belonged to God, as "the lot of his inheritance," when they were appointed to show them his truth and will, and to engage their obedience to him, not to themselves. Instead, therefore, of usurping authority over their brethren, or endeavouring to convert their office into a lucrative trade, they ought to behave in such a manner, as to be "examples to the flock," and to elucidate, by their own piety, purity, humility, self-denial, and universal conscientiousness, the instructions which they gave to the people. This would not indeed tend to their worldly affluence or dignity, but it would ensure to them a most abundant future recompense. For when the Chief Shepherd, from whom their pastoral charge was derived, on whom they depended for all their sufficiency, to whom the flock belonged, and to whom they must finally give account, shall appear as the Judge of the world, then they, and all such faithful ministers, will receive a crown of unfading glory, infinitely better and more honourable than all the authority, reputation, wealth, and pleasure of the world could possibly be. (Note, Heb. xiii. 20, 21.)—The words rendered "taking the oversight," literally signify, performing the episcopal office, and they must be allowed to be a decisive evidence, that no express distinction was established between bishops and presbyters, when the apostle wrote this epistle. (Notes, Acts xx. 28. 1 Tim. v. 21—25. Tit. i. 5—9.)

V. 5—7. The word "younger," seems not to relate to any particular station in the church, but in general denotes juniors, whether in the pastoral office, or not, who were exhorted to submit themselves, and show a proper deference to their seniors. Yea, all Christians were directed to be subject to one another, according to their different relations in life; thus, the people were required to obey their pastors, children their parents, subjects their rulers, and servants their masters, according to the precepts of God's word. And as pride, in juniors and inferiors, militates against due subordination, even as in superiors it prompts to tyranny, so they all were admonished to be clothed with humility, as their chief ornament, that whatever abilities, endowments, or spiritual gifts they possessed, their modesty and humility might be conspicuous to all beholders, above every other distinction. Thus they would, without exception, be willingly subject to their seniors and superiors. This ought above all things to be sought for, seeing that God contended by his omnipotence against all proud persons, showing favour to none but those who were deeply sensible of their unworthiness, and conferring this special grace on all who were humbly desirous of it. It therefore behooved them to humble themselves, as guilty, polluted, and wretched sinners, under the powerful hand of God, which was sufficient to crush the stoutest of his enemies, and to uphold the feeblest of his friends, that so, submitting to his righteousness, they might be reconciled to him by faith in Christ, and in due time exalted to the glory, honour, and immortality prepared for his saints, after the trials here allotted them. (Note, James iv. 6—10.) In the mean while, indeed, they would meet with various trials and difficulties, and be assaulted by many solicitous cares about their temporal or spiritual concerns, and those of the church; but, being attentive to their present duties, they were encouraged and required to cast all their anxieties upon the Lord, by faith and prayer, assured that he would manage every thing for their advantage, according to his unerring wisdom and unfailing truth, seeing he cared for them, he pitied and loved all those who thus trusted in him. (Notes Matt. vi. 24—34. Phil. iv. 6, 7.)

V. 8, 9. The apostle here again renewed his exhortation to sobriety and vigilance, (Note, iv. 7.) that being free from the intoxication of sensual pleasures, or worldly interests, the Christians whom he addressed might not be lulled asleep, or found off their guard in the great concerns of eternity. (Luke xxi. 34—36.) To excite them to this watchfulness, they must be reminded, that the devil, the prince of the darkness of this world, and of the apostate angels, the accuser of the brethren, and the adversary of believers, who always seized on every opportunity of bringing some charge against them, or of obtaining leave to sift and harass them, was walking about, like a roaring lion, full of rage and fierceness, seeking whom he could find asleep, or unarmed, that he might at once devour him. (Notes Job i. 6—12. Zeph. iii. 5. Luke xxii. 31—44. Rev. xii. 10.) The terrible persecutions, that were instigated by this enemy of God and man, as "working in the "children of disobedience," seem to be peculiarly intended. Thus outward terrors and inward suggestions, drove numbers into apostacy, or a temporary denial of Christ; and many were finally ruined, from fear of man and love of life, and others narrowly escaped this downfall, being found careless and secure. They ought therefore to resist and repel his assaults, being steadfast in the profession of the faith, assuredly believing the truths of the gospel, and constantly depending on the power and love of Christ, to repel and drive away the hated tempter. And to excite them thus strenuously to resist temptation, 10 But [n] the God of all grace, [o] who hath called us unto his [p] eternal glory by Christ Jesus, [q] after that ye have suffered awhile, [r] make you perfect, [s] stablish, [t] strengthen, settle you.

11 To [u] him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

and strive against sin, though it were unto imprisonment, scorning, stripes, or death, they should know assuredly, that their brethren, dispersed in other parts of the world, fully and constantly endured afflictions of the same kind, in the same cause, and from the same sort of persons.—These repeated exhortations to watchfulness, and the especial motive assigned for it, ought to have peculiar weight, as coming from that apostle, who, through self-confidence, carnal security, and unwatchfulness, when Satan desired to sift him and his brethren as wheat, was induced to deny his Lord with oaths and dire imprecations.

V. 10, 11. The apostle did not pray that his brethren might be exempted from such salutary and honourable trials; but he besought "the God of all grace," being plenteous in mercy, and the inexhaustible and holy Source of every kind and measure of grace, who, by his word and Spirit, had called them to the hope and sure earnests of eternal and most glorious felicity through Jesus Christ, that, "after they had suffered awhile," for the trial and increase of their faith, he would make them mature and complete in every Christian grace, establish them in the peace and hope of the Gospel, strengthen them to resist all kinds of temptations, to endure all sufferings, and to perform all duties, by invigorating their holy affections; and that he would settle them firm and immoveable, as a compact building on a good foundation, so that no storms, assaults, or stratagems of the enemy might overthrow them. This would redound to his praise, as the work of his power and sovereign authority, to whom all glory and dominion were universally and eternally to be ascribed.

V. 12. It is highly probable, that Silvanus was the same person who generally attended St. Paul, and who was frequently called Silas. St. Peter supposed and concluded, from all he saw and heard, that he was "a faithful brother," a true believer, and a zealous minister of Christ "unto them," among whom he had commonly laboured. He had therefore taken the opportunity of writing by him a brief epistle, exhorting them to be steadfast, and to act consistently with their Christian profession: he testified to the Gospel which they had received, to satisfy them that the doctrines of grace, which they had embraced, and in the faith and experience of which they stood accepted with God, were indeed the truths of Christ, and that the power of them upon their hearts, and the fruits of them in their lives, evinced them to be partakers of the grace of God, and fully established in his favour. This seems to determine that St. Peter wrote to confirm in the faith the churches which had been planted by St. Paul, and his companions, against all the insinuations of those who pretended that he preached a different conduct from the other apostles; and indeed the attentive reader will remark a great similarity in the sentiments of those two great apostles, especially in the manner in which they connect doctrine and practice together.

V. 13. There is no sufficient ground to suppose that, by Babylon, the apostle mystically meant Rome; for no reason can be assigned, why he should withhold the name of that city when he wrote this epistle. Yet, if any choose to avail themselves of this only Scriptural proof that Peter ever resided at this great antichristian metropolis, Protestants are not concerned to controvert it. It is, however, well ascertained that Peter went to Rome, and there suffered martyrdom. It is not certain whether Marcus is, or is not, the same with John Mark, mentioned frequently by St. Paul and in the Acts of the apostles.—(Preface to the Gospel according to St. Mark.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

They who most know the nature, difficulties, snares, and temptations of the pastoral office, are best qualified to exhort their brethren, and will speak with the most genuine authority on such topics. An experimental acquaintance with the sufferings of Christ, gives the best grounded confidence of being "partakers of the glory "which shall be revealed," and they, who would counsel to the greatest effect, must not unnecessarily use the language of superiority or authority. Ministers should unite skill, vigilance, diligence, faithfulness, love, zeal, patience, disinterestedness, and self-abasement, in their characters and conduct, both in order "to feed the flock of God," and to be examples unto them: they ought to perform the most laborious services, and endure the greatest hardships, for the Lord's heritage, "not by constraint, but "willingly, not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind," and without assuming any dominion over their faith.—This is not, indeed, the road to high perferments in the outward church; but "when the chief Shepherd shall "appear," such pastors "shall receive of him a crown of "glory that will never fade away." And what, compared with this, are all those riches, eminent stations, or lordly dignities, which so many nominal pastors eagerly pursue? Or where will the avaricious, the slothful, the sensual, or the tyrannical men, who have borne the name of ministers, appear, when the great Judge shall come, and call them to give an account of their stewardship? The sentence to be then denounced against them, and executed on them, is already recorded; may they read it, and tremble, and flee from the wrath to come! (Notes, Matt. xxiv. 48—51.) But every station and age has its peculiar duties; subordination is the plan of God: the younger should submit themselves unto the elder, and all, in their several relations, should be subject to those placed over them.—This will be the case, as far as men "are clothed with "humility," and God never shows favour to a proud man, except when he brings him down into the dust of self-abasement; (Note, Dan. iv. 37.) nor will any humble soul come short of his grace, or of eternal life. Let us then "humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God, for he is able to save and to destroy; then "he will exalt "us in due time," as much as is good for us in his church on earth, and among "his saints in glory everlasting."—When we become humbly subject to our reconciled God, and simply dependent on him, we are allowed and commanded to cast all our care on him, and assured "that he "careth for us," as a Father for his own children; and this will bring far sweeter peace and greater comfort into the soul, than could arise from the most complete gratification of pride and ambition. Thus also we shall be safe; for humility will induce us to be sober and vigilant, diligently attending to our duty. This is our part, and thus we may unreservedly and cheerfully leave the events to the Lord, to whom they belong.

V. 8—14.

When we consider the indefatigable malice, power and subtlety of our adversary, the devil, who "goeth about "seeking whom he may devour," and recollect what numbers he continually destroys, we cannot but perceive our need of vigilance, and confidence in God. Did a roaring lion at any time traverse our streets, devouring the careless and inattentive, we should proceed with vast caution and circumspection, if obliged to go out in such perilous circumstances; yet a far more formidable enemy continually watches his opportunity of destroying our souls, nor can we have any safety, except we watch and are sober. Thus we may hope to be kept from falling into temptation; but, if we must encounter this dreadful foe, we should resist him steadfast in the faith, and then the Lord will constrain him to flee from us. In whatever form he assaults us, or by whatever agents, we may know assuredly, that our brethren experience the same conflicts, temptations, and tribulations. We should therefore pray for them also, that after they have suffered awhile, the God of all grace would perfect, stablish, strengthen, and settle them. This he will do for all, whom he hath "called to his eternal glory by Jesus Christ," that they may celebrate his praises, as his willing subjects, for ever and ever. All the apostles and evangelists exhort us to these things, and testify that this is the true grace of God: may we then steadfastly adhere to this primitive Christianity, and not listen to cunningly devised fables! Thus it will appear that we were elected together with those who are now in glory; that we are indeed faithful brethren with all the family of God; that we desire to live in love with them, and to share that peace which belongs to all that are in Christ Jesus, and to them exclusively.

THE

PETER.

The writer of this epistle calls himself " Simon Peter," (Acts xv. 14. Gr.) " an apostle of Jesus Christ ;" he alludes to circumstances and facts, which agree to none but St. Peter ; (i. 14—16. John xxi. 19 ;) he calls it his " second epistle ;" and he speaks of his " beloved brother, Paul." (iii. 1. 15.) It must, therefore, either be the work of the apostle Peter, or of one who personated him : but ' it is a thing of the worst ' example, for any man to forge another's name, or pretend to be the person he is not.' (Le Clerc.) It may be added ; ' especially to forge the name of an apostle, and to personate him, in order to sanction a ' man's private opinions, by so high an authority.' Yet the epistle is remarkable for the energy with which the writer inculcates holiness ; and the solemn, yet affectionate manner, in which he testifies against the delusions of those who neglect it. It has indeed been urged, that the style remarkably differs from that of St. Peter's first epistle : but this is by no means true, except in respect to a part of the second chapter, which indeed seems to have been taken, in a measure at least, from some writing which described in very strong language the false prophets of that, or of earlier ages ; which was then extant, and well known, but is now lost. St. Jude seems also to have taken some things from it ; for part of his epistle remarkably coincides with the second chapter of this. In all other respects, the internal characters of authenticity are very strong. Some doubts, however, in this respect were entertained in the primitive church ; which Jerome ascribes to the supposed dissimilarity of style. But, it is probable, that it was written only a short time before the apostle's martyrdom ; and, not having been so publicly avowed by him, and clearly known to be his, during his lifetime, the scrupulous caution of the church hesitated about admitting it into the sacred canon ; till internal evidence fully convinced the most competent judges, that it was entitled to that high distinction. It is generally supposed to have been written, at least three or four years after the former epistle ; and it is evidently in the first instance intended for the same persons, though not expressly addressed to them. It appears, that the apostle, by this epistle, especially intended to put Christians upon their guard against the false apostles, who perverted the Gospel ; and the profane scoffers, who started objections to the truth of it : but it is replete with the most important instructions on a variety of subjects.

CHAP. I.

The apostle salutes his brethren, 1, 2. He shows the blessings to which God had called them ; and earnestly exhorts them to diligence in every good work, in order to make their calling and election sure ; intermixing suitable warnings and encouragements, 3—11. He states, that, aware of his approaching martyrdom, he is the more diligent, in thus admonishing them, that they might remember these things after his decease, 12—15. He urges the evidence of what he had seen and heard in the holy mount, in confirmation of his testimony, concerning the power and coming of Christ, 16—18 ; referring them to the more sure word of prophecy, 19 ; and instructing them, concerning the interpretation and source of it, 20, 21.

*SIMON [a] Peter, [b] a servant and [c] an apostle of Jesus Christ, to them that [d] have obtained like precious faith with us, [e] through the righteousness † of God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ:

2 [f] Grace and peace be multiplied unto you, through [g] the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord;

3 According as [h] his divine power hath given unto us [i] all things that pertain unto life and godliness, [k] through the knowledge of him that hath [l] called us ‡ to glory and [m] virtue:

4 Whereby [n] are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises; that by these [o] ye might be partakers of the divine nature, [p] having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. Perhaps Peter deemed it proper to style himself an apostle, as well as a servant, of Christ, because he meant in this epistle to oppose certain false teachers, who did great mischief in the church. He addressed himself to "them who had obtained like precious "faith" with him and his brethren. The nature and effects of true faith were precious, and it interested the possessor in the most valuable blessings; it was therefore equally precious in a private Christian as in an apostle. Thus he tacitly distinguished "the faith of God's elect" from that dead and worthless faith by which many were deluded, (Notes, James ii. 14—26.) This faith, which, as the original intimates, they received by the special favour and allotment of God, rested on the righteousness "of our God and our Saviour Jesus Christ," as the words may be literally rendered. Thus they were taught to believe and trust in the obedience unto death of the Lord Jesus, as their incarnate God and Saviour, for their justification, and for all the blessings connected with it, and resulting from it. This is the most obvious meaning of the words; but if any contend that the expression, "Our God," refers to the Father, they should also remember that the meritorious obedience of the incarnate Son is often called "the "righteousness of God:" nor can we form any idea, in what sense a Christian's faith could be said to be either in, or through, the righteousness, or justice of God, considered as a divine attribute, when it rests mainly on his mercy and truth, and only views his justice as satisfied, and, as it were, consenting to the sinner's salvation, through the meritorious work of Christ. Our translation, "through "the righteousness," though it seems not to be the exact sense of the passage, yet conveys a very important meaning, as the faith, by which we receive Christ for salvation, is given to us, "through the righteousness," which he finished as our Surety; for it springs from the regeneration of the Holy Spirit, as given to us through his mediation. In behalf of all such Christians the apostle prayed, that "Grace and peace might be multiplied to "them, through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our "Lord:" (Notes, John xvii. 3. 2 Cor. iv. 3—6:) for, in proportion to the degree of our believing, spiritual, and experimental knowledge of the perfections of God, in the harmony and glory of them, as displayed in the Person, character, and salvation of Jesus our Lord, all our gracious affections will be exercised, and our peace, hope, and consolation will abound, as that knowledge abounds in us.

V. 3, 4. It might be expected, that this progressive work of illumination, sanctification, and consolation, would be carried on in believers, according to what had already been conferred on them by the divine power of the Lord Jesus. In consequence of his exaltation and mediatorial authority, he had given to his people "all things "pertaining to life and godliness;" whatever was requisite for their spiritual and eternal life and final felicity, and for their acting suitably to their relations and obligations to God, during their passage through this evil world to heaven. Instructions, motives, encouragements, means, principles, and assistances, together with pardon, peace, and grace, had been given them, through the regeneration of the Holy Spirit, and all the fulness of Christ, and the engagements of the everlasting covenant had been set before them in the word of the Gospel: so that, notwithstanding their inward and outward impediments and conflicts, they might still be enabled to serve God acceptably in this world, and obtain everlasting life in the world to come. All these things had been freely bestowed on them, through the knowledge of God, who had called them by his glorious grace and mercy, and the powerful virtue, or energy, of his quickening Spirit; or he had called them to partake of his eternal glory, and to a constant and courageous profession of the Gospel, and obedience to Christ, amidst all the trials and sufferings of their present state. For the words glory and virtue may either refer to God who called them, or to what they were called to: the former seems the more literal construction; but the unusual use of the word rendered virtue, in applying it to God, hath induced many to adopt the latter interpretation. Yet the same word is used, in this application of it, by this apostle in another place. (1 Pet. ii. 9. Gr.) By this knowledge of God in Christ through the Gospel, and by their efficacious calling, exceedingly great and precious promises had been given them. The promises of scripture relate to things most needful to sinners, suitable to their case, answerable to all their wants, and abundantly sufficient to render them most blessed for evermore; whereas without them they must have been for ever miserable: the promises are therefore exceedingly great, and precious beyond expression. These are set before men by the Gospel, who are invited to come and partake of the promised blessings: but they are given to believers alone, who may consider them as so many valuable securities, or good bills, payable when their circumstances and best interests render it necessary: for, being united to Christ, and partakers of

5 And [q] beside this, [r] giving all diligence, add to your faith, [s] virtue; and to virtue, [t] knowledge;

6 And to knowledge, [u] temperance; and to temperance, [x] patience; and to patience, [y] godliness;

7 And to godliness, [z] brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, [a] charity.

8 For if these things be [b] in you, [c] and abound, [d] they make you that ye shall neither be * barren nor [e] unfruitful [f] in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

him, all the promises belong to them through him and by his covenant. (2 Cor. i. 20.) They were moreover bestowed on them to the end, that they "might be partakers "of the divine nature," instead of that depraved and diabolical nature, which they had, as apostate sinners; that by their union with Christ, and the indwelling and new-creating power of the Holy Spirit, the divine image might be renewed upon their souls; that so a new nature might be formed within them, and a new direction given to their understandings, wills, and affections; conformable to the holy nature of God, and capable of loving and delighting in him, and finding happiness in his service. When this change of heart and nature was begun in regeneration, it influenced those who experienced it, to separate "and escape from the pollution that was in the "world through lust;" or from all those outward vices and enormities, into which men are drawn by their excessive and idolatrous cravings after the pleasures, possessions, or distinctions of the world. Such evil practices have always filled the earth, and they are pollution and filthiness, in the judgment of God. When sinners profess to repent, and to embrace the Gospel, they outwardly relinquish these iniquities, (ii. 20;) and all regenerate persons actually and finally escape them, that is, the allowed or habitual practice of any of them.

V. 5–7. The apostle here called on his Christian brethren, not to rest in their apparent conversion, or the reformation connected with it: but, in dependence on the promises of the Gospel, and in pursuance of the end for which they were given, to "cleanse themselves from all" remaining "filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holi-"ness in the fear of God." (Note, 2 Cor. vii. 1.) Besides that change which had taken place, they ought to give, or use, all diligence, in the use of every appointed means, from an earnest desire of increasing holiness; and thus "to add to their faith, virtue," that they might with fortitude and manly constancy profess their belief in Christ, and obey his will, in the midst of persecutors, and show a composure of mind, notwithstanding the difficulties and dangers to which they were exposed. They ought furthermore diligently "to add to their virtue, "knowledge;" that, by an increasing acquaintance with the whole truth and will of God, they might be enabled to regulate their zeal and courage with judgment and discretion; knowing how to behave in all circumstances and to all men, like well informed intelligent persons, who could not justly be charged with any thing rash, foolish, or contrary to the duty of their place, in the church or the community. (Note, Phil. i. 9—11.) To "knowledge," they must add "temperance," or an exact government of all the animal appetites, in subordination to the will of God, and the benefit of themselves and others; as well as great moderation in all worldly things, and indifference about them. To "temperance," they must unite "patience," or a cheerful submission to the will of God under afflictions, meekness amidst injuries and affronts, perseverance in well-doing notwithstanding severe trials, and a quiet waiting for the Lord to interpose for their comfort and deliverance. To this, "godliness" must be added; as consisting of all those holy affections and dispositions, which constitute the spiritual worshipper and truly devoted servant of God, in all his ordinances and commandments: and to this, "brotherly kindness," or an unfeigned fervent love of Christians, as brethren in the Lord; (Note, 1 Pet. i. 22;) and to all the rest they must join "charity," or benevolent and compassionate love to all men, according to the commandments of God, and in imitation of his kindness to the sinful children of men.—These holy dispositions, and the effects of them upon their conduct, must be diligently and carefully added together, as different voices in harmony form a chorus; that so the exercise of each other might connect with, regulate, and bound, that of the rest, and prevent their exceeding or degenerating. Thus the Christian character would appear well proportioned and beautiful: whereas, if any of these graces were remarkably defective, the others would appear to be redundant, being mixed with those natural dispositions that most resembled them; and the character would appear deformed and disproportioned; whilst one man would be bold without knowledge, or love; another gentle and kind without firmness or fortitude; and the same would appear in various particulars.

V. 8, 9. These things ought to be peculiarly attended to, as the usefulness and comfort of Christians depended greatly upon them; for if holy affections and dispositions were rooted in their hearts and abounded in their lives, they would effectually prevent them from being slothful or unfruitful, in their knowledge of Christ; as they would excite them to continual activity in his service and to that behaviour in all relative duties, and in the improvement of their talents, which would be very useful to mankind. But, on the other hand, the professed Christian, who was destitute of these gracious dispositions, or even remarkably defective in them, was to be considered as spiritually blind: for his most exact notions only showed, that he had heard that such things were; but his conduct proved that he had never seen their real nature, use, glory, and excellency. At least he must be very short-sighted, and incapable of perceiving any thing of the genuine tendency of the Gospel! nay, he had forgotten the very meaning of his own profession, when he embraced Christianity, and was baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, as that symbolical ordinance represented the purging away of a man's old sins, in conformity to the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ, (Notes, Rom. vi. 1 Pet. iii. 21;) that, being dead unto sin, and risen to newness of life, he might thenceforth live unto God.

V. 10, 11. As no outward profession could profit men, without a renewal of their hearts to holiness, the apostle exhorted his brethren, "the rather to give diligence to make their calling and election sure;" that by earnestly and vigorously using every means of grace, applying themselves to the performance of all their various duties, mortifying every sinful propensity, and cultivating every holy affection, the evidence of their "calling," or regeneration, might become more complete, clear, and indisputable, to themselves, as well as to others. And by this, their election would also be ascertained; and they might assuredly infer, that God had from the beginning chosen them to salvation, and would preserve them to his eternal glory: (Notes, &c. Rom. viii. 29, 30. Eph. i. 1—12. 2 Thes. ii. 13. 1 Pet. i. 2.) For if they diligently practised those things which had been mentioned, they should never fall; it would thus be manifest that they were true believers, who would be preserved from total and final apostacy, into which many professed Christians were drawn; and, in proportion to their diligence, they would be kept from the snares of Satan, and from falling into such sins as would be a scandal to the Gospel, and very distressing to themselves. Thus they would be preserved in a comfortable and honourable walk with God, and from all those declensions and failures, into which others were betrayed: and when they left the world, an entrance would be afforded them into "the everlasting kingdom of Christ;" every thing would be so arranged as to conduce to their felicity; they would be favoured at the approach of death with satisfactory assurance that they were going to heaven; they would enter that blessed estate, as a ship comes into harbour, richly laden from a prosperous voyage, with a fair gale and a full tide, carrying it above all impediments, and terminating all its dangers; and they, who were left behind, would have no doubt of their being gone to be with Christ, in his glorious and eternal kingdom. Whereas inconsistent professors of the Gospel would, probably, have darkness and doubt for their companions in the hour of death; others would be disposed to hesitate in respect of the event; and in many ways they must suffer loss, even though they were saved as by fire.—(Note, 1 Cor. iii. 10—15.)

V. 12—15. Seeing things were as had been stated, the apostle assured his brethren that he would not be negligent in his duty; but would embrace every opportunity of putting them in remembrance of these important matters, even though they knew them, and were established especially in that truth which he then inculcated; namely, the necessity of holiness, in order to an abundant entrance into the eternal kingdom of Christ. This was the case with many of them, who would be glad to have their memories refreshed, and their holy affections invigorated, by his animated exhortations: but others might be in a declining or wavering frame of mind; especially as many teachers propagated opinions of a contrary tendency. The apostle, however, deemed it right, and a debt owing to his brethren, whilst he sojourned in the frail body, as in a tabernacle, to stir them up to increasing and persevering diligence in every good work, by putting them in remembrance of those truths which they had before learned, but were too apt to forget. To this he was excited by the assurance that his death approached, when his body would be taken down like a tent, or laid aside as a garment by one who was going to rest: not indeed by a natural dissolution, but by a violent death, as his beloved Lord had showed him long before. (Note, John xxi. 18, 19.) The composure with which Peter, on this occasion, spoke of the very painful death that awaited him, as if it had been no more than putting off his garment or removing his tent, may very properly be contrasted with his terror, and denial of his Lord, when he had been left to himself in order to his humiliation. Until the time of his death should arrive, his chief concern and endeavour would be to use every means, that every individual might, after his decease, have these practical instructions in remembrance: for, though he wrote to the churches in Asia, yet he evidently intended his exhortations for the benefit of Christians in other ages and nations. The insufficiency of oral tradition is clearly shown, by the apostle's earnestness to convey his admonitions in writing.

V. 16—18. The apostle was ready to lay down his life in attestation of the gospel, and earnest to establish others in the faith; because he was conscious and confident, that he, and other ministers of Christ, had not followed artful and ingenious fables, devised for the purpose of soothing men's passions, and gratifying their depraved inclinations; and thus advancing the persons that propagated them, to wealth, authority, or reputation. This had been the nature, intention, and effect of many of the Pagan fictions, and the inventions of Jewish rabbies: and indeed is the object of all those, who invent and propagate false or perverted systems of religion: but there was nothing of the sort in the doctrine taught by the apostles, concerning the power and authority, to which Christ had been advanced in consequence of his crucifixion and resurrection, and the ends for which he reigned; or in what related to his second coming to judge the world, to perfect the salvation of his disciples, and to execute vengeance on his enemies. These doctrines were not suited to please carnal men, or to procure secular advantages to those that taught them; indeed they would certainly offend such, as were not brought by them to repentance, faith, and holiness; but they were authenticated in the most satisfactory manner. For Peter, with James and John, had been eye-witnesses of their Lord's majesty, even during the season appointed for his humiliation: his essential dignity, and his approaching mediatorial exaltation, were manifest, in the splendour of his countenance, and in the appearance of Moses and Elias to surrender up their honours to him, at his transfiguration. But, especially, he received the most distinguishing honour and glory from God the Father, when there was heard from the bright cloud, the symbol of the divine Presence in his transcendent glory, a voice, saying, "This is my beloved Son, in "whom I am well pleased:" and the apostle himself, together with his brethren, had heard this voice from heaven, when he accompanied the Lord Jesus to the mount of transfiguration, which was properly called "holy," from this signal display of the divine majesty upon it. (Notes, &c. Matt. xvii. 1—8.)

V. 19—21. The recollection of the transfiguration of Christ gave great confidence to the apostle, and his testimony concerning it might be a great confirmation of the faith of other Christians: yet they had also "a more sure "word of prophecy." The appearance and voice on the mount were transient, and only three persons witnessed the interesting scene, one of whom had long since been martyred. (Acts xii. 1, 2.) Whatever assurance therefore it might bring to the individuals concerned, it was not so well suited to satisfy the minds of men in general, as the prophecies of Scripture were. These, from the beginning, foretold and described one extraordinary Person, and gave intimations of his birth, character, miracles, doctrines, sufferings, death, resurrection, and exaltation; together with the establishment, extent, prosperity, and duration of his kingdom, and his final coming to judgment: when compared with their accomplishment in Jesus, they constituted a permanent and general proof, that he was the Messiah, the Son of God, and the Saviour of the world, and more powerfully corroborated the doctrine of the apostles, concerning his exaltation and second coming, than any thing which Peter had seen on the mount: and the more this word of prophecy should be considered, the fuller conviction would it communicate. To this, therefore, all, who read the epistle, would do well to give peculiar attention; for it was to be considered as a light shining in a dark place, not only in respect of the total ignorance of the Gentiles, and the comparative darkness of the Mosaic economy, but as the earth was, at all times a dark place, except where the word of God had diffused light in it, by leading men to Christ, the Light of the world. Christians ought therefore to attend to the prophecies of Scripture, for their direction and conviction concerning the truth of the Christian religion, till the Holy Spirit should discover to their souls the glory and excellency of the Gospel, and, by his sanctifying and comfortable influences, give them the dawning of heaven in their hearts; and till the knowledge of Christ, and the experience of his power, truth, and love, had formed within them an assurance and anticipation of the light, holiness, and felicity of the saints, in the presence of their glorified Saviour; even as the morning-star preceded and ushered in the rising sun and the perfect day. (Notes, Prov. iv. 18. Hos. vi. 3. 1 John v. 10.) This inward demonstration of the truth of Christianity would render the external evidences less necessary; as they could no longer doubt of it, when they saw the glory, and tasted the comfort of it, and experienced the truth and power of it in their hearts, and manifested it in their conduct. But, in taking heed to this light, they must first know, as a matter of the greatest importance, that "no prophecy of Scripture was of any "private interpretation." This clause has been variously explained; some render it, ‘of any private impulse,’ as if it related rather to the giving than the interpreting of prophecy: but the word cannot properly be so rendered, as it implies the loosing of a knot: and it would also render the next verse a mere repetition of the same thought, and in the form of a reason assigned for what went before.—Many have opposed the text to the right of private judgment, in order to support a supposed authority inherent some-where in the Church and its ministers, and to make themselves the ultimate object of faith, by fixing the sense of the scriptures for the people: yet, at last, this is as much private interpretation as any other can be; for every Church puts its own meaning upon the word of God, and that often contrary to the truth. Some have referred the words to the general application of scriptural promises by believers to their own case, as being a common property of the Church, and not the appropriate exclusive right of the individuals to whom they were at first given. But the apostle was not discoursing of promises, as his argument related entirely to predictions; and this seems to me to point out the true meaning. The lively imaginations of men often lead them to suppose events to be accomplishments of scriptural prophecies, which in fact have no relation to them: and this way of misapplying them, as fancy, inclination, or passion dictates, has always tended to render them suspected, or disregarded. Instead then of employing a lively imagination, to discover some agreement between our own private concerns, or those of our party and the predictions of scripture, and so pretending to foretell future events from them, we should remember, and be assured, that every prophecy has its precise and determinate meaning, which no human ingenuity can alter. We should therefore exercise our judgment, with proper helps, and in dependence on divine teaching, to discover, as far as we can, the real meaning of the predictions, and the accomplishment of them in the public concerns of Christ and his Church, and in those of the world as connected with the Church: and to rest satisfied with understanding such as have evidently been fulfilled, without too curiously prying into those which appear to be hitherto unaccomplished. Thus the perversion of prophecy would be prevented, and the objections against the argument brought from it, in proof of the divine inspiration of the scriptures, would be answered. The prophecies, which have been already most evidently fulfilled in the Person and salvation of Christ, and in the grand concerns of the Church and of the world, form a most unanswerable demonstration of the truth of Christianity, and the accumulating evidence, arising from the fulfilment of further prophecies from age to age, must at last rouse the attention of the most heedless, and silence the cavils of the most skeptical. But the misapplication of prophecy, as if it were of private interpretation, and as if every man were at liberty to put his own fanciful meaning upon it, only serves to furnish objections, gives the whole an air of uncertainty, and so perplexes the subject. For the prophecy came not in ancient times, at the instance and according to the inclinations of men, nor can it be properly thus interpreted: but the events, to which it related, were fixed in the eternal counsels of God, to be accomplished in their appointed season; holy men of God, who served him and were specially favoured by him, spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit; and they were so far from modelling their predictions according to their inclinations, that they frequently could not discover the meaning of their own words, (Note, 1 Pet. i. 10—12.)—The apostle doubtless intended the prophecies of the Old Testament, but his arguments are equally conclusive respecting those of the New Testament also.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

We should carefully examine, whether our faith be of a like precious nature and efficacy with that of the primitive servants of Jesus Christ: for if we have obtained this inestimable benefit, we are certainly interested in “the righteousness of our God and Saviour;” and grace and peace will be multiplied unto us, in proportion to “our knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord,” till they are perfected in the felicity of heaven. We can expect nothing too great and valuable from him, whose divine power hath already given us all things pertaining to life and godliness, through the knowledge of him, who hath called us by his new-creating Spirit, in order to bring us to his everlasting glory. “Exceedingly great and precious promises” are contained in his holy word; so that if we have that precious faith, which embraces and relies on the promises, and which renders Christ precious to the soul, we possess all that is essentially valuable, and need not desire those trifles which carnal men idolize, as if they comprised the substance of all happiness. But let us remember that these promises were given to us, in order to our being “partakers of a divine nature:” and this will induce us to inquire, whether we really flee from the pollutions which are in the world, through “the lust of the flesh, “the lust of the eye, and the pride of life,” and whether we be really “renewed in the spirit of our minds.” It will also teach us to convert all these promises into prayers for the purifying and transforming grace of the Holy Spirit, to make us indeed partakers more and more of the image of God, in righteousness, goodness, and truth.

V. 5—11.

It is incumbent on us to give all diligence, to add to our faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and charity, that it may appear that we are one with Christ, and with the Father through him. (John xvii. 20—23.) When these graces dwell in the heart, and abound in the conduct, they constitute a consistent, active, and fruitful Christian: and a degree of with his kindness to Noah and Lot, in proof that he would certainly preserve his people, and execute vengeance on the wicked, 4—9. A more particular account of the seducers above-mentioned, of their vile character and practices, and of the hopeless condition of those that were deceived by them, 10—22.

zeal and diligence in good works, to which other men are strangers, will show the excellency of those doctrines which many ignorantly suppose to lead to licentiousness. But the light that is in numbers who profess the Gospel, is darkness; and, whilst they deem themselves more clear-sighted than practical Christians and teachers, their own deficiency, in the graces and good works of true religion, proves them to be blind, or at least very dim-sighted, men who can see nothing but a few things belonging to their own narrow system, without perceiving the enlarged nature and beneficent tendency of the Gospel, who have forgotten that even baptism signifies 'a death unto sin, 'and a new birth unto righteousness,' and that all Christians, by their very profession, are bound 'to mortify all 'evil and corrupt affections, and daily to proceed in all 'virtue and godliness of living.' As therefore so many "are pure in their own eyes, who are not washed from "their filthiness," (Prov. xxx. 12.) and as every one of Christ's apostles bears most decided testimony against such a worthless form of knowledge, such a dead and solitary faith, "we ought the rather to give diligence to make our "calling and election sure." Many indeed presume themselves to be elect, because they believe, in their way, the doctrine of election, though they have no evidence that God hath called them with a holy calling: but, if we would not be deceived, we must diligently make sure to our souls, by the indisputable fruits of the Spirit, that we are called by special grace; and we may thence safely infer our eternal election and our final preservation. It is not said, that if we hold certain doctrines we shall never fall, but, "if we do these things, we shall never fall;" and in the practice of every good work we should wait for, and expect, an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

V. 12—18.

It behooves all ministers, after the example of Peter, diligently, and at all times, to put their hearers in remembrance of the things above mentioned, in connexion with evangelical truth; otherwise they cannot "take them to record, that "they have declared unto them all the counsel of God," however exactly they have preached the doctrines of grace. This is not only necessary with such as are ignorant, or waver, in these matters, but even among those who know them, and are, as to their judgment, established in them; for allowed truths often lie dormant in the mind, except as they are rendered active by animated exhortations; and a carnal mind renders the memory treacherous in this respect, so that it soon loses sight of spiritual instructions. These practical subjects, however, do not generally prove most acceptable to the majority, in congregations where the doctrines of grace are preached: so that ministers will often be tempted to omit them, or to hurry them over in a general and superficial manner, which tends to deceive souls, and to diffuse a false and loose religion. We are therefore bound, in justice to men, as well as in duty to God, as long as we are in these tabernacles, to stir up our people, by putting them in remembrance of the various good works, by which they must glorify God and adorn the Gospel, and to consult what is profitable, rather than what is pleasant to them. For we shall shortly put off these our tabernacles, and nothing can tend so much to produce composure in the prospect, or in the pangs, of death, and in expectation of our great account, as consciousness that we have not sought to please men, or to obtain wealth, reputation, ease, or indulgence, to ourselves, but that we have faithfully and simply served the Lord Jesus Christ, and sought his glory and the salvation of souls, as the great aim of all our labours. Indeed, the speedy approach of death should excite us, not only to prepare to meet it with comfort, but to use every proper means that all around us may have the substance of our instructions in remembrance after our decease. We cannot indeed expect such extensive and permanent success to our feeble and defective endeavours, as attended the writings of inspired men of God; yet, when we are conscious that our testimony tends to lead men to the Scriptures, to Christ, and to holiness, we may hope that abiding good will spring from them; whilst many of the admired productions of ingenious infidels, heretics, and ungodly men, will continue to corrupt the principles, to deprave the morals, and to murder the souls of numbers, from age to age, to the accumulating guilt and condemnation of those who left so fatal a bequest to posterity. For, whatever clamours be made about bigotry and uncharitableness, it is most certain, that they only who preach salvation for sinners through Jesus Christ, and who make known his power and coming to judge the world, are free from the charge of following cunningly-devised fables, and therefore they ought to be the most earnest in their labours, without regarding what the consequence may be respecting their temporal interests. For even those things, of which the apostles, or some of them, were eye-witnesses, concerning the majesty and glory of Christ, and what they heard from the excellent glory, "This is my beloved Son, "in whom I am well pleased," are full of conviction, instruction, and encouragement to us, at this day, to direct and animate us in the work of the Lord.

V. 19—21.

We have not seen or heard such things as apostles did; but we have a more sure word of prophecy, which will satisfy the diligent investigator, even more than any transient miracle could do, as it lies open to every man's examination, and continually becomes more conclusive, by the further accomplishment of its predictions. To this grand evidence of the truth of Christianity, and its great doctrines, every serious inquirer will do well to take heed, especially in this skeptical age, when so many engines are at work, to draw the attention of the unstable from the Gospel, as if it were a cunningly devised fable. In this way, then, let such persons wait, and, taking heed to this light that shineth in a dark place, they will gradually be directed to Christ, and their experience of his power, truth, and love, will be the day-dawn, and "the "day-star arising in their hearts," and a sure earnest and foretaste of everlasting happiness. But in searching the Scriptures, and especially in considering the prophecies and their accomplishment, we should beware of self-confidence, an ungovernable fancy, and the influence of selfish passions. We have indeed a right to judge for ourselves, and to call no man master on earth; but it is requisite we should exercise our judgment with sobriety, modesty, and docility; nor is it generally safe to indulge a fondness for novelty, or to deviate from the approved judgment of eminent servants of God in other ages of the Church, without evident need. Above all, we should examine these subjects with earnest prayer for the teaching of the same Spirit, by whom holy men of God spake their prophecies, that we may be enabled to discover what was his meaning in them, as far as that is good for us. Under his guidance, we shall be kept from interpreting Scripture according to our private fancy, humour, or inclination; we shall discover the relation of all the prophecies to Christ and his Church; and that so many of them have already been fulfilled, that we are fully authorized to expect the accomplishment of all the rest, till his second coming to judge the world, to perfect his people's salvation, and to shut up the wicked in hell, shall fulfil the last of these predictions, to the glory of his truth, power, love, wisdom, and righteousness, and the joy and admiration of all his redeemed people.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—3. As the false prophets opposed the holy men of God under the old dispensation, and, by flattering and deceitful words, obtained a pernicious ascendency over the minds of the people and the rulers of Israel, so there would be false teachers in the Christian Church, who would by similar methods draw off professed Christians from the holy doctrines of the apostles, and other faithful preachers. The deceivers would not at once openly and directly oppose the leading truths of Christianity: but they would work with unsuspected subtlety, and, by degrees, under specious pretences, clandestinely introduce such false doctrines, as tended to subvert the very design of the Gospel; so these would make grievous divisions in the Church, and end in the eternal destruction of those who were deceived by them. For they would deny the Lord that "bought them;" men, professing to believe that the Lord Jesus redeemed the Church with his own blood, and considering themselves as bought with that inestimable price, instead of glorifying him by devoted obedience, would cast off his yoke, renounce his authority, and refuse to have him to reign over them. It is not requisite to understand the apostle as declaring that the Lord Jesus had died, with an express intention of redeeming these very persons; it sufficed for his argument, that they denied him as their Lord, in whom they professed to hope as a Redeemer, as all avowed Antinomians do. Thus Christ sometimes addressed the Pharisees according to their own mistaken notions, and argued with them from their own principles, (Notes, Luke xv. 7. 31.) The inconsistency and baseness of the conduct of these false teachers was evident from their own profession, and it was not the manner of the sacred writers to express themselves with that systematic exactness, which many now affect. (Notes, Rom. xiv. 15—20. 1 Cor. viii. 11.) It appears to me at least very unnatural to explain the words, "the Lord "that bought them," of Israel's redemption from Egypt, which would scarcely have been thought of in this connexion, had not controversy led men to exercise their utmost ingenuity to evade the arguments, and answer the objections of their opponents. Thus, exact system leads men to do violence to the Scriptures, and this deeply injures the cause which they are so anxious to defend. Doubtless Christ intended to redeem those, and those only, whom he foresaw would eventually be saved by faith in him; yet his ransom was of infinite sufficiency, the proposal of it in Scripture is general, and men are continually addressed according to their profession, even when it is intimated that they are not upright in it. (i. 9.) The false teachers, by denying, or refusing to obey him as their Master, whom they pretended to trust in as their Redeemer, and by teaching others such abominable doctrines, were bringing on themselves swift destruction, which would come on them unawares and suddenly. But, in the mean time, many would follow their pernicious ways, or destructions, imbibing their poisonous principles, and copying their base examples; by reason of whom the way of truth would be blasphemed by ignorant persons, who would conclude that Christians in general held such licentious doctrines, and that they secretly indulged themselves in wickedness, though only some of them were detected, or were bold enough to avow it. In this manner, by flattery and false pretences to love, zeal, and attachment to evangelical doctrines, they would pay court to men's passions and carnal inclinations, in order to gratify their own avarice; and so they would carry on a base merchandise for the souls of the people, consigning them to destruction in order to enrich themselves. But, whilst they thus prospered by their damnable heresies, and hoped for impunity in their crimes, the punishment intended for them had long before been predicted, the place of torment had been of old prepared, the judgment by which they would be condemned did not linger, and the vengeance of God, which would certainly consign them to eternal destruction, did by no means slumber. Indeed, the Lord bore with them in his long-suffering, till his own holy purposes should be effected, and their measure of iniquity filled up: and they inferred, that the predicted judgment lingered, and the threatened damnation slumbered; but the event would soon awfully undeceive them. (iii. 4.) Learned men have maintained discordant opinions concerning the heretics, whom the apostle especially intended: but, probably, he used general language, designedly, that the description might suit various kinds of false teachers, in that and in future ages.

V. 4—9. The method, in which the Lord used to proceed in such cases, might evidently be collected from examples. When angels, who were created of a far superior order to men, sinned against God, he showed them no mercy, and exercised no compassion towards them; but, on the first instance of their rebellion, he cast them, as guilty and polluted, from his holy habitation in heaven, and allotted them their residence and portion in hell, even in that place of torment, which his righteous vengeance had prepared for them, and their great ringleader in rebellion. (Matt. xxv. 41.) Thus they were bound as criminals, and reserved to take their trial at the day of judgment, when sentence will be openly passed and finally executed upon them; in the mean time their incurable enmity and wickedness, and the omnipresent and omnipotent justice of God, hold them fast, as in chains of darkness, misery, and despair, from which there can be no possible escape. Their doom is therefore irreversible: though the Lord, for wise reasons, as it were, lengthens their chains, enlarges the bounds of their prison, and defers the extremity of their punishment; which respite and relaxation they employ in opposing to the uttermost his purposes of love to mankind, and in attempting their destruction. But this will all be overruled for the fuller display of God's glory, the accomplishment of his eternal counsels, and the more conspicuous exercise of his awful justice, in the everlasting misery of such implacable enemies. Thus he would also bear with the wicked seducers above mentioned, till their impiety and enmity were sufficiently evinced: and when his wise and holy purposes were accomplished, he would execute deserved vengeance upon them and their adherents, and so terminate the temptation to which his people were exposed through their artifices. The same instructions might be deduced from the Lord's dealings with the old world. He had indeed preserved Noah, the eighth person; (seven others having been saved with him, for his sake, in the ark which he had prepared;) and during the hundred and twenty years of his long-suffering, Noah had been a preacher of righteousness to that corrupt generation among whom he lived, which must have exposed him to manifold trials and temptations, as none, that we know of, were brought to repentance, faith in the promised Saviour, and obedience to God, by his long continued labours. So that, at length, the Lord executed the vengeance denounced, and spared none of all the millions who then lived on earth, but by bringing in the deluge he destroyed them all; "and Noah only re-"mained alive, and they that were with him in the ark." (Notes, &c. Gen. vi. vii. viii. Heb. xi. 7. 1 Pet. iii. 19, 20.) In like manner, the Lord, after having long borne with the extreme wickedness of Sodom, till their measure of sin was filled up, at length, when they did not at all expect it, sent fire from heaven to burn their cities and all the inhabitants of them; that the tremendous overthrow to which they were condemned, might be a solemn warning and an instructive example to all those in future ages, who should live in ungodliness and wickedness. (Notes, Gen. xix.) Yet at the same time the Lord delivered, in a most gracious and wonderful manner, "right-"eous Lot" from the destruction of his neighbours: for though he had been very faulty in many respects, and was severely corrected, yet, being a true believer and a justified servant of God, he was taken care of, and brought out of Sodom before it was destroyed. He had indeed, from carnal motives, gone to reside in that wicked place, and had very pertinaciously adhered to the foolish choice which he had made; (Notes, Gen. xiii. xiv.) but he was extremely uneasy there, being continually vexed and harassed by the filthy conduct and discourse of the abandoned Sodomites, and their clamorous and furious opposition to his counsels and instructions. What he saw and heard of their unlawful and hateful crimes caused his righteous mind daily vexation and inquietude, seeing he could not prevail in any degree to stop the inundation of their wickedness. But this disposition to hate, avoid, and be troubled for the sins of his neighbours, joined to his general conduct, proved him to be a pious man; and therefore, whilst he was stripped of his possessions, as a correction for his sin, and his family was either destroyed or greatly corrupted and disgraced by means of it, the Lord mercifully snatched him, as a brand out of the burning, and saved him from so perilous and ensnaring a situation. These examples, therefore, sufficiently showed, that the Lord knew how, in the best time and manner, to deliver the godly out of temptation; to rescue them from the most formidable dangers in the critical moment; to distinguish the most feeble and defective of them from their ungodly neighbours; and to arrange all his dispensations in the best manner for their salvation. This he hath engaged to do, and his wisdom must be trusted to select the best time and manner of performing his faithful promises, which cannot fail, whatever appearances may be. But he also knows how "to reserve the unrighteous to the day of "judgment to be punished:" whilst he bears with them, and permits them to prosper in vice, they are bound, as it were, in the chains of their sins, and shut up in the dungeon of his immutable justice, till the day of his wrath; then will he bring them forth to judgment, and execute on them the most terrible punishment, because of his long patience with them, and their perverse abuse of it. The word rendered "cast them down to hell," (4,) is not used in any other part of the New Testament, or the Greek translation of the Old; yet the meaning of it must not be sought from the fables of heathen poets, but from the general tenour of the sacred scriptures.

V. 10, 11. The preceding observations were applicable to all wicked men, but especially to hypocritical professors and false teachers of Christianity: yet they were, and would be, peculiarly verified in the licentious seducers of whom the apostle discoursed, and in that of their abandoned followers. These persons habitually "walked after the flesh," and indulged their sensual appetites "in the lust of uncleanness;" as if they had proposed to themselves the inhabitants of Sodom for an example: and while they exercised no government over their own passions and inclinations, they despised the government of others. They denied Christ, in respect of his kingly office, and would not obey him as their Lord and Master, (1;) and we may suppose, that they contemptuously disregarded the spiritual authority of the apostles, and other pastors and rulers of the church: but they seem also to have treated civil government with scorn, as if they were determined, like genuine "sons of "Belial," to cast off every yoke, and to be wholly their own masters! For they were presumptuous, self-confident, destitute of any due regard to God, aspiring to pre-eminence, and supposing themselves authorized to do whatever they chose. They were also self-willed, determined to follow the impulse of their own mind; proudly set against counsel, not to be influenced by argument, disregarding all consequences, and bent upon their own rash and foolish purposes. They were, therefore, not afraid to revile dignities, in a slanderous manner; and, instead of honouring the persons and authority of those in exalted stations, according to the word of God, and as his ministers, and representatives; they calumniated and railed at them without fear of consequences: while, doing these things under the pretence of religion, they exposed Christianity to scandal, and gave plausibility to the accusations and persecutions of their enemies. (Note, 1 Pet. ii. 13—17.) But angels, who were far greater and more powerful than men, and perfect in holiness, did not act thus in respect of the governors of the earth: for, though, as ministers of Providence, they reported to the Lord the execution of their commission, with respect to kings and rulers; they did not bring any virulent or bitter accusations against them; but stated facts as they were, and respected them as God's vicegerents; though they could not but abhor the crimes, which they often witnessed, and sometimes were employed to punish. So that, the professors of Christianity, who slandered and reviled dignities, did not copy the example of holy angels; but rather that of Satan, the false accuser of men in the presence of God.

V. 12—14. The hypocrites, here described, were like natural brute beasts, which, being bent on the gratification of their appetites, rage against all who oppose them, and are ready to devour them: and as wild beasts seem made only to be taken and destroyed, to prevent the havoc which they would otherwise make of the human species; so these seducers would certainly expose themselves to destruction; nay, they would be proscribed as nuisances, and enemies to the community. Satan had caught them with his baits, and taken them captive at his will, and they were in the way to eternal destruction: for, being impatient of counsel or control, they uttered vehement revilings against the persons, authority, laws, and measures of their rulers, which they were incompetent to understand, or had never sufficiently examined: and in so doing, they not only incurred the displeasure of princes, but that of God also, and thus would utterly perish by their own corrupt practices. For, notwithstanding their vain conceit of imagined privileges, they would certainly "receive the reward of unrighteousness," seeing their pleasure was not sought in obeying God, but in riotous feastings and intemperance, in which they indulged, even during the light of the day, without shame or remorse. They were, therefore, spots and blemishes, that deformed and disgraced those Christian societies which did not expel them, whilst they wantonly sported themselves, and indulged a kind of insulting triumph, in their own deceivings, as if they were the chief favourites of heaven, and persons uncommonly illuminated in the grace and liberty of the Gospel; when in fact they were not believers at all; and were thus boasting and exulting on the brink of destruction. So that, while they partook with Christians of the Lord's supper, or joined in the religious feasts in which the rich and poor ate together in a loving manner, their conduct was so shameful, that they reflected scandal on the whole company with which they associated. For, besides their riot, luxury, and excess, "their eyes were "full of adultery," or "of an adulteress," as if their infamous paramours had never been out of their sight; so constantly were their imaginations employed about, and their desires fixed on, their habitual wicked practices! Nay, they "could not cease from sin;" not from external constraint, or natural inability, (which would have been an extenuation of their guilt,) but from the violence of their ungoverned passions, and the strength of their long-continued habits of vice, through which they were perfectly enslaved to their lusts, and indeed judicially given up to a reprobate mind. But, notwithstanding all their wickedness, they pleaded so speciously and confidently for their corrupt principles, and so extenuated or apologized for their crimes, that they beguiled very many professed Christians, who were not established in knowledge, faith, grace, and experience. Thus they supported the expense of their sensualities, by flattering and quieting men's consciences in the indulgence of their passions: as their hearts were exercised with covetous practices, and they constantly employed themselves in devising artful methods of obtaining money from their deluded followers, till, inured to such base pursuits, they felt no remorse about them, which showed them to be "the children "of a curse," and exposed to the wrath of God for their multiplied abominations.

V. 15, 16. The persons described by the apostle had evidently forsaken the right way of holy obedience from evangelical principles, and were gone astray, not merely from an erroneous judgment, but from the sensuality, ambition, and avarice of their hearts; so that they followed the example of Balaam, the son of Beor, (or Bosor,) who so "loved the wages of unrighteousness," that he endeavoured, in disobedience to the injunction of Jehovah, to go unto Balak, and curse the people whom God had blessed. But he was rebuked for his iniquity, not by the immediate voice of God, nor by one of his prophets, but by the ass on which he rode, which, though naturally dumb, was yet miraculously enabled to speak, that by so despised a creature God might, in the most mortifying manner, forbid the prophet, who was very proud of his visions and revelations, to proceed in his infatuated course of rebellion. (Notes, Num. xxii. xxiv. xxxi. 8—16.)

V. 17. The teachers whom the apostle exposed were like wells from which men expected to draw water, but which could only disappoint their expectations: (Marg. Ref.) they were as clouds which gave hopes of fructifying rains, but, instead of yielding any advantage to others, they were themselves carried about with tempestuous winds. Thus these teachers were driven about, with their own passions, and by every wind of doctrine, from one false opinion to another: for indeed they were given up by God to final obduracy, as the mist, the dimness, and dismay of darkness, or of wickedness, despair, and misery, was reserved for them as their everlasting portion.

V. 18, 19. These men were not only very wicked themselves, but the cause of sin and ruin to others.—Whilst they spake swelling and pompous words, which had no meaning, except as they showed the vain-glory and ostentation of their hearts: yet they allured, by their confident boasting and specious pretensions, such professed Christians as were glad to suppose, that the lusts of the flesh, and much wantonness or lasciviousness, could consist with the salvation of the Gospel; and so they drew off those, who had actually, as to their outward conduct, escaped from among those who lived in error, but who abstained from their former indulgences only from fear, while their unrenewed hearts still hankered after them. But whilst they paid court to the carnal minds of hypocrites, by promising them liberty from every yoke, as if the service of God had not been the most perfect freedom, they themselves were the "slaves of corruption," or of the most corrupt and vile affections, as it was a general rule, that a man must become the bond-servant of him, by whom he was vanquished and taken captive. They were evidently vanquished, taken captive, and enslaved by the devil and their own lusts, and it was impossible that they could lead their followers to any better condition.

V. 20—22. If professed Christians, having escaped the outward pollutions of the world, by the knowledge of Christ, as far as convictions and a notional faith could reach, (1. 4.) were again, by the artful seductions of false teachers, entangled in those polluting practices, as consistent with the service of Christ, and so overcome as habitually to indulge in their corrupt inclinations, their latter end, after they had learned thus to abuse the Gospel, would be far worse than the beginning, when they sinned in ignorance, as they must have done violence to far clearer light and fuller conviction. It would therefore have been better for such wretched heretics, hypocrites, or apostates, if they had never known the way of righteousness, and the truths, promises, and precepts of Christianity, than, after all their instructions, convictions, and profession, to turn in avowed disobedience from the holy commandment to repent of their sins, to believe in Christ, and to love and obey him, as this would leave them more deeply condemned and completely hardened. But it was not to be wondered at, that teachers of this character made many proselytes; for it had happened unto them according to the true proverb of Solomon, (Note, Prov. xxvi. 11.) and to another of similar import; the one of which hath been explained, and the other is too obvious to need explanation. They are the two most disgusting and loathsome emblems which the whole animal race can suggest, and are adduced to illustrate the filthiness of those, who, after convictions, professed repentance, and reformation, returned back to wickedness, because their carnal hearts loved it. But if the power of God should change the swine into a sheep, (the emblem of the regenerate) though it might be thrown into the mire, yet it could no more wallow in it with delight, but must be most uncomfortable till cleansed from it. (Notes, Matt. xii. 43—45. Luke xi. 24—26. Heb. vi. 4--10. x. 26---38.) The difference between this chapter and the rest of Peter's epistles, in the style and manner, and its coincidence with that of Jude, have made several expositors suppose, that both of them borrowed their language from some ancient book which is now lost; but of this every reader must judge for himself.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The unbelief, selfishness, and impiety, of man's carnal heart always give an opening to false teachers, who speak smooth things to draw away disciples after them, for their own credit, or lucre's sake; and, alas! many in general "turn away their ears from the truth, and are turned unto "fables," who liberally reward ingenious men for helping them to deceive themselves. Hence it hath come to pass, both in the Jewish and the Christian church, that men have arisen, who have found their account in corrupting the humbling holy truth of God, by "privily bringing in damnable heresies:" who have denied and cast off obedience to the authority of the Lord, whilst they professed to glory in his special favour and abundant mercy, and have attempted to separate the redemption and the commandments of the Lord Jesus, and to expect pardon through his blood, whilst they yielded no obedience to his laws! Thus they deceive themselves and others, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. These specious refinements, while they seem to some persons the Gospel of free grace in all its purity, are in fact "damnable heresies," which finally ruin all who follow such pernicious ways; and also cause the way of truth to be evil spoken of by those, who see the bad tendency and effects of these delusions, and charge them on all who preach and profess the doctrines of salvation by grace alone. The sober teachers of practical and experimental Christianity need not be surprised, to find their hearers drawn from them by these specious and lax preachers; for even in the primitive times, before miracles ceased, their delicious poison found many purchasers, and their merchandise of souls by feigned words brought in ample gains; whilst love of the truth and of the brethren were the pretence, but covetousness was the concealed principle, of their conduct. In vain do men of this character hope to escape with impunity: the judgment so long since foretold, and the damnation menaced, will speedily arrive, though unbelief may suppose that the justice of God lingereth and slumbereth, because he "endures with "much long-suffering the vessels of wrath, which are "fitted for destruction." His manifold goodness, if it do not lead men to repentance, and engage them to obedience, will no more secure them from condemnation, than the creating kindness of God to angels induced him to spare such of them as sinned in heaven itself; but "as "he cast them down to hell, to be reserved in chains of "darkness to the day of judgment," to be punished, so will he in due season execute the vengeance that is written, on all impenitent sinners. The destruction of the antediluvian world and its millions of inhabitants, and that of Sodom and Gomorrah, stand on record, to confute the vain notions of those, who imagine that God is so lenient, that he will not take vengeance on his rebellious creatures.—But his mercy does indeed shine forth conspicuously in preserving Noah and his family, and in delivering him from the flood, and from that perverse generation, to whom he was so long a most unsuccessful preacher of righteousness; but still more in rescuing Lot, and dealing with him as a righteous man, notwithstanding all the blemishes of his character. Yet his vexation in Sodom, and his escape with the loss of every thing, except his life, from that devoted city, loudly warn us to keep separate, as much as possible, from ungodly connexions, if we would avoid the most heart-rending anguish, and the most painful corrections. But, if we indeed fear, trust, love, and endeavour to obey the Lord, we should recollect, in all our conflicts and trials, that "he knoweth how to deliver "the godly out of temptation," that he hath ten thousand ways of rescuing us, of which we never thought, and that his wisdom and power will surely effect the purposes of his love, and the engagements of his truth; whilst wicked men often escape suffering here, because they are reserved to the day of judgment, to be punished with the devil and his angels.

V. 10—14.

While we take encouragement from the tender mercies of our God, let us also stand in awe of his holiness and justice. None have more cause to tremble than they who are emboldened to gratify their sinful lusts by presuming on his grace and mercy; nor can any thing more fully illustrate the desperate wickedness of the human heart, than the abominations in which men have wallowed, whilst professing to be religious, and while contending for the holy doctrines of the Gospel! Many, both in ancient and modern times, have deemed themselves at liberty to walk after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness, and have despised governments of all kinds, as if licentiousness and anarchy were the only desirable freedom, presumption and self-will equivalent to holy confidence and boldness in the Lord, and calumnies or revilings against the powers that be, the proper way of "rendering "to Cesar the things that are Cesar's, and to God the "things that are God's!" Such liberty of conscience, and licence of speech and conduct, holy angels, who are greater in power and might, never desired. If we were more like them, we should be more cautious in speaking and acting, and more scrupulous not to bring a railing accusation against our governors, though we could not approve of either their character or their measures. But there have been, in every age, professors of the Gospel, who have acted "like natural brute beasts, made to be "taken and destroyed," who have deemed themselves authorized to "speak evil of those things which they "did not understand." And if they ventured to speak evil of the divine law, and deemed themselves freed from all obligation to obey it, can we wonder that they would cast off every yoke, discard all subordination, level all distinctions, and disdain subjection to every human authority, which must be defective and liable to blame? But let Christians stand at a distance from such contests; for, alas! many professors of the Gospel, running into such excesses, bring their characters into suspicion, and open the mouths of those who speak evil of us, as of evil-doers; nay, many utterly perish in their own corruption. Especially let us fear a licentious profession; doubtless they "will receive "the reward of unrighteousness, who count it pleasure to "riot in the day time." These are indeed "the spots and "blemishes" of the Church, who "sport themselves in their "own deceivings," who join with Christians in sacred ordinances, and with the world in their licentious and dissipated revels, and who attempt to reconcile these things by perverting the doctrines of the Gospel, and boasting of their liberty and privileges. But could it have been conceived, if Scripture and facts had not evinced it, that teachers and professors of the holy doctrine of Christ could preserve their confidence, credit, and influence, whilst "their eyes "are full of adultery, and while they cannot cease from "sin?" that unstable souls could be beguiled by such men? and that success should attend the covetous practices in which their hearts are exercised? Or that they should be considered as blessed, who are indeed the children of the curse, and evidently described as such in the word of God?

example and from his principle, because they loved the wages of unrighteousness; but they will be rebuked for their iniquity and punished for their madness, with as much contempt and severity as he was. Being "wells "without water, and clouds carried about" as the wind of favour or lucre changes, it is too plain that to them "the "mist of darkness is reserved for ever." They who would escape these deceivers, should consider, that they abound in high-swelling words of vain boasting and ostentation, and speak of themselves, as if wisdom and knowledge belonged exclusively to them, at the same time that they give great indulgence to the lusts of the flesh; thus they allure, with the hope of sensual gratification, and impunity in it, such stony-ground hearers, as, under convictions and transient affections, had escaped for a time from those that live in error. Persons of this description, not valuing the liberty of obeying the commandments of God, are disposed to listen to those who promise them liberty of another sort, and assure them that their practical instructors had held them in bondage; and thus antinomian tenets are embraced, as a covert way of returning to the world and sin, and as a more specious and quiet kind of apostacy. For the liberty promised by those who are overcome by their own lusts and passions, can be no other than licentiousness; and if after men have "escaped the pollutions of the world, by the knowledge "of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again "entangled" in such delusions, and brought under the dominion of their lusts, "the latter end is worse with "them than the beginning;" nor is such a departure from practical Christianity to antinomian principles and behaviour less fatal than an open apostacy, as it serves to keep conscience entirely asleep, perhaps more effectually than any opiate in the world. It is evident, therefore, that it would have been better for such men, if they had continued ignorant of the Gospel, than thus to pervert it to their own deeper condemnation, and the ruin of others along with them. Yet, alas! how many are there, who thus verify the true proverb, by "turning as the dog to his own "vomit again, and as a sow that is washed to her wallow-"ing in the mire!" But this shall never happen to any, who are "in Christ new creatures," and made partakers of a divine nature. Let us then pray continually, "Create "in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit "within me:" let us remember, that a "holy com-"mandment" is given to us, as well as exceedingly "great and precious promises;" let us beware of turning from the precepts, as much as of rejecting the truths, of Christianity; and let us equally avoid antinomian corrupters, and pharisaical opposers of the Gospel, as being alike the enemies of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—4. This second epistle appears, by the opening of this chapter, to have been primarily addressed to the same churches as the former, though they were not mentioned at the beginning of it. It was the design of the apostle, in both of them, not so much to instruct them in truths which they had not learned, as to stimulate and animate their pure, sincere, and upright minds to practise their duty, by recalling to their remembrance the truths and precepts which they had been taught; lest remaining sinfulness, temptation, forgetfulness, and the artifices of false teachers, should turn them aside from it. He therefore wrote to them, in order to make them mindful of the words which the holy prophets of old had spoken, concerning the salvation and kingdom of Christ, and of the commandment which had been given them by him, and the other apostles of their Lord and Saviour, to prepare for his coming to judgment, with patient expectation and diligence in their several duties. Of this they needed to be admonished, as they ought to know in the first place, and as a matter of chief importance, that under the Christian dispensation, and after some time had elapsed, there would certainly come among them a set of scornful men, endeavouring to subvert their faith, by deriding their expectation of the coming of Christ to judgment, and treating the great truths of the Gospel with infidel contempt and profane ridicule, whilst they indulged without restraint the several carnal inclinations of their own evil hearts. These persons would insolently demand, What was become of the promise which the Lord had left them, that he would appear a second time among them, to complete their salvation and destroy their enemies? Had it not manifestly failed? And would they suffer themselves to be any longer imposed on, or continue to adhere to his self-denying, persecuted religion? For it could not be denied, that since the fathers, (the primitive teachers and professors of Christianity, or the ancient patriarchs and prophets, to whom it was first revealed,) had fallen asleep, all things had continued, in respect of the returning seasons, and other outward dispensations, as they had been used to do from the beginning of the world, without any material alteration answerable to the extraordinary things, which had been spoken on that subject.

6 Whereby [o] the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished:

7 But [p] the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire, [q] against the day of judgment, [r] and perdition of ungodly men.

8 But, beloved, [s] be not ignorant of this one thing, [t] that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.

9 The Lord [u] is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness; [x] but is long-suffering to us-ward, [y] not willing that any should perish, [z] but that all should come to repentance.

V. 5—7. The scorners of whom the apostle wrote, (some of whom seem to have been even then endeavouring to corrupt the church,) were willingly ignorant of the scriptural account of the creation, and of the dealings of God with men in former ages; for they perversely withdrew their attention from such subjects, because they tended to confute their self-conceited and profligate infidelity, and to confirm the doctrine of a future judgment. Otherwise, they would have known from the books of Moses, that the heavens and the earth were originally created by the omnipotent word of God, who "spake, and "it was done, who commanded, and it stood fast;" and that the earth, especially, was formed out of the chaos, which had been previously brought into existence for that purpose, the dry ground being, at the command of God, separated from the waters, which retired to the channels prepared for them. Thus the earth, with its productions and inhabitants, as distinguished from the seas, "stood up out of and above the water;" but it was surrounded by the water, which was needful to moisten, purify, and render it fruitful. Yet, when the wickedness of men had provoked the Lord to execute vengeance on them, this very arrangement, in itself so conducive to the welfare of mankind, became the means of their destruction: for all the parts of the globe being deeply covered with waters, by the omnipotence of God, the world that then was perished; all the inhabitants of the dry land, and all the works of men, were entirely destroyed; nothing remained "but Noah, and they that were with him in the "ark;" the external form of the earth was no doubt extremely altered, and a new race of inhabitants were raised up, to people it. At the same time, the Lord promised and covenanted never more to destroy the earth by an universal deluge; yet intimations had been given of a total dissolution, which was to terminate the present state of things; (Note, Ps. cii. 26. Is. li. 6.) and it had, under the New Testament dispensation, been more expressly revealed that this was to be effected by fire. It might therefore be said that the visible heavens, and the earth, with all the lower creation, were condemned to be destroyed by fire, and, by the word of God, which could not be broken, were treasured up as fuel for the general conflagration. This would certainly take place about the same time with the great day of judgment, which would prove "the "day of perdition to ungodly men," who would then be "punished with everlasting destruction." (Note, 2 Thes. i. 8—10.) The event was therefore certain; and the same power was engaged to effect it, which had created the world, destroyed it with the deluge, restored it to its present form, and still continued to uphold it in that state.

V. 8. Whatever scoffers were willingly ignorant of, or perversely cavilled at, as if delays were failures, or respites impunity, Christians must not be ignorant of that one thing, which tended to clear up all the rest; namely, that the divisions of time among men bear no proportion to eternity, with which all the counsels and purposes of God are immediately connected. One day, therefore, and a thousand years, are with him the same thing; for as every event comes to pass at the time which he hath appointed for it, so the intervention of a thousand years is no more than one day, in respect of those things which he will most assuredly accomplish in their season.

V. 9. It must then by no means be supposed that the Lord was slack, or dilatory, concerning the performance of his promise, as some men, (both profane unbelievers and impatient believers,) might understand the word; but, in fact, the delay of judgment was the effect of his long-suffering towards the church and the human race. (Note, Matt. xxiv. 48—51.) He patiently endured the provocations of the wicked, and even the scornful defiance of infidels, because he would not be influenced by their crimes to terminate the present state of things, till all his chosen people were brought to repentance, and prepared for the kingdom; as he was not willing that any of them should perish. Nay, as he delighted not in the death of a sinner, but rather that he should repent and live, so his long-suffering gave sinners space for repentance; and as all things were ready, and all were invited, yea, commanded to repent, so, in this sense, God had shown himself unwilling that any should perish, and willing that all should come to repentance, though many would pervert his long-suffering, to their deeper condemnation. Men's impenitence arises from their unwillingness to return to God, not from his unwillingness to receive them; and therefore he is doubtless willing, that all who are so disposed should come to repentance, and be saved. Many, that were Christians at the time when the apostle wrote, owed their salvation to the long-suffering of God, who thus gave them time, as well as grace, for repentance; and even some of those who were then objecting to the delay of Christ's coming, as if it invalidated the truth of the Gospel, might at length be converted, and know that "God was not willing that "they should perish, but that they should come to repent-"ance." These are two distinct, but consistent, views which may be taken of the subject: the one accords to the condition of sinners, when first taught to attend to the word of salvation; to them, the long-suffering of God, the provisions of the Gospel, the general invitations, the command to all men to repent, and the promises that none shall be cast out who come to Christ, are so many

10 But [a] the day of the Lord will come [b] as a thief in the night; [c] in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and [d] the elements shall [e] melt with fervent heat, [f] the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burned up.

11 Seeing then that [g] all these things shall be dissolved, [h] what manner of persons ought ye to be [i] in all holy conversation and [k] godliness, assurances, that the Lord is not willing that any (who seek salvation,) should perish, but that sinners of all descriptions should come to repentance; and that they who repent do that which pleases him, and shall be accepted. But the other refers to God; "known unto "whom are all his works from before the foundation of "the world;" and, according to it, the established believer ascribes his willingness to repent to special grace, and acknowledges that, if he had been left to himself, he should have perished in obstinate love of sin and enmity to God, as numbers of his fellow-sinners do.

12 [l] Looking for, and [*] hastening unto, [m] the coming of the day of God, wherein [n] the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall [o] melt with fervent heat?

V. 10—13. Though delays seemed to be made, whilst the Lord waited to complete the counsels of his wisdom and mercy, and to render the implacable enmity of impenitent sinners manifest to the whole creation, yet his great and terrible day would certainly come suddenly, when not expected, and with most surprising consternation, and inevitable destruction to all that were found unprepared. (Notes, &c. Matt. xxiv. 42—44. 1 Thes. v. 2, 3.) At that important catastrophe, the heavens, and all the hosts of them, (as far, at least, as connected with this earth and its inhabitants,) will pass away, and rush into confusion and destruction, with a tremendous noise, of which thunders, earthquakes, and all other convulsions of nature, are wholly inadequate to give the least conception. Then all the elements, of which the earth and its atmosphere, and all the luminaries connected with it, are composed, shall melt with intense heat; and not only one vast city, or one whole nation, but the earth, with all its cities, forests, mountains, yea, the contents of its bowels to the very centre, as well as all the works of men, however admired or magnificent, which cover the surface of it, shall constitute one vast conflagration, and be reduced to as confused a chaos, as that from which it was at first created. As, therefore, all those things, which were then the objects of their senses, and the coveted, admired, or envied possessions of men, would certainly be dissolved and perish, as to their present mode of existence, "what manner of persons ought they to "be, in all holy conversation and godliness?" For it must be evident, that, at the period referred to, they who had no treasure secured in heaven, nor any interest in him as a Saviour, who would then come as the Judge of the world, would be most miserable. Ought not Christians therefore to be continually "looking for," and preparing to welcome that solemn season, called "the day of God;" hastening to have all ready to meet him with comfort, and even longing for the solemn catastrophe which would perfect their felicity? Though it was in itself so terrible to think of "the heavens being on fire and dissolved, "and the elements melting with heat," yet the Gospel suggested such consolations, and inspired such hopes, that believers had no reason for terror or uneasiness; for, though all other inheritances and distinctions must then be terminated, yet they, according to the sure word of God's promise, looked for and expected "new "heavens and a new earth," another and far more glorious and blessed state of things, and an abiding habitation, into which righteous persons alone could find admission, and in which all the inhabitants would be perfected in purity, obedience, and love of each other; so that no sin could enter, to defile or disquiet them, to all eternity. In some Scriptures, "new heavens and a new earth" seem figuratively to describe the most prosperous and peaceful days of the church on earth; (Notes, Is. lxv. 17. lxvi. 22. Heb. xii. 26.) but here the state of the righteous after the day of judgment, and the dissolution of this present world, are evidently intended; but what is meant in various particulars, the fulfilment alone can fully explain.

V. 14—16. From the preceding considerations, the apostle took occasion to exhort his beloved brethren, who professed to believe and look for such things, to prove that they really did so, by diligence in every duty and means of grace; that they might be found of Christ, at his coming, in peace with God, their own consciences, each other, and all men; being also "without spot, and "blameless." For if they thus evinced themselves interested in the perfect righteousness of Christ, by the diligent obedience of faith and love, they would certainly be then presented faultless before God, and as perfect in regard to sanctification as justification. They ought also "to account the long-suffering of the Lord to be salvation." Every day that their lives were spared gave them the opportunity, of diligently seeking "to make their "calling and election sure;" mere professors of Christianity had space afforded them, to seek a real experience of the work of divine grace; and the goodness of God was suited, and intended, to lead sinners to repentance. All therefore who read the epistle, ought to "account "the long-suffering of the Lord to be salvation," as they owed it to that alone, that they were not then in the place of despair and final misery, instead of the land of hope, of prayer, and forgiveness; or in the way of peace and salvation. Thus the apostle observed, that his beloved brother Paul also had written to them to the same effect, according to the wisdom which God had bestowed on him. The affectionate and highly respectful language, here used by St. Peter, concerning the apostle of the Gentiles, who was supposed to differ from him in some points of doctrine, and who had openly rebuked his dissimulation at Antioch, is peculiarly worthy of observation. The fourth and fifth verses of the Epistle to the Romans are generally supposed to be intended; but it is not obvious, in what sense these could be said to be written to those whom St. Peter addressed. They, therefore, who suppose that he wrote to the Jewish converts exclusively, point out some passages in the Epistle to the Hebrews, to which they think he alluded; (ix. 27, 28, x. 36, 37;) but that epistle was directly addressed to the churches in Judea, and not to the Jewish converts in Asia. The apostolical epistles, indeed, were written to some particular churches, or description of Christians; yet they were intended for general instruction; and as Peter had read the epistles of Paul, so they, to whom he wrote, had probably done the same, even in respect of those that were addressed to other churches. The false teachers, whom Peter opposed, seem to have grounded their damnable heresies on a misinterpretation of some passages in St. Paul's epistles, which might appear to many contrary to Peter's exhortations: so that the general tenour of St. Paul's epistles to some of the Asiatic churches, or of that to the Hebrews, rather than detached expressions, seems to have been meant; for certainly, when properly understood, they are as exhortatory and practical as St. Peter's. Indeed, the apostle observed that this was the case in all his epistles, (as those to the Romans, the Corinthians, the churches in Macedonia, and to Timothy and Titus:) for in them all, he spoke of the coming of Christ, and the preparation to be made for it, with warnings and admonitions to different descriptions of persons. Yet in these epistles, connected with plainer subjects, were some things hard to be understood; namely, such as related to the divine decrees, and the deep dispensations of ihs government; and the sovereignty of his grace in saving some, and leaving others to be hardened: for of these doubtless Peter principally spake. Such things would not be properly understood, except by those who had come to some maturity in knowledge, grace and experience, and who received them in humble and simple faith and love. "The unlearned and unstable," therefore, even such as were untaught in the school of Christ, or unteachable through pride, prejudice, and carnal passions, and unestablished in faith and by sanctifying grace, wrested, or perverted them, by a forced and unnatural interpretation, inconsistent with the context and the apostle's general doctrine; and adduced them in support of their proud, corrupt, and licentious principles and conduct: and thus they compassed their own destruction. But this perversion of St. Paul's writings, (which Peter evidently speaks of as a part of the sacred scriptures,) must not be charged on the epistles themselves; but on those who thus perverted them contrary to their real meaning and tendency: for they did the same also with the other scriptures, both the books of the Old Testament and as many of the New Testament as were then extant, and allowed to be of divine authority; for proud, carnal, ambitious, covetous, or licentious men, could wrest some things in any of them to a seeming agreement with their pernicious doctrines, and so pervert them to their own destruction; in the same manner, as they made a fatal use of the mysterious subjects which St. Paul discoursed on. It was therefore proper to warn and instruct men to read them with humility and a teachable spirit; and not to perplex themselves with hard things, till they were established in such as were more plain. But this was no reason why either St. Paul's epistles or the other scriptures should be laid aside, or put out of sight: for men left to themselves abuse every good gift of God, and the corruption of the best things becomes the worst. 'The 'persons, to whom Peter's epistles were written, were 'for the most part Paul's converts.' 'Of this vice,' (wresting the scriptures,) 'they are most commonly 'guilty, who, from the pride of understanding, will re'ceive nothing but what they can explain. Whereas 'the humble and teachable receive the declarations of 'revelation, according to their plain, grammatical, un'constrained meaning; which it is their only care to 'attain, by reading the scriptures frequently and with 'attention.' (Macknight.) He should have added, 'and 'with prayer.'

V. 17, 18. As the Christians, whom Peter addressed, had been previously instructed and warned concerning these things, they ought to be upon their guard against the insinuations of deceivers, and to beware of the rock on which so many had split; lest, being drawn from the simplicity of believing obedience to the Lord Jesus, through the errors and delusions of wicked men, especially of those licentious teachers whom he had before described, they should fall from that steadfast adherence to the truths of the Gospel, that constant profession of faith, and that uniform course of consistent behaviour, which they had hitherto maintained, and which constituted a steadfastness peculiar to them, and distinguishing them from numbers of unstable professors. In order to be assured that this never would be their case, they ought to use every means with the greatest earnestness, in order to have every holy disposition invigorated in their hearts, that their grace might be growing to more confirmed habits, and be productive of good works in greater abundance; and that they might also increase continually in a believing, spiritual, experimental, and transforming knowledge of Jesus Christ, as their Lord and Saviour. After this important exhortation, the apostle concluded with ascribing glory to Christ as to a divine person, and with desiring that it might, or rejoicing that it would, be given to him, both at that time and for ever. Amen. 'This word, at the beginning of a sentence, is an earnest asseveration. In the conclusion of a sentence, it imports an earnest wish that it may be so.' (Benson.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The purest minds of men on earth want stirring up by way of remembrance; that, by habitual attention to the doctrine and precepts delivered by the holy prophets and apostles, they may be kept steadfast in faith, fervent in love, and diligent in obedience. The only wise God our Saviour, by predicting the scoffs and contemptuous objections of infidels and profane men, in ancient and modern times, hath taken care, that even their perverse opposition to the scripture should furnish an additional proof of its divine inspiration. No wonder that they who walk after their own lusts endeavour to deride our expectation of a future judgment, and of the eternal destruction of all those, who "will not have Christ to reign over them;" or that they catch at every thing, which can help to buoy up their hopes of "escaping the damnation of hell." Most of their cavils and sneers expose their ignorance of the scriptures and of the power of God: yet their very ignorance is the consequence of their ungodliness, and wilful opposition to those parts of divine truth, which condemn their darling iniquities. But none, who read and believe the scriptures, can be ignorant that the omnipotent Creator of the heavens and the earth, who upholds, preserves, changes or destroys his own work, as he sees good, has his whole plan before him; that he alone is competent to determine about times and seasons; and that with him "one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day."

V. 9—13.

The Lord, in reality, makes no delays, however his dispensations may appear to our unbelief and scanty knowledge; he is not slack concerning his promises, (according to men's notions of slackness,) but he is slow to anger, he waiteth to be gracious, he delighteth not in the death of a sinner, and he is willing that any perishing rebel should come to repentance, and seek his salvation. But his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure: "the heavens and earth, which now are, are reserved unto fire, against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men:" that "great day of the Lord shall come as a thief in the night," as surely as the deluge came, and equally unexpected by unbelievers. What will then be the surprise, terror, and anguish of proud scoffers, infidels, and all ungodly and worldly men, "when the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up!" Here imagination itself is baffled, description would be vain, and we can only apply the inconceivable subject to practical purposes. As all these things shall be dissolved, "what manner of persons ought we to be, in all holy conversation and godliness?" Surely Christians should not lay up their treasures on earth, or set their affections on things below! It is our great business to prepare for this great catastrophe, by daily expecting, and hasting to, the coming of the day of God; that we may possess a triumphant hope of lifting up our heads with joy, when the heavens and the earth shall form one immense conflagration, and when no refuge will remain to the wicked from the intolerable wrath of their offended Judge, and that everlasting fire to which he will doom them; and to "look and prepare for the new heavens and the new earth," which God hath promised; remembering that righteousness dwelleth there, without alloy or interruption.

V. 14—18.

In the firm belief of the great and eternal realities set before us in this chapter, let us "give diligence to be found of Christ, at his coming, in peace, without spot and blameless." Let sinners account the long-suffering of our Lord to be salvation, seeking him while he may be found, and calling on him while he is near, that they may have the privilege of blessing him to eternity for sparing them, when others were cut off in their sins. We should also avail ourselves of the apostle's caution, whilst we read the epistles of St. Paul, and other difficult parts of the holy scriptures. Most evident it is, that untaught, unteachable, self-sufficient, unstable, and unconverted men wrest many things of this kind to their own destruction. Yet they have a most important use in the system of divine truth; and if men will pervert them, they do it at their peril. But let us seek to have our minds prepared for the reception of such things as are hard to be understood, by properly digesting and reducing to practice those parts, which are most simple and intelligible: and let us take care not to give strong meat to babes, who cannot digest it, as it only "belongs to those that are of full age, and who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern good and evil." Thus taking things in their proper order, and proceeding with humility, caution, prayer, and practice, we shall be prepared to derive benefit from the deepest and most mysterious truths, and to perceive their consistency with the rest of divine revelation. Let all then, who know and read these things, beware, lest, being led away by the error of the wicked, they fall from their own steadfastness; and may we all grow continually in grace and the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and ascribe glory to him for ever. Amen.

THE
JOHN.

This epistle has been received, as written by the apostle John, by the church from the earliest ages; and the similarity of sentiment and expression, between it and his Gospel, is a full confirmation that he was the writer, though his name is not prefixed to it. From two expressions in the second chapter; "Because ye have "known him, that is, from the beginning;" and "It is the last time;" several learned moderns have concluded, that it was written just before the destruction of Jerusalem, and to the Jewish converts exclusively: but it has been the more general opinion, that it was written much later than that event, and not long before the book of Revelation. The texts, on which the former opinion is grounded, do not seem to require, or even admit of, that interpretation, which these learned men put upon them; (Notes, ii. 13. 18;) and there is not the least intimation of any distinction between Jewish and Gentile converts, in the whole epistle. It appears, to me at least, the more probable opinion, that it was written towards the close of the apostle's life, after the death of all the other apostles: and that it was intended as a circular letter, or a general address, to all the Christian Churches, which was known to come from the only surviving apostle. The authoritative, yet affectionate manner, in which the writer addresses his dear children, favours this conclusion: (Note, ii 1, 2:) and the heretics, or antichrists, whom he evidently intended to oppose, came forward much more openly, at this time, than at an earlier period. It is generally allowed, that they who denied the real Deity of Christ; they who explained away his proper humanity, and the reality of his sufferings and death, as an atoning sacrifice; and they, who taught their followers, that believers, being saved by grace, were not required to obey the commandments of God; were the principal of the Antichrists. These were branched out into a variety of sub-divisions called by different names; such as Ebionites, Cerinthians, Docetee, or Phantasiastæ, Gnostics, Nicolaitans, &c. on which ecclesiastical writers have enlarged abundantly. The apostle, however, did not name any of them, and his language, was suited to refute and expose many other heretical sentiments, both of ancient and modern times; and in that view the epistle is highly interesting to us. He expatiates also on the love of God to us, as shown in the salvation of his Son; and again and again most pathetically enforces on believers love to each other, as shown in its practical effects, by almost every motive imaginable. This, I suppose, has given occasion to the general opinion of his being himself of a most loving disposition; even more so than the other apostles. Our Lord, however, called him, and James his brother, Boanerges, (Note, Mark iii. 13—19:) and the faithful, plain, and even sharp manner, in which he speaks of hypocrites and false teachers, sufficiently illustrates the reason, for which that name was given. He also lays down various marks and evidences; by which Christians might be distinguished from self-deceivers and hypocrites: and, while this epistle differs exceedingly in style and manner, from those of the other apostles, it perfectly harmonizes with them in doctrine and practical instruction.

A. D. 90. CHAP. I. A. D. 90.

The apostle declares, what he had seen and heard of Christ, the Word of life, that others might have fellowship with him, and share his joy, 1—4. He shows that they, who have communion with God, and are cleansed from sin by the blood of Christ, walk in the light of holiness, 5—7; and that the faithfulness and righteousness of God are engaged for the pardon and cleansing of those who confess their sins; but that all who deny themselves to be sinners are deceived, 8—10.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. (Notes, John i. 1—18.) The apostle began this epistle in the same abrupt manner as he did his Gospel, and without any particular address; and he wrote as a witness, in a sententious and declaratory style, and not in an argumentative manner. "That which was "from the beginning:" though the neuter gender is used, he seems to mean the Person of Christ; even as when it is said, "that he and the Father are one," One Deity, "in "the neuter gender, not one Person," in the masculine; (numen, θειον.) or when the angel said, "That holy Thing "which shall be born of thee." (Luke i. 35.) That essential Good, that uncreated and self-existent Excellency, which had been from the beginning, as coequal and coeternal with the Father, and had at length appeared in human nature for the salvation of sinners, was the great subject concerning which the apostle wrote to his brethren. If we then understand him to mean the Person of Christ, (and it does not appear what else could be meant,) "from "the beginning" seems to signify from eternity: for if the creation and time were coeval, "That which was from "the beginning, before God created the heavens and the "earth," must have been from eternity. Indeed, the same expression in some places may signify the first opening of the dispensation of the Gospel; (ii. 7, 8.) yet this does not appear so consistent with the context. The more obvious meaning is this: that essential Good, which was from the beginning with God, and was God, by whom all things were created, had become flesh, to dwell on earth among men; and the apostle and his brethren had heard him deliver his doctrine and publish his salvation; they had seen him with their eyes, whilst they "beheld "his glory, as of the only begotten of the Father, full of "grace and truth." They had not only viewed him with a transient glance, but had accompanied him, and contemplated him, both in respect of the wisdom and holiness of his character, the power of his miracles, and his abundant love and mercy, during some years, till they saw him crucified for sinners, and afterwards risen from the dead; and their hands had handled him, whilst he condescended to give them this full proof of his resurrection, that they might witness it to others. (Notes, John xx. 20. 25. 27.) This divine Person, "the Word of life," "the Word of God," become incarnate, that he might be "the Life of men," the apostle declared to mankind; and he wrote to assure his Christian brethren of the reality of his human nature, which some in those days denied, and that of his divine nature, which his resurrection fully demonstated, (Rom. i. 4.) For "the Life," the Source and Author of life, natural, spiritual, and eternal, who possessed life in himself necessarily and unchangeably, and who might therefore be called "the Life;" life being essential to him, and derived from him to all creatures; even he had been manifested in the flesh, to be the life of fallen men. (Marg. Ref.) And when the Son of God, the essential Life of all creatures, was thus manifested, the apostles were peculiarly favoured, in being chosen to be his attendants, and to see him, during his ministry, at his death, after his resurrection, and at his ascension, that they might bear witness to others of these things, and show them that eternal Life, which had always subsisted with the Father, as one with him, and yet distinct from him. One in the undivided essence of the Godhead, but possessing distinct personality, as the only Begotten of the Father, by an eternal and incomprehensible generation; and who, in the fulness of time, was manifested, as the Author and Giver of eternal life to sinners, through the redemption of his blood, and by the communication of his new-creating Spirit. They did not therefore proceed on report, or insufficient proof, when they went to the nations, and encountered all hardships, dangers, and persecutions, in preaching the Gospel to them. But they declared the things concerning the Person, doctrine, and salvation of Christ, which they had seen and heard, and had the most abundant opportunity of learning from his own lips; and of which they had been assured by his miracles, resurrection, and ascension.

V. 3, 4. The apostle likewise declared the things, not from selfish or carnal motives, but from the purest benevolence and love; in order that they to whom he wrote might have fellowship with them, and share all their immunities, hopes, comforts, and everlasting advantages: and whatever an ungodly and carnal world might imagine, concerning the condition of such poor, despised, and persecuted men, whom they treated as the "off-"scouring of all things," yet truly their "fellowship "was with the Father," and with his Son Jesus Christ. They shared the special love and favour of God the Father; all his perfections ensured their happiness; they were made partakers of his holiness, and even of a divine nature; and they had the assured hope and blessed earnests of enjoying him, as their all-sufficient and eternal Portion. Moreover, they had a free access to him, as their Father; and a sacred union having been formed between him and their souls, through Jesus Christ, and by the power of the Holy Spirit, a most honourable and happy communion and intercourse was continually carried on between the glorious God and them: while they poured out their inmost souls before him, made him their Hope and confidence, aimed to do his will and manifest his glory, celebrated his praises, were his devoted worshippers, and sought their felicity in his favour and acceptance; and while he graciously heard their supplications, accepted their persons and services, communicated to them his holy consolations, showed them his will, supplied them with wisdom and strength suited to their wants, and took on him the care of all their concerns. This their fellowship with the Father arose from their "fellowship with his Son, "Jesus Christ." By faith they were interested in him and his salvation; so that "He was made of God to them "Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemp-"tion;" and by a continued regard to his Person, mediation, and grace, and an habitual reliance on him as the Life and salvation of their souls, they had access to God as a Father. Thus, through the incarnate Son, and his sacrifice, and intercession, and the communication maintained with him by faith, they had communion with the Father also, notwithstanding their sinfulness. This was no enthusiastic imagination, or hypocritical pretence, as many were disposed to represent it; nor was it an unsatisfactory or inefficacious transaction, as others might suppose, who did not deny its reality; but they had the happy experience of it in their souls, and evidenced the excellency of it in their lives: and shared with their brethren in this sacred communion, such comforts and substantial satisfaction, as made them ample amends for all their losses, sufferings, and hardships. Being therefore assured, that this alone was sufficient to make men happy, and knowing the inexhaustible fulness of Christ and his precious salvation, they desired, exceedingly, that their fellow-sinners would come and share their felicity; and leaving the lying vanities of the world, or empty forms and superstitions of false religion, should seek with them this "fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus "Christ." The desire, glowing with intense ardour in the hearts of the apostles, and united with zeal for the honour of their Lord, animated them to all their self-denying labours, and reconciled them to all sufferings, in promoting the Gospel. The same principle induced the apostle John to write this epistle to the churches, that, rejecting the heretical doctrines of false teachers, having fellowship with Christ, and those who adhered to the apostles' doctrine; and avoiding whatever could interrupt their communion with God: their holy joy might be complete, and they might live in actual possession of those invaluable privileges, to which they were called by the gospel. The communion of the Holy Spirit is not particularly mentioned in this most interesting passage; because the communion of believers with the Father and the Son, and their loving communion with each other, are effected and maintained by the communication and influences of the Holy Spirit; who is the immediate Author of their spiritual life, hope, love, joy, peace, and holy affections; the bond of union between Christ and his mystical body, and between every member of it and all the others; the great blessing communicated from the Father's love, and through the incarnation and mediation of the Son; and the seal and pledge of, and preparation for, all other blessings in time and to eternity. As the Holy Spirit is, therefore, the great Agent in our communion with the Father and the Son, it was not necessary that communion with him should be separately mentioned. (Note, 2 Cor. xiii. 14.)

5 This then is [q] the message which we have heard of him, and declare unto you, [r] that God is Light, and in him is no darkness at all.

6 [s] If we say that we have [t] fellowship with him, and [u] walk in darkness, [x] we lie, and [y] do not the truth:

7 But [z] if we walk in the light, [a] as he is in the light, [b] we have fellowship one with another, [c] and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.

V. 5—7. In order that Christians might obtain that fulness of joy of which the apostle spoke; and that they might be upon their guard against all delusive appearances, and all false pretences to communion with God; it was needful for him, to state to them the message, or declaration, which they had heard from Christ, concerning the perfections of God himself. The substance of this is, "That God is Light," pure perfect intellect, an all pervading, all penetrating Spirit, essential knowledge, wisdom, holiness, love, and felicity: so that "in him is no "darkness at all;" no ignorance, error, moral evil, or defect in felicity; and therefore none of these could be derived from him, (Note, James i. 13—17.) As this is the nature of God, the doctrines and precepts which came from him must be of the same kind: true religion might be distinguished from counterfeit by that criterion; and especially his spiritual worshippers, who really had communion with him, might be known by their conformity to him. If then, any persons, professing Christianity, affirmed, as a matter of experience, that they had fellowship with God according to the Gospel, and consequently were partakers of his salvation, while at the same time, "they walked in darkness," or were deluded by Satan, through ignorance and false doctrine, to live in the habitual practice of sin, and so to have "fellowship with the un-"fruitful works of darkness," such persons spake falsehood, and were either deceiving, or self-deceived, by hypocrites, whose conduct belied their profession: for they did not practise what was sincere and faithful, and according to the truths of God's word. But if the professed disciples of Christ, "walked in the light as he was in the "Light," acting habitually as became those who knew God, and his holy truth and will; and imitating his purity, righteousness, goodness, and truth, in their behaviour among men; they might deem this a sufficient evidence, that they were partakers of Christ, and interested in the love of the Father through him: they were warranted to conclude, that their fellowship with God, and the intercourse maintained between him and their souls, was the very same in nature and efficacy with that of which the apostle spake; they were admitted to the communion of the saints, and entitled to all their privileges and blessings, and ought to be the objects of their special love and complacency; and they might also be fully assured, that the atoning blood of the Son of God had taken away the guilt of all their former sins, and did remove that of all their daily defects, defilements, and transgressions; nay, that the Holy Spirit, as given through the merit of his atonement, was cleansing away, and would at length perfectly destroy, all the sinfulness of their fallen nature. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8—10. While the apostle strenuously insisted on the necessity of an habitual holy walk, as the effect and evidence of the knowledge of God in Christ Jesus, and of communion with him, he guarded, with equal care, against the opposite error of self-righteous pride. If any professed Christians, while they seemed to walk in the light, should be so elated with a conceit of their own attainments, as to say "that they had no sin," but were perfectly pure, and as holy in heart and life as the law of God required, they were certainly deceived in a most awful manner; nay, the truth was not in them, as a principle of life and illumination, or they never could have fallen into a mistake, which implied the most gross ignorance of God, of his spiritual law, and of their own hearts. On the other hand, such as confessed their sins, with unreserved, ingenuous, and sincere humiliation before God, (for that alone can be here intended,) owning their guilt and desert of wrath, not attempting to extenuate or deny their offences, but casting themselves wholly on the mercy of God for the pardon of them, would certainly find him faithful to his promises, and just to his covenant engagements to Christ their Surety, and to them through him; yea, his very justice, (as satisfied by the atonement of his Son,) would induce him to forgive all their sins, how numerous and aggravated soever they had been; and to cleanse them, not only from the guilt, but gradually, and at length perfectly, from all the pollution of their unrighteousness, (Ez. xxxvi. 25—27. 2 Cor. vii. 1.)—But if any of them continued to deny that they had sinned, and so needed not to confess guilt, or seek forgiveness and cleansing from sin, they, in fact, "treated the words of "God as a lie," and his declaration of man's sinfulness as a libel on human nature; nay, they virtually denied the truth of the whole Gospel, which every where speaks of men as lost sinners; so that the word of God was not in them, by faith, or by the teaching of the Holy Spirit.—In this latter verse the apostle opposed such persons as totally denied their sinfulness, their need of mercy, or their desert of wrath, by whatever method they deceived themselves into a confidence that they had never sinned, or that they had in some way made amends for their offences, and were not justly deserving of punishment. But in the former verse he seems to have shown the gross error of those, who imagined that through the Gospel they were so perfectly sanctified, as to have no spot or blemish of sin in them; the present tense, "have no sin," being used in the eighth verse, and the past, "have not sinned," in the tenth. (Notes, &c. Ps. xxxii. li. Prov. xxviii. 13.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

Our most lively gratitude is due to the Lord for that fully authenticated revelation, which he hath given us concerning "the Word of life," by those, who heard and saw him, and who had the testimony of their senses to the reality of his incarnation and his resurrection. But what words can express the praises of his love to sinners, in causing "the Life to be manifested," even "the eter-"nal Life that was with the Father," in order that we, condemned rebels, who were dead in sin, might live by him! This appears the more admirable, when we consider the deep abasement and the agonizing sufferings, to which this manifestation exposed the incarnate Word and Son of God; nay, how his very humiliation hath given occasion to the children of men to rob him of his glory, to deny his Deity, and to speak of him, whom all angels worship, as if he were altogether such a one as themselves. Faithful and zealous ministers, though they have not seen and heard the Lord of glory with their outward senses, may yet declare to men what they have known and experienced of his mercy, truth, and power: and as he became incarnate, that sinners might have fellowship with him, and in the love of the Father through him, for their everlasting felicity, so they are willing to labour and suffer, that their fellow-sinners may be brought to have fellowship with them in their most precious blessings. However men may despise and revile them, and cast out their names as evil, or deem them madmen, bigots, enthusiasts, or hypocrites, yet verily they possess the greatest honour, pleasure, privilege, and advantage imaginable, in communion with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ, and in their liberty of access with boldness at all times into the presence of the eternal God; while all the perfections and persons in the Godhead are engaged, by covenant, to make them most blessed for evermore. These benefits are not like the scanty possessions of the world, which are congenial to the selfishness of our fallen nature, and inspire the jealousy of every competitor, because the more share them, the less each person can appropriate. But the joy and felicity of communion with God corresponds with the enlarged philanthropy of the regenerate soul, and tends to encrease it, because the good enjoyed is infinite and all-sufficient; so that any multitude may partake of it, without its being at all diminished; nay, the felicity seems enhanced to each possessor, by its being communicated to increasing numbers. This "fellowship

CHAP. II.

The apostle exhorts believers not to sin, and points out Christ, as the Advocate with the Father, and the Propitiation for the sins of the world, 1, 2. He shows that the knowledge of Christ, and union with him, must be evidenced by obeying and imitating him, and by love of the brethren; that thus the love of God is perfected; and that those are deceived, blind, and hypocritical, who live in hatred and malice, 3—11. He warns believers of every age and attainment against the love of the world; showing the vanity of all that is in the world, compared with the eternal happiness of those who do the will of God, 12—17. He cautions them against many antichrists, who fatally seduce some professed Christians, 18, 19; declares that the unction of the Holy Spirit was the effectual preservative against them, 21, 22: points out to them the true doctrine of Christ; and exhorts them to adhere to his truth, and abide in him, in expectation of his coming; and to prove their regeneration by their habitual righteousness, 23—29.

MY [a] little children, [b] these things write I unto you, [c] that ye sin not. [d] And if any man sin, [e] we have an Advocate with [f] the Father, Jesus Christ [g] the righteous:

"with the Father, and his Son Jesus Christ," is "the secret "of the LORD," which is peculiar to those that fear him; and ungodly men must therefore treat it as the delusion of a heated imagination. No doubt there are both enthusiasts and hypocrites, who are deceived, or mean to deceive others: yet that is not worth counterfeiting, either by Satan or wicked men, which itself is of no value or reality. There are then those, who are warranted to say, that "truly their fellowship is with the Father, and with "his Son Jesus Christ;" and they all desire to bring others to partake of the same blessedness: indeed, it is the design of all the instructions in the word of God to lead us to possess these consolations, that so "our joy may be full."

V. 6—10.

It is the interest, as well as the duty, of all men to regard the message sent to us by those, who "declare that God "is Light, and that in him is no darkness at all:" for as his perfect felicity is inseparable from his perfect holiness, so our happiness must be proportioned to our sanctification. By this rule we may also judge, who truly have fellowship with God; for if any man profess this, and "walk in "darkness, he is a liar, and does not the truth:" but if we habitually walk in the light of holy obedience, as it becomes those who have the transforming knowledge of God, we have fellowship with prophets and apostles, and with all saints, yea, with the Lord of saints himself; and the blood of Jesus cleanses us from all sin. For Christianity is in every respect the religion of a sinner: and they, who walk most nearly to God in holy conformity and obedience, are most sensible that their best days and duties are mixed with sin, and need cleansing with the atoning blood. No encouragement is therefore given in scripture to any of those who say they have not sinned, or that they have no longer any sin to repent of, to be pardoned, or to be cleansed away: such men deceive themselves; yea, they make God a liar, and his word is not in them: they arraign the truth of his declarations, and the justice of his government; and cannot possibly offer the sacrifice of a broken and contrite heart before him, or properly understand the nature and value of his Gospel of abounding grace. Let us then learn to plead guilty before God, and be humbly willing to know the worst of our case; let us ingenuously confess all our sins, and all their aggravations; relying wholly on his mercy and truth, through the righteousness of Christ, for a full and free forgiveness; and let us trust in him, and wait on him, to cleanse us from all unrighteousness, till no spot or blemish remain in us, even in the judgment of our holy God and merciful Father.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. It is probable that John was the only surviving apostle, when he wrote this epistle; and his old age, and long-continued usefulness, faithfulness, and love to Christians, must have given him a kind of parental authority throughout the whole church, as far as it adhered to the pure Gospel of Christ. It was therefore peculiarly proper for him to address them as his spiritual family, whose welfare he had greatly at heart: and as most of them were young in years, compared with this beloved and venerable disciple, who probably was the oldest Christian on earth at that time; none ever could with such propriety, adopt the endearing language of his Lord, and call his fellow-Christians, "My little," or my dear, "children," as he did: (John xiii. 33;) for the diminutive is commonly used by way of endearment, and to express peculiar affection. He was desirous of counselling, warning, and encouraging them, "as a father does his "children:" (1 Thes. ii. 11, 12;) and the things which he had written to them in the former chapter, and what he was about to add, were intended especially to preserve them from committing sin: as every part of the doctrine of salvation by Jesus Christ, was suited to display the malignant nature and effects of sin, to teach men to hate, dread, and flee from it; and to lead them to the love of God and holiness; as well as to give the most effectual encouragement, motives, and assistance to "repent, and do "works meet for repentance." Yet, "if any man had "sinned," he should remember, that "they had an Advocate with the Father." Superficial speculators might here have been ready to charge the apostle with inconsistency, as if the latter part of the verse had contradicted the former: but the state of a Christian in this world is such, that encouragements after having sinned, are as necessary as warnings against sin: for, through the remaining power of sin in his heart, the manifold snares of the world, and the power of Satan, he cannot always stand upright. The valiant soldier will be most furiously attacked by the enemy, and may sometimes be foiled; and despondency is as inimical to watchfulness, diligence, and holy obedience, as even carnal security itself. No man on scriptural principles, can conclude himself to be any better than a hypocrite, who habitually commits sin, because God is ready to forgive the penitent: but the fallen, who desire to arise and renew the combat, have abundant encouragement so to do. From the sinner's first conviction of guilt, to the end of the Christian's warfare by death, the general rule is applicable; that, "if any man sin, we "have an Advocate with the Father;" one who hath undertaken, and is fully qualified and authorized, to plead in the presence of God the Father in behalf of every one who applies for pardon, salvation, and all things pertaining to them, in his name, and in dependence on his meritorious intercession. This gracious Advocate never refuses his patronage to any sinner, who seeks it, and he never pleads in vain. For he is "Jesus;" the Saviour, Emmanuel, the incarnate Son of God; and "Christ," the Messiah, the anointed One, chosen, appointed, commissioned, and consecrated, to his office, as a High Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. He alone is "the "righteous One," who received his human nature pure from all spot of sin, and, as our Surety, perfectly obeyed the whole law of God, and so fulfilled a righteousness more valuable in itself, and more honourable to the Father, than that of all mere creatures could have been. Moreover, "He was the Propitiation for their sins;" for, "through the atonement of his sacrifice on the cross, and his subsequent intercession, he rendered a holy and righteous God propitious and favourable to sinners; so that he waiteth to be gracious upon the true mercy-seat, or propitiatory, of which that above the ark of the covenant was merely a type and shadow. (Note, Rom. iii. 25, 26.) Nor was the benefit of this propitiation to be confined to the Jewish nation: on the contrary, sinners all over the whole earth were admitted to share in it: so that all men, in every land, and through successive generations, were to be invited to come to God, through this all-sufficient Atonement, and by this new and living Way; and all who accepted of this invitation, were as much interested in Christ, and all his blessings, as if he had become incarnate, and died upon the cross for them alone. (Note, John i. 29.) So that there was most abundant encouragement to every one, in the whole world, who heard the Gospel, to repent, and seek salvation by faith in the blood of Christ; but none to any man to continue impenitent and unbelieving.

V. 3—6. True Christians might be "overtaken in a "fault," or even fall into a grievous sin; and their infirmities and deficiencies in their daily walk would be many: yet an habitual and unreserved obedience to the commandments of God was to be considered as the proper evidence of a saving knowledge of Christ, and of God the Father in him. (Notes, John xvii. 3. 2 Cor. iv. 3—6. Phil. iii. 8—10. 2 Pet. i. 2, 3. 8.) The knowledge of God or of Christ evidently signifies a believing, spiritual, and experimental acquaintance with him, and a cordial acceptance of his salvation. Professed Christians would desire to know, or be assured, that their faith and experience were genuine, and distinguishable from those of all hypocrites: and as the apostle and his brethren "knew that they thus "knew Christ," not by their exact notions, high affections, or even miraculous powers, but by a disposition of heart, habitually, unreservedly, and willingly to keep his commandments; so any other man might know his profession to be sincere, and his knowledge of Christ spiritual and saving, by the same evidence. (Marg. Ref.) But he, who professed to be acquainted with Christ, and to believe in him, whilst he did not keep his commandments in his habitual conduct, was a liar, and a hypocrite, in whom there was no sincerity, and in whose heart the truth had no place. On the other hand, whoever he was, that remembered and observed the counsels, and obeyed the precepts of Christ, in him verily, or really, the love of God was perfected; the love of God to him, as a chosen and redeemed sinner, had attained its end in his sanctification; and his love of God had produced its fruit, and was in a mature and perfect state, as the graffed tree is, when loaded with its intended and valuable increase. (Note, James ii. 22.) By this, apostles and primitive Christians knew that they were in Christ through faith and the communion of his Spirit; and thus alive to God through him; (Note, John xv. 1—8:) and indeed, if any man professed to abide in Christ, he ought so to walk as Christ had walked, in an habitual course of righteousness, holiness, truth, and love; or else he could not expect to be believed by those who knew the transforming efficacy of the saving knowledge of Christ. It is evident, that the obedience here spoken of, is the humble, sincere, unreserved, and loving obedience of a believer in Christ; which is not perfect, but attended with continual repentance, and application to his atoning blood for pardon and acceptance; as well as with a constant dependence on the Holy Spirit for grace, to enable him in any measure to perform it. Yet even this observance of the holy commandments of Christ, in imitation of his example; though far from real perfection, constitutes a degree of holiness and excellency, of which none but true Christians have any adequate conception; and which, if universal, would render the earth in no small degree like heaven itself.

V. 7—11. In exhorting Christians to obey and imitate their Lord, as the proper evidence of their love to him, and to the Father who sent him, the apostle wrote no new command to them; but that which they had received from the beginning, and which from the first had been repeatedly enforced by Christ himself. Nay, in fact, it had been virtually in force from the beginning of the world; as it could not comprise more than was contained in the law, which required Israel "to love the LORD "with all their hearts," and "their neighbour as them-"selves;" and to be "holy as God was holy." Yet this old commandment, especially that which inculcated the love of their brethren, might be called a new commandment, as given to Christians. (Notes, John xiii. 34, 35. xv. 17.) This was true, in respect of him their Lord and Saviour, in that he had newly shown them the immensity of his condescension, compassion, and self-denying love to sinners; and had laid them under new obligations to obey and imitate him, especially in "loving one another, "as he had loved them." The command likewise was now enforced by his mediatorial authority, to the full exercise of which he had been lately exalted. It was also "true "in them;" as their situation was new, and differed widely from that of the Gentiles around them, and even from that of the people of God under the Mosaic dispensation; and as they were now united by a new bond of union, as fellow-soldiers, fellow-travellers, brethren, and co-heirs of heavenly felicity. So that the love of Christians to each other, as such, though virtually comprised in the love of their neighbours as themselves, and somewhat like that of the Israelites to each other, was new in respect of its exercise, motives, rules, and obligations. This arose from the change, which had taken place; as the comparative darkness of the preparatory dispensation was past, and the true light shone in full splendour: so that Christians might be expected to be more exact in their obedience, and more full of love to one another, and to all men, than even believers had been under the darker dispensation of the law. He, therefore, who professed, that he walked in the marvellous light of the Gospel, as partaking of the special grace and mercy of God, (Note, 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10.) and yet hated his brother, (either any of his fellow-christians, or his neighbours,) was evidently in darkness even to that time: for though the true light shone around him; he was blinded by his pride and selfishness. Thus he continued a subject of the prince of darkness, the author of all malice, envy, murder, and malignity; for the illumination of the true knowledge of Christ always transformed the hearts in proportion to its degree, and produced a loving disposition in all those who really partook of it. He, therefore, who loved his brother, and habitually showed himself disposed to goodness, mercy, and forgiveness; to active, liberal, self-denying love; evidently lived and walked in the light of the Gospel, and was influenced by the inward efficacy of the truths, which he had professed: and there was nothing in the general prevailing disposition of his heart, by means of which Satan could succeed in tempting him to scandalous sins; or which was likely to prove an occasion of his throwing stumbling blocks in the way of others, to their destruction. Whereas, he, who hated, or bore habitual malice against his brother, or any man, was still in darkness: and as men walking in the dark, know not whither they are going, nor at what they stumble; so such a person would proceed in an ignorant, uncertain, and unholy manner, not aware of the dangers that beset his path, nor sensible that it led to destruction; as the darkness of error and sin had blinded his eyes, till at length he would fall into some destructive heresy, or scandalous crime, and not only ruin himself but cause others to fall likewise.

V. 12—14. The apostle had before addressed Christians in general, as "his little children," or his dear children: but here he spoke of such as were young in years, or newly converted: and distinguished them from those, who were further advanced in the life of faith and grace. He particularly addressed his exhortations to those "new-born babes, who had tasted that the Lord is gracious," (Note, 1 Pet. ii. 2, 3:) because their sins were as certainly forgiven them, for the sake of Christ, and through faith in his name, as those of their more established and experienced brethren were; though their weakness of faith, and want of distinct and exact knowledge, might prevent them from possessing the abiding comfort of it: and the counsel, which he was about to give them, would preserve them from many snares and sorrows, enable them to obtain the assurance of their acceptance, and direct them in making a suitable return for so invaluable a benefit. He wrote also to the fathers, having the same counsel and admonitions to give to those Christians, who were "old disciples," matured in knowledge and experience, and who ought to be the guides and examples to their juniors, as well as to "shine as lights in "the world." These had long known him, who was from the beginning; and their long acquaintance with Christ, and with the eternal Father in him; with all their discoveries of his glory, and experience of his love, truth, and power, should engage them to simple dependence, lively gratitude, fervent love, devoted obedience, and steady confidence in God, and zeal for his honour and that of the gospel. Moreover, he wrote to the same effect to the young men, who had for some time professed the gospel, and had passed through the state of childhood, but were not arrived at that maturity in grace, to which the Fathers had attained. These he addressed and exhorted, from the consideration that "they had overcome the wicked one:" they had successfully encountered the first trials and temptations, which attended their separation from sin and renunciation of the world; and had overcome the assaults of Satan, by giving up their secular interests, breaking off their bad habits and connexions, and entering in at the strait gate of true conversion. As they had, therefore, thus far conquered "the wicked one," who had tried all methods in vain to keep them from embracing the gospel, and giving themselves up to the service of Christ, they ought to go forth in his strength, aspiring after further victories; and endeavouring to spend the vigour of their spirits, or the prime of their years, in the services to which they were called, for the honour of Christ and the benefit of the church; and not in seeking worldly advantages. But, in order to give his exhortation the greater emphasis, the apostle again addressed the different descriptions of Christians, and admonished the little children, (for though the word is changed, the meaning seems to be the same,) (Marg. Ref.) as those who had known the Father, and had already experienced his parental compassion and love for them; for which they were called to make the due returns of filial confidence, submission, gratitude and obedience. The address to the fathers exactly coincides with that which went before: to the young men he added, that they "were strong" in faith, hope, love, and all holy affections; they were in the prime of their fitness for active service, to which the mature experience of old age might be less adapted; and as the word of God, which they had received when they were converted, abode in them, which appeared by their victory over the temptations of Satan, so it ought to be manifested in its effects, by their increasing fruitfulness in all good works.

V. 15—17. The general counsel and exhortation, which the apostle meant to enforce on all the persons above described, was this, "not to love the world, or the things "that were in the world." The world, as God created it, is very good, and a proper object of a measure of love; but as sin hath marred it, our affections ought to be wholly alienated from it. The men of the world, as distinguished from believers, are enemies of God and subjects of Satan; we are therefore required to renounce their friendship, to avoid intimate society with them, and to abhor their ungodly principles and practices; while we pity their miseries, love their persons, and try to do them good. The things of the world may be desired, possessed, and valued, for those uses and purposes, which were intended by God when he created them, and in subordination to his favour, authority, and glory; but for those purposes, to which sin hath abused them, and sinners idolize them, we must not desire, seek, nor value them, in any measure, or manner: and if any man thus love the world, the love of the Father is not in him: his idol has never been dethroned, his heart remains unchanged, he is not reconciled to God through Jesus Christ, and hath no true filial love of him in his heart. (Notes, Luke xiv. 25—33.) For "all that is in the world," as thus idolized and abused by men, who seek their happiness from it, and not from God, may be summed up under three heads: 1st. Such things, as are suited to excite and gratify "the lust of the flesh;" or the irregular, inordinate, and polluting hankerings and cravings of the carnal heart, and the animal appetites, after gross sensual gratifications; as if man's happiness consisted in them: 2dly. Those things, which are suited to excite and gratify "the lust of the eyes;" or the desires of the carnal heart after the possessions, embellishments, decorations, and enjoyments, which the eye is apt to look at with coveting, and inordinate desire of obtaining; such as treasures of gold and silver, or precious stones, houses, lands, gardens, stately mansions, elegant furniture and equipages, costly garments; and in short, all that wealth can purchase, which gratifies the beholder's eye or his other senses, but is not directly to be considered as gross animal indulgence. 3dly. "The pride of life," or those titles and dignities, that authority and honour, that reputation and splendour, which form the summit of earthly exaltation, and the highest prize in the poor lottery of this present life, to which the pride and ambition of man's apostate nature can aspire: and the greatest gratification of that mental concupiscence, which is congenial to the old temptation, "ye shall be as gods." For a poor vainglorious worm to be advanced to such dominion over his fellows, or to possess such honour among them, as to be tempted to forget his own mortality, as well as his Creator and Judge, and to be so surrounded with vassals, attendants, and flatterers, or so emblazoned with high-sounding titles, and encumbered with magnificence, as to have nothing on earth that he can behold above him, and thus to disregard him that is "higher than the highest," this is the perfection of the pride of life; and all pre-eminence and distinction above others partakes of the same nature, whether power, splendour, or renown, on any account, be the immediate source of it. All these things, (to which every earthly object that any man is tempted to put in competition with the will, favour, and glory of God, must be referred,) are "not of the Father:" this idolatrous desire of created things did not attach to them, or to man, as God made them; they do not consist with his prescribed use of them; they are not bestowed for these purposes; nor do they, who are his children and influenced by his grace, desire, seek, or use them in this manner. But "they are of the world," as lying "under the wicked "one:" these desires after created things, and this use of them, are the effects of man's apostacy and subjection to Satan; they are thus made the baits, by which men are seduced into sin, and kept in rebellion against God, and the incentives to all their vile passions. They suit the taste, and form the supreme good of worldly men, and are their only portion; and for the sake of them the whole earth is filled with violence, fraud, crimes, and misery. But the world passeth away, and the lust of it: all its pleasures, treasures, honours, and splendour, will soon vanish for ever, (Note, 1 Pet. i. 24;) and they, who have lusted for them, and idolized them, will be eternally disappointed and miserable. But the man, who doeth the will of God, as revealed to sinners by the Gospel, will abide for ever in the possession and enjoyment of that substantial good, which he hath been enabled to make choice of. It is evident, that the apostle did not speak of the lawful, moderate, subordinate, and holy use, possession, or desire of God's good creatures, for the ends to which he hath appointed them; but of the unlawful, inordinate, unholy, and idolatrous hankering after them, and valuation of them, to which all men are addicted, so long as they remain in an unregenerate state. Many vain efforts have been made, by limitations, distinctions, and exceptions, to evade the force of this passage; and many have written on it, as if they meant to prove how far we might safely be carnally minded, and lovers of the world: but, in the apostle's evident meaning, we are no more allowed to love the world at all, than we are to worship Dagon; for we cannot serve God and Mammon; or love the Lord, and the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life. A man may carry on any business, fill any station, or possess any wealth, as the servant and steward of God, according to his commandments, for his glory, and for the good of mankind; and he may desire food and raiment, and things suitable to his rank in life, and use them with thankfulness, temperance, and humility: but he cannot love or desire them, to gratify his sensuality, pride, avarice, or ambition, or seek his happiness in them, without being an idolater. Every regenerate man is delivered from the dominion and allowed indulgence of the love of the world; and strives and prays against the remains of it, as it works in his heart, or breaks forth into his life: he desires to love God supremely, and seek all his happiness from him alone; and to love all other things in him, for his sake, and as his bounty; and to use them in submission to his precepts and providence. In proportion as men get this victory over the world, the reality of their grace is evidenced, and they are prepared for labouring and suffering in the cause of Christ: but unless it is begun in the heart, a man has no root in himself, and he will either fall away in time of temptation, or remain a mere unfruitful professor of Christianity. (Notes, v. 4, 5. Matt. xiii. 18—23.)

V. 18, 19. The love of the world, as unsubdued in professed Christians, gave Satan his greatest advantage, not only in tempting them to open apostacy, but also in seducing them by destructive heresies, through which they were enabled to reconcile a quiet conscience with a carnal mind, and the indulgence of their favourite passion, under the mask of a religious profession. So that the transition was natural, from warning Christians against the love of the world, to putting them upon their guard against false teachers. The apostle therefore showed his beloved children, especially such of them as were young and inexperienced, that it was the last time, or the last dispensation which God intended to introduce on earth, under which he would establish the kingdom of his Son on the ruins of the usurped dominion of Satan; and this kingdom of Christ should continue till all enemies were put under his feet. But they had all heard, both from the predictions of ancient prophets, and from those of Christ and his apostles, that under this dispensation Antichrist should arise: for Satan would not only oppose the gospel by exciting persecutions, but also by corruptions of the faith; and, especially, by one great enemy to the Person, truth, authority, and glory of Christ, he would obtain immense power and influence in the visible church, (Notes, 2 Thes. ii. 1—12:) and as St. Paul had declared that this mystery of iniquity did already work; so John observed that "there were many antichrists," or opposers of the pure Gospel of the Lord Jesus, whose character, principles, intentions, and machinations, were of the same stamp, as those of the great antichrist would be, and who were evidently his fore-runners. By this they might know that it was the last time; and that while God was specially exerting his power, by means of faithful ministers, to honour his Son, the devil and his servants were peculiarly active in endeavouring to defeat the design. (Notes, 1 Tim. iv. 1—3. 2 Tim. iii. 1—9. iv. 3, 4.) These antichrists did not arise from among such as had before been avowed unbelievers; but they were professed Christians, who separated from the church, and became leaders of heretical sects, contrary to the doctrine of the apostles, and derogatory to the honour of Christ. But, though they went out from the disciples, having been admitted to outward fellowship with them, yet they had never been of them, as regenerated persons, and living members of the body of Christ: for if this had been the case, they would "surely have continued with them;" as the Lord would not have given them over to a strong delusion, but would "have put his fear into their hearts, that "they should not depart from him," according to the engagement of his everlasting covenant to all true believers. But, as they had not received the truth in love, they had been left to the pride and lusts of their hearts, and to the artifices of Satan, to be deceived into fatal heresies, and to separate from the churches of Christ; that it might evidently appear, that all they who professed the Gospel were not true disciples. Thus the church was purified; and true Christians were approved, and rendered more watchful and humble; whilst the distinction between them and hypocrites was more strongly marked. (Note, John xv. 2—6. 1 Cor. xi. 18, 19.) Some explain "the last "time," to mean the last age of the Jewish church: but, probably, that had been subverted some years, when St. John wrote this epistle; and the marginal references may show on what grounds another interpretation is adopted. It seems very unreasonable to interpret antichrist, in the singular, to mean the same as the "many antichrists," afterwards mentioned; and then to confine the whole, either to the Jewish opposers, or Judaizing corrupters, of Christianity, as some do; or to the Gnostics, as divided into different sects, as others do. Antichrist signifies, one that opposes Christ, whether he oppose the doctrine of his deity, or his humanity; or whether he set himself against him, in respect of his priestly office, by substituting other methods of atoning for sin, and finding acceptance with God; his kingly office, by claiming authority, to enact laws in his church, contrary to his laws, or to dispense with his commandments; or his prophetical office, by claiming authority to add to, alter, or take away from the revelation which he has given in his holy word. 'They 'oppose the person of Christ, or his doctrine, or both to'gether.' (Beza.) In this view, there were, at an early period of the church, many antichrists; and the heads of any sect of heretics might be in a subordinate sense so called: but the direct opposers of Christianity could not be meant in this place. The term is used in this epistle, and in St. John's second epistle, and in no other part of scripture; not even in the Revelation. "They went out from us," that is, 'they went out from the apostles in Judea,' (Whitby,) "but they were not of us:" this then must mean, that they were not apostles. It does not, however, appear, that they professed to be apostles; nor is it said, that they had previously been teachers in the church. But they professed Christianity, and had been admitted to communion with true Christians; yet their subsequent apostacy proved, that, (like Judas,) they had from the first been hypocrites.

V. 20—25. The apostle wrote to his fellow-christians, for their caution, comfort, and establishment; though his observations were especially calculated to put all, who professed to believe the Gospel, on self-examination, and to prevent new converts from self-deception. They, however, whom he peculiarly addressed, had "an unction "from the Holy One;" they were anointed by the Spirit, as sent forth, through Christ the Holy One of God, to illuminate, sanctify, and consecrate them, to be a spiritual priesthood unto the Father. By his teaching and influences they knew all things, which related to the principles of Christianity, in a spiritual and experimental manner; so that no antichrist could fatally delude them. (Marg. Ref.) He had not therefore written to them, because they knew not the truth: for if he had addressed persons of that description, it would have been requisite for him to have discussed his subject more copiously; but he had written to them, because they did know the truth, and that no lie belonged to it, or could consist with it. The general self-evident proposition was not more certain, than the particular application of it to the delusions of their seducers, whose false doctrines could not proceed from the same source with the truth of God. For "who "was a liar," but the man who denied that Jesus was the Christ? Some of these heresiarchs denied the Deity of Christ; others explained away his incarnation, and so denied his humanity, and the reality of his sufferings; and some opposed his kingly authority. Thus, whilst they retained the name of Christians, they virtually denied his Person, as the Christ, the Son of God, and the Son of man; or his offices, as the anointed Prophet, Priest, and King of his church: they denied that God was manifested in the flesh, to ransom the church with his own blood; that in virtue of his one oblation, he might appear in the presence of God as our great High Priest, and reign over his redeemed people, as his willing subjects, to the end of the world, and for ever. Now, whether they denied his divine or his human nature, his atonement, or his authority; they virtually denied him to be the Christ; as they who had the unction of the Holy Spirit would readily perceive. Such a teacher was, therefore, in fact, an antichrist, who denied both the Father and the Son; seeing the Father can only be known, approached, worshipped, and glorified by sinners, in and through his incarnate Son; and they who honour not the Son, honour not the Father that sent him. (Notes, Matt. xi. 25—27. John v. 23.) The denial of the Son is, therefore, a denial of the Father: and the supreme Being, the supposed Deity, which ancient or modern deniers of the personal or mediatorial honour of the Son have professed to worship, is in fact the creature of their own imagination, and not the wise, just, holy, merciful, and faithful God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. He, therefore, who denies the Son, has not the Father, as his God, his Friend, and his Portion; but he, that in true faith acknowledges the Son, hath the Father also. This last clause is printed in Italics, because it is wanting in most copies of the Greek Testament: yet it is found in several manuscripts; so that Beza and several other able critics, look on it as genuine. As these things were so, the apostle exhorted his beloved children, to let that abide in them, and sink deep into their hearts, which they had heard from the beginning of their profession of the Gospel, concerning the Person and salvation of Christ; for if the doctrine which they had at the first heard from the apostles and evangelists, remained in them practically and efficaciously; they also would continue in union and fellowship with the Son, and with the Father through him; and they ought to remember, for their encouragement and confirmation against the artifices of false teachers; that the promise, which God had irreversibly given to all true believers, engaged to them eternal life and felicity, and all things pertaining to it. No lie, &c. (21.) 'Lie, here means 'a doctrine contrary to that taught by the apostles; which 'being the true doctrine, its contrary must be false, or a 'lie.' (Macknight.)

V. 26—29. These admonitions the apostle wrote to his beloved Christians, concerning those false teachers who attempted to seduce them, and had prevailed with many, who had once belonged to their company. He meant to caution and fortify them against the specious insinuations of deceivers: but in respect of real believers, the anointing which they had received of Christ, abode in them, as an incorruptible principle of life, and light, and spiritual discernment: so that they needed not that any man should teach them; except as that same anointing taught them, and by "stirring up their pure minds in the way of "remembrance;" for by this teaching of God himself they were instructed in all things essential to salvation, and could not be fatally deluded. Now this teaching was altogether truth, and no lie; they could not, therefore, have any occasion to change the doctrine, which they had thus received from apostles and evangelists, for new improvements. On the contrary, they who wanted to induce them to this change, evidently aimed to seduce them from the truth to believe a lie; whereas the apostle only sought to establish them in the truth, which had been "preached "to them, with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven:" and indeed, they who had thus been taught would abide in him, or in it: in Christ, or in the truth of his Gospel. He therefore needed only to exhort them, with all parental affection, to abide in him, or in Christ; for the apostle's mind, being full of warm affections towards his beloved Lord, spoke frequently of him by a pronoun without an antecedent, and so without naming him. Let them then adhere steadfastly to the truth of the Gospel; live in a constant dependence on Christ by faith for every thing; attend diligently on his ordinances, and yield a loving simple obedience to his commandments: and thus they might be assured, that when he should appear to judge the world; they would not be ashamed, as all hypocrites and apostates would be; but would have confidence before him, as his approved servants, at this his second coming, and amidst all the solemn and important events of that decisive season. In this the apostle joined himself; intimating, that he took the same method of preparing for the coming of his Lord and Judge, which he recommended to them; and that their abiding in Christ would then increase his confidence and joy. As they therefore could not but know, that he their Lord and Saviour was righteous; so they might be assured, that all, who habitually practised righteousness, as what they loved and delighted in, were born of him by the regeneration of his Spirit, and so were the children of God and the heirs of heaven. So that abiding in Christ, and bringing forth much fruit by working righteousness, was the proper method of preparing to meet him in judgment with confidence and joy. The

CHAP. III.

The apostle breaks out in admiration of the love of God, in making believers his children, and giving them present privileges, with the hope of an inconceivable felicity; and shows them that this hope is always connected with a disposition to follow after holiness, 1—3. He shows how the children of God, and the children of the devil, may be known, 4—10. He exhorts his readers to love one another, contrasting this love with the example of Cain, and warning them to expect the hatred of the world, 11—13. He points out the love of the brethren, as the distinguishing evidence of conversion; explains the nature and effects of it, contrasting it with enmity and selfishness; and enforces the practice of it, by the example of Christ, 14—17. He exhorts them to love in deed and in truth; and shows that confidence in God was connected with the consciousness of upright obedience, 18—24.

expression, "born of him," which is most obviously interpreted of Christ, concerning whom the apostle was speaking: and thus becoming the sons of God, (iii. 1,) clearly shows what John believed concerning his Lord. (Marg. Ref.) The quakers, and some others, have inferred, from the language of the twenty-seventh verse, that a stated ministry is not necessary in the church; as true believers, being anointed by the Spirit, need not such teaching: 'but it may be of moment to observe, that the 'Christian ministry was in the highest repute in the 'church, when the gifts of the Spirit were poured down 'upon it in the greatest abundance.' (Doddridge.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The Gospel, when well understood and duly received, sets the heart against all sin, and effectually prevents the allowed practice of it: at the same time that it gives the most blessed relief to the wounded consciences of those who have sinned; by the hope of pardon, through our "Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous," and his all-sufficient propitiation. Thus the divine original of the scriptures is evinced, by the complete suitableness of the remedy proposed in them, to the actual state of men in this evil world; whilst all other schemes are founded on false principles; and therefore are totally inapplicable to the case, and cannot effectually bring peace to the conscience, and lead the heart to abhor all iniquity. While we seek for grace to make a holy use of the intercession and atonement of our heavenly Advocate, and encourage our fellow-Christians to do the same; we should remember, that "He is the propitiation, not for our sins "only, but for those of the whole world;" and therefore, if any sinner in any part of the earth be willing to accept of this salvation, he will surely be made partaker of it: and we should desire and endeavour, by every proper means in our power, to be the instruments of bringing others to share with us in so precious a benefit. But we should carefully guard against every sentiment, which tends to pervert the abundant provision of the Gospel for the forgiveness of our sins, into an encouragement to disobedience: "Hereby we know that we know Christ, if "we keep his commandments;" and "he is a liar, and "the truth is not in him," who pretends to know him, and does not habitually obey him. What then shall we say to the unguarded language of some persons, who have argued, or asserted, that sanctification is not the proper ground of assurance, and evidence of our justification; and that it is legal for men to look to their works, as the proof of their being true believers? We can only say, that they directly contradict the apostle, and that therefore they are most certainly mistaken. "Whoso, then, keepeth the "word of Christ, in him verily is the love of God per-"fected." By this apostles knew that they were in Christ, and by the same means we must know it also, if we would not deceive ourselves: he, therefore, that saith he abideth "in Christ, ought himself so to walk, even as he "walked;" and no competent judge will believe his assertion, if his spirit and conduct habitually be contrary to those of his Lord; for at last he who hath most closely copied Christ's example, will be found to be the best Christian. These are no new commandments or declarations, but the same which the disciples had heard from the beginning; though some persons affect to treat them as novelties, even as others do the peculiar doctrines of a gratuitous salvation. Christianity, instead of rendering the love of God and man, and good works, superfluous and unnecessary, furnishes us with new motives, and lays us under further obligations to abound in them; and it gives us new directions concerning the love of our neighbours, by requiring love to our brethren for Christ's sake, and to our enemies after the example of his love to us. These things are true and important, according to his conduct towards his redeemed people, and their peculiar privileges and obligations, "because the darkness is past, "and the true light now shineth:" and we must remember, that hatred of our brethren or neighbours, and the prevalence of any malignant passion, is proportionably a proof that a man is still in darkness. The degree of our holy love is the proper criterion and standard of our illumination, as well as the best preservative from sin, and the most active principle of obedience. He that most loveth his brother abideth in the clearest light, and will be best kept from stumbling, or from occasioning the falls of others: but he, who is of a violent, selfish, and malicious temper, however he may boast of his knowledge, walketh in darkness, and is in the road to destruction; though he is not at all aware whither he is going, because "the darkness" and the prince of darkness, "have blinded his eyes." These things demand our closest attention, and most serious self-examination; and should lead us earnestly to pray that God would show us what we are, and whither we are going.

BEHOLD, [a] what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, [b] that we should be called the sons of God! therefore [c] the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not.

V. 12—17.

When there is real "faith that worketh by love," even little children and weak believers may be assured, that their sins are forgiven them for the sake of Christ: and though there are different degrees of growth, strength, knowledge and grace, among the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty; and though some of them have obtained more victories over the wicked one, or are more fit for active service, or to give wise counsel, than others are; yet they are all alike dear to their heavenly Father. They all have some knowledge of him and love to him; and through his word abiding in them, he will lead forth the young ones of his family to the same victories, and train them up to a measure of the same vigour and maturity, to which others have already attained. But all, who would share these blessings, must be careful not to love the world, or any of its polluting vanities: this idolatry, remaining unsubdued in the hearts of many professors of the Gospel, hath occasioned their apostacy or total unfruitfulness: nay, through some remains of it, numbers are kept from comfort and assurance; their spiritual life continues low and feeble; they are mere babes, or dwarfs, to the end of their days, and enter eternity before they obtain any comfortable satisfaction, what their eternal state will be. Indeed, all that is in the world, as apostate, and so the kingdom of the devil is diametrically opposite to the holiness, spirituality, temperance, humility, and lowliness of the Christian religion: its pleasures, interests, pomps, and honours, can only excite and strengthen the propensities of our fallen nature, which it is our great business and interest to subdue and crucify. The pursuit, acquisition, or enjoyment of them only tend to pollution and condemnation; they are soon passing away, to be possessed no more; whilst the portion of him that doeth the will of God shall be for ever. Yet are these vanities so alluring to the remains of corruption in our hearts, that without constant watching and prayer, we cannot escape, or obtain victory over, the world, and him who is the god and prince of it!

V. 18—25.

They who have been delivered from that original and universal idolatry, the love of the world, and the things in the world, will be less liable to be deceived by the seductions of those many antichrists, who, in every age and place, endeavour to corrupt the Gospel, and to oppose the honour and cause of Christ. Many thus go out from the society of Christians, but they never were true believers; for if they had belonged to that blessed company, they would no doubt have continued with them: nay, in fact, damnable heresies as much prove the faith of nominal Christians, as furious persecutions do. The unction from the Holy One alone can teach that knowledge, which will surely preserve a man from all delusions: and when we are thus established in the great truths of the Gospel; we shall know that no lie is of the truth; and shall therefore disregard the eloquence, learning, ingenuity, and confidence, of those who contradict the Bible; and be satisfied with opposing the express testimony of the truth itself to their well varnished and ably defended falsehoods. We shall in this manner most clearly perceive, that every man is an antichrist, who denieth the Person or any of the offices of Christ; and that in denying the Son, he denieth the Father also, and hath no part in his favour, whilst he rejects his great salvation. Candour and liberality of sentiment are good words; bigotry, fanaticism, and a contracted mind, sound very harsh: but let us not aspire to the reputation of liberality, or desire to escape reproach, more than the apostles did. Whilst we judge favourably of all, who trust in Christ as a divine Saviour, and obey his word, let us pity and pray for those deluded men, who deny the Deity and atonement of Christ, and the work of his new-creating Spirit; protest against their antichristian doctrine, and refuse all needless intercourse with them.—Let that abide in all, who have professed the Gospel, or would be deemed Christians, which was taught the primitive disciples; that they may continue in the Son and in the Father, and that the promise of eternal life may belong to them.

V. 26—29.

The subjects, above treated on, are peculiarly needful at this day, concerning those who seduce the professed disciples of the Saviour, and would persuade them, that it is of no consequence what they believe concerning his Person or doctrine. This fashionable species of infidelity directly contradicts the whole word of God, and in fact does its utmost to antiquate the Bible as an useless book, in this age of wisdom and illumination. We should desire to teach no man any thing, except what the Holy Spirit hath taught us in his word, to which our appeal must be made; and the same Spirit teaches all those, who partake of his sacred anointing, the grand truths of the sacred word, though they be left to differ in less essential matters. May we then receive from Christ more and more of his anointing, to abide in us, and to illuminate our mind in the truth unmixed with error; that we may abide in it, even as they did who of old adhered to the doctrine of the holy apostles: and let all, who profess the truth, and appear to have come to Christ, abide in him; without listening to the suggestions of any modern illuminaters of mankind; that when our Judge shall appear, we may all, with prophets and apostles, "have confidence, and not be ashamed "before him at his coming." Yet let us be equally careful not to hold the truth in unrighteousness; but remember that they only are born of God, who bear his holy image, and walk before him in his most righteous ways.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—3. (Note, John i. 10—13.) The apostle, having declared that they who did righteousness were born of God, here broke out into a joyful and admiring view of the love of the eternal Father, in having bestowed on them the unspeakable honour and felicity of being called "his children." What manner of love was this! or by what words could it be described? Whether his majesty, purity, and justice, or their guilt, vileness, and misery, were considered; whether the blessing conferred on them, or the method in which it was bestowed, were contemplated; the love of the Father in it must be adored, as passing knowledge and comprehension. Indeed, the world of ungodly men, among whom the children of God lived, commonly in poverty, affliction, and contempt, would not acknowledge their claim, approve their character, or desire their privileges; but this was the effect of their ignorance of God, and contemptuous alienation from his holy excellency; so that, when the only begotten Son of the Father appeared on earth, they knew him not, but rejected, despised, and crucified him. But, whatever the world thought of them, true believers, even in their afflicted condition on earth, were the children of God, regenerate, adopted into his family, the special objects of his love, and the heirs of his kingdom; and, whatever their trials were, their almighty Father would surely protect, provide for, comfort, and bless them. It did not indeed then appear what, or how glorious, they would at length be, nor could even the beloved apostle frame an adequate conception of heaven, and its ineffable felicities, which would be ennobling and rapturous beyond all his thoughts. Yet they knew, in general, that when he, even Christ, or God in human nature, should be manifested, his believing people would be made completely like him, both in the incorruptibility of their bodies, and the perfect holiness of their souls. For, in the beatific vision, the eyes of the children of God shall behold his glory in the Person of Christ, and their souls shall know his fulness and excellency by immediate perception; then, beholding of "him as he is" will complete the renewal of the divine image upon them, and for ever destroy all unholy affections; and thus they will be prepared for the consummate, unalloyed, and most felicitating enjoyment of God, in and through Jesus Christ, of which we can gain the most remote idea. But wherever the regenerating Spirit of God had produced this genuine hope in a man's heart, it would certainly induce him to desire and follow after holiness, as the preparation for this final happiness, and the anticipation of it; for he who hoped in God, that he would render him perfectly happy, by fully renewing him to the holy image of the divine Saviour, would also be assured that his present comfort must bear proportion to his sanctification: the assurance, that his labour in following after holiness would not be in vain, would also give energy to his endeavours; nor would he ever rest satisfied with his attainments, so long as sin remained in him: but he would use all means, and wait on God for the performance of his promises; till all his affections and powers were fully sanctified, all sinful passions destroyed, all holy dispositions perfected, and all his words and actions made conformable to those of his beloved Lord. As this can never be fully attained in the present life; the true Christian's diligence, in purifying himself as Christ is pure, must be continued till death: then the soul will be admitted into his presence, and perfected in his likeness: but the complete conformity of the Christian to his Lord, in body and soul, will not be possessed till the general resurrection. (Marg. Ref.) 'He does not say "has purified," but "purifieth," 'that we may understand him to signify, following after holiness, not the perfect attainment of it.' (Beza.) (Note, 1 Cor. vii. 1.)

V. 4—6. According to what had before been observed, they who did not follow after holiness, could not possess the genuine hope of the Gospel: but the apostle further remarked, that he who committed, or practised, sin, transgressed also the law, or violated and directly opposed the authority and requirements of the moral law; (for the ceremonial cannot here be intended.) Thus it was taken for granted, that the holy law of God was the rule of conduct to all his true servants; and that none of them wilfully and habitually did any thing contrary to it. For sin is a transgression of the law, or a lawless conduct. Whatever in any degree exceeds, comes short of, or deviates from, the law; and in thought, word, or deed is not perfectly coincident with it, is sin, a violation of the law, and deserves death according to the covenant of works: but an habitual commission of sin tends to the destruction of the law and its authority, and can never be allowed of by any disciple of Christ. For they know, that he was manifested in human nature, to take away the sins of his people, by atoning for their guilt, and by renewing them to his own holy image. Moreover, in him was no sin, and the perfection of his holiness, and active obedience, both magnified the precept of the law, constituted him a proper Person to be a sacrifice for sin, and was intended as an example to his people. Whosoever, therefore, abides in Christ, as one with him, and as maintaining communion with him, doth not sin in his allowed and general conduct: and whosoever sinneth, wilfully and habitually, has never seen the glory of Christ by faith, or had any experimental saving knowledge of him; for if he had, he would be transformed in a measure into the holy image of him, in whom there was no sin.

7 Little children, [u] let no man deceive you: [x] he that doeth righteousness is righteous, [y] even as he is righteous.

8 He [z] that committeth sin is of the devil; for [a] the devil sinneth from the beginning. For [b] this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil.

9 Whosoever is [c] born of God, doth not commit sin; [d] for his seed remaineth in him: [e] and he cannot sin, because he is born of God.

10 In this [f] the children of God are manifest, [g] and the children of the devil: [h] whosoever doeth not righteousness [i] is not of God, [k] neither he that loveth not his brother.

V. 7—10. The apostle, therefore, warned his beloved children, as others before had done; (Notes, 1 Cor. vi. 9. Gal. vi. 7. Eph. v. 6. James i. 22. 2 Pet. i. 9;) not to let any man deceive them by plausible pretences, into an opinion, that they might live in habitual sin and yet be true Christians. For he, who practised righteousness, as his business and delight, was a righteous man; and his conformity to Christ, (being righteous as he was righteous,) was the proper evidence of his interest, by faith, in his obedience and propitiation. On the other hand, he who committed sin, as his business and delight, was evidently of the devil's party, family, and disposition; as he was the first sinner, and had practised rebellion and iniquity from the beginning, and had no pleasure in any thing else. But it must be impossible to imitate and adhere to the devil, and at the same time to be a disciple of Christ; seeing the Son of God was manifested, for the single and express purpose of destroying, abolishing, or undoing the works of the devil, in behalf of all his people. He came to deliver them from that condemnation and slavery, into which the influence and temptation of Satan had reduced them and all mankind; and to restore them to the favour, image, and service of God. This was done, by atoning for their sins and pardoning them, and by a new-creation of their souls to holiness; but whilst men lived habitually in pride, infidelity, impiety, injustice, fraud, cruelty, malice, intemperance, or licentiousness, or in the neglect of a sober, righteous, and godly life: it could not be supposed, that the works of the devil had been destroyed, or his fortifications in their hearts cast down, by the power of Christ. Consequently the end of his incarnation and humiliation had not been answered in respect of them; and therefore they could not be warranted to account themselves his disciples. For all, that belonged to Christ, were born of God; (Notes, John iii. 1—8;) and no one who was regenerate, lived in the commission of any allowed sin: because the incorruptible seed of God, being made to grow and live in his heart by the Holy Spirit, (Note, 1 Pet. i. 23—25,) remained in him, and rendered it impossible that he could sin with allowance, continuance, and satisfaction; even as a fish cannot live out of water, because it is out of its element, and can only languish and die unless it be again put into it. This must be all that the apostle's general words can mean; because, if strictly taken, they would not only prove, that some men are perfect, but that all regenerate persons are incapable of sinning any more for ever; an inference, which no man, who either reads the Bible, or the history of mankind, will ever admit. General declarations of this kind must always be explained according to the argument of the sacred writer: otherwise, an antinomian may prove, that God justifies those who are in every sense ungodly, and who never do good works of any kind, or for any purpose, as long as they live: (Rom. iv. 4, 5;) and a man, who runs into the other extreme, may prove, that all God's children are perfectly sinless, and that no regenerate person can possibly fall into any sin. But scripture must be explained by itself, and soberly; and the context evidently shows, that the apostle spoke of an allowed practice of some habitual sin: this he declared to be impossible to the regenerate, and a full proof of a man's being the child of the devil. For in this especially the children of God, and the children of the devil, were manifestly distinguished from one another: and he who did not practice righteousness was not of God; whatever his creed, profession, gifts, or pretended experience might be: nay, this was to be carried to so great a strictness, that he who did not love his brother, but showed a selfish, envious, and malignant spirit in his general conduct, was not to be accounted a child of God, but of the devil. "He that committeth sin "is of the devil." (8.) 'It is not he, who committeth 'one or more sins of infirmity; for so did Christ's dis'ciples while they were with him; nor he, who com'mitteth one great sin, through the power of a strong 'temptation, of which he bitterly repents, and from 'which he returns to his obedience; for thus did David 'and St. Peter, who yet were not then the children of 'the devil: but they who comply with the lusts of Satan, 'and will do them. The other interpretations of these 'words, including the preceding verses, seem either vain 'and impertinent, or false and dangerous.' (Whitby.) Some have explained them, to signify, that he who is born of God, ought not to sin; some have argued, that when a Christian sins he ceases to be the child of God; and others have maintained, that they "who are born of God sin "not;" because their sins will never be imputed to them. 'He that is born of God proposeth to himself a life as 'free from sin as possible, nor does he ever of his own 'accord employ himself in sin; if at any time, contrary 'to the purpose of his mind, he has offended, he does not 'persist in the same; but, acknowledging his fault, he 'speedily returns to his former plan of life, as soon, and 'as much as he can.' (Gataker.) As "doing righteous"ness," means, not a single action, but habitual obedience to God; "committing sin," (it is the same verb in the original,) cannot properly signify merely a single act of sin, but habitual disobedience, in some particular at least. The word rendered "sinneth not," in this connexion, must signify the same, as those translated "com'mitteth not sin;" and be explained by them. Doing righteousness, evidences that a man is righteous; that is, a justified believer: but the apostle does not say, that it constitutes his righteousness; nor could he say this consistently with the tenour of the sacred scriptures. "He that doeth "righteousness is born of God;" it is the evidence and effect, and not the cause, of his regeneration. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. The message, which had been delivered from the beginning to Christians, in the name of their Lord, had especially required them to love one another, as the distinguishing evidence of being disciples. They therefore, who were manifestly destitute of this grace, ought not to be considered as true Christians; but were to be ranked with Cain, who being a professed worshipper of God, showed himself to belong to the family of that wicked one, the devil, by envying, hating, and murdering his brother Abel. (Notes, &c. Gen. iv.) But for what cause did he commit this atrocious murder? What provocation had he received? What injury had been done him? None at all: but he hated the holy image of God in Abel, and the example of his humility, faith, and piety; he was angry with God for accepting his brother's oblation in preference to his; and so he was enraged to that degree, that he slew him, "because his own works were evil and "his brother's righteous." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13—15. The disposition of Cain naturally belonged to the children of the devil, some of whom had despised, hated, and crucified Christ for the same reason: Christians therefore ought not to wonder, that the world hated them; seeing the men of the world were in subjection to the wicked one, and under his influence, as the children of his family. Indeed no Christian, who was well acquainted with the heart of man, could wonder at any effects of the contempt and enmity of ungodly people against the children of God; for it was the most unequivocal proof, that themselves had passed from that state of condemnation and spiritual death, in which they all once lay, into a state of life, and acceptance with God; when they were conscious that they loved the brethren. Humble disinterested love of men, for the Lord's sake, is indeed a good evidence of regeneration; but it is manifest that the apostle spoke especially of the love of believers towards their brethren in Christ, as such. Naturally, they all were disposed to hate, deride, revile, and injure those, who professed the truths of the gospel, bore the image of Christ, and were spiritual worshippers and servants of God through him: they had once been ready to deem them unsociable, precise, morose, and troublesome enthusiasts, or hypocrites, and to shun and dislike them as such. But, being born of God, and having thus passed from death unto life, they were made congenial with them in judgment and disposition; and thus they were brought to love, esteem, and honour them; to sympathize with them, and show them kindness; and to take pleasure in them, as the excellent of the earth. This affection for them was not entertained on account of their belonging to the same party, or holding the same notions; but, because it appeared to them that they loved Christ, bore his image, and were devoted to his service. Thus "they had purified their hearts, in obeying the truth, "through the Spirit, unto unfeigned love of the brethren:" (Note, 1 Pet. i. 22:) but, on the other hand, he who did not love his brother, even every one of those who appeared to be Christians, with cordial affection, and indeed every one of his neighbours, with good-will, abode still in death, condemned, and unregenerate. "For whosoever hated his "brother was a murderer;" that is, he had the heart of a murderer, and the pride, selfishness, envy, and malice, which habitually ruled in it, constituted the root of bitterness whence murder naturally sprang; so that, if all restraints had been removed, and suitable temptations interposed, the act of murder would have infallibly been the consequence. And they "knew, that no murderer had eternal life abiding "in him;" that is, no one, who had habitually the heart of a murderer, and a disposition to perpetrate that crime, could be a regenerate person, or a partaker of the Spirit of Christ. No doubt David, when in one dreadful instance he was guilty of murder, had eternal life abiding in him; nor is there any single sin, into which it is impossible for a regenerate man to fall: but the apostle was showing, that no true believer could live in habitual sin; and he stated, that he who loved not his brother did in effect hate him; and he who habitually hated his brother was constantly of the temper of a murderer; that is, he bore the image, and was of the disposition, of the devil, and therefore was one of his children, and not one of the children of a God of love. What an awful view do the concluding words give of the state of those numbers, who habitually determine by duelling, to attempt the commission of murder, whenever an occasion seems to call for it! 'The apostle does not 'say, that by loving our brethren, we are translated 'from death to life; but that we may know that we have 'passed.' (Beza.) It is the evidence and effect, and not the cause. The state of death in sin and condemnation, in which all men are by nature, is here taken for granted, as an undeniable fact.

V. 16, 17. The effects of genuine love of the brethren required to be ascertained; and this might be understood, by considering the love of God to sinners. The reality and immensity of his love was perceived especially, in that he, in the person of Christ, as incarnate, laid down his life for his people, to atone for their sins, and ransom their souls. Many copies read "his love," and not "the "love of God," so that the same weight cannot be laid upon this passage as on a similar one. (Acts xx. 28.)—If, however, this love of Emmanuel to lost sinners was duly considered, it must appear that Christians were required, according to the perfection of their rule and example, to lay down their lives for their brethren, when the case was urgent, and a proportionable good might be done by it; and therefore all inferior things ought surely to be given up for their benefit, when circumstances called for it. If, then, a man had "this world's good," and possessed what was sufficient for his own necessary expenses, and had any thing to spare for indulgence, or to hoard, and should see his brother have need, through sickness, calamity, or distress, yet, instead of cheerfully supplying his wants from his own plenty, should shut up his bowels from him, and stifle his compassionate feelings, through reluctance to be at the expense of relieving him, and so leave him in want and misery, how could it be thought that the love of God abode in that man's heart? By what could it be known that he had a true sense of the love of Christ for perishing sinners, when he laid down his life for them? or that the love of God had ever been planted in his heart by the Holy Spirit? seeing that the love of the world and its goods overcame and choked the risings of compassion to his suffering brother. (Note, ii. 15—17.)—Every instance and degree of this selfishness must weaken the evidence of a man's conversion; and when it is habitual and allowed, it must decide that he doth not belong to God, but more resembles Cain; seeing he would rather leave the children of God to suffer or die, than part with his money to alleviate their sorrows, or save their lives.—This might also be deemed constructive murder, as such a man refused to preserve life, when it was in his power, and his bounden duty to do it; and if the Lord had acted thus towards sinners and enemies, we must all have perished. As no higher expression of love is mentioned, than a willingness to lay down our lives for our brethren, it is manifest that the apostle did not maintain the extravagant notion, that true grace will make us willing to be eternally miserable, for the glory of God, and the good of the universe.

V. 18—24. (Note, James ii. 13—17.) From the preceding considerations, the apostle earnestly admonished his dear children to love one another, and their poor brethren and neighbours, "not in word, neither in "tongue," or merely in profession, and with kind and obliging language, "but in deed and in truth," showing the sincerity and strength of their affection for them by their actions, and in self-denying, liberal, communication to the supply of their wants. If they did this from faith in Christ and love to him, they would "thereby know, "that they were of the truth;" these fruits of the Spirit would show that they held the truth in love, and experienced the power of it in their hearts; and so they would be able "to assure their hearts before God," in humble confidence of his acceptance, and enlarged expectations of having all their wants supplied from the riches of his liberality. But they could not have this warranted assurance of his love, if they allowed themselves in known sin, or the neglect of known duty; for if their own hearts and consciences condemned them of secret wickedness, or of selfish disregard to the distresses of their brethren, they could not but know "that God was greater than their "hearts, and knew all things;" and the consideration of his acquaintance with all their sins, his holy hatred of them, his impartial justice, and almighty power, must fill them with fears of his vengeance, and prevent their confidence in him. For if they could not but decide against themselves, when made judges in their own cause, notwithstanding their partial self-love, insensibility to the odiousness of their sins, and their proneness to forget them and their aggravations, how could they hope to stand in judgment before the infinite God? According to the law,

CHAP. IV.

The apostle warns Christians against pretenders to inspiration; and gives directions for distinguishing the Spirit of truth from that of error, 1—6. He exhorts them to love one another, by the example and the covenant of works, every man's heart must condemn him, in proportion as he knows his rule, and examines himself by it. Even according to the Gospel, every man's heart must condemn him of hypocrisy, who lives in allowed habitual sin, unless his conscience be seared, and God have given him up to be judicially blinded and hardened. Nay, when true believers are betrayed into any known sin, of omission, or commission, they are arraigned at the tribunal of their own hearts, and condemned for it; and their confidence in God is weakened, till deep humiliation, and faith in the atoning blood for pardon, make way for the renewal of their peace and the revival of their confidence: and if, through more grievous declensions, their consciences lose this salutary though painful sensibility, severe corrections will surely be employed, as the merciful means of preventing their total ruin. But if the hearts of Christians do not condemn them of any allowed or unrepented sin, or neglect of duty, then have they confidence towards God, through the Spirit of adoption, and by faith in their great High Priest; and thus coming to the throne of grace, they may ask what they will of their reconciled Father, and shall certainly receive it, (if good for them,) because their conduct evidences the reality of their repentance and faith; as they uprightly keep his commandments, and habitually do those things that are pleasing in his sight. He has especially commanded sinners, by the Gospel, to believe in his Son Jesus Christ, and to come to him, pleading his name and merits, that they may thus receive forgiveness of sins, and all the blessings of salvation; and that, for Christ's sake, and after his example, they should love one another, in a forgiving, compassionate, liberal, and self-denying manner, even as Christ had given them commandment.—He therefore, who uprightly obeys these commandments, and others connected with them, is thus proved to "dwell "in Christ," his Ark, Refuge, and Rest, and in the Father through him. It was also manifest, that Christ dwelt in him, as the Lord of his affections, and as exercising his power, and displaying his glory, in and by him: and it was known, that this mystical union subsisted between Christ and their souls, by the Spirit which he had given them. This could not relate to the miraculous operations of the Holy Spirit, which were no full proof of this gracious indwelling, but to his new-creating energy, producing holy love, and renewing the image of Christ on their souls, and then "witnessing with their spirits that "they were the children of God."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

We can never sufficiently admire the love, which the Father hath bestowed upon us, or rejoice in our own felicity, if indeed we are numbered among the children of God. Who and what were we, or what had we done, that the infinite Lord should condescend thus to notice and distinguish us! What manner of love was this, that he should so redeem, regenerate, adopt, and bless such worthless worms, such guilty polluted rebels! doubtless it was vast beyond conception, and incapable of being illustrated by any comparison. May we then be followers of him as his dear children; and thus show our sense of his unspeakable mercy, and express that obedient, grateful, and humble mind, which becomes those so highly favoured and distinguished. Should the world disown us, and deride our pretensions, of being "the sons and daughters of "the Lord almighty," or even treat us with the utmost contempt, enmity, and cruelty, we may recollect, "that "the world by wisdom knew not God;" and that even his professed worshippers knew not "the Brightness of "his glory, the express Image of his Person," but crucified him, "whom all angels worship!" But as they could not exclude the First-born from his inheritance, so neither will they be able to prevent the eternal felicity of those whom he graciously owns as his brethren. Even in our lowest estate, and under our heaviest trials, "we are the "children of God," if we indeed believe in Jesus Christ; and we shall experience such consolations and possess such hopes, as will support us under our transient sorrows: but none on earth can conceive, in an adequate manner, the nature of "that exceeding and eternal weight of glory," into which we shall speedily enter. It doth not indeed yet appear what we shall be, but enough is known to animate us to the conflict: for what more can the believer desire, than to behold his beloved Saviour "as he is," in all his inexpressible glory, to be perfected in his image, filled with his love, and enabled to praise and serve him in a manner worthy of his infinite excellency, and his own immense obligations? But let none suppose that they possess holy hope in God, if they do not now desire, pursue, and practise holiness: for every man, without exception, in whose heart it is planted by the Holy Spirit, "purifieth himself," in dependence on the grace, and in contemplation of the glory of Christ, unto increasing conformity to his perfect purity. This distinguishes the living hope of God's children from the presumption of all kinds of hypocrites. The Redeemer did not magnify the law, and make it honourable, that his disciples might violate and despise it; but that they might be delivered from its righteous condemnation, and taught to obey and delight in its most holy and reasonable precepts. As in him was no sin, so none that abide in him allow themselves in any transgresssion of the divine law: for he, who committeth sin, hath not seen or known Christ, and is miserably deluded, if he think that he has.

V. 7—10.

In the vast concern of eternal happiness or misery, how careful should we be not to deceive ourselves! and the argument of the apostle in these verses points a way, in which many, it is to be feared, are self-deceived: for, however we interpret his expressions, they must prove, beyond all reasonable doubt, that they only are righteous of God in giving his Son for sinners; and various considerations tending to show the necessity, benefit, and efficacy of this sacred affection, 7—21.

before God, as justified believers, who are taught and disposed, by the renewal of the Holy Spirit, to practise universal righteousness in the general tenour of their conduct; and that a man's conformity to the example of Christ is the only adequate evidence of his being interested in his redemption. It should also be observed, that all, who are not as regenerate persons, the children of God, are the children of the devil; and, as they copy the example "of "him who sinneth from the beginning," they no doubt will be heirs of his inheritance, if they die unchanged. For the Son of God was manifested on purpose to destroy the works of the devil; so that they, in whose hearts the works of the devil are not destroyed in any degree, but who still continue proud, selfish, sensual, malicious, envious, and alienated from the life of piety, purity, and righteousness, cannot have received the special benefit of his incarnation. "Whosoever is born of God doth not com- "mit sin:" nay, he cannot do it; for his new nature, the divine seed that remaineth in him, effectually hinders him: even unallowed deficiencies, or such transgressions as he may be sometimes betrayed into, give him the most poignant distress. It is indeed impossible that he can live in known sin, or take any pleasure in such a course, because it is impossible to destroy the principle of divine life, and sensibility of conscience, which hath been communicated by the regenerating Spirit, or to turn again the heart of flesh into an unfeeling stone. "In this the children of "God are manifested, and the children of the devil;" and "whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God." May all professors of the Gospel lay these truths to heart, and examine themselves by them; and let all ministers be sure, as they will answer it before the Lord Jesus at the day of judgment, to insist fully on these topics, and make them plain to their hearers; for numbers are most certainly deceived by vain words; "sin on that grace "may abound;" make the lamented fact, of a believer's liableness to be overcome by temptation, a palliation of their habitual wickedness, and hope for heaven, whilst living in the secret, nay, perhaps, the open commission of those things, "for which the wrath of God cometh "upon the children of disobedience."

V. 11—17.

In ascertaining our state and character, as well as in inquiring after our duty, it behooves us to advert especially to the message delivered to Christians from the beginning, "to love one another." For the children of God are distinguished by humble, harmless, and self-denying love, as those of the devil are by proud, selfish, and mischievous hatred: the former love all men, and desire the happiness of those whose crimes they detest, and whose society they shun, though the household of faith attracts their special affection, and are the objects of their cordial estimation and complacency; but the children of the wicked one, whilst "they live in malice and envy, hateful and hating one "another," above all, despise, revile, envy, detest, and persecute those who bear the image, profess the truth, worship the name, love the cause, and seek the glory of Christ. For they are "like Cain, who was of that "wicked one, and slew his brother, because his own "works were evil, and his brother's righteous." Whilst we remember that the same nature belongs to, and the same spirit works in, all the children of disobedience," as prompted Cain to murder Abel, and the Jews to crucify the holy Jesus, we cannot marvel if the world hate us, nor ought we to be disconcerted by any insults or injuries with which we meet; and if indeed we love the brethren, we may know that we have passed from our natural state of enmity and spiritual death, and are brought into the company of those who are alive to God through Jesus Christ our Lord. But if this radical grace be wholly wanting, the most plausible professor of the Gospel abideth in death; yea, he is a murderer in his heart; he bears the image of Satan, and hath not eternal life abiding in him. Nor is it enough for us to avoid express malice and revenge: our love of our brethren, of our neighbours, and even of our enemies, must be positive and active, like that of our God and Saviour, who laid down his life for those whom he loved when enemies, in order that he might make them his friends and brethren. (John xv. 12—15.) If, then, it may in some cases be our duty to lay down our lives for our brethren, surely we are bound continually to labour, expend, and deny ourselves, in various ways, to alleviate their sorrows, and promote their good, as circumstances may require, and opportunities are given us! What then shall we say to such persons, professing the Gospel of Christ, as are rich in this world, and either hoard the greatest part of their wealth, or spend it in gratifying "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, or "the pride of life;" whilst they behold their poor brethren in distress, and refuse to pity them, or to part with any due proportion of their abundance for their relief? How can it be thought that the love of God dwelleth in them? How can they help dreading "judgment without mercy, "who have shown so little mercy?" Or how can "they "suppose themselves followers of Christ," when this world's good is more valued by them, than his example, commandment, glory and favour, or the comfort and lives of their brethren? (2 Cor. viii. 9.)

V. 18—24.

All Christians, whether rich or poor, should be careful to love one another, "not in word and in tongue, but in deed "and in truth," leaving cheap and hollow compliments to the children of the wicked one, as the necessary varnish of their selfishness. Thus, in proportion as grace expands our hearts in love, and the fruits of it abound in our conduct, "we shall know that we are of the truth, and shall "assure our hearts before God;" and there can be no reasonable doubt, but that Christians would in general be more satisfied of their acceptance, and enjoy more abundant consolation, if they were more diligent, self-denying, and liberal, in administering to the relief and comfort of their brethren. But when our hearts condemn us of acting contrary to our duty, and inconsistently with our profession, the consideration of the greatness, holiness, and omniscience of God must weaken our confidence, and give us apprehensions of being dealt with after our own measure of penuriousness and severity; whilst the Spirit of God, being grieved by our selfishness, will leave us disconsolate, and full of darkness and terror. But when our hearts do not condemn us of allowed deviations from our duty, then, like children who are conscious of having done aright, and assured of their loving parents' approbation, we have confidence with God; and whatsoever we ask we receive of him, because we show that we repent and believe, by "keeping his commandments, and doing "those things which are well-pleasing in his sight." Thus a gratuitous salvation and the holy obedience of love are inseparably connected, as the substance of the command of God to sinners is faith in his Son Jesus Christ, and love to one another, for his sake. This obedience, though utterly insufficient for our justification, (for we are made the righteousness of God in Christ,) proves that we dwell in him, and he in us; the sanctifying Spirit which he hath given us forms and maintains the sacred union, and seals us the children of God, and his consolations are the foretastes of our eternal felicity.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. While the extraordinary gifts and operations of the Holy Spirit were vouchsafed to the church, as well as his sanctifying and comforting influences, it was peculiarly incumbent on Christians to be upon their guard against false prophets, and important for them to be able accurately to distinguish between them, and those who "spake as they were moved by the Holy "Ghost." The apostle therefore exhorted his brethren not to believe every spirit, or every man who professed to speak by a supernatural impulse, and to be under the guidance of the Spirit of God; but to make trial of all such pretensions, whether they who made them were of God, or not. This was absolutely necessary, because many false prophets were gone forth into the world, who were instigated and prompted by Satan to propagate destructive heresies, in opposition to the doctrine and glory of Christ. (Note, Matt. xxiv. 24.) In giving this direction, the apostle did not make his appeal to the miracles wrought by the true prophets. (Note, Deut. xiii. 1—5. 2 Thes. ii. 9—12.) But he deemed it more decisive to determine the matter, by the agreement or disagreement of their doctrine to that which the apostles had "preached with the Holy "Ghost sent down from heaven;" for this was confirmed by the Scriptures of the Old Testament; by all the miracles of Christ, and all the prophecies fulfilled in him; by his resurrection, and the accomplishment of his engagements and predictions; and by all the miracles performed by the first preachers and professors of Christianity, during a number of years; and nothing done by those false prophets, who opposed their doctrine, could pretend to equal this multiplied demonstration. This shows that Christians, who are well acquainted with the Scriptures, may, in humble dependence on divine teaching, know, for themselves, who preaches according to the doctrine of the apostles, and who contradicts it, and that they are bound to make this trial of men and their tenets; that no pretences to the Spirit, to inspiration, or new revelations, are to be regarded as any thing but Satanical delusions, when they are brought to disprove or oppose the fundamental doctrines delivered by the apostles: that even apparent miracles would be totally insufficient to authenticate such a doctrine, and consequently that philosophical reasonings and human authority must be entirely disregarded, which concludes equally against Mystics, Enthusiasts, Papists, Socinians, and Deists, who may mutually despise and oppose each other, but all agree in setting up new lights against the authenticated and complete light of divine revelation. The apostle, therefore, exhorted his brethren, in determining who spake by the Spirit of God, and who did not, to observe, that "every spirit, which confessed Jesus "Christ as having come in the flesh, was of God." (Note, ii. 18—22. Matt. x. 32.) This must be understood of an intelligent confession of the doctrine delivered by the apostles concerning the Lord Jesus, his Person, and his offices. The reality of his human nature was no doubt peculiarly adverted to by the expression, "come in the "flesh;" but who could have doubted of his having been really a Man, if it had been generally understood and believed that he was merely a Man? And if the apostle had not known, that, as the Son of God, he could have come otherwise than in the flesh, he would scarcely have noticed his "coming in the flesh" as an essential part of this confession; for who would have said that John Baptist, or John the apostle, came in the flesh, when they were employed in preaching the Gospel, as they must have come in human nature, seeing they had no other nature? But the coming of Christ in human nature, when God "the Word "became flesh, and tabernacled among men," was indeed essential to the apostle's doctrine concerning his redemption. So that they who did not confess him as "come "in the flesh," or advanced any tenets contrary to his being the Christ, the Son of the living God, or any of those offices, which as God manifested in the flesh he was anointed to perform, were not of God, whatever pretences they advanced to inspiration, or appearances they exhibited of miraculous powers. For the spirit that suggested such heresies was that of antichrist, and they who spake by it were men of the same infidel, ambitious, and impious disposition, as the principal antichrist would be, of whose coming they had heard, and who in fact was already in the world, in the various false prophets that were raised up to oppose the true doctrine of Christ, of whom the grand antichrist would prove the genuine successor. These very heretics, whom the apostle here showed to be the fore-runners of the principal antichrist, might be proved to be the very same persons, whose sentiments the Socinians and others adopt and patronize, as primitive Christianity: and it is not very improbable that the most fatal prevalence of antichrist, which is yet supposed to be future, will be in the garb of infidelity, or open opposition to the Deity and atonement of Christ; that is, "denying that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is "come in the flesh," to be "the propitiation for the sins "of the world;" not in that of popery.

V. 4—6. (Note, ii. 20.) The Christians, whom John so affectionately addressed, were "of God," his children, bearing his image, and adhering to his truth and will; and they had overcome these false prophets, who were of the wicked one; they had been enabled to withstand their assaults, and to reject with decision their pernicious doctrines. This had been done through the teaching and assistance of the Spirit of Christ, who dwelt in them, and who was more powerful to uphold and preserve them, than the evil spirit, that dwelt and wrought in these deceivers, and in the whole world of unbelievers, was to assault or injure them. The undeniable and stupendous miracles also, as well as the holy lives of true Christians and faithful ministers, had, in many places, given them decided advantages over the false teachers, and driven them away with disgrace. These indeed were of the world, though they professed to be Christians, they belonged to Satan's kingdom, they were of a worldly disposition, and aspired at secular distinctions and advantages. They, therefore, spake of the world, agreeably to its wisdom, maxims, and taste; so as not to offend, but to gratify, carnal men, who loved the world, and to ensure their friendship, by flattering them, and giving them encouragement while indulging their worldly lusts; and, on this account, the world heard them with approbation, they made rapid progress, had numerous followers, and drew off many unestablished professors of Christianity from their faithful teachers. But the apostle might say with confidence of himself and his brethren, "We are of God;" and those who knew the holy and glorious character of God, and had an experimental acquaintance with him, through regeneration, adhered to their doctrine and instructions: whereas they, who were not born of God, and did not truly belong to him, would not hear them, but attended to the more amusing or flattering speculations of other teachers. But by this token all impartial inquirers might know the Spirit of truth, and that of error; for they who were influenced by the Spirit of truth, adhered to the doctrine of the apostles, whilst their genuine piety and holiness showed that they belonged to God; but they who were guided by the spirit of error, opposed the doctrine of the apostles; and the worldly disposition and conduct of those who propagated and embraced such delusions, as well as the tendency and effects of them, showed evidently that neither they nor their religion were of God. The same is the test and standard of truth to this day; nor can we by any other rule "try the spirits, "whether they be of God, or not." (Note, Matt. xvi. 18, 19.) 'Though the apostles be all dead, yet, as they 'speak in their divinely inspired writings, John in this 'passage, declares that their writings are the test, by 'which the disciples of Christ, since the decease of the 'apostles, are to judge both of teachers and of their doc'trine.' (Macknight.)

V. 7, 8. The apostle here returned to exhort those who adhered to the true doctrine of Christ, that they would cultivate the most endeared affection towards one another; for this holy, spiritual, and self-denying love was "of God," the effect and evidence of regeneration; insomuch, that every one, who thus loved Christians with special affection, and took pleasure in doing them good because of their likeness and relation to Christ, was certainly born of God, and had a saving knowledge of him; (iii. 14.) whereas he, who did not thus love the image of God in his people, was not born of God, and was destitute of any transforming knowledge of him. For "GOD "is LOVE," or essential goodness and benevolence: it is, as it were, his very nature, to be kind, to communicate life and impart felicity, and to provide for the happiness of his creatures, in all cases and methods, which consist with his infinite wisdom, justice, truth, and holiness; for love must be exercised consistently with these attributes by a perfect Being. The earth is filled with the goodness of the Lord, and doubtless the immensity of the creation is the same: holy angels derive from God complete and endless felicity, and rebellion alone has made any rational creatures suffer pain and misery. Being and happiness could not have been communicated in that vast extent and degree that it is, and will be, without the creation of intelligent agents. These form a kingdom, to be governed by a perfect law, and a righteous Sovereign. The very law of God is love, as well as his nature; love of him and each other constitutes the whole of its holy, just, and kind requirements; and all would have been perfectly happy, had all perfectly obeyed it. Unless infinite wisdom had seen it proper, that omnipotence should be exerted to prevent free agents from transgression, which undeniable facts demonstrate that it did not, this law must be guarded by sanctions, and they who break it must be exposed to a punishment proportioned to the offence. Thus love to creatures at large dictated both the law and its sanctions. When angels sinned, a God of love, in kindness to his obedient creatures, turned those from heaven to hell, who would have converted heaven into hell, if they had continued there, except some other act of omnipotence had prevented it. When man's apostacy took place, the love of God was shown, not only in sparing sinners, and giving them such a rich profusion of temporal benefits, whilst the sentence denounced against them was in part respited; but in so ordering it, that even their pains, sorrows, and temporal death, were expressive of his wise compassion, and tended greatly to prevent the multiplication of crimes, and the increase of condemnation. Especially, the provision of the Gospel, for the forgiveness of sin and the salvation of sinners, in consistency with the glory of the law and justice of God, whilst present sufferings are made subservient to the final and eternal felicity of believers, doth undeniably manifest that "God is Love." So immense were the obstacles to be surmounted, and so astonishing the method, by which mercy is honourably exercised to rebels deserving of eternal misery, that, even if the entrance of sin had been prevented, or impunity and recovery to holiness could have been ensured to all transgressors without any such expedient, the love of God would not so clearly have appeared to be infinite and incomprehensible. Something we can now see of its immensity: and, though impenetrable mystery and obscurity rest on many things respecting it, yet it will surely at length be seen, resplendent as the noon-day sun, that the most perfect love presided, when, in infinite wisdom of God, the entrance of sin was permitted, and when infinite justice, holiness, and truth, determined to leave many rebels in their impenitency, to be vessels of wrath fitted for destruction, as connected with the election, redemption, and sanctification of the vessels of mercy, who are thus prepared before unto glory. So that, if wise and holy love, in its most perfect exercise towards universal being, through eternity, had required or even admitted of it, no pain would have been suffered by any creature. much less would any have been left to be finally miserable. But to argue from hence, that none will be finally miserable, in direct opposition to his testimony, who is TRUTH, as well as LOVE, is the height of impiety and presumption. What do we know concerning the purposes of love to unnumbered millions through eternal ages, which may be answered in the infinitely wise counsels of God, by leaving comparatively a small number of rebels to the merited punishment of their crimes? Men might on the same principles argue, that prisons and executions could not have any place in the dominions of an eminently benevolent prince; when, in reality, wise and equitable benevolence to numbers would dictate severity to a few atrocious criminals, who would otherwise make many wretched. Indeed, we might as reasonably argue, that, since "God is love," there can be no such thing as misery in the creation; for omnipotence could certainly exclude it: but if infinite wisdom, justice, holiness, and truth, require that Love himself should cause his creatures to endure anguish, (and here facts preclude the vain hypothesis, which speculation might otherwise have adopted,) no created understanding can determine, in what degree, to what duration, or in how many instances, the wise, righteous, and holy purposes of LOVE may require the suffering of his rebellious subjects. So that all arguments and calculations of this kind prove nothing but the vain self-wisdom of foolish man, who deems himself competent to determine what God ought to do, and what he will do: and, in this presumption, opposes his arguments to the explicit testimony of God himself, and professes to honour his love, whilst he treats his truth as a lie, and supposes his awful threatenings to be terrifying delusions, to frighten the ignorant part of mankind into good behaviour, and to be despised by the more discerning! But it is enough for our purpose, that God hath so shown himself to be Love in his dealings with us, that, after all our crimes, we cannot come short of eternal happiness, except through our unbelief and impenitent rebellion; whilst strict justice would have consigned us to hopeless and final misery, as soon as ever we transgressed our Creator's law.

V. 9—12. In this, the love of God towards us, lost sinners, hath been especially manifested; "because he "sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we "might live through him." (Note, John iii. 16—21.) Hence it appears, that Christ is called the only begotten Son of God, previous to his incarnation, or coming into the world; and that the love of God, in giving his own Son to assume our nature, in order to his expiatory sufferings, was more stupendous, than even in giving him as incarnate to the death upon the cross for us. When God designed so vast a blessing as life eternal for fallen sinners, in his infinite compassion and mercy, his most perfect justice and holiness rendered it impossible for him to do it, (for he cannot deny himself,) except an all-sufficient atonement could be made for their sins: and when no other method, or none so proper for this end, was perceived by his infinite wisdom, as the sending of his own Son to be our Surety, and the atoning Sacrifice for our sins; he spared him not, but sent him into the world, that we might live through him. None of our words or thoughts can do justice to such free, rich, astonishing love of a holy God towards sinners, to whom he owed nothing; who could not profit, or harm him; whom he might justly have crushed in a moment; who were shown to have been deserving of his tremendous vengeance, in the very method by which they were saved; and when he could by his omnipotent word have created countless worlds, replenished with far more exalted beings, if he had seen good. Search we then the whole universe for love, in its most enlarged and glorious displays? We must at length be constrained to own, that it is to be found in the Person and the cross of Christ. Herein is that love, the splendour of which eclipses all that hath been seen elsewhere, from the beginning of the world, and which will be the special subject of admiring and adoring praise to all eternity. Doth love subsist between God and sinners? Herein was the origin of it; not that we loved God, for we were enemies to his holy character, law, sovereignty, worship, and providence; but that he, most freely, and with most condescending compassion, forgiveness, and liberality, loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiatory sacrifice for our sins. (Note, ii. 1—3.) In this great event, all holy beings will for ever see that "GOD is LOVE;" and the more redeemed sinners understand of this subject, the clearer views will they have of that love, which can never fully be comprehended: whereas they, who exclude this view of the divine benignity, may speculate about the subject, but can scarcely know any thing concerning its real nature and glory. If then God hath so loved us, in providing salvation, and bringing us to partake of it, we ought also to love one another, in imitation of his example, and in grateful obedience to his command; and to express this love, by a forgiving, peaceable, kind, liberal, and compassionate conduct towards each other. For no man hath seen God, in respect of his divine essence, at any time: (save, that he who hath seen Christ hath seen the Father also:) we therefore best prove that we love him, by loving his image in his people, and by doing good to them for his sake. Thus it will appear, that God dwells in us, by his new-creating Spirit, and that his love produces its genuine effects upon our hearts, by our renewal to his holy image. (ii. 5.)

V. 13—17. Christians might, therefore, know that they dwelt in God by faith, and he in them, as in his consecrated temple, "because he had given them of his "Spirit:" (Marg. Ref.) for, besides the miraculous powers conferred on some whom the apostle addressed, the same Spirit had so changed their hearts, and made them partakers of a divine nature, that they loved the children of God with a holy love, and copied his example in their conduct to each other. Under this influence and energy, the apostles, and others who had seen Christ, and were experimentally acquainted with his precious love, did testify to their fellow-sinners, every where, that "the "Father had sent his Son to be the Saviour of the "world," and to confer pardon, grace, and eternal life, on all men, in every place, who applied for them, through his atoning blood, by living faith in his name. Whosoever, therefore, should hear and receive this testimony, and confess Jesus to be the Son of God, acknowledging the love of the Father in this gracious dispensation, cordially falling in with the design of it, and venturing the enmity of ungodly men, in professing the faith of the Gospel, and obeying the divine Saviour, might be assured that he dwelt in God, as his Refuge and Rest, and that God dwelt in him, as his beloved temple. All such general expressions must be interpreted according to the context: for unless such a confession of Christ were sincere, intelligent and influential, the man could not be a partaker of holy love; and therefore the apostle would have contradicted what he before asserted, if he had meant a mere confession with the lips, without faith and grace in the heart. (8.) But true Christians had known, understood, and experienced, as well as believed, the love which God had shown towards them in the redemption of his Son; and it had had a transforming effect upon them, by bringing them to resemble God, in the nature and fruits of their love, and so by an habitual exercise of this holy affection towards God, each other, and all men; and to live in the most endeared and intimate union with him. Thus their love to the Lord was made perfect, or produced its genuine and valuable effects, in their love to one another: and they cultivated this holy disposition, and acted from it, in order that they might have boldness in the day of judgment, (Notes, Matt. xxv. 31—46:) because, as Christ was, so were they in this world: like him, they were influenced by holy love to do good to others in a self-denying manner; and being treated with contempt, reproach, and enmity, they meekly and patiently endured it, and persevered in doing good against evil, as he had done. Or, as God is, so were they; they bore his image, which the world hated, &c.

19 We [e]love him, because he first loved us.

20 If [f]a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God [g]whom he hath not seen?

21 And [h]this commandment have we from him, That he who loveth God love his brother also.

V. 18. In the love of God through Jesus Christ, as made perfect in love to Christians and to all men, for the Lord's sake, there is no fear or terror: the obedience and good works performed from this principle are not like the servile diligence of one, who reluctantly labours from dread of a hated master's indignation; but like that of a dutiful child, who performs services to a beloved father, which conduce to the benefit of his brethren, and are, on every account, pleasing, and voluntarily performed. Reverence of the majesty of God, and fear of dishonouring him, are intimately connected with the most perfect exercises of holy love; but terrifying apprehensions of vengeance have no place in it, and cease, in proportion as love prevails, and inspires confidence and gratitude. So that perfect love of God, (and of man for his sake,) must produce such full satisfaction of acceptance, such delight in his service, and such experience of his consolations, as to cast out all servile fear: this gives torment and distress to the mind, from which the Spirit of adoption proportionably delivers the believer. (Note, Rom. viii. 15—17.) The remains and returns of these terrors, therefore, in the experience of established believers, show that they are not perfect in love, though they have great use, in this state of conflict and imperfection, in all respects; yet the habitual prevalence of them in many persons implies, that they are not duly brought under the influence of the Spirit of adoption, but serve God, more from slavish fear, than from filial love. In heaven this love will be perfect, and uneasy fear will be for ever excluded; and in this world, the more we obey God from love, and the less we need and experience that "fear, which hath torment," the more of heaven do we enjoy. But this does not imply, that any Christians are made perfect in love on earth absolutely, to the full demand of the divine law, or that slavish fears prove a man to have no love or grace, or that exemption from fear of every kind is the privilege of believers. It is equally true, "that blessed is he that feareth alway," as that "perfect love casteth out fear;" for different kinds of fear are meant. (Notes, Rom. xi. 20. 1 Pet. i. 17.)

V. 19. They who serve God from filial affection, not slavish fear, "love him, because he first loved them;" not that their love is merely gratitude for his previous benefits, which, abstracted from other exercises of love, would be a very selfish affection: nor could any man in that case love God at all on good grounds, without some immediate revelation, to assure him that he was the object of his special love, even whilst he had no grace, and was wholly impenitent and sinful. But the evident meaning is, that if the Lord had not loved them before they loved him, even when they were dead in sin, they must for ever have continued enemies to him. His love suggested the plan, and provided the means of redemption; he revealed to sinners his glorious perfections and abundant mercy, in the Person and work of his Son; he sent his word, to declare to sinners this great salvation, and to invite them to partake of it; he regenerated them by his Spirit, and so brought them, by repentance, and faith in Christ, into a state of acceptance and reconciliation; and thus taught and enabled them to love his excellency, to value his favour, to be thankful for his inestimable benefits, and zealous for his glory. As, therefore, his love to them was the original source of their love to him, so from the latter they may infer the former, and take the comfort of the happy change which hath been wrought in them, whilst they give him the glory of it.

V. 20, 21. The love of God in Christ, produced in the heart of Christians by the spirit of adoption, is to be considered as the grand proof of their conversion; yet that also must be tried by its effects, in their temper and conduct towards their brethren. For if a man profess to love God, and yet hate his brother, and either indulges habitual resentment against any one, or shows a spiteful or selfish disposition, or contempt and enmity of God's image in his children, he is no doubt a liar, a false professor: for if a man do not love the holy image of God in his brother whom he hath seen, and whose good behaviour is sensibly endearing and advantageous to him, or refuses to show kindness to his brother in distress, when he knows this to be the commanded expression of love to God, how can he be supposed to love God, whom he hath not seen? whose perfection he can only contemplate at a distance; who is not visibly present, to excite him to suitable returns of affection; and who cannot want, or be profited by, any of his services? So that the pretence of loving God, when the love of the brethren is neglected, is no more than a cloak of selfishness, or an excuse for malignant passions. And indeed this is his express command, that our love to God should be shown by the love of our brethren: but how can he be supposed to love God, who habitually violates his command, and acts contrary to his most endearing example? (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V 1—6.

We live in an age, in which few comparatively pretend to immediate revelations; yet we have at least as much cause to try men's doctrines and religion by the word of God as they had in the primitive times. For "many "false teachers are gone forth into the world," who agree in scarcely any thing, but in denying "that the Son "of God is come in the flesh, to be the propitiation for "our sins, and the anointed High Priest, Prophet, and "King of his Church." If indeed no teachers are of God, who do not confess the doctrine of the apostles, concerning the person and salvation of Christ, "God "manifested in the flesh," and if all others are actuated by the lying spirit of antichrist, we may truly say, that antichrist did not much more prevail, in the darkest days of popery, than in these times of infidelity, skepticism,

CHAP. V.

The apostle shows the connexion between faith in Christ, regeneration, love to God and his children, obedience to his commandments, and victory over the world, 1—5. He states the manifold testimonies, by which the doctrine of Christ is proved; and declares the inseparable union between faith and eternal life; and the contrary, 6—13. He reminds Christians of the Lord's readiness to hear their prayers, for themselves and each other, 14, 15; gives an intimation of the sin unto death, and the regenerate man's security against committing it, 16—18; marks the difference between the world that lieth in wickedness, and true believers, 19, 20; and cautions Christians against idolatry, 21.

socinianism, arianism, mysticism, and antinomianism: whilst the scriptural doctrine concerning the Person, or some of the offices of Christ, seems to be wholly excluded from the religion of most of his professed disciples. But there is a remnant, who are of God, and who have overcome the assaults of all these deceivers, and will be finally victorious over them; because they are taught and kept by the Spirit of Christ, who is greater than the evil spirit, which still worketh in the children of disobedience. Indeed, they whose wisdom, principles, spirit, and conduct, accord to the judgment and disposition of the world, will be heard, applauded, and followed, by worldly men, as far as their consciences find it convenient to have some kind of religion, by way of an opiate: and, as the way to destruction is broad and frequented, no wonder that they have the majority on their side; for in all ages and places hitherto, the friends of God have been comparatively few. We must not indeed take it for granted, as the apostle did, that we are of God; and that he, who "knoweth God, heareth us;" but, as far as we can prove that our doctrine, temper, and conduct, "accord to the oracles of God," we may be confident that he will maintain our cause, and that his friends and children will favour us: and the characters of the persons who adhere to, and of those who reject, the testimony of preachers, may go far in deciding who declare the humbling holy truths of God, and who speak the dictates of the spirit of error; for many are incapable of doing such honour to the ministry of God's servants in any other way, as they do by forsaking, deriding, and reviling it; whilst their actions show to all, who understand that emphatical language, the reasons of their dislike.

V. 7—17.

Again and again we are exhorted to "love one another, because love is of God:" in proportion as this abounds in our heart, and regulates our behaviour, we bear the image of God, and show that we are born of him, and know him: thus we anticipate the temper and happiness, and, as it were, breathe the air, of heaven; whilst enmity, selfishness, malice, and revenge, are from hell, and the beginning of the misery prepared for the devil and his children. But our "GOD is LOVE:" and with such displays of this endearing attribute before us, and such obligations as we are brought under to it, how large, liberal, and fervent, ought our love of each other to be, and even that of our very enemies! Seeing that God hath manifested his love towards us, in sending his own Son, to be the propitiation for the sins of us rebels and enemies, that we might live through him, how earnest ought we to be in using all means, with persevering self-denial, to promote the welfare and save the souls of those who are most injurious to us! And how should we lay ourselves out to do good to our fellow-christians, for the Lord's sake! Let us not then think it enough to admire the love of God in Christ Jesus to us sinful creatures; but, since we cannot profit him, "whom no man hath seen or can see," let us show our love and gratitude to him, by imitating his kind and merciful conduct, in our dealings with our brethren and neighbours. Thus it will appear that he dwelleth and ruleth in our hearts; and his love will be perfected in us. Whilst we profess to believe the doctrine, which the apostles testified to mankind, and confess "that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world," may our holy loving tempers show, that he hath given us of his Spirit! Thus it will appear that we have understood the nature and glory, as well as believed the revelation, of the love which God hath to us; and that, as "God is Love," so we dwell in love, and in God, and he in us. In this way our love will grow unto perfection, and our confidence before the mercy-seat will be an anticipation of our boldness in the day of judgment; whilst we are conscious, that as he our Lord and Saviour was, so are we in this evil world.

V. 18—21.

By the work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope, we shall the most effectually be relieved from slavish and tormenting fears; for the more we feel of the loving temper of children towards our Father, and of affection to our brethren for his sake, the less we shall fear being treated as enemies, and the fuller will be our assurance of the special love of God to us. Nor would there be occasion for our being left to the painful restraint and impulse of terror, if we were more entirely constrained by love, in every part of our duty; so that all our disquieting doubts and apprehensions arise from our not being made perfect in love. Let us then pray, without ceasing, that we may more entirely love him, who hath first loved us: and if it be evident that our natural enmity is changed into filial affection and gratitude, let us bless the name of our God for this seal and earnest of eternal felicity; and, in return for his mercy, and in obedience to his commandments, let us do good to our brethren also, and to all men, for his sake, and after his example; and thus show, that, though our love is imperfect, yet that we essentially differ from all those who profess to love God, whom they have not seen, and yet hate their brethren, whom they have seen.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—3. Every man, who truly believed Jesus to be the promised Messiah, and received, honoured, and obeyed him in that character, according to the predictions of the Old Testament, and the testimony of the apostles concerning him, was doubtless born of God; as this faith must be the effect of divine life, and could not be separated from repentance, love, and other graces, or those good fruits which spring from them: and all, who credibly professed this faith, were entitled to that love which Christians owed to their brethren, whatever differences there might be in their previous character, abilities, rank, or situation. For every one, who loved God, the Father of all the regenerate, must also love every one of his children; even as men commonly love and show kindness to the offspring of their dear friends and liberal benefactors. But as every gracious affection might be counterfeited, it was necessary to observe, that this genuine love of the children of God might be distinguished from all natural benevolence, or party attachments, by its inseparable connexion with the love of God, and a cheerful upright obedience to all his commandments; for the same Spirit, who had brought the sinner's heart to love the image of God in his children, must also have taught them to love his holy character, precepts, and service. (Note, James ii. 10.) Christians might therefore know their love of the brethren to be spiritual, and evidential of their having "passed from death to life," by a disposition to love and obey God in all other respects; whereas that man could not truly love the children of God, who habitually committed known sin, or neglected known duty. So that these two parts of the Christian's character must reciprocally prove each other to be genuine. In fact, the nature, tendency, effect, and, as it were, the essence, of love to God, consists in its disposing the heart to unreserved and cheerful obedience: and as his commandments are holy, just, and good, the rule of liberty and felicity, so they, who are born of God, and love him, do not deem them grievous, but delight in obedience; and only groan and lament that they cannot serve him more perfectly. Indeed, the natural love of worldly objects, which is found in every human heart, and the fear of those inconveniences and sufferings, which the displeasure of ungodly men threatens and occasions, (in some measure at all times,) to the faithful servants of God, render obedience in the present state of things arduous, and connected with self-denial, and various losses, perils, hardships, and distresses, from which, in other circumstances, it would be wholly exempted. But true Christians are possessed of a principle of divine life, which carries them above all these obstacles and impediments.

V. 4, 5. That which is born of God, that new and heavenly nature which is communicated in regeneration, tends so powerfully to God and holiness, and includes in its essence such a spiritual judgment, and such heavenly affections, that all, in whom it is found, are by it made victorious over the world, and overcome both their natural love for its honours, riches, pleasures, decorations, and friendship, and their natural fear of the frown, rage, and contempt of worldly men. Thus they are prepared for losses, self-denial, and enduring affliction, in the cause of God, and taught to disregard the maxims, fashions, customs, and opinions of ungodly men, however eminent, numerous, or powerful. This new creature, as born of God, hath the ascendency in the heart of the youngest and feeblest true Christian, and therefore they all aspire after and attain unto this victory; for though the conflict of grace with corrupt nature, and the allurements and terrors of the world, is often very sharp, and the regenerate man may be baffled, cast down, and apparently slain in the battle, yet the divine life within him, being invigorated by the Holy Spirit, will again excite him to arise, and renew the combat with redoubled fortitude and resolution. So that at length the victory will be his decidedly; and he will habitually profess the truth, and do the will of God, as far as he knows them, whatever loss, suffering, disgrace, or hardship, may ensue, even if he should be exposed to death, in its most terrifying form, by his adherence to his duty. In acquiring this honourable victory, faith is principally concerned; a realizing belief of the testimony of God concerning invisible and eternal things, operating by fear of his wrath, and hope of felicity in his favour; a believing reliance on Christ for redemption, and all the blessings that flow from it, working by love and gratitude; with an abiding sense of God's presence at all times, to witness every action, and to support, help, and comfort those who trust in him, give such a determination to the true Christian's conduct, that he cannot habitually do what he knows to be contrary to the will of God, whatever emolument, credit, or favour, he may acquire by so doing: nor can he habitually neglect what God commands, to whatever loss, reproach, or suffering, it may expose him. Through temporary weakness of faith, he may be drawn into sins and negligences: but he will soon find such fear, shame, sorrow, remorse, and self-abhorrence, in his heart and conscience, that he cannot but return into the way of obedience, and reject the wages of transgression, whatever may be the consequence: nor can this ever be altered, unless it were possible that the shield of faith should be finally torn from him. (Note, Luke xxii. 31—34.) This is universally the case with true believers, though the temporary suspension of faith, and a consequent prevalence of worldly affections, may be longer in some cases than in others, during which lamentable seasons their evidence of sincerity must be equally weakened. And this is peculiar to believers; so that we may challenge the whole earth to produce one instance of a man, who did not believe in the Son of God, who had in all respects so overcome the love and fear of all persons and things in the world, as not habitually, in some way or other, to act contrary to his own judgment and conscience, from a regard to interest, reputation, ease, liberty, indulgence, friendship, or social and relative comfort and affection; or in order to avoid derision, reproach, the censure of singularity, or more material losses and sufferings. All men, but believers in Christ, are habitually enslaved, in some respect or other, to the customs, opinions, or interests of the world: and who is there, that dares in all things act according to the conviction of his own mind, without being warped by the general influence of society, or that of his own particular circle? He, and he only, can do this, who "believes that Jesus is the Son of God," and trusts in him for salvation, according to the scriptures: his faith, united with humble love, spirituality, fear of coming short of salvation, hatred of sin, a constant respect to his Lord's example, an indifference for worldly objects, and a deep persuasion of the miserable condition of all worldly men, gives him this victory.—(Note, Gal. vi. 14.) He habitually in all things follows the dictates of his own conscience, and the commandments of his Lord, whatever consequences may follow; and when he is betrayed into an incidental deviation from this rule, he deeply repents of it, and attempts renewed obedience. Hence it is, that the world will tolerate all other persons, except true believers, whatever their forms or notions be; because all others will, in some respects, comply with the humours, and court the friendship, of worldly men. But Christians are so unpliant, and so determined to follow their Lord according to their own judgment of truth and duty, without regarding the opinions, counsels, attentions, derision, revilings, or enmity of the many, the wise, the great, the learned, or the virtuous; nay, without being turned aside by persuasion, or the dictates of affection and gratitude, from the line of duty, they cleave to their religious singularities, (as they are deemed,) at so great an expense, and often amidst so many sufferings; and in so many ways they testify of the world, that its works are evil and its wisdom folly; that they can hope for no quarter from worldly men, but must expect to be hated or despised by all, for Christ's sake; even as he was, who perfectly overcame the world, as their Surety and example. It may be proper here to observe, that the Christian, in proportion to his knowledge and grace, will be singular only where truth and duty require him; and steadfast, according to the certainty or importance of the truth and duty: but in all things that he deems indifferent, and where his own will or interest alone are concerned, he will endeavour to be pliant, in order to show, that his pertinacious adherence to his rule is the effect of conscientiousness, and not of obstinacy and affectation,

V. 6. Having mentioned Jesus, the Son of God, the apostle observed, that this was the anointed Saviour, who came by water and blood. As he entered on his ministry on earth when he was baptized by John, and closed it by shedding his blood on the cross, so, after his death, water and blood flowed from his pierced side, as emblematical of the removal of our guilt by his atoning sacrifice, and the purifying of our souls by his grace, after his example, and according to his commandments: (Note, John xix. 32—37.) For "he came" to save sinners, "not by water only," not merely by teaching them the way of holiness, and enabling them to walk in it, "but by water and blood," by atoning for their guilt, and thus making way for their sanctification, and the acceptance of their persons, and works of faith and love: and to this the Holy Spirit bore witness, both in the miracles wrought by those who taught this doctrine, and the holy lives, the patient sufferings, and the abundant consolations of such as embraced it: and this witness of the Spirit to the doctrine 'of his atonement, as the Son of God come in the flesh, to save sinners by his blood-shedding,' could not be objected to, or rejected; "because the Spirit is Truth," even essential Truth itself, which cannot possibly deceive or be deceived. (Notes, 20, 21. iv. 1. John xiv. 6.)

V. 7, 8. These doctrines, concerning the Person and salvation of Christ, had been and were attested in the most unexceptionable manner; for there were Three, who from heaven, the holy habitation, in which the divine presence and glory is peculiarly displayed, had borne witness to it "The Father," who repeatedly, in an audible voice from heaven, had declared Jesus to be his "beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased," and had borne witness to the same truth, as well as the acceptance of his sacrifice, by raising him from the dead: the Word, who was himself God, as well as "from the beginning with God," who had testified that "He and the Father were One;" that "he who had seen him had seen the Father;" and that "he would shed his blood a ransom for many:" whilst his miracles, and the fulfilment of ancient prophecies in him, the accomplishment of his own predictions in his resurrection, and various other events, showed his testimony to be divine, and the voice of God came from heaven in human nature, to attest these truths to man: "and the Holy Ghost," who descended from heaven as a dove, and rested on Christ at his baptism; who had borne witness to him, by the mouth of all his prophets from the beginning of the world; and who came forth from the Father and the Son, to attest his resurrection and exaltation to the mediatorial throne, by the gift of tongues, and other miraculous powers, communicated to the apostles on the day of Pentecost. And these three divine witnesses, though personally distinct, were yet One in the unity of the Godhead, in a most mysterious and incomprehensible manner. There were also "three that bore witness on "earth," perpetuating, as it were, the testimony of the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, whose especial abode is in heaven, and whose testimony was immediately from thence: even "the Spirit," in the miraculous powers communicated to the disciples, by the laying on of the apostle's hands; the sanctifying efficacy of their doctrine; the holy conduct and consolations of Christians; and the prophecies delivered to the new-testament church, which would be fulfilled from age to age: "the Water," or the initiatory ordinance of baptism, by water, "into "the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy "Spirit," as the perpetual emblem of the polluted sinner's sanctification by faith and grace from the Lord Jesus: "and the Blood," or the Lord's supper, which was appointed as a memorial and attestation of the sacrifice of the death of Christ, till his second coming: and permanently testifies, that pardon and salvation can only be obtained by faith in the atoning blood of him, whose name is Emmanuel, who is "God manifest in the flesh," and who will surely come to be our Judge. As the accomplishment of the prophecies contained in the New Testament more than counterbalances the ceasing of miraculous gifts, so these divine attestations to the doctrine of Christ's Person, and the two great constituent parts of his salvation, continue to this present day, and shall to the end of the world: and we at present have abundant testimony to those truths, which our Father in heaven, the incarnate Word, and the Holy Spirit, immediately testified to the primitive Christians. It is well known, that many volumes have been written concerning part of the seventh verse and the beginning of the eighth, in order to prove, or to disprove, its authenticity. It is certainly wanting in many of the ancient versions and manuscripts; but whether the Trinitarians interpolated it, or the Arians and other Unitarians omitted it, is to this day a matter of controversy, and not likely to be determined. Upon such questions men will in general decide according to their preconceived opinions; yet it is very wrong to deviate from truth in support of system. It is, however, perhaps, somewhat more likely that the Arians or Anti-Trinitarians should silently omit, in their copies, a testimony that was so decisive against them, or that it should be left out by the mistake of some ancient transcriber, than that the Trinitarians should directly forge and insert it. The Trinitarian in fact would be deprived only of one argument, with which he might attempt the conviction of his opponent, if this text were wholly rejected as spurious; for his doctrine is abundantly supported by other scriptures: but if this testimony were admitted as the unerring word of God, all the ingenuity and diligence of their opponents would scarcely suffice to explain it away, or to avoid the inference that must naturally be drawn from it, except by rejecting the apostle's testimony. It has indeed by some, even Trinitarians, been maintained, that the words, rendered "these three are One," only mean, that their testimony is one: but the writer is not speaking of testimony, but of persons: else, why is the word translated three, masculine? Or why is the expression so remarkably varied in the next verse? "These three, the Father, the Son, and "the Holy Spirit are One," θειον, numen. It may also be doubtful, whether the passage connects with so much propriety, if the contested words be omitted, as it otherwise does: for if we read, with the copies in which they are wanting, "The Spirit beareth witness, because the Spirit "is truth: for there are three that bear record, the "Spirit, and the water, and the blood, &c." there seems to be a remarkable repetition, and a want of the apostle's usual energy in the passage: and it does not appear evident for what reason "the water, and the blood," or the two great ordinances of the new testament, as outward signs of sanctification and justification, by the grace and atoning blood of the Son of God, and as agreeing in One with the testimony of the Spirit, should be mentioned, and yet nothing should be hinted, concerning the testimony of the Father from heaven to Christ, as his beloved Son; or that of Christ himself, as confirmed by his miracles and resurrection, and the fulfilment of his promise, in pouring the Holy Spirit on his assembled disciples. As the words stand in our copies, there is indeed a most abundant concurrence of divine testimonies to the Person and doctrine of Christ, pointed out in a most compendious and energetic manner, —It cannot, however, be expected, that, in such a publication as this, a question, which has long employed the attention of the most learned men in Christendom, should be settled; and, after assigning the above reasons in favour of the authenticity of the passage, I am very doubtful, whether they are sufficient to counterbalance the arguments of those who think otherwise. But we need not be anxious on the subject, as we have scriptural evidence in abundance, without this text, to confirm our faith in one God, subsisting in three co-equal Persons, "the Father, "the Son, and the Holy Ghost," into whose One name we were baptized.

matter of fact; and almost all human affairs, even when the lives or interests of whole nations lie at stake, are conducted and determined by "receiving the testimony of "men;" and though it is known that all men are liable to be deceived or mistaken, and prone to deceive, yet he that should refuse to act upon human testimony, and should require another kind of demonstration in the various concerns of life, must soon not only give over all business, but refuse his most needful sustenance. If, then, the witness of men must be received, how absurd is it to reject that of God! This must be greater, or more indisputably certain; (iii. 20;) as he knoweth all things, cannot mistake or be imposed on, can have no possible inducement to deceive his creatures, is essential Truth, and cannot lie. (6. Ps. xix. 7.) The testimony of God is therefore the highest kind of demonstration: and we need only inquire into the evidence, that he hath spoken; and into the meaning of his words, which the honest, humble, and diligent inquirer will not be left greatly to mistake in; and then we obtain the utmost certainty that can be conceived, in things of the greatest importance. Thus faith appropriates the information contained in the testimony of God, and in a most compendious manner renders a man wise unto salvation. But the principal truth which God hath testified, in his authenticated word, is that which relates to his Son, and the way of salvation through him. He therefore who credits the witness of God, will "believe "on the Son of God," and rely on him for the blessings which he came into the world to purchase for sinners, and to bestow on them; and in consequence of this faith, he will receive another, and still more satisfactory testimony to the truth of the Gospel, which also seals to him his interest in Christ and his salvation. For "he that believeth "on the Son of God hath the witness in himself;" his discoveries of the glory of God in the Person of Christ, and the change thus produced in his judgment, dispositions, and affections; the views which he hath received of the evil of sin, of his own character and condition, of the deceitfulness and wickedness of his heart, and of the wretched state of the world around him; all of which he now perceives to accord exactly with the declarations of scripture, though once he saw nothing of it; the victory which he is enabled by faith to obtain over the world, his own bad habits and propensities, and the temptations of Satan; the evident answers which many of his prayers receive, and his experience of the faithfulness of God to his promises, and of his providential regard to him; and above all, "the love of God shed abroad in his heart by "the Spirit" of adoption; the peace, hope, and consolation connected with it; the pleasure he finds in communion with God, and obedience to his will; his delight in the society of spiritual persons, and the support which he receives when afflicted; these, and similar experiences, form a "witness in himself," to which all other men must be strangers; for "the Spirit of God thus witnesses with his "spirit, that he is the child of God," and gives him sweet earnests and foretastes of his eternal inheritance. This puts the matter out of all doubt with him, (except in hours of peculiar darkness, conflict, temptation, or humiliating correction;) and he can no more be argued out of his belief of the leading truths of the Gospel, respecting the Person and salvation of Christ, by any ingenuity or sophistry of infidels or heretics, than he could be convinced by logic that the sun was a dark, cold body, when he saw its light, and felt its genial warmth. This testimony proves, both that the scripture is the word of God, that he rightly understands the most essential parts of it, and that he is a partaker of the blessing thus announced to him. (Notes, John xi. 40. 2 Pet. i. 19.) On the other hand, he that believeth not God, in respect of his testimony to his Son, can never receive "the witness in himself;" but must expect his heavy displeasure; seeing "he maketh God a "liar," or treats his word as utterly unworthy of credit or confidence. This is the case of every one, "who believes "not the testimony which God hath given of his Son," and confirmed in all the ways above enumerated. (Marg. Ref.) As all revelation centres in this fundamental doctrine, it is in vain for a man to pretend that he believes the testimony of God in other things, whilst he rejects it in this. His opinion may indeed accord with the doctrine of scripture, in matters less affronting to human pride, more level with the human understanding, or more reconcileable to the love, friendship, and pursuits of the world. Thus a man assents to scriptural truths, because he thinks they may be otherwise proved; at least there is no other evidence to be opposed to the testimony of God, and nothing to be lost by assenting to it: but if his own reasonings, or those of some proud philosophy, lead him to a conclusion contrary to the word of God, he will lean to his own understanding, or believe in a philosopher, and treat the testimony of God as a lie. Nay, men professing to believe the scriptures will reject doctrines expressly revealed there, or employ a perverse diligence and ingenuity to explain them away, merely because they can find no philosophical arguments, with which to confirm God's testimony! The light of the sun is not sufficient for them, nor will they be satisfied with it, unless they can see the same objects by their own dim candle! On the other hand, they will pretend to believe the word of God, when it accords with the opinion of some philosopher, who perhaps borrowed that glimmering from scripture, which preserves his scheme from total darkness: and they sometimes suppose themselves doing good service, when they call such witnesses to support the testimony of God. So that, in fact, they do not believe God, but other witnesses, when they assent to scriptural truth; for they directly treat him as a false Witness, when he contradicts their preconceived opinions. Thus it is evident, that no belief of the Bible, or of any thing revealed in it, is of any avail, except a man "believe the testimony which God "hath given of his Son;" which is a subject as much beyond the reach of man's reasonings, as it is contrary to his pride and worldly lusts. (Note, John. iii. 12—16.)

V. 11, 12. The record, or testimony, of God, about which the apostle had repeatedly spoken, might be summed up in few words, as to its grand outline, "God hath given," of his free mercy and bounty, "to us," men, sinners, rebels, and enemies, even to all of our fallen race, who accept of the gift in his appointed way, "eternal life," or everlasting felicity, with every thing pertaining to it: "and this life is in his Son," in his Person, as "God manifested in the flesh;" and in his mediatory offices, as having all fulness in him, in consequence of his atoning sacrifice, for the pardon, sanctification, and salvation of every believer; so that this eternal life must be obtained and enjoyed by union and communion with Christ, both in respect of the title to it, the meetness for it, and the earnests of it. (Note, 1 Cor. i. 29—31. Col. iii. 1—4.) He therefore, "that hath the Son, hath life;" he that by true faith receiveth Christ, as the Son of God and as his Prophet, High Priest, and King, his "Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption;" who humbly depends on him for all these purposes, and is thus interested in him, and vitally united to him, and continually seeks and derives the blessings of salvation from him, through the influences of the Holy Spirit, "hath "life," is spiritually alive, hath the promise of eternal life ratified to him, and the sure earnests of it in his soul, which shall certainly issue in his everlasting felicity. "And he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life;" he who denies him to be truly and properly the Son of God, and refuses to trust and honour him as such; or who disdains to submit to his teaching as his Prophet, to rely on his atonement and intercession as his High Priest, or to obey him as his King, has not life; he is dead in sin, under condemnation, and the wrath of God abideth on him; nor will his morality, learning, philosophy, forms of religion, doctrinal notions, or enthusiastical confidence, at all avail him. For Christ is the believer's Life; and if a man do not live in Christ, by "faith working by love" and by the supply of his Spirit, he hath no life; whether he be an Infidel, a Socinian, or Arian; a Pharisee, a Mystic, an Enthusiast, or an Antinomian. To have Christ, we must receive him and abide in him, for all the purposes for which he came into the world; we cannot truly receive him in one character, whilst we reject him in another. He will not protect, deliver, or accept services from those, as a King, who will not be taught by him, or who despise his precious blood; and he will not save, as a High Priest, those who will not have him to rule over them.

V. 13. The apostle wrote the things above stated unto those who believed on the name of the Son of God, to confirm their faith, and to put them upon their guard against the seductions of false prophets; to assure them that theirs was the true religion of Christ, and that in him they had eternal life; and to encourage their hope, that they might more constantly and vigorously exercise and profess this faith in the Son of God, amidst all the delusions, persecutions, and tribulations, with which they met. The epistle might indeed be, and it has been, very useful to other descriptions of men; but this was the primary intent of it.

V. 14—18. The confidence which established Christians had in God, respecting the promise of eternal life in his Son, had an especial reference to his readiness to answer their prayers, through the heavenly Advocate, notwithstanding their sinfulness. They were assured, that if they asked any thing, however great or difficult, according to his will, after the prescribed manner, in humble faith, hope, and uprightness, grounding their requests upon his promises, and submitting themselves to his wise and righteous providence, "he certainly heard them," and accepted of their worship. And, knowing this, they were thence assured, that they had the "petitions which they "desired of him;" being confident that his omnipotence would certainly effect the purpose of his love, and fulfil his faithful promises. In some things their prayers were evidently and speedily answered; in others, they might be satisfied that they were granted in the best manner, though not exactly as they expected; and even when their requests were for the present denied, they made themselves sure, that in the best time and way they would at length be answered, in case this was for the glory of God, and their own real and abiding advantage: and this composed their minds, even as if they had already obtained their petitions. Whilst they thus asked and received, in their own behalf, that "their joy might be full," that love, which had been so largely insisted on, would dictate many prayers for their brethren; especially when they had been overcome by temptation, or were under some sharp chastisement; and they might be assured, that the Lord would graciously accept and answer such prayers; and in answer to them, grant repentance unto life to such as had sinned, but not unto death; and that he would remove the corrections, with which they had been visited. Yet they must observe, that "there was a sin unto death," which would be an exception to this rule; nor were they required or encouraged to pray for those who had committed it. It hath been shown, that apostacy, after an intelligent and credible profession of the Gospel, when connected with strong expressions of enmity, could seldom be separated from the sin against the Holy Spirit. (Notes, Matt. xii. 31, 32. Heb. vi. 4--8. x. 26—31.) This, no doubt, was that sin unto death, which the apostle intended; and, when it appeared evident that any person had committed it, Christians were directed to leave him to the righteous judgment of God, without expecting to see him renewed to repentance. Indeed, "all unrighteousness," or every deviation from the perfect rule of righteousness, is sin, and so deserves death, or final condemnation, according to the law; and all who turn aside from the Gospel, or act contrary to it merit this punishment: yet "there is a sin," even of this kind, "which is not unto death;" for, being the effect of surprise rather than of deliberate enmity, many, who were thus overcome in the moment of danger, had been and might be recovered: so that they were admonished to pray for their brethren, when grievously fallen, if they did not see in them the marks of determined obstinacy and enmity. The apostle had before observed, that none who were born of God could live in known and allowed sin, (iii. 9:) and he here added, that none of them were left to commit the unpardonable sin; for though such apostates had gone out from them, they had never been of them; (ii. 19.) As the man, (who is born of God, not allowing himself in any sin, but watching and praying, in the faith, fear, and love of God, to be preserved from temptation, or supported under it;) "keeps "himself," by the Holy Spirit, out of the way of this fatal transgression: so that the wicked one, by whom false professors are overcome and induced to apostatize, is not allowed access to him, or can make no impression on him. Satan obtained leave to sift all the apostles, and he grievously baffled and wounded Peter; but he could touch none of them, except hypocritical Judas, so as to prevail with them deliberately to renounce and betray their Lord: for the incorruptible seed abode in their hearts, in the genuine faith, love, and integrity, produced by it; and therefore they could not thus sin, because they were born of God.

V. 19. The apostle, and such established Christians as had "the witness in themselves," in love to God and each other, hatred of sin, and victory over the world, knew assuredly that they "were of God," born of God, his servants and worshippers, his children and heirs: and they also clearly perceived, that "the whole world lay in "wickedness," or under "the wicked one." All the human race, unless born of God, and become a part of Christ's kingdom, abide in willing subjection to the devil, (who is the god and prince of this world,) and are his vassals and slaves. They are overcome by him, and brought into bondage to him; they bear his image, and copy his example of pride, envy, malice, deceit, murder, mischief, slander, apostacy, rebellion, ingratitude, and enmity against God. They do the works of the devil, and concur in supporting his cause; they have neither wisdom, power, nor will, to deliver themselves; and they all must for ever have continued in this dreadful state, if Christ had not "come to destroy the works of the devil." This general declaration includes all unbelievers, whether Jews or Gentiles, idolaters, or hypocritical worshippers of the true God; atheists, infidels, profligates, profane persons, and formalists: the wise and foolish, the learned and unlearned, the rich and the poor, the royal and noble, as well as the base and vile; yea, the moral and virtuous, as well as the vicious. All lie in wickedness, under the power of unrepented and unmortified sin; or under the wicked one, as in some way or other doing him service; those only excepted, who "are delivered from the power "of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of the "Son of God." This the well instructed and established Christian knows assuredly: and the criminality, slavery, and misery of the human race excite his lamentations, prayers, and endeavours to spread the Gospel, as the only method, by which they can be delivered from their abject condition. Yet other men perceive nothing of it; but are exceedingly offended at the declaration, and at the endeavours used, "to turn them from darkness to light, and "from the power of Satan unto God." As the apostle made no exception in favour of unbelieving Jews in his day; so we can allow of none, in favour of unbelieving, heretical, and carnal men, called Christians in this present time. (iv. 5.)

V. 20, 21. The apostle, and his brethren also, knew, "that the Son of God was come; and that he," either Christ, or the Father, for it is not evident which Person was intended, "had given them an understanding, to "know him that is true;" (Notes, Luke xxi. 15. xxiv. 45:) so that their believing, experimental, and sanctifying knowledge of the Son of God, as the true and faithful Witness, the Truth and the Life, and of the only true God in him, (John xvii. 3.) was the effect of divine grace through the Spirit, who is Truth, (6.) Thus, having "the witness in themselves;" they knew that they "were "in him that is true," united unto the true and eternal God, by faith and love, abiding in him as their Rest and Refuge, and living in him by his indwelling Spirit; "even "in his Son Jesus Christ:" by union with Christ they were thus spiritually united unto God; because "He and "the Father are one." (Note, John xvii. 21—23.) "This "Person is the true God, and eternal life." (i. 2.) The language here used is peculiarly to be noted: it is not obvious to determine, in some clauses, whether the Father or the Son was intended; but when "the Son of God, "even Jesus Christ" had been mentioned, the apostle made use of a personal pronoun, (often improperly rendered "this man," when applied to Christ, but commonly signifying this Person.) This demonstrative pronoun hath Jesus Christ for its immediate and evident antecedent; and having said "this Person is the true God, and eternal 'Life," the apostle concluded by solemnly cautioning his beloved children "to keep themselves from idols;" which must imply, that this would be done, by worshipping the Son as the true God and eternal Life. The scripture, and the New Testament especially, was expressly intended to draw men off from the worship of idols of every kind, to serve the One, living, and true God; and can it possibly be imagined for a moment, that an inspired writer should speak in this manner of Jesus Christ, if he had not been, equally with the Father, the proper object of all adoration? If the worship of the Son of God were idolatry, (as it must be, if he were no more than a creature,) surely the apostle introduced his caution against idols in a very unaccountable manner! But if the triune Jehovah, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, three Persons in One undivided Godhead, be the Object, and the only Object, of divine adoration, nothing could be more proper and emphatical: for the Jews, rejecting the Son, and professing to worship God in one Person, (as the Mahometans, deists, socinians, and others in after ages have done,) had really charged the true Object of worship, the God of the Bible, for an imaginary Being, and could not easily be exculpated from the charge of idolatry; for they could not be discriminated from those, who worshipped the supreme being under the name of Jupiter, or Baal. So that Christians in our days, in other places besides the church of Rome, have more need to be warned to keep themselves from idols, than is generally supposed; and to be careful, that they adore the triune God, in whose name Christ commanded that his disciples should be baptized: and that, whilst they bow their knees to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus, they remember to honour the Son even as they honour the Father; in dependence on the omnipresent and divine Spirit, and under his guidance; that the grace of the Lord Jesus, the love of the Father, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, may be with them at all times. Amen.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

True faith in Christ always springs from regeneration; and all, who are not born of God, are either mere infidels, or they have only a dead and unprofitable faith. True Christians show their faith by their works: they love God, and all whom they judge to be his children; and this is proved to be genuine, by the pleasure which they take in keeping their Father's commandments; for, instead of deeming them grievous, they seek liberty and happiness in obeying them. By a new and divine nature, and the grace of the Holy Spirit co-operating with it, and by the exercise of faith in the testimony, the promise, the power, and the love of God, they gradually acquire a victory over the world, and learn habitually to do the will of God, without being seduced, persuaded, or affrighted from it, by any persons or objects in the world around them. Indeed this victory cannot be acquired without conflict; and it is never absolutely perfect in this life: yet our faith prevails so far above what any other principle can do, that we may boldly say, "Who is he that overcometh the world, "but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?" Let then all who profess to believe the Gospel inquire, whether they have obtained, or are contending for, this victory. For we must all, after Christ's example, overcome the world, or it will overcome us to our final ruin. A worldly carnalized Gospel is the peculiar danger of the present day, and gives infidels and heretics of every name their chief advantage against the truth of God's word. The Gospel, which is so abundantly attested by all the Persons in the Godhead, by miracles and prophecies, by the peculiar ordinances of the new dispensation, by the holy lives, patient sufferings, and joyful deaths of apostles, evangelists, and martyrs, relates especially to the Person of Emmanuel, to the efficacy of his atoning blood, and "the "sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience:" and as the miraculous powers communicated by the Holy Spirit bore witness to the apostle's doctrine, so his new-creating work, in our hearts, attests our interest in the great redemption of the Son of God; nor can this deceive us, "because the "Spirit is Truth." As Jesus, therefore, came not by water only, or by blood only, but by water and blood, let us never attempt to separate what God hath thus joined together: for the holy lives of all, who profess the doctrine of grace, is that testimony to the truth, which is at present principally wanting, in order to stop the mouths and silence the objections of all who oppose them.

V. 9—13.

Nothing can be more absurd than the claim of those men, who will be satisfied with nothing but demonstration in matters of religion; whilst, in the ordinary affairs of life, they hesitate not to proceed upon credible human testimony, and would deem him out of his senses, that refused to do so; whereas, "if we receive the witness of "men," surely "the witness of God is greater!" Indeed, it is impossible that the invisible things of God and the eternal world should be known, except by faith receiving the information of divine revelation: for in what other way can we know the inconceivable perfections of God, his inscrutable counsels, or the manner in which he will show mercy to his rebellious creatures? These are not subjects for man to discover or know, by speculation or abstract reasonings; but will always be best understood by those, who most simply believe the sure testimony of God respecting them. And indeed they, who believe in the Son of God, have an inward testimony to the truth, through the illumination, renewal and consolations of the Holy Spirit, and in their own happy experience: which, when possessed in a large degree, is a rational foundation of the most entire confidence that can possibly be had by those, who have not come to the immediate vision and enjoyment of God. But can it be expected, that this "Secret of the "LORD" should be with those who do not believe his word, and who treat Him, who is Truth itself, as a liar and deceiver? This is the case of all who believe not "the record which God hath given of his Son;" and it does not become them to treat the steadfastness of experienced Christians as obstinacy, or their consolations as enthusiasm, when they are so fully warranted by the word of God. Disregarding then their self-wise reasonings, let us thankfully receive the record of Scripture, that "God "hath given us eternal life, and that this life is in his "Son;" he who hath the Son hath life, and he "who "hath not the Son of God, hath not life:" that we may give diligence to obtain an assurance of our interest in Christ, and know that we have eternal life; and may so grow stronger in faith, more steadfast in hope, "and al-"ways abounding in the work of the Lord; knowing that "our labour is not in vain in the Lord."

V. 14—21.

Confiding in the love of our heavenly Father, and coming to him through our great Advocate, we may be assured that he always heareth, accepteth, and answereth all such prayers, as accord with his will, and tend to our real benefit. We should, therefore, abound in supplication for our brethren, as well as for ourselves, especially seeking to the Lord to pardon and recover the fallen, as well as to relieve the tempted and afflicted: and as we cannot know who hath sinned unto death, we should not easily yield to discouragement, respecting those whom we once considered as brethren. We ought to be very thankful, that no sin is unto death, according to the Gospel, of which a man truly repents; and that God will enable all those, who are born of him, to keep themselves, that the wicked one may never prevail on them to sin, in the manner which they do who are given up to a reprobate mind. If we have so grown in faith and grace, as to "know that "we are of God;" we shall readily perceive that "the "whole world lieth in wickedness," and under the power of Satan: this will show us how vast our obligations are to redeeming love and special grace; and ought to excite our constant prayers and unremitting endeavours, to promote the preaching of the Gospel, and the conversion of sinners, by every means in our power. Happy are they, who know that the Son of God is come, and to whom God hath given an understanding to know, and a heart to rely on, him that is true! May this be our privilege; may we dwell in Christ, and Christ in us; may we be one with him, and he with us; for "this is the true God and eter-"nal life:" thus our fellowship will be with the Father and the Son, through the Spirit, and we shall be preserved from all idols and destructive heresies, and from the idolatrous love of worldly objects, and be "kept by "the power of God through faith unto eternal salvation."

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF

JOHN.

This short epistle, and that which follows, being written, as is probable, not long before the apostle's death, and neither to any church by name, nor to the churches at large, were not so generally and unanimously known and acknowledged, as written by him, in the earliest ages, as the preceding epistle was: but their coincidence with it, in sentiment, manner, and language, at an early period satisfied all concerned, that they were written by the same person. Mill observes, that of the thirteen verses in this epistle, eight may be found in the first, either in sense or in expression. (Marg. Ref.) The word rendered, "The elder," might probably be applied to St. John, when all the other apostles were dead; as a title of honourable distinction; for he was the Senior of the whole church: or he might modestly, yet as claiming authority, assume it on this occasion. Some have conjectured, that the church of Jerusalem was figuratively meant, by "The elect lady;" and that of Ephesus, where John is supposed to have at this time resided, by "her elect sister:" but it hath more generally been thought, that an eminent and honourable Christian matron, well known in the church, was addressed by the title of "the elect lady," and that some other honourable Christian, nearly related to her, was intended by "her elect sister," (v. 13.) On any supposition, however, the title of catholic, cannot properly belong to it: (Preface to 1 Peter:) as the writer's purpose of visiting, in a short time, those whom he addressed, is alone a sufficient proof. It is supposed, that the apostle especially intended, in this epistle, to put those to whom he wrote on their guard against such heretics, as affirmed that Jesus was not really a man, but only appeared to be one; and appeared to do and suffer those things which the apostles and evangelists recorded of him. This heresy was, in its consequences, subversive of Christianity; which accounts for the decision of the writer against those teachers who held it. (Note, 7—11.) The same decided conduct is, however, equally needful, reasonable, pious, nay, charitable, (in the true sense of the word,) in respect of those who propagate many other opinions, subversive of the Gospel; who yet exclaim against the bigotry of those, (however benevolent and beneficent in all other things,) who determine not to be partakers of their evil deeds.

A. D. 90. A. D. 90.

The apostle addresses, with expressions of affectionate regard, and with salutations, "the elect lady and her children," declaring his joy in their good behaviour, 1—4. He exhorts them to brotherly love and obedience, 5, 6. He warns them against deceivers, that neither they nor he may lose their full reward, 7, 8; and against giving the least countenance to those who did not bring the true doctrine of Christ, 9—11. He hopes to see them shortly, and concludes with salutations, 12, 13.

THE [a] Elder unto [b] the elect lady and her children, [c] whom I love in the truth; and not I only, but also all they that have [d] known the truth;

2 For [e] the truth's sake, [f] which dwelleth in us, and shall be with us for ever.

3 [g] Grace * be with you, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, [h] the Son of the Father, [i] in truth and love.

4 I [k] rejoiced greatly, that I found of thy children [l] walking in truth, as we have received a commandment from the Father.

5 And now I beseech thee, lady, [m] not as though I wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had from the beginning, [n] that we love one another.

6 And [o] this is love, that we walk after his commandments. [p] This is the commandment, That, as ye have heard from the beginning, ye should walk in it

7 For [q] many deceivers are entered into the world, [r] who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an antichrist.

8 [s] Look to yourselves, [t] that we lose not those things we have † wrought, but [u] that we receive a full reward.

9 Whosoever transgresseth, [x] and abideth not in [y] the doctrine of Christ, [z] hath not God: [a] He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, [b] he hath both the Father and the Son.

10 If there [c] come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed:

11 For he that biddeth him God speed, is [d] partaker of his evil deeds.

NOTES.

V. 1—3. The aged apostle seems to have written this short letter about the same time with his general epistle; and he only styled himself "the Elder," (1 Pet. v. 1;) knowing that the honourable matron, whom he addressed, would be satisfied from whom she received it; and properly regard it, without a more explicit declaration of his authority. She seems to have been a person of superior rank; he did not scruple to give her the title of honour which custom had allotted to her; and his acquaintance with her "work of faith, her labour of love, and her patience of hope," satisfied him concerning her "election of God." He also addressed her children, who were trained up in religion, and some of them at least were partakers of her grace. He assured them, that "he loved them in the truth;" in sincerity, and as united by the bond of the truth of the Gospel, which they all believed. Nor was this peculiar to the aged apostle; for all those loved them, who had understood and known the truth; that is, all such as were acquainted with her and her family. This affection was borne to them "for the truth's sake, which dwelt" both in this matron and her children, and in those that loved them; and which would be with them for ever, as the incorruptible seed of eternal life. The same, or a similar benediction, has repeatedly been considered; except as the apostle added, "in truth and love;" which seems to refer to the cordiality and fervency with which he sought those spiritual blessings, in behalf of the persons to whom he wrote.

V. 4. The apostle had either met with the children of this honourable matron, in some place whither he had journeyed, and found that they "walked in truth;" and evinced their sincerity in professing the Gospel, by an habitual conduct consistent with it: or he had witnessed this when he was with them. It, however, gave great joy to his benevolent and pious mind, to see them tread in their honoured parent's steps, and likely to be instrumental in their turn to the support of the Gospel.

V. 5, 6. I beseech, &c. 'This sort of address suits 'a particular person, better than a whole church consist-'ing of many individuals.' (Macknight.) What follows accords to that which has already been considered. (1 John ii. 7—11. v. 1—5.)

V. 7—11. The influence of the false teachers tended to disunion among Christians, as well as to pervert and mislead the unstable. (Notes, 1 John ii. 18—29. iv. 1—6.) It therefore behooved those to whom this epistle was addressed, and all into whose hands it might come, to be upon their guard, and to take heed to themselves, to their principles, spirits, and conduct; lest the labour of their ministers should prove fruitless, and their expectations be disappointed; and lest even their own losses, self-denial, and diligence in the cause of the Gospel, should prove of no use to them. This would be wholly the case of apostates; and in some degree of those who were seduced into heretical opinions and an inconsistent conduct. Whereas the apostle's desire was, that he and they together might receive a full reward, which would be the case, if they were steadfast in the faith and obedience of the Gospel: as this would at present recompense him, by his joy in them, for all his labours on their account; and they would at last be his crown of rejoicing in the day of Christ. But whosoever transgressed, habitually and with allowance, the commandments before spoken of, or abode not in the doctrine of Christ, had not God for his Father and Portion; as he only, who abode in that doctrine, was interested in the special love of the Father, and the redemption of the Son. If therefore any persons came to the place where this elect lady and her family resided, to propagate their tenets, who brought not with them, in their profession and preaching, the doctrine of Christ, respecting his Person, as the incarnate Son of God, and his salvation

12 Having [e] many things to write unto you, [f] I would not write with paper and ink: but [g] I trust to come unto you, and speak [*] face to face, [h] that [†] our joy may be full.

13 The [i] children of thy elect sister greet thee. Amen.

from guilt and sin; they were warned not to entertain them in their house, nor "to wish them good success in the name of the Lord:" for by thus countenancing their ministry, they would partake in the guilt of their evil deeds, and be abetting to the destruction of men's souls and the dishonour of God. They might relieve such persons in sickness or distress, or show good-will to them in any way that gave no sanction to their pernicious doctrines: but they must stand aloof from them, and protest openly against them, in this respect, that they might prevent their mischievous success as much as possible. The heretics, especially intended, are supposed to be those who denied the real humanity of the divine Word; and explained all that was recorded of his actions and sufferings as mere delusive appearances.

V. 12, 13. The apostle expected much joy and comfort in visiting, and conversing with, this pious matron and her family, and to be a helper of their joy also; that so their consolation in Christ might be complete. We know nothing concerning "her elect sister," who sent salutations to them, to which the apostle joined his hearty Amen. But it is probable, that some well known and eminent family of believers, residing near to the place where the apostle was at this time, is meant.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

A consistent and fruitful profession of the Gospel is the principal honour, even of those few of the noble and exalted of the earth, who are thus distinguished: and that love is most cordial and permanent, which Christians bear to one another in the truth, and for the sake of it; for this will dwell in their souls to eternity, and be with them as the source of most perfect felicity. All, who know and love the Gospel, will love such as profess and adorn it; and will pray, that "grace may be with them, even mercy and peace, from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father, in truth and love:" and it will greatly rejoice faithful and zealous ministers, to see the honourable of the earth employ their influence and improve their talents to promote true religion; to observe them educating their "children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord;" and to witness any of their descendants walking in the truth and obedience of the Gospel; as ready to support that good cause while they live, and to bequeath a regard towards it to the succeeding generation. Some few families of this kind are found among us: may the Lord bless them more and more, and their children after them; and raise up many others to copy their example! For, alas! most of the superior orders in the community are rapidly diffusing irreligion, infidelity, and vice, in their extensive circles; and preparing to leave them as a fatal legacy to their posterity. We should employ every argument and persuasion, to induce Christians to abound in love of their brethren, and to render obedience to all the Lord's commandments: for those "many deceivers, who confess not that Jesus Christ," the Son of God, "is come in the flesh," "to redeem us to God with his blood," will have great success among those professors of Christianity who are not rooted and grounded in love, and taught to delight in God's commandments. As such deceivers and antichrists multiply on every side, it behooves us to look to ourselves and to each other; especially ministers to their people, and parents to their children; that we may not lose the things which we have wrought, but receive a full reward. Let us then equally disregard those who transgress the commandments, and those who abide not in the doctrine of Christ; that, by maintaining and obeying the truth, we may have both the Father and the Son for our "Shield and exceeding great Reward." Let us protest against such teachers as do not bring with them the doctrine of Christ; not giving them any entertainment, and not seeming to "wish them God speed;" lest any should by our means be induced to hearken to their damnable heresies, and so we should be found partakers of their evil deeds, which are often a thousand times more mischievous to mankind, than those of profligates or even assassins, as they murder far more souls than the others can do bodies of men. In obeying this commandment of God, amidst the clamours which will be raised against our bigotry and uncharitableness, we should be careful to show great candour to those who differ from us in matters less essential, who hold the doctrine of Christ's Person, atonement, and holy salvation: and we ought to pray for those deluded men, who deny the fundamentals of Christianity, and show them kindness, in every way, and by every method, which implies no countenance of their heresies. Thus we shall stand at a distance from all appearance of persecution and intolerance, whilst we strenuously assert the difference between the Gospel of Christ and the doctrine of every antichrist: and between the love due to enemies and that which belongs to the saints, in whose communion we find much of our present joy, as an anticipation of our eternal felicity.

THE THIRD EPISTLE OF

JOHN.

'The writer of this epistle speaks with an authority, which the bishop of a particular church could not pretend to. For if Diotrephes was bishop of one of the churches of Asia, the bishop of Ephesus,' (that is, if not an apostle also,) 'had no right to say to him, "If I come, I will remember his deeds which he does." '(Note 9, 10) That language, and the visit made to the churches, denote a man who had a more general 'jurisdiction, than that of a bishop, and can only suit St. John the apostle.' (Beausobre, and L'Enfant, in Macknight.) All inquiries, whether Gaius, to whom the epistle is addressed, was, or was not, the same person, mentioned in the Acts of the apostles, and the epistles of St. Paul, have hitherto terminated in uncertainty. There can be no reasonable doubt, but that "the strangers," and those "who for his name's sake went forth, taking nothing of the Gentiles," were evangelists, or missionaries. (Notes.)

The Apostle addresses Gaius with good wishes, commendations, and exhortations to persevere in his liberal and zealous support of those who went forth to preach the Gospel, 1—8. He cautions him against the presumptuous and malicious designs of Diotrephes; and highly commends Demetrius, 9—12. Giving intimations of an intended visit, he concludes with salutations, 13, 14.

NOTES.

V. 1—4. (Rom. xvi. 23.) It hath been generally supposed, that the Gaius, to whom St. John wrote, was the same person, of whom frequent mention is made in the writings and history of Paul, and his character may seem to favour the opinion: but it is probable that John wrote his epistle many years after St. Paul's death. Gaius was a very common name; and the person here addressed appears to have been converted by John's ministry: so that no certainty can be attached to the opinion; nor is this of any consequence. After an address, couched in that affectionate and fervent language for which the apostle was remarkable, he added his earnest wish, "that concerning "all things," (for that seems to be the proper rendering,) "Gaius might prosper, and that he might be in health, "even as his soul prospered." Gaius was probably of a weak constitution, and had perhaps sustained heavy losses from the rapacity of persecutors; whilst at the same time "his soul prospered" exceedingly, as the apostle well knew: he therefore earnestly desired the confirmation of his health, that his valuable life might be prolonged: and that all his well-formed designs for usefulness might be prospered, and his ability for conducting them continued and increased. For the apostle had been greatly rejoiced, when certain brethren, (who seem to have been preachers of the Gospel,) had come from the residence of Gaius, "and had testified of the truth that was in him;" and of the consistency of his disposition, discourse, and conduct, with the truths which he had received and professed. The apostle indeed had no greater joy on earth, amidst all his labours, infirmities and sufferings, "than to hear that his "children," (either Christians in general, or such as had been converted by his ministry,) "walked in truth;" or showed the sincerity of their profession, by the effect of the truth upon their temper and conduct: for this would encourage his prayers, and hope in God, and animate him to fervent thanksgivings. Indeed it must have highly gratified the zeal and benevolence of his pious heart.

whatsoever thou doest to the brethren, and to strangers;

6 Which [n] have borne witness of thy charity before the church: [o] whom if thou bring forward on their journey [*] after a godly sort, thou shalt [p] do well:

7 Because [q] that for his name's sake they went forth, [r] taking nothing of the Gentiles.

8 We therefore ought [s] to receive such, that we might be [t] fellow-helpers to the truth.

9 I wrote unto the church; but Diotrephes, [u] who loveth to have the pre-eminence among them, [x] receiveth us not.

10 Wherefore, if I come, [y] I will remember his deeds which he doeth, prating against us with malicious words; and not content therewith, neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them that would, [z] and casteth them out of the church.

11 Beloved, [a] follow not that which is evil, but that which is good. [b] He that doeth good is of God: but [c] he that doeth evil, hath not seen God.

V. 5—8. The apostle thought it proper to commend his beloved Gaius as one who in all things acted in that manner which became a believer, and was faithful in the use of what had been committed to his stewardship: this appeared in whatever he did towards his fellow Christians and the ministers of the Gospel; and to the strangers, that were driven from home by persecution, or travelled abroad to preach the word of God. For these had borne testimony to his liberal and hospitable love, before the churches of Christ in different places, especially where St. John then resided: and in continuing to entertain such persons, and in aiding to defray their travelling expenses, from a regard to the will and glory of God, he would act in a manner becoming his character, and honourable to the Gospel.—Because, from love to Christ, and for the honour of his name, they had gone forth as evangelists, to preach among the Gentiles; determining to take nothing of them for their subsistence, to whatever straits they might be reduced; lest they should appear mercenary, and so prejudice the minds of men against their doctrine. It, therefore, became the duty of established Christians to entertain such zealous and disinterested ministers, and to contribute to their support, that they might be helpers, together with them, in propagating the truth of the Gospel, by enabling them to proceed in their work and labour of love. 'The 'apostle's sentiment in this precept is, that such of the 'brethren, as had not devoted themselves to the preaching 'of the Gospel, but followed their ordinary occupations at 'home, were bound to contribute, according to their ability, towards the maintenance of those who went about 'preaching the gospel.' (Macknight.) It is manifest, at the first glance, how exactly this accords to the case of those, in this commercial country, who cannot, or do not, become missionaries; and their conduct respecting those who are.

V. 9—12. Some expositors think, that the apostle here only meant, that he should have written to the church, had not the report which he had heard concerning Diotrephes determined him rather to address his letter to Gaius: but it does not appear that the words are capable of that construction. He seems to have written to the church, to induce them to help on their journey the persons before mentioned: but Diotrephes, (who probably was a pastor of the church, whose circumstances or abilities, concurring with his ambition of pre-eminence, had acquired him an undue influence over his brethren,) would not own his authority, nor pay any regard to his counsel. Wherefore the apostle observed, that if he came thither, as he intended to do shortly, he would publicly censure his conduct; or even enforce his decision by inflicting some miraculous punishment upon him, as he was not afraid nor ashamed to vent malicious or wicked invectives and slanders against him, in the most indecent manner. Nay, he did not think this a sufficient expression of his contempt and enmity; but refused to entertain, or countenance, those evangelists whom St. John recommended; and even forbade others to do it; and when they regarded the apostle's authority more than his prohibition, he proceeded to excommunicate them for so doing. It is indeed most wonderful, that a professed minister of Christ should thus pertinaciously oppose the aged apostle; and should acquire such authority over the affairs of any church, as to be supported in such a contest: yet this was most evidently the case. The apostle, therefore, warned his beloved Gaius not to be influenced by this ambitious man, or to imitate his conduct; let him not "follow the evil, but the good:" which was to be seen in the behaviour of professing Christians: for "the man who did good," and was kind, loving, and beneficent, from evangelical principles, was born of God, and belonged to him; whereas he who practised evil had no saving knowledge of him. But while the apostle cautioned him against Diotrephes, he pointed out to him another person of his acquaintance, that was well worthy of his imitation; as he had a good report of all Christians, and of men in general; yea, the very truth itself, as it were, bore testimony to his humble diligence, zeal, and honourable conduct: to which the apostle also added his testimony: which Gaius knew to be true and faithful: and he would therefore be sure to honour and imitate so excellent a man. 'Private offences against our'selves must be forgiven, and forgotten; but when the 'offence is an impediment to the faith, and very preju'dicial to the church, it is to be opposed and openly 'reproved.' (Whitby.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

How many professors of the Gospel are there, concerning whom the apostle's words may be reversed; so that we must earnestly wish and pray that their souls may prosper, as their health and outward circumstances do! For spiritual languor, and want of vigour and success in every thing conducive to the glory of God, may be observed in numbers, to bear proportion to their external prosperity. But there are a few, who are so eminent in grace, and zealous of good works, that the precarious state of their health gives concern to all who love the Gospel: and they earnestly desire the continuance of their lives, and the increase of their ability to do good, and that they may "prosper in all things even as their souls prosper." The conduct of such Christians gives a joy to faithful ministers, which counterbalances their grief on account of those who disgrace their profession: and every renewed testimony, which is borne to their walking in the truth, renews that inward satisfaction; for the rejoicing of such pastors over their children, and in their fruitfulness and consolation, differs widely from the selfish joy of prosperous hirelings: or that of such, as "love to have the pre-eminence." Parents and ministers should be as ready to commend what is well done, as to point out what is wrong, in the conduct of those whom they superintend; and indeed this is far more pleasing to a benevolent mind. The faithful stewards of Christ, whether they have been intrusted with "the mysteries of God," or with talents of another sort will at length obtain a good report: nor can multiplied charities, or "hospitality without grudging," be so concealed, as to remain unknown to the church. Applause properly introduces exhortations; and indeed it should be considered as an admonition to proceed in the same commendable behaviour. Ministers, who are constrained by the love of Christ, and of the souls of men, to go forth and encounter perils and hardships in spreading the Gospel, and who are content to struggle with poverty in their labour of love, rather than quit their stations, or do any thing to prevent their own success, are peculiarly entitled to the countenance and assistance of their fellow-christians. Every one, according to his ability, ought to assist such persons as circumstances require; that they may be fellow-helpers to the truth. Indeed that money must be well expended, which promotes the faithful preaching of the Gospel in any part of the world: and it is greatly to be wished, that all Christians would try to save, not only a little, but if practicable, very much, from their expenses, in order to create a fund for conducting such important designs. But, alas! we live too much to ourselves in these lukewarm days; and we need not wonder, if covetous and ambitious men, who love to have the pre-eminence in the church, disdain these admonitions from inferior ministers, when even the apostles were not secured from the presumptuous, insolent, and malicious opposition of persons of this description: but their deeds will one day be remembered against them, when "every One that exalteth "himself shall be abased, and they who humble themselves "shall be exalted." Let us then not follow that which is proud, selfish, malicious, slanderous, and wicked, though the example be given by eminent and distinguished persons; but let us be "followers of God, as "dear children, and walk in love," after the example of our Lord, and such as have most closely imitated him: for he who thus habitually doeth good, is of God; and he "that doeth evil hath not seen or known God," whatever his notions or gifts may be. We should therefore notice those "who by well-doing have put to silence the ignorance of foolish men," and who have good report of the truth itself, and of its most faithful and zealous friends: for by associating with such Christians, and copying their example, we shall have peace within, and live at peace with the brethren. Thus our communications with the Lord's people on earth will be very pleasant, and we shall be numbered with them in glory everlasting.

THE

JUDE.

The writer of this epistle so expressly describes himself as Jude, the brother of James, (Marg. Ref.) that we must either allow him to have been Jude, the apostle, (called also Lebbeus, whose surname was Thaddeus, who was brother, or near relation to our Lord,) or we must suppose the writer guilty of a direct forgery. Some hesitation, however, as to the authenticity of the epistle, seems for a time to have prevailed in the church, which was at length fully removed; though some learned moderns have, on frivolous pretences, as it seems to me, endeavoured to revive it. He calls himself, not an apostle, "but a servant of Jesus Christ;" and so does St. Paul. (Phil. i. 1.) He is also supposed to quote apocryphal books. Now St. Paul quoted heathen poets, when what was true in them might be adduced to good purpose; without at all sanctioning the fables which they contained. These are the chief objections; and they amount to nothing against the internal evidence, and the general current of antiquity. It is probable that St. Jude wrote to caution his brethren against the same deceivers, whom St. Peter, in his second epistle, had opposed; and nearly at the same time. Many think, that they both had access to some ancient book, which is now lost, and quoted from it; and likewise, that Jude had seen St. Peter's epistle; and, in order to add his testimony to the same effect, adopted several of his thoughts, and even expressions. This, however, is uncertain: for the same Spirit of prophecy might lead these two witnesses to oppose the corrupters of Christianity, by similar examples, arguments, and illustrations, without either of them knowing what the other wrote. There is no ground for the opinion that it was exclusively addressed to the Jewish converts: on the contrary, it seems to have been properly a catholic epistle, intended for all Christian Churches throughout the world. The exact time when, and the place from which, it was written are uncertain.

The address and salutation; and the writer's purpose in the epistle, namely, to establish Christians against certain false teachers of very bad character, 1—4. The example of the Israelites, who perished in the wilderness; that of fallen angels, and that of Sodom, are adduced, as showing the danger to which they, who apostatized, or perverted the Gospel, were exposed, 5—7. The vile character of these seducers further stated, and their doom denounced; with reference to some traditions, concerning Michael contending with the devil about the body of Moses; and an ancient prediction delivered by Enoch, concerning "the day of judgment "and perdition of ungodly men," 8—16. Warnings, counsels, and exhortations suited to the occasion; and a concluding ascription of glory to God, 17—25.

NOTES.

V. 1, 2. The apostle Jude, or Judas, (John xiv. 22.) seems to have written this short circular letter soon after Peter wrote his second epistle, with an intention of adding his protest also against the seducers whom Peter opposed. He styled himself "the servant of Jesus Christ, and the "brother of James," namely, of James the Less, the son of Alpheus, who was the author of the epistle bearing that name. The unusual ascription, (Marg. Ref.) of sanctification to God the Father, and the order of the words, have induced many expositors to explain "sanc"tified," of their being "set apart," or separated "in "the election of grace," by God the Father; in consequence of which they were given to Jesus Christ, and preserved, in and by him, from dying in their sins, or falling into fatal delusions, till called by the word and Spirit of God into a state of actual fellowship in the Gospel of Christ. Others suppose the order of the words to have been disregarded: and then the apostle's meaning is, that the persons addressed were regenerated and sanctified, by the grace communicated from God the Father; that they were thus brought home to the "good Shepherd, who "bought them with his blood," and were preserved by his watchful care; and, being "called according to his pur"pose," they would be "kept by the power of God "through faith unto salvation." In behalf of all these the apostle desired, that "mercy" to pardon their sins, to compassionate and relieve their miseries, and to supply their wants, "and peace," inward and outward, "and "love, might be multiplied unto them:" even the special love of God to them, with all its precious fruits, and their love to him, to one another, and to all men, for his sake. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3, 4. When the apostle applied himself, with all assiduity and care, to write to his fellow-christians, concerning that salvation, which was common to him and them, and every man who would accept of it, it appeared to him, upon mature consideration, most needful to address them upon the duty of "contending earnestly for the "faith," or doctrine, "once delivered to the saints," by the apostles and evangelists, who first preached the Gospel after the day of Pentecost. They could not but know the great fundamentals of that doctrine, respecting the person and salvation of the Lord Jesus, and his mediatorial authority over his redeemed subjects: and, as these were violently assaulted at that time, they ought to contend earnestly for them; patiently and constantly professing the faith, and adhering to the commands, of Christ, in the midst of hardships, opposition, and persecution, (ἐπαγωνίζεσθαι,) and diligently striving to disseminate the knowledge of uncorrupted Christianity in the world; refusing all countenance to those who opposed it; decidedly using all their influence to put others upon their guard, and to confirm them in the faith and practice of the Gospel; and to show them the falsehood and pernicious tendency of the heresies, which were propagated instead of them. Thus their example, profession, conversation, prayers, and improvement of talents, might be instrumental to impede the progress of fatal delusions, to establish the faith of the weak and wavering, and even to recover some of the fallen: and an earnest contending for the faith, with such weapons as these, would consist with meekness and benevolence; and differ widely from that controversy, which was conducted with acrimony, slander, invective, and reciprocal contempt. These vigorous measures were peculiarly proper at that time, as certain men had glided in like serpents, with subtlety and plausible pretences, unawares to the people and their pastors; for the enemy sows these tares while men sleep. But the Lord had foreseen them; for they "were of old ordained," or registered, "to this condemnation:" many predictions had from the beginning been delivered to this effect, (14, 15;) and it had been declared, that such persons should arise, and be left to themselves, and so invent and propagate pernicious errors; deceiving men, and exposing themselves to the righteous condemnation denounced against lying prophets. Nay, these predictions had been extracts, as it were, from the registers in heaven; even the secret and eternal decrees of God, "known unto whom are all his works "from the beginning of the world;" in which he had determined to leave them to their pride and lusts, till they merited and received this condemnation. Such were "un"godly men," who, professing Christianity, took encouragement from the abundant mercy of God, and the way of free salvation there revealed, to indulge without fear or shame in the grossest lasciviousness; thus perverting the most holy truths into an occasion of the vilest unholiness: in doing which they "denied the only Lord God," cast off the yoke of his authority, as their Creator, "and that "of our Lord Jesus Christ," by refusing to have him to rule over them, or to be the subjects of his mediatorial kingdom. (Note, 2 Pet. ii. 1—3.) Some have supposed, that these ungodly men denied the doctrine of the apostles, concerning the Person and atonement of Christ; (Note, 5 I will therefore [s] put you in remembrance, though ye once knew this, how that the Lord, [t] having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, [u] afterward destroyed them that believed not.

1 John ii. 22, 23;) and they would therefore explain "turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness," of some attempts made by them to traduce the doctrines of grace, as tending to licentiousness. But this construction would be very unnatural; and the whole epistle shows that they were abominable antinomians, who "wrought all "uncleanness with greediness," under pretence of exalting free grace. Yet it is very probable that they also held some wild notions concerning the Person of Christ; for this was generally the case with the various descriptions of these primitive heretics; whose absurd and presumptuous reveries, concerning these points, would be wholly unworthy our notice, did they not illustrate the folly of man's wisdom in matters of religion; the perverse disposition of the human heart to prefer any senseless falsehood to the truths of revelation; and the artifice of Satan in suiting the delusions, which he propagates by his ministers, to the taste and capacities of those whom he means to ruin by them. The intellectual poison which he administers, in this age of proud reasoning and skepticism, is of a more plausible kind, and can be supported with more show of argument; or else it would not be so generally received. Gave all, &c. (3.) 'I was sedulously devising to write to you concerning the common faith, when the circumstances of the times rendered it necessary, and determined me to this subject.' Once. (3.) Once for all: so that no addition is to be made to the doctrine thus delivered, or alteration in it; and all that either human learning and wisdom, or human folly and ignorance, can do in this way, only tends to corrupt it. Of old ordained, &c. (4.) Not to commit these crimes by any constraint; but their wilful sin and impenitence being foreseen; and God, for wise reasons, determining to leave them to themselves, he "ordained them to this condemnation;" as he had done Judas, and those who crucified Christ. (Marg, Ref.)—Whatever objection lies against this view of the subject, lies at least equally against the whole system of prophecy, as far as the crimes and condemnation of men are expressly foretold. (Marg. Ref.) The only Lord, &c. These words may be differently rendered: but our translation seems to give the true meaning, preserving the distinction between the Father and the Son.

V. 8. (Notes, 1 Cor. x. 1—12. 2 Pet. ii. 4—11. 20—22.) External privileges, profession, and apparent conversion, could not secure from the severest vengeance of God, those who thus turned aside in unbelief and disobedience. To evince this, the apostle deemed it proper to remind his readers, though they had been taught and had understood it, that the Lord, having delivered the whole nation of Israel from Egyptian bondage, and made a national covenant with them as his people; yet afterwards destroyed with terrible judgments such of them, as believed not, and so would not obey him; though this involved a vast majority of the nation. (Notes, Heb. iii. 7—19. iv. 1, 2.) In like manner, they, who apostatized from Christianity, or manifested their unbelief by determined and habitual disobedience, instead of being secured by their external privileges, would be more deeply condemned on account of them. Even the angels, originally created holy, endued with noble powers, and exalted to great eminence in heaven itself; when, dissatisfied with their first estate, they ambitiously and rebelliously, left the station assigned them by the Creator, had been cast down from their holy habitation, and were reserved, as in chains of everlasting darkness, wickedness, misery, and despair, until the judgment of the great day; when their condemnation will be as distinguished, as the rank was from which they fell. Even as the inhabitants of Sodom and the adjacent cities, who were favoured with a most pleasant and fruitful country; when, after the manner of apostate angels, they daringly rebelled against God, (which appeared especially in their giving up themselves to abandoned lewdness, and the shameless indulgence of their unnatural lusts;) had been exhibited as an example of divine vengeance to the whole earth, in the destruction of their cities and all that was in them, by fire from heaven, and by the perpetual desolations of their fertile country; so that it became a visible emblem of the eternal fire of hell, into which that judgment swept the souls of such as died in their sins; and all the adults without exception seem thus to have perished. In like manner "the dream- "ers," of whom the apostle spake, vainly expecting liberty and impunity in sin, followed the example, and would share the doom of abominable Sodom: whilst they defiled their bodies, which ought to have been consecrated to God; despised all authority, divine and human; and reviled those, who were placed in dignity, or invested with power, in so insolent a manner, as would tend to exasperate them against Christians in general. In short they would not endure either authority or reproof; but disdained them as the inhabitants of Sodom did the gentle expostulation of Lot. (Gen. xix. 9.)—Dreamers. (8.) 'Per- 'fectly stupified, and destitute of reason, as if their senses 'had been locked up by a deep sleep, or an inveterate 'lethargy, from which no terrible example could awake 'them.' (Beza.)—The epithet filthy, added in our translation, implies that their very dreams were defiled, through the filthiness of their waking thoughts.

V. 9, 10. (Notes, 2 Pet. ii. 11—19.) It is most probable, that the apostle took this account concerning Michael from ancient tradition, which was well known among the Jews; and by thus adducing it, he hath given sufficient attestation of its truth. (Notes, Deut. xxxiv. 6. Dan. x. 13. 21. xii. 1.) In some of the passages here referred to, Michael has been supposed to be the Son of God himself, as the great Ruler over all angels, and worshipped by them all. But we do not seem authorized to interpret this text of him, as spoken of in the tradition by the name of Michael; but rather of some created angel, invested with great authority over his fellows, perhaps as Messiah's peculiar vicegerent. This exalted arch-angel, however, had a contest with the devil about the body of Moses. It may be supposed that he wanted to make the place of his burial known to the Israelites, in order to tempt them to worship him, as the papists do the bodies of martyrs, real or supposed; but Michael would not suffer him to do it: and probably the devil expressed his rage in desperate blasphemy. Yet Michael durst not bring against him a railing accusation; he did not presume to denounce on him the judgment of blasphemy, or to retort his revilings; but merely said to him, "The LORD rebuke "thee." (Zech. iii. 2.) Though the hateful character and atrocious conduct of the devil must have excited the holy abhorrence and indignation of the arch-angel, he yet dared not to utter any reviling expression: not from fear of the devil, but because, even in those circumstances, it would not have been consistent with the perfection of his character. But these heretics, pretending superior eminence, as the favourites of heaven, dared to speak evil of dignities, whom God had commanded them to honour and obey. Thus they spake language concerning their lawful rulers, which Michael scrupled to use concerning the devil himself: and surely they would not pretend that they were more privileged than the arch-angel, or that their rulers were more execrable than that great enemy of God and man! But indeed they spake evil of such things as they understood not: for they were men of a base groveling mind, whose chief attention was paid to the indulgence of their appetites, in such things as they knew naturally, even like the brutes; and by their excessive and lawless gratification they wholly polluted themselves. To suppose, as some learned men have done, that "the body "of Moses" means the Jewish church after the captivity, because the true church is called "the body of Christ," and to refer the whole to the transaction recorded in the third of Zechariah, merely because "the LORD rebuke "thee, Satan," occurs there, may be ingenious; but it is ingenious trifling, which brings no instruction nor satisfaction to the mind. 'Michael, one of the principal 'angels, was contented to deliver up the devil, however 'execrable, to be coerced by the judgment of God: yet 'these perverse and insignificant men were not ashamed 'to reproach the powers ordained by God himself!' (Beza.) 'The angels have no disposition, and, I believe, 'they have no talent, or faculty, for railing: the cool con'sideration whereof should make all men, especially those 'who call themselves divines, and especially in contro'versies about religion, ashamed and afraid of this manner 'of disputing.' (Arbp. Tillotson.)

V. 11—13. The apostle denounced a wo upon these deceivers: for they had gone in the way of Cain, who, proudly disliking the humble obedience of faith, and the spiritual worship which God had appointed, failed of finding acceptance with him; and, being enraged by this, he murdered his righteous brother, and apostatized from the religion that he had professed: and these wicked men had turned aside from the pure doctrine of Christ, become haters of those who adhered to it, and were about to cast off all their profession of Christianity. They had also run with eagerness and greediness in the same way which Balaam had taken, in order to obtain the reward of unrighteousness: like him they had gone contrary to the commandment of the Lord, from love to filthy lucre; they had sought the ruin of the professing people of God; and they had seduced many of them into licentiousness, and thus exposed them to divine vengeance. Moreover, as Korah and his company opposed the authority of Moses and Aaron, and excited the people to rebel against them, so those wicked men had rejected the authority of Christ's apostles, and contradicted their doctrine; yea, they had induced many others to oppose them; and they were about to perish in their gainsaying, or rebellion, as Korah and his associates did. These were spots in their religious feasts, in which they met together as Christian brethren; for, feasting with Christians and indulging their appetites without fear, they would, by that and other scandalous practices, be a disgrace to the whole company. They were indeed "clouds without water," from whom no good could be expected: whilst their own lusts and Satan's temptations drove them from one folly and wickedness to another, as the clouds are driven about by the wind. They might also be compared to trees, that seemed to take root and to give hopes of fruit; but their buddings were withered, and they remained wholly unfruitful; so that they were "twice dead;" as the transient hope that had been given of their receiving life, and taking root, only made way for their being reduced to a more desperate state, from which they could not be expected to recover: for they were as barren trees torn up by the roots, that they might be cast into the fire. They might also be compared to "raging waves of the sea," in the turbulency, clamour, and violence of their conduct; whilst, by boasting, reviling, and filthy language, they foamed out their own shame; and proved to all, who judged by the word of God, what scandalous persons they were. They were like "wandering stars," whose irregular courses could not easily be described or understood; whilst their appearance, though luminous, foreboded mischief to mankind: and the blackness of darkness, despair, and misery, were reserved for their eternal portion; along with the devil and his angels, with whom they had united in opposing the authority and honour of Christ. (Marg. Ref.) The word rendered spots, primarily means the tops of the rocks appearing above the water, which give the sea the appearance of being spotted, and on which ships are wrecked. Thus the disgraceful appearance of these heretics, and the danger arising from them, may be at once exhibited. The word rendered "wandering stars," signifies planets: but it may be questioned, whether the apostle used it in the strict astronomical sense; or not rather according to the popular meaning of it, which best suited his purpose. The horrible enormities, ascribed to the heretics, who are supposed to be here intended, are almost incredible: but, if true, it is by no means proper to speak of them in the detail.

V. 14—16. In a prophecy, which had been delivered by Enoch to the Antediluvians, concerning the coming of the Lord to judgment, men of this character had been predicted and condemned. It had not pleased God, that this ancient prophecy should be committed to writing by Moses, or by any other inspired person; but it had been preserved by tradition; and it not only accorded to the general doctrine of revelation, but was authenticated as a part of it, when thus quoted by the apostle of Christ. Though Enoch lived so soon after the creation, as to be the seventh in descent from Adam, yet he foresaw and predicted the second coming of the Lord, even of the promised Messiah, to judge the world; of which the approaching deluge was an emblem. He, therefore, called on the men of that abandoned generation, to behold and take notice, that the Lord would come, and was even then coming, with ten thousands of his holy ones, his holy angels, in the most conspicuous manner, to execute judgment upon all wicked men; and to arraign, convict, and condemn all that were ungodly among them, both in respect of their profane, rebellious, and wicked works, which they had most impiously perpetrated, in contempt and defiance of him; and of all the hard speeches, the virulent, presumptuous, scornful, blasphemous, and malicious words, which they had dared to utter, from the proud and carnal enmity of their hearts against him. This conviction and condemnation, the false teachers of whom Jude wrote could not escape, seeing their works and words were exactly of the same kind. For they were murmurers; (after the example of the Israelites, who murmured against Moses and Aaron, and thus showed their enmity to JEHOVAH;) they quarrelled with the truths, precepts, and ministers of Christ; and complained of every restraint laid on them, or authority exercised over them; as well as expressed continual discontent with the Lord's providential dispensations respecting them. At the same time, they "walked after their own lusts," habitually making their ungovernable carnal inclinations the rule of their conduct, and disdaining all control. Yet "their mouths spake "great swelling words;" boasting extravagantly of their knowledge, liberty, and gifts, as if they were the only favourites of heaven: and they paid court, with abundant flatteries and professed admiration, to such persons, as were able and willing to promote their secular advantage, without any regard to their characters; by which partiality, and mercenary servility, they attached proud and worldly men to their party.

V. 17—19. (Note, 2 Pet. iii. 2, 3.) As the deceivers, of whom the sacred writer spake, were making destructive progress in the church, he deemed it requisite to exhort his beloved brethren to recollect the words which the other apostles of Christ had spoken, when they first preached the Gospel to them, as well as of what some of them had written to this effect; especially Paul, Peter, and James. For they had warned them, that under the Christian dispensation there would arise, within the visible church, mockers, who would treat the most sacred truths, and most important duties of Christianity, with profane contempt; and would be a scandal to that holy religion, by walking after their own ungodly lusts. (Notes, 2 Tim. iii. 1—9. iv. 3, 4.) These warnings and predictions related to those persons, who at that time separated from the apostolical churches to form heretical sects; being sensual, or natural men (ψυχικοι, Notes, 1 Cor. ii. 14. Jam. iii. 15;) who not having the Spirit of God dwelling in them, as the Author and Preserver of divine life and holy affections, were entirely actuated by pride, ambition, avarice, and licentious inclinations: it therefore behooved the disciples of Christ to remember their Lord's admonition on this subject, "By their fruits ye shall know "them." (Note, Matt. vii. 15—20.) A careful examination of the three places in which ψυχικοι occurs, will confirm the conclusion, that it signifies natural, that is, unregenerate. Without determining into what channel natural depravity was diverted by special circumstances, it is absurd to suppose, that the apostle would class with these abominable heretics all who had not miraculous gifts; but if that interpretation be set aside as inadmissible, " not having the Spirit" must mean being unregenerate.

V. 20, 21. Instead of listening to deceivers, the apostle exhorted his beloved brethren to be employed in "building "up themselves," and each other, "on their most holy "faith." The doctrine of faith is most holy in its nature and tendency, leading men to repent, and hate all sin, to love and obey God, and to lead a sober, righteous, and godly life; by which it may be distinguished from all false doctrines. The grace of faith is most holy, as it worketh by love, purifieth the heart, and overcometh the world; by which it is distinguishable from a false and dead faith. Adhering, therefore, to the Holy doctrine of the Gospel by a living obedient faith, Christians ought continually to be seeking an increase in their knowledge of the truths of God, and in the experience of the power of them on their hearts, that they may be more and more established in a realizing and efficacious belief of them, and in all those holy dispositions, and that obedient practice, which depend on it, as the superstructure rests upon the foundation. Thus the consistency, stability, and circumspection, of their conduct, will continually be advancing: and they will more effectually adorn the gospel, glorify God, and do good to men, as long as they live. In order to build up themselves and each other, on their most holy faith, the apostle directed them to continue, "praying in the Holy "Ghost," or in dependence on, and under the influence of his sacred teaching; as in this manner alone they could escape the snares and resist the temptations, which would be laid in their way. By such a conduct they ought "to "keep themselves in the love of God;" in the assurance, and comfort of his special love to them, which they could not enjoy if they were slothful; and in the exercise of filial love and gratitude towards him. Yet with all this assiduity, watchfulness, devotion, and conscientiousness, they must put no trust in themselves: but wait, expect, and be continually looking for, "the mercy," shown to sinners, by the Lord Jesus Christ; and preparing for the "completion of it, in eternal life," as the gift of God through him. Certainly, "praying in the Holy Ghost," does not mean extempore prayer, as distinguished from a liturgy: for, both they who pray without a form, and they who read words previously put together, often come short of "praying by the Holy Spirit." But how is the whole of this most beautiful passage enervated, by explaining the words in question, of inspiration, or miraculous gifts! Whether with a written form, or without, no man can pray spiritually, but by the teaching and assistance of the Holy Spirit, exciting, in the mind and heart, holy desires, affections, and expectations: and this is wholly independent of miracles, and inspiration, properly so called. All Christians are commanded to pray in, or by, the Holy Spirit: but, for at least fifteen hundred years, no Christians have had the Spirit of miracles and inspiration. Have none then, during this period, prayed according to the apostle's exhortation?

V. 22—25. It was peculiarly needful for Christians, in those perilous times, to know how to act respecting such of their brethren, as had been seduced by the deceivers, and might probably be recovered. Of some they ought to have compassion, and to treat them with gentleness, tenderness, and kindness; making a difference between those who had fallen through inadvertency, and appeared penitent, and others who were more hardened and profane. The latter they were directed "to save with fear;" being cautious, lest by attempting their recovery, they should be themselves entangled; (as if a man, being eager to rescue others from a fire, should fall in and be himself burned:) and they should use alarming and terrifying methods, as they would do if they saw any persons in imminent danger of being consumed in the flames, whilst insensible of their situation, through sleep or intoxication. All endeavours in this case must also be joined with decided abhorrence of the crimes committed by the persons concerned, and care to avoid whatever led to "fellowship "with them in their works of darkness," even as a garment infected with the plague would be shunned by those who desired to keep clear of the malady. Thus ought they to hate "even the garment spotted with the "flesh," or whatever had the most remote alliance with the sensual practices and licentious doctrines of these deceivers. It hath been observed by some writers, that such ornamental clothing, as tends to tempt others to "fleshly lusts," or is purchased with the wages of licentiousness, may very properly be called "garments spotted "with the flesh;" and, as such, ought to be detested and loathed more than the vilest rags, (however rich, elegant, and becoming it may be,) by all those who would be thought Christians. But, whilst the apostle gave these warnings and counsels, he showed his readers where to place their whole dependence for preservation, by the form of his concluding doxology. For he addressed it "to him, that was able "to keep them from falling" into iniquity, heresy, or destruction, whatever their dangers and temptations might be, and who alone could do it, by his outward protection and his inward supports; and thus he would at length "present them faultless," fully justified, and perfected in holiness, "before the presence of his glory," when displayed at the day of judgment before the assembled world, "with exceeding joy," to each of them on his own account, and in the felicity of all the rest; to all the holy angels, yea, to the Lord himself, who would rejoice in and over them, to do them good for ever. To him therefore, as "the only wise God," who knew how to deliver the godly out of temptation, "even to the Saviour" of sinners, the apostle ascribed "glory and majesty, domi-"nion and power, both then, and for ever, Amen." He rejoiced that these belonged to him, and would for ever be possessed by him, who alone was worthy of them, and capable of exercising them in a suitable manner, for the good of his universal and everlasting kingdom. As the Lord Jesus alone will visibly appear at the day of judgment, to present his saints unto himself, so it hath been thought by some expositors that this doxology was addressed personally to him. (Marg. Ref.) But others suppose that the apostle had the "One true and living God" in his mind, without exclusive respect to any of the Persons in the sacred Trinity; as God is become our Saviour, in Jesus Christ, and the glory of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost, in the salvation of believers, will be displayed at the day of judgment, though Christ alone will visibly and personally appear to judge the world.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

When the servants of Christ address those who are "sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus "Christ, and called;" and for whom they pray, "that "mercy, peace, and love, may be multiplied unto them," they must not only instruct them, with all diligence, in things pertaining to "the common salvation," but select such subjects as more especially suit the circumstances of the times, and tend to put them on their guard against prevailing delusions. A cordial attachment to the doctrines once delivered to the saints, and handed down to us in the scriptures, will render us earnest in contending for them, and against all innovations, by every means consistent with meekness and love; and a competent acquaintance with them will put us upon our guard against those ungodly men, who creep in unawares, amidst revivals of religion, and turn the grace of God into lasciviousness, by their perverse interpretations and scandalous crimes, through which they "deny the only Lord God, and our Lord "Jesus Christ," as if they were determined to be their own rulers in every sense, and to be subject to no authority, either human or divine; and thus they bring upon themselves that destruction, to which they were appointed. Whilst we contend earnestly for the truths, which relate to the Person and Salvation of Christ, we should guard with equal caution against every perversion of them: for though the infidel, or Pharisee, will as surely come short of salvation as the Antinomian, yet he does not so dishonour the Gospel, or do so much to set mankind against it. We ought therefore to remind the people, not to rest in any profession, knowledge, or experience, which doth not bring the soul into subjection to the obedience of Christ; for nothing but the renewal of our souls to the divine image by the Holy Spirit, can secure us from being destroyed among the enemies of God. We are continually warned of this: and the examples of his severity on unbelieving Israelites, on apostate angels, and on Sodom and Gomorrah, stand on record, for our admonition, that we should not presume on former favours and present privileges, or take occasion from thence to rebel, or to indulge our ungodly lusts, if we would not be "bound in chains "of darkness unto the judgment of the great day."

V. 9—16.

Whilst we are on our guard against "filthy dreamers, "who defile the flesh," let us also stand aloof from those, whether moral or immoral in other respects, "who despise "dominion, and speak evil of dignities," and give themselves the license to revile their rulers in language which an arch-angel would not dare to use, in reply to the blasphemies of the prince of darkness. When we deem any thing amiss in the conduct of our governors, and wish well to sober and regular plans of securing liberty, and redressing grievances, let us by no means lose sight of the meekness of wisdom, but leave every matter to the Lord in the use of proper means; nay, even if oppressed and persecuted, we should, without rendering evil for evil, "commit ourselves to him that judgeth righteously." There always have been numbers, who speak evil of things which they do not understand, and corrupt themselves in such as they know naturally like brute beasts. The way of Cain, of Balaam, and of Korah, hath ever been frequented; and enmity against God, concurring with avarice, ambition, and sensuality, drives men headlong in similar courses to their own destruction. But when persons of this character are admitted and continued in communion with the churches of Christ, they are disgraceful spots and blemishes in them; whilst they indulge their appetites and passions without fear or shame, and bear no good fruit, but disappoint all the expectations, which promising appearances once excited. Such persons, continuing unfruitful after hopeful convictions, and so becoming "twice "dead, and plucked up by the roots," often prove like "raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame," in virulent reproaches, arrogant boastings, and perhaps horrible blasphemies: they make a glare indeed for a short time, like meteors, and then they sink into the blackness of darkness for ever. The men of God, from the beginning of the world, have declared the doom which will be denounced on such persons, when Christ shall come, with ten thousands of his saints, to execute judgment on all the ungodly, for all their wicked works; and for all the impious words which they have spoken against him, by reviling his truths, servants, providential appointments, and holy commandments. We should therefore avoid those murmurers and complainers, who walk after their ungodly lusts, and want a religion to suit such a course of life: and we ought to disregard their "great swelling words of vanity;" whilst we mark how they have men's persons in admiration for their own secular advantage; especially such as are rich, and can buy flattery and power at a high rate.—

V. 17—25.

We should constantly remember the words of the apostles of Christ, and we shall find the Scriptures verified in the profane and licentious scoffers, who separate from those that adhere to the holy doctrine of Christ, and even dare thus to deride them; and who expect that the Lord will save them, though they remain carnal, and sensual, and destitute of his sanctifying Spirit. Let us also remember that the doctrine and faith of Christians are most holy; that we may build ourselves on them, in all spiritual and devoted obedience to God; praying for, and by, the Holy Spirit, to be preserved in the love of God; and thus waiting for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life. Whilst with tender compassion, or more solemn and awful warnings, (as the case may require,) we seek to recover our fallen brethren from dangerous heresies and falls, we should look to ourselves, and hate even the garment spotted with the flesh, as afraid of being infected with that most fatal pestilence; and still trusting in him, "who is able to keep us from falling, and to present us "faultless before the presence of his glory, with exceed-"ing joy," we should ascribe to him, even God our Saviour, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, all glory, majesty, dominion and power, now and for evermore. Amen.

THE REVELATION OF

JOHN THE DIVINE.

It is a singular circumstance, concerning this book, that its authenticity was very generally, if not universally, acknowledged, during the two first centuries; and yet in the third century, it began to be questioned! This seems to have arisen from some absurd opinions concerning the Millennium, which were grounded on this book, by those who maintained them; and, therefore, their opponents injudiciously, nay, presumptuously, endeavoured to discredit their tenets, by denying the authority of the book itself. But it was then too late; and its divine original and authority, have been fully established, by the clearest and most decisive evidence. Indeed, the prophecies contained in it have, in so many undeniable instances, been most circumstantially accomplished, through a long series of ages; that it stands as little in need of external evidence, as any book in the whole scripture. No doubt it was written by John, the apostle, to whose name the title of "The Divine" (or the Theologian) was added some time after; either because of the deep and mysterious truths relative to the nature, decrees, and counsels of God, with which his writings abound; or because he spoke so much concerning the divine Person and glory of the Lord Jesus. The book is styled, "The Apocalypse or the Revelation;" as consisting of matters chiefly prophetical, which were immediately revealed to St. John from Jesus Christ: this took place, when he was in the isle of Patmos in the Egean Sea, whither he was banished, as is generally thought, by the emperor Domitian, A. D. 94, or 95. Some indeed, maintain that this happened during the persecution of Nero, A. D. 67, or 68, or even before that time: but the arguments adduced in support of their opinion are by no means conclusive; and as it stands last in the sacred canon, so it seems to have been written last, and to have been intended to occupy that place. The Revelation opens with the apostle's account of an extraordinary vision which he had of the Lord Jesus, appearing to him, in glory. Then follow seven short epistles from Christ himself, to the seven principal churches in Asia: (Note, Acts xix. 8—12:) and after them it contains a series of prophecies, some chiefly emblematical, relating to events, which would take place in the church and the nations of the earth, through all the subsequent generations of mankind, to the end of the world, the day of judgment, and the eternal state. This series is sometimes interrupted by explanatory digressions, which will be noted as we proceed: such predictions as are supposed to be already fulfilled, will be compendiously stated with the events to which they relate according to the judgment of the most approved writers: and an endeavour will be thus far made to render the great outlines of the book, as plain as may be to the unlearned reader, whose edification must principally be considered. But in respect of those things, which seem not to be yet fulfilled; a judgment must be formed, and an opinion ventured, with very great caution, and in a very general manner. Many indeed have objected to, and some called Christians, and ministers of the Gospel have even derided, every attempt to explain so mysterious a book; while no doubt many have wanted to be wise above what is written, and have applied general prophecies by a private interpretation, in a very unwarrantable manner. (Note, 2 Pet. i. 20, 21;) and this should teach others modesty, reverence, and a simple dependence on the teaching of the Holy Spirit in all their inquiries; whatever helps or advantages they may possess for such investigations. But, if we are enabled to study, write, and read in this manner; there can be no doubt, but we shall derive most abundant practical instruction, and obtain increasing vigour to our faith and holy affections, by attending carefully to every part of this most surprising discovery of the Lord's purposes, respecting his church and the world, which was made so many ages before they were accomplished.

'They who censure and dissuade the study of it, do it for the most part, because they have not 'studied it themselves; and imagine the difficulties to be greater, than they are in reality. It is still "the sure word of prophecy;" and men of learning and leisure cannot better employ their time and 'abilities, than in studying and explaining this book, provided they do it as Lord Bacon adviseth, with great wisdom, sobriety, and reverence.' The folly of interpreters has been, as 'Sir Isaac Newton observes, to foretel times and things by this prophecy, as if God designed to make them prophets. By this rashness they have not only exposed themselves, but brought the prophecy also into contempt. The design of God was much otherwise. He gave this, and the prophecies of the Old Testament, not to gratify men's curiosities, by enabling them to foreknow things; but that after they were fulfilled, they might be interpreted by the event; and his own providence,' (or foresight,) 'not the interpreter's, might be manifest thereby to the world.' (Bp. Newton.) It should, however, be admitted, that to give the attentive and pious reader a general assurance, that the cause of truth and righteousness shall finally and gloriously prevail even on earth, for his encouragement, during the triumphs of superstition, idolatry, heresy, infidelity, and wickedness, which on every side are witnessed, or reported from every quarter, was one end for which this revelation was given. But when even the most learned and respectable men attempt, with particularity and exactness, to explain those predictions, which are not evidently fulfilled; it commonly happens, that others oppose their interpretation by some counter-scheme, supported also by plausible arguments: and while several are thus engaged, each in defending his own conclusions against those who combat them, their readers in general are perplexed, instead of convinced; the difference, between that part which is fulfilled, and may clearly be explained, and the unaccomplished predictions, seems to disappear; the evidence, arising from the fulfilment of prophecy, as demonstrating the divine inspiration of the scriptures, fails of producing its full effect; and not unfrequently, the whole is laid aside, as uncertain, or inexplicable, seeing the most learned writers advance such discordant opinions on the subject. In most other controverted topics, truth is generally supposed to lie on one side or the other, or to be divided between the disputants: but in this particular, the debates often produce a kind of skepticism in the minds of many readers; so that they begin to doubt about the whole and every part of it. In order to avoid this, great care should be taken, to mark strongly the difference between what is fulfilled, and what is not fulfilled; and to draw the line between these as exactly as may be; that the uncertainty, as to the grand outlines, may not appear to attach to those parts, which have already received their accomplishment; but be wholly confined to the other part. Even in respect of those predictions, which are supposed to be fulfilling in this eventful period, peculiar caution is necessary: for an unexpected turn in the affairs of nations, may, after a few years, confute some of the most plausible and confident assumptions of the expositors; and weaken the credibility in the minds of men, even of those interpretations which are well founded. It does not, indeed, appear probable, that the prophecies, fulfilling in any age, should be clearly understood by the contemporaries; any more than that impartial histories should be written by men of their own times. The events, in which our interests, and those of the country, or party, to which we belong are deeply concerned, must have such an effect upon our minds, as to deduct from that cool and impartial judgment, which is requisite in such an inquiry. It cannot so soon be known, how the successes and advancement of some and the subversion of other powers, may terminate: and till that be known, the application of the transaction, of our own age, to the events predicted in scripture, must be attended with a degree of uncertainty. Our nearness to the objects likewise tends to magnify them to us: and we are apt, too readily, to conclude, that such important transactions must have a prominent place in prophecy. But, I apprehend, that prophecy, (especially that contained in this book,) resembles a map of the world, on a small scale; in which only countries, and capital cities, and some very remarkable places, are noticed: so that they who dwell near considerable cities and large towns, are disappointed at not finding them in the map. Thus the events of a century, through a whole continent, or continents, being foretold in a few verses, or at most a single short chapter; we certainly shall look in vain for many transactions, which appear to us of very great importance. But they, who shall come after us, on reviewing the history of the century, or the continent, and comparing it with the prophecy, will doubtless perceive a sufficient coincidence, to enable them to say, "Thus it was written, and thus it must be." Though probably, they will find this accomplishment of prophecy, materially differing from what the most sagacious of us now suppose. Since the author first printed his thoughts on this book, above sixteen years ago; most extraordinary changes indeed have taken place, in the state of the nations, and of the visible church; which he doubts not will be found accomplishments of the predictions contained in it. Many books also have been written on the subject; several of which he has considered, and means further to consider; and to make such use of as he is able. But he purposes still to adhere to his former plan; and to be very cautious and general, in attempting to explain what has not hitherto allowedly been fulfilled: and merely supplying this deficiency, (if it be one,) by a few quotations from those who have ventured to be more particular. He does not indeed write for the learned. These may and will consult the several authors, who have purposely and exclusively treated on this subject, and judge for themselves: nor has he the presumption to attempt the office of an umpire, between those who maintain different opinions respecting it. The plan and method, on which he proceeds, will appear to the best advantage, in the notes on the several parts of the prophecy: and a general analysis, or outline of the whole, will be more properly introduced towards the conclusion, than at the beginning, of the book. It is worthy of notice, in respect of the Revelation, that the views given in it of God and heavenly things; of the kingdom of providence and grace; of the Redeemer's glory; the happiness and character of his people; with the wickedness and ruin of his enemies, are set forth, in so striking and peculiar a manner; that, even they who do not at all understand the prophetical meaning, are uniformly interested and edified by reading it, in proportion to the degree of their humility, faith, and piety.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. The Lord Jesus, in his mediatorial character, is the great Prophet of the Church, the incarnate Word of God, by whom he reveals himself to men. In this sense some things were given to him, "as "his revelation," to be through him communicated to his servants, and others were not, (Note, Mark xiii. 32.) An infinity of the divine decrees remain impenetrably concealed in the mind of God, till the event discover them; but he hath seen good previously to make known some of his purposes respecting future ages, in order to confirm the faith, encourage the hope, and enlarge the views of his people; and that the accomplishment of them in after times might demonstrate the truth of the Scriptures to every diligent inquirer. (Note, Deut. xxix.) This book was therefore called "The Revelation of Jesus "Christ;" because its principal subject is, 'A previous discovery of the purposes of God respecting the affairs of the Church, and of the nations as connected with it, from the time when it was given, even to the end of the world.' This Revelation was given to Jesus Christ, that he might show to his servants those events, which would immediately begin to take place, and which would all shortly be accomplished; as the transient term of some thousands of years bears no proportion to eternity, in which the whole will at length be swallowed up. These things Christ sent his angel, one of his more illustrious servants in the world above, to signify and explain in order to John, who was his principal servant on earth at that time, as it is probable he was then the only surviving apostle. Thus future events were made known to him, as they had been to several of the ancient prophets, especially Ezekiel, Daniel, and Zechariah. Accordingly he faithfully testified, and exactly recorded the word of God, even the testimony of Christ, and all things which he saw in these visions of the Almighty.

V. 3. The apostle introduced his testimony, by solemnly pronouncing a blessing on all who should read, hear, remember, and obediently observe, the words of this prophecy; of which the accomplishment was at hand. This seems to have been prophetically intended to obviate, or answer, the objections, which would in after ages be made to the study of this mysterious book, and to all endeavours to bring others acquainted with it. Nothing tends more to fortify the mind against the cavils of infidels and skeptics, or the incursions of unbelief, or to produce patient hope amidst trials and difficulties, than the observation and experience of the fulfilment of the Scriptures, in the events which take place around us: an acquaintance therefore with this Revelation, concerning the purposes of God respecting his Church to the end of time, when connected with humility, sobriety, and the obedience of faith, must greatly conduce to the Christian's stability, constancy, hope, peace, and patience: it must exceedingly enlarge his views of the great plan of the Lord's providential government of the world, as combined with the redemption of sinners; and direct or encourage his prayers for those prosperous days of the church, in which all her tribulations shall terminate: as well as reconcile his mind to those events which, though distressing in themselves, form a part of one vast design, in part accomplished, and evidently hastening to an entire completion, to the eternal glory of God our Saviour, the final victory of his cause over all opposition, and the endless felicity of all his faithful servants. Nay, the very mysteries and difficulties of this book are so wonderfully united, inseparably, with such grand and interesting discoveries of the glory of God, and the work and worship of heaven, as are peculiarly suited to solemnize, enliven, and purify the soul of the humble and attentive reader, even when he cannot discover the prophetic meaning of the passage. Nor is it any objection to say, that many have read it in another spirit, and got much harm by it: for this is the case with other scriptures, especially with those passages which may be called "strong meat," being peculiarly strengthening to the faith, hope, love, and gratitude, of such as can digest them, though not meet nourishment for babes; and even capable of being turned into a fatal poison by the vicious affections of a proud and carnal mind. (Note, 2 Pet. iii. 15, 16.) The reasons which induce infidels and profane mockers, who "walk according to their own ungodly "lusts," to deride all attempts to explain this prophecy, are obvious; for so much of it hath most manifestly been already fulfilled, as must for ever ruin their cause, could the attention of men be drawn to the subject described, in proportion to its vast importance; and no part of Scripture more awfully denounces the doom of all impenitent sinners and opposers of the Gospel. But pious men could never have been induced to object to the study of it, as some have done, in strong, nay, rather contemptuous, language, had not the misconduct of many in this respect filled them with prejudice, and formed an association of ideas in their minds, which have no necessary relation to each other. The Lord, however, grant that the writer, and the readers, of the present attempt to render this mysterious book more intelligible and instructive to Christians in general, may rely on, and pray for, the participation of the blessing here promised, in every part of their progress through it: that in faith, humility, reverence, and expectation of great advantage, they may read, hear, meditate on, and keep, the things which are written in it: for the time is at hand, when the further accomplishment of them will render them so plain, that they shall no longer be either neglected or misunderstood.

V. 4—6. The apostle addressed the seven churches of Asia, or that district of which Ephesus was the capital city. (Acts xix. 10.) The benediction which he used is similar to what hath been repeatedly considered in the epistolary part of the New Testament; but it is here expressed in more sublime and mysterious language, according to the nature of the book to which it is prefixed. He wished and prayed that "grace and peace" might be bestowed on them, "from Him, who is, and who was, and who is to "come:" that is, from the self-existent, eternal, and unchangeable JEHOVAH. The original is peculiar, perhaps unexampled, and almost, if not absolutely, incapable, of an exact translation; the preposition governing the genitive case of the article, and yet all the subsequent words being in the nominative. It is supposed to refer to the name of God, revealed to Moses, (Ex. iii, 14,) and with a similar disregard to the ordinary rules of grammar. This is here especially meant of the Person of the Father. As the One true and living God communicates blessings to sinful man, through the mediation of the incarnate Son, and by the agency of the eternal Spirit, so it is almost unavoidable, under such an economy, to speak of the Father in the absolute style of Deity, and of the Son and the Spirit with relation to their assumed characters and offices, though in language evidently implying a participation in all divine perfections, and co-equality with the Father, in their original and essential nature and dignity. "Grace and peace" were moreover sought for the Christians addressed, "from the seven Spirits, which are before "the throne." This is generally, and doubtless justly, interpreted of "the divine Spirit," with respect to the abundance, sufficiency, and variety of his gifts, graces, and operations; and in relation to the seven churches, with each of which, and all others, the One and self-same Spirit dwelt, as the Fountain of life, grace, and peace; being omnipresent and omnipotent, and one with the Father and the Son, "God over all, blessed for ever-"more." This manner of expression well accords with the enigmatical or emblematic style of this book; and it is absurd to suppose any created spirits to be joined in this solemn benediction with the eternal Father and Jesus Christ the Son of the Father; and indeed it would sanction the worship of created angels, (Notes, Matt. xxviii. 19. 2 Cor. xiii. 13.) Finally this grace and peace were sought for in their behalf, "from Jesus Christ," as the appointed Mediator, through whom the eternal Spirit, with all his gifts, graces, and consolations, was given to sinners: and the Saviour was described as "the faithful Witness," who came into the world to bear witness to the perfections, counsels, truths, and will of God to men; and who fully revealed all that he had received of the Father for that purpose. He was, also, "the First-begotten from the "dead." Being the Only-begotten of the Father before all worlds, and "the Heir of all things," he had come on earth in that character, to tabernacle in human nature; and, having been put to death for declaring himself to be the Son of God, he arose from the dead, among other reasons to evince that he was what he professed to be. Thus he became the First-fruits of the resurrection, and appeared as the First-born of the children of God, in and through whom they shall all arise again, be manifested in their high and honourable character, and invested with their eternal inheritance. (Notes, Luke xx. 36. Rom. i. 4. Col. i. 15—19.) Being thus arisen from the dead, and exalted to the mediatorial throne, he is also "the Prince," or Sovereign, "of the kings of the earth;" by whom they reign, to whom they are accountable, whose glory they ought to seek, and by whom all will be terribly destroyed, who oppose, despise, or neglect him. This declaration of the Redeemer's sovereignty over all the kings of the earth was a proper introduction to the prophecies which were about to be delivered, of the opposition which would be made to his cause, and his final triumph over all his enemies.—Animated with a view of the glory of his beloved Lord, and contrasting it with the vastness of his condescension, and the depth of his self-abasement, the inspired writer broke out in adoring praises "to him, who," great and glorious as he was, "had loved them," when defiled with the loathsome stains of guilt and sin, and when deserving the final wrath of God; and whose love had been so immense, that he had "washed them from their "sins in his own blood," which he had willingly shed upon the cross, to make satisfaction to divine justice, and to procure all the blessings of salvation for them. And having, in consequence of this atonement, "quickened "them" by his Holy Spirit, he had taught them, in penitent and obedient faith, to purge their consciences from guilt by the application of his blood; and their hearts from the pollution of sin, by the grace promised through his mediation. In this manner he had not only delivered them from the wrath to come, but had also exalted and ennobled them as kings, to reign with him in eternal glory; and consecrated them as priests, to be accepted worshippers, and to offer spiritual sacrifices unto "God, "even his Father," (Notes, 1 Pet. ii. 5—9.) On these accounts, the apostle ascribed unto Christ personally the glory and dominion for ever and ever: (Note, Phil. ii. 11. 2 Pet. iii. 18:) and in thus honouring the Son, he especially honoured the Father that sent him; as all do, who cordially say, Amen to it.—Some indeed apply the doxology to the Father; but the construction is by no means so obvious and natural.

V. 7. The prophecy of this book principally relates to the opposition, which, in one form or other, would be made to the cause of Christ; the temporary success of his enemies, and his final triumph over them all: and, therefore, at the very opening of it, the reader's attention is called to that great day, when these scenes will be closed, and all will see the wisdom and happiness of the friends of Christ, and the madness and misery of his enemies. For "behold," with attention and solemn awe, the Saviour, who "loved his people and washed them from their sins "in his own blood,," was "coming with clouds," or in the clouds of heaven, in his own glory as Mediator, and in the glory of the Father, to be the Judge of the world! The intervening space would soon pass away, and it might even then be said "He cometh!" (Jude 14, 15.) Then all nations, being raised from the dead, will be gathered before his tribunal, and every eye shall see Him, in human nature, exercise omnipotence, omniscience, and all divine perfections, who once lay prostrate in unknown agony at Gethsemane, and was numbered with malefactors on mount Calvary! Then they, especially, who pierced him, shall be compelled to witness his glory, as well as to feel the power of his avenging indignation. Caiaphas and the chief priests, Pilate and his soldiers, with all concerned in his condemnation and crucifixion, and those in every age, who by their infidelity, apostacy, persecutions, heresies, and daring crimes, have crucified him afresh and put him to open shame, shall then behold him, with unutterable terror, preparing to pronounce and execute the righteous sentence of their eternal condemnation. And as all the kindreds of the earth, through successive generations, have combined in opposing, despising, abusing, or neglecting him and his great salvation, with the exception only of a very small remnant, so will they at that time wail because of him, in horror and despair; as neither their numbers nor their power can defend them from his omnipotent vengeance. The apostle, therefore, assured of the justice of these awful proceedings, and knowing that then the redemption of all true Christians would be completed, subjoined to this declaration, "Even so, Amen." "Thus let "all thine" implacable "enemies perish, O Lord."

V. 8. As the Lord Jesus was evidently spoken of in the preceding verse, so it is obvious to conclude that "the "Lord," who speaks in this, is the same Person: nor can the least appearance of a reason be assigned, why it should be understood of "the Father," personally; except that men are reluctant "to honour the Son," even as they ought to "honour the Father that sent him." The whole vision related to Christ, from whom immediately the revelation was given: most of the expressions here used, or others equivalent to them, are afterwards spoken by him, and concerning himself, and the construction and arrangement of this passage, and the context, would be very intricate, if we were to suppose the Father to be the Speaker. The Lord Jesus, therefore, here declared, "that He was "the Alpha and Omega," which are the names of the first and the last letters in the Greek alphabet, the language in which the apostle wrote; this implies, that he is the first Cause and the last End, the Author and Finisher of all things, in creation, providence, and redemption; "the Beginning and the Ending," the Source of existence, of life, of holiness, and of felicity, and the Completion of them, in every sense, and in all respects.—"Who is, and who was, and who is to come," as One with the eternal Father, (4.) "The Almighty," the Omnipotent, and Sovereign Ruler of all worlds, by, and for, whom all things were made, and by whom all things consist. No words can more strongly express eternal power and Godhead than these do.

V. 9—11. The apostle next proceeded to relate the manner in which he received the revelation that he was about to deliver; and he merely called himself the brother of believers, without mentioning his apostolical authority, though the only surviving apostle. He was also "their "companion in tribulation," being a persecuted servant of Christ, and exposed to the same sufferings in his cause as they were, a fellow-subject with them of the Saviour's kingdom on earth, and a fellow-heir of his heavenly kingdom. These sufferings he endured, as they did, with that submission, constancy, composure, and perseverance, which Christ required and exemplified, through which he experienced present consolations, and expected a happy event of his tribulations. He was, at the time when he had these visions, in the Isle of Patmos, whither he had been banished for preaching the word of God and bearing testimony to Christ; and it is recorded that he was confined to the mines, and compelled to labour in them, notwithstanding the infirmities of his extreme old age. But none of these things moved him! His soul was serene, and at liberty, amidst his sufferings; he had far sweeter comforts, than the emperor or any of his prosperous persecutors could obtain; and he expressed no dissatisfaction or emotion, on account of the injustice and cruelty with which he had been used. Whilst in this situation, "he "was in the Spirit," or brought under the immediate impulse of the Spirit of prophecy, as Ezekiel, Daniel, and others had been, when favoured with visions of the Almighty. This was "on the Lord's day," which can be meant of no other than the day on which the Lord Jesus arose from the dead, even the first day of the week; and this is a conclusive proof that it was set apart and kept holy, by the primitive Christians, in commemoration of that great event; for on what other account could it have been thus mentioned? Being thus cast into a trance, or ecstacy, he heard behind him a voice, loud and clear as the sound of a trumpet, saying some of the same words which have been already considered, or to the same effect. (Marg. Ref.) They must here be understood of Christ, and this is an additional reason for interpreting the others of him. But if any should still be disposed to understand the foregoing passage of the Father, they cannot but admit that Christ and the Father are One; for otherwise how can it be conceived, that Christ would have used the same words of himself, which had just been spoken by the Father, as descriptive of his eternal Godhead? So that, on either interpretation, they are conclusive in respect to Christ's Deity. The voice then ordered John to write what he saw, in a book, and send it to the seven churches in Asia, on which we shall have occasion afterwards to make some observations, but shall in this place only take notice, that this seems to confirm the ancient tradition of John's having resided and laboured at Ephesus, and in that vicinity, for a considerable time before his banishment to Patmos.

V. 12—20. When the apostle had distinctly heard these words, he turned to see from whom the voice proceeded, and he then had a vision of seven golden candlesticks, in allusion to the golden candlestick with seven branches, which was made for the tabernacle, (Notes, Ex. xxv. 31—40. Marg. Ref.) and in the midst of them, as presiding over and taking care of them, he saw One like unto the Son of man. The apostle had been well acquainted with Jesus, when he was on earth a man of sorrows: but though he perceived him in human form, and with some resemblance of his former appearance, yet he now saw him in such resplendent glory, that he seemed another person: "He was clothed," after the manner of the priests, "with a garment down to his foot," perhaps representing his perfect mediatorial righteousness and royal priesthood; this vesture was girt around his breasts with a golden girdle, which may denote the preciousness of his love, and the cordiality with which he maintains the cause of his people. His hairs like wool, or snow, may signify his majesty, purity, and eternity. (Notes, Dan. vii. 9, 10. 13, 14, 22.) His eyes as a flame of fire, may represent his omniscient acquaintance with the secrets of all hearts, and with the most distant events. His feet, like fine brass burning in a furnace, may denote the stability of his appointments, and the transcendent excellency of all his proceedings. His "voice, as the sound of many "waters," may represent the energy of his word, to astonish and terrify, or its invincible efficacy to convert, or destroy, as he sees good; the seven stars in his right hand were emblematical of the presiding ministers of the seven churches, which the apostle addressed, whom Christ upheld, directed, governed, and managed, by his power and according to his will. The sharp two-edged sword out of his mouth seems to represent his awful and irresistible justice, in cutting down his enemies on every side, and slaying them by the breath of his mouth. (Is. xi. 4.) Moreover, his countenance was like the sun at noon day, when it shines most clearly and powerfully, so that "nothing can be hid from the heat thereof." Upon this display of the Redeemer's glory, even his beloved apostle, who had not only leaned on his breast at table, but had seen his glory on the holy mount, (Matt. xvii. 2.) was utterly overwhelmed with the effulgency of his majesty! (Dan. x. 5—9.) But the divine Redeemer graciously supported him and dispelled his fears, again declaring himself to be the "First and the last," (Notes, 8—11.) and adding, "I am he that liveth;" the ever-living, self-existent God, to whom, as Mediator, it was given to have life in himself, and to be the life of men, and who had also been obedient to death for sinners; but behold, he was alive, as the first-fruits of the resurrection, to die no more, to which the apostle seems to have added, Amen, as expressive of his unspeakable satisfaction; nay, so absolute was his conquest over the king of terrors, that he had possession of "the keys of hell and of death." He possesses the absolute sovereignty, as dwelling in human nature, over the invisible world, the state of separate spirits, and over death and the grave; so that he removes men out of this life, and consigns their bodies to the grave and corruption, when and as he pleases; he then fixes their souls in happiness or misery with absolute authority, and he will soon raise all their dead bodies, and either receive them into heaven, or shut them up for ever in hell, as he sees good. None, therefore, of his friends can have aught to fear from any creature, either during life, or at the approach of death, as every circumstance will certainly be ordered in that manner, which may best subserve their everlasting advantage. The Lord Jesus, therefore, ordered his apostle, to write, 1st. The things which he had seen, namely, the circumstances of that vision; 2dly. The things which then were, or what related to the state of the churches at that time; and 3dly. The things which should be hereafter, even the prophecies which he was about to receive; and this seems to mark out to us the contents of the book. This mysterious and emblematical vision of the seven stars was then explained to him, to signify the seven angels, or presiding ministers of the churches, who were the messengers of Christ to them; and the seven golden candlesticks were shown to represent the seven churches themselves, as enlightened by the word and Spirit of the Lord, and holding forth that light to others, by the profession and preaching of the word, the administration of holy ordinances, and their Christian conversation and behaviour.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The revelations of God, by Jesus Christ, were intended to inform his servants about as much of his designs, respecting them and others, through the short period of time and the countless ages of eternity, as it was good for them to know. They that are intrusted with the word of God and the testimony of Christ, must bear record of all things which they know, and "declare the whole counsel "of God," as far as it is profitable for those to whom they speak. Whilst it becomes us to leave secret things to God, we ought carefully to read, hear, keep, and obey, whatever he reveals; for "every word of God is pure," and "doeth good to him that walketh uprightly." Even difficult and mysterious passages, will be useful to the humble believer, though he cannot fathom the depth of them, and the time may speedily arrive, when the dispensations of Providence shall fully illustrate the meaning of obscure prophecies to the most unlearned readers.—The grace and peace, which come from the everlasting and unchangeable love of the Father, by the communion of the omnipresent spirit, who dwells in all believers, and through Jesus Christ, the faithful Witness, the First-born from the dead, and the Prince of the kings of the earth, belong to all those, and to those only, whom he hath washed from their sins in his own blood; nor can they sufficiently admire his love, which passeth knowledge, or rejoice in the dignity and felicity to which he hath advanced them, or devote themselves too much to the sacred duties of their royal priesthood, or ascribe too great honour to their divine Redeemer, "to whom be glory and "dominion for ever and ever." This will soon appear; for "behold he cometh in the clouds," and every human eye, however averse to the sight, shall see him placed upon the dread tribunal, from which there can be no appeal. What then will be the terror, dismay, and anguish of his crucifiers, and of all in every age who have been of their judgment and disposition! and how will "all the kindreds of the earth wail because of him!" Whilst all his faithful followers shall rejoice, and say, even so let it be, Lord Jesus; Amen, Amen. If we would be 'numbered with his saints in glory everlasting,' we must now willingly submit to him, receive him, and honour him, as a Saviour, who (we profess to believe,) will come to be our judge, for he is the First and the Last, the Beginning and the Ending, the unchangeable, eternal, and omnipotent Lord, to whom all must be subject, or perish for ever; and they, who will not believe him to be the great I AM, and who refuse to honour him as co-equal with the Father, will discover their awful mistake, when made to feel the weight of his anger, and the power of that eternal vengeance, which they now despise.

V. 9—20.

They who are brethren to the apostles and ancient servants of Christ, must expect to be companions with them in tribulation, and in the patience, as well as the kingdom of their Lord; though few of them are called to suffer so much as they endured in this good cause. A peaceful conscience, however, and the consolations of the Holy Spirit, will enable the afflicted Christian to be more joyful in communion with God, when immured in a prison, than ungodly men can be in the most prosperous circumstances. If believers are confined, even on the Lord's holy day, from public ordinances and the communion of saints, by necessity and not by choice, they may expect great comfort in meditation and secret duties, from the influences of the Spirit, and by hearing the voice and contemplating the glory of their beloved Saviour, of whose gracious visits nor confinement nor circumstances can deprive them. But we may well be satisfied to walk by faith, during our continuance here on earth; for could we now see the Lord as he is, the displays of his glory, even as dwelling in human nature, would overwhelm us; and we must be totally changed in body and soul, before we can bear the effulgency of his majesty, and find unalloyed happiness in that beatific vision. Let us then at present hearken to his voice, lean on his arm, and receive the encouragements of his love to obviate our fears; for what can he, "the First and the Last," even the eternal Son of the Father, withhold from those for whom he became incarnate, that he might die for their sins? and what can be too hard for him, who has the keys of death and hell, and liveth as our almighty Friend for evermore? May we then obey his word, and walk in his light; may our light, as derived from him, shine before men for their conviction and edification; thus may we expect the time of our departure hence, which, with every thing relative to it, will be appointed by his unerring wisdom and love, who will come to receive our souls to his presence, and who will at length raise and change the bodies of our humiliation also, "that they may be made like unto his glorious body, ac-"cording to the mighty power by which he is able to sub-"due all things unto himself."

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. Many expositors have imagined that these epistles to the seven churches, were mystical prophecies of seven distinct periods, into which the whole term, from the apostles' days to the end of the world, would be divided. But there is no proof from scripture, that seven such periods, and no more, were to be expected in the state of the church, unless the epistles themselves be admitted as proofs of it; nor are there any distinct traces in ecclesiastical history, in respect of such as are supposed to be already past, though a lively imagination and a prompt invention may advance plausible things on the subject. It cannot be conceived, if the concluding part of this book itself be recollected, that the last period of the church will be worse than any that has gone before, as the Laodicean church was far more corrupt than any of the rest. Nor can it be true in fact, that a more flourishing period succeeded that of the church in the apostles' days, or that immediately subsequent to their death; yet the state of the church of Smyrna was far purer and more excellent than that of Ephesus, nay, perhaps than that of Philadelphia, which on this hypothesis must accord to the Millennium. So that there seems no ground at all for this sentiment, though it has been sanctioned by many respectable names. But the churches, here addressed, were in such different states, in respect of purity of doctrine and the power of godliness, that the words of Christ to them will always be suitable to the case of other churches, and professors of Christianity, in all ages and places, to the end of the world; and some of them contain the proper message or instruction to those of one character, and others to those of another, in all the variety which they contain. The Lord Jesus himself, appearing in vision to John, directed him what to write to each of these seven churches; and to address it to the angel of the church, his stated messenger or resident ambassador among them. It seems more natural to understand this of one presiding minister, than of several elders or pastors spoken of collectively, because one in office; and thus it countenances the opinion which has been advanced, concerning the introduction of a moderate kind of episcopacy in the primitive church. (Notes, Acts xx. 28. 1 Tim. v. 21—25. Tit. i. 5.) It is also undeniable, that there were several elders, or pastors, in the church at Ephesus, before this time, so that some ruler or minister, presiding over the other pastors, must be intended. The address to "the "angel of the church," doubtless implied commendation, reproof, instruction, or encouragement to him, and to the pastors in general, yet the church was principally intended. That of Ephesus was planted by St. Paul. There is no proof that Timothy ever statedly resided there; and as nearly thirty years seem to have elapsed since the second epistle to him was written, various changes had doubtless taken place in that time. John himself is also recorded to have abode at Ephesus, and to have superintended that and the neighbouring churches for several years. Ephesus was the capital of the province called Asia, (Acts xix. 8—12.) and the apostle was directed to write the first epistle to the church in that city, as a message from "him, that held "the seven stars in his right hand, and walked amidst the "seven golden candlesticks," (Notes, i. 12. 16. 20.) This intimated the absolute authority of Christ over his ministers, with their entire dependence on him, and his constant, though invisible, presence with his churches, in which he had fixed the light of his word and ordinances, his attention to their whole conduct, his readiness to help and bless them, whilst they made a proper use of their light, and his power and purpose to remove it, if provoked by their abuse or neglect of it.

V. 2—5. Our Lord reminded the presiding minister at Ephesus, and by him all the church, that he knew, or observed and accepted, their works of faith and love; the labour, which they bestowed in his service; their patient continuance in well-doing, under heavy trials and afflictions; and their decided abhorrence of false teachers and evil workers, whom they would not on any account endure in their communion. Moreover, he had noticed with approbation the trial which they had made of certain persons, who confidently claimed apostolical authority, as if immediately commissioned by Christ himself, and had thus attempted to draw them off from the faith once delivered to the saints; and how they had found them out to be hypocrites and impostors. (Notes, 1 John iv. 1—4. 2 John 10, 11.) They had repeatedly been enabled to endure affliction, and to exercise patience in his cause; and he repeatedly took a kind notice of it, and of their persevering labours, without wearying or fainting, from a regard to his name. Nevertheless, he had somewhat to allege against them, because the fervency of their love to him and their zeal for his glory had sensibly declined since they first embraced Christianity, and they had become more negligent and formal than they used to be. This abatement of holy affection naturally tended to still more apparent evil; the Lord therefore called on them to recollect how lively, zealous, fervent, united, and active, they had been, and to compare their present fallen condition with it, that thus they might be excited to repent, and do their first works, else he would come, by his providence, in a short time and an unexpected manner, and remove their candlestick out of its place, or deprive them of the light of the Gospel, and the advantage of its ordinances; nor could this judgment be averted, without repentance and works meet for repentance. This sentence was after a time most awfully executed; and at this day, Ephesus, which was so renowned a city, is an inconsiderable village, in which there are no persons that bear the Christian name.—There is some difficulty in conceiving how the persevering diligence and patience of this church could consist with that abatement in love with which it is charged. But observation and experience combine to prove, that in many instances, while the affections are lively and fervent, men engage zealously in services, and form habits of exertion, self-denial, patience, and courageous disregard to the opposition and reproaches of men, in which, as to the outward conduct at least, they persevere, from various motives, and often conscientiously, though it is lamentably true, and they know it, that their hearts are not so thoroughly engaged in what they do as they once were. Many are well aware, that this is their case; they have zeal enough to retain them in their former course of active service, which is become habitual, and in some circles creditable, to them; but had they not been more "fervent in spirit serving the Lord," in former days, those habits would never have been formed, those services had never been engaged in. Perhaps most Christians are too apt to take encouragement from such diligence, and to silence the remonstrances of their consciences by it; but it is plain, that our Saviour and Judge considers this as a very criminal state of heart and conduct.

V. 6, 7. The Ephesian church, however, had one thing favourable in its case; though declined in love, it was not corrupted with licentious principles or immoral practices, but hated the deeds of the Nicolaitans, which Christ also abhorred; we shall see hereafter that this was a sect of avowed and most abominable Antinomians. (Notes, 16, 17.) But, whilst these things were immediately addressed to the rulers, pastors, and church at Ephesus, every person, that had an ear, and could perceive the meaning of the words, was concerned to attend to them, and to all those things, which the Holy Spirit, (by whose agency the apostle had this vision of Christ speaking to him,) thus declared unto the churches. For the Lord Jesus promised to every man, that by faith in him should overcome the temptations of the world, the flesh, and the devil, and especially those to which his peculiar disposition or circumstances most exposed him, that he would give him "to eat of the Tree of life." This is a figurative expression taken from the account of the garden of Eden, (Notes, Gen. ii. 9. iii. 22--24,) and denoting the pure, satisfactory, and eternal joys of heaven, and the anticipation of them in this world, by faith, communion with Christ, and the consolations of his Holy Spirit. Every victory over sharp temptation would be graciously rewarded with foretastes of this fruit, and the final victory, with the eternal fruition of the happiness intended by it, in heaven itself, and the presence and love of God.

V. 8, 9. Smyrna was a large city to the north of Ephesus. The epistle sent to the angel of the Church, established there, was the message of him, who is, "the "First and the Last." (Notes, i. 8. 11. 17, 18.) These words were spoken by Jehovah of himself, when declaring his own eternal Deity, and asserting "that beside him there "was no God, yea, he knew not any," (Note, Is. xliv. 6—8.) so that the repeated use of them by the Lord Jesus must be allowed to be a full proof, that he is the self-existent and eternal God; and as the distinction between the Father and the Son is every where established, whilst it is declared that there is but one God, so we may assert, and could easily prove in form, that there can be no consistent alternative, between rejecting the Bible, or denying it to be the unerring word of God, and the acknowledging a plurality of Persons in the Unity of the Godhead. For the same has been, and may be, shown concerning the Holy Spirit, in respect of the attributes and operations peculiar to Deity, and his distinct personal subsistence. So that the doctrine of the Trinity is fixed on the firm basis of divine revelation; and it will always be found, that no contrary scheme, however modified, can be supported by any learning, ingenuity, or diligence of man, except with a proportionable disregard to the oracles of God; and the full establishment of any such doctrine must be the effect of a total disbelief of the scriptures, in respect of the nature, subsistence, and perfections, of the Godhead, for all attempts at a coalition must in this case be abortive. The Church, indeed, as built on the Person of Christ, cannot be subverted by the gates of hell; and though we may well be concerned for our children, and the cause of the Gospel in these lands, and should therefore use every proper method of "earnestly contending for "the truth once delivered to the saints;" yet we may be free from anxiety about the event of the contest, and predict, that the triumphing of those, who strive against "the First and the Last," will assuredly be short. He, who thus asserted his own essential Deity, in the same place gave an intimation of his incarnation, death, resurrection, and everlasting intercession; and, in the character of the omnipotent Friend and Saviour of his people, he assured the Christians at Smyrna, that he noticed and accepted their works, and was well acquainted with their trials and poverty; for though Smyrna was a rich, and populous city, either the poorest of the inhabitants alone had been converted, or the Christians there had been impoverished by persecution. They were indeed poor in the world, as well as poor in spirit, yet Christ declared, "that "they were rich," in faith, and by an interest in his unsearchable riches, and the precious promises of the new covenant, in wisdom, grace, and good works, and as heirs of an unfailing treasure in heaven; for they were in a very flourishing state in respect of their souls, though greatly reduced in their outward circumstances. Moreover, he knew the blasphemy of certain persons, that said they were Jews, and reviled both them and him. Some think that these men professed Christianity; but in their zeal for the Mosaic law, they spake such things of the Person and righteousness of Christ, as amounted to constructive blasphemy; but it is more obvious to conclude, that they were virulent opposers and persecutors, who contradicted and blasphemed, as the Asiatic Jews had done in the time when St. Paul preached among them.—They professed to be Jews, and the people and worshippers of God; but they were not what they pretended to be. Whether they were of the Jewish nation or not, God allowed them not as his congregation; the rites for which they contended were no longer of any validity; their worship was carnal and hypocritical; they violently opposed the truth and cause of God; and they were in fact "the "synagogue of Satan," a company of people, bearing the image, copying the example, doing the works, and combined together to support the kingdom, of the devil.

V. 10, 11. These concluding verses show, that the persons above mentioned were fierce persecutors, and not subtle deceivers; for Christ did not warn his people to beware of false doctrine, but to prepare for the cross.—He exhorted them "to fear none of those things, which "they should suffer;" for he, "the First and the Last," was able to protect, support, comfort, uphold, and deliver them; yet, behold, he saw good to permit the devil to prevail so far, that he would cast some of them into prison, by means of his synagogue of pretended Jews, who probably stirred up the people and magistrates against them. Their enemies meant that they should thus be destroyed, but their Lord and Saviour permitted it, that they might be tried, and proved, and purified, (Note, 1 Pet. i. 6, 7.) and for this end they would have tribulation ten days. This may either mean ten years, which is recorded to have been the duration of Domitian's persecution; or a considerable time; during which space many of them might be called to suffer martyrdom for the truth. The Lord therefore exhorted them to be "faithful unto death," maintaining their allegiance to him inviolable, fighting valiantly as his soldiers, and adhering to his truth and will, even if called to suffer death for his sake, or in any case till the close of their lives; and then he, "who had "been dead, and was alive," would recompense them, as no other prince or captain could do his faithful adherents, for he would give them "a crown of life," or eternal glory and felicity. This epistle also concerned all that could hear and understand, as no one, that conquered in this spiritual warfare, should be hurt by the second death, though he might die in winning the battle. But he, "that hath the keys of hell and of death," engaged to secure the souls of his servants, at the time of their dissolution, and their bodies at the resurrection, that they should not be finally separated from God, or sent away into the everlasting punishment prepared for all wicked men, which is emphatically called "the second death;" (xx. 14.) on the contrary, they would be preserved from every degree of this misery, and receive the gift of eternal felicity after their transient sufferings in this world.—Nothing of reproof or warning is contained in this epistle; and it is remarkable, that there are more Christians at this day in Smyrna, than at any other place in all that part of the world; the candlestick hath not wholly been removed from them, but some glimmerings of light are still continued to the harassed remnant of this Church.

V. 12, 13. This epistle to the angel of the church in Pergamos, (a city to the north of Smyrna,) contains both reproof and threatenings, and, therefore, it was sent as from him, "who hath the sharp sword with two edges."—(i. 16.) Christ took favourable notice of the works of the Christians in this city, as far as they were obedient to his commandments, and he reminded them, that he knew their habitation to be in a place, where Satan had especially established his throne and taken up his abode. This must denote, that Pergamos was not only a very wicked city, but also, as it were, the head-quarters of both persecution and heresy, the two principal engines of the devil, in opposing the pure Gospel of Christ, and that from thence they diffused their baleful influence to other cities. Yet, even in this perilous situation, the church in general held fast and professed the truth of the Gospel, and a zealous regard to the honour and authority of Christ; so that they had not denied the faith, either by open apostacy, or by temporizing, to avoid the cross, not even in those trying days, wherein Antipas, (who probably was a pastor of the church,) had been a faithful witness to the truth of Christ, and had been slain for his testimony, by those among whom Satan dwelt.

V. 14—16. The Lord had, however, a few things to allege against this church; because they permitted in their communion, or otherwise connived at, some of those licentious teachers, against whom his apostles had protested, (Notes, 2 Pet. ii. Jude,) even such as held the doctrine of Balaam. For that wicked man, though really favoured with prophetic visions, had yet, for filthy lucre's sake, plotted mischief against Israel, by teaching Balak to seduce them into idolatry and fornication, (Notes, Num. xxv.) and thus to throw in their way an occasion of falling into sin, and under the wrath of God; and in like manner the church at Pergamos contained persons who held the doctrine of the Nicolaitans, which Christ hated. Hence it is evident, that the teachers of this sect sought "the wages of unrighteousness," in their endeavours to corrupt and pervert professed Christians; and that, in order to obtain them, they laid stumbling blocks in their way, and, on some pretence or other, encouraged and enticed them to join in the idolatrous feasts of their neighbours, and on those occasions, and at other times, to commit fornication. They might, perhaps, inculcate the lawfulness of dissembling their religion, to escape persecution, which is an occasion of falling to numbers in such circumstances, and joining in the idolatry and excess of the heathen worship would effectually answer this end; but they certainly grafted this prevarication on more general principles, and an erroneous view of the doctrines of free grace and Christian liberty constituted the root of bitterness, from which their evil practices naturally grew. In short, they turned the grace of God into lasciviousness, and taught others to do the same, and were the Antinomians of the primitive church; a heresy, which, in one form or other, hath always hitherto sprung up when the pure Gospel of Christ hath been successfully preached, being a kind of tares, which the enemy will ever sow among the good seed, as far as he is permitted.—Many have supposed, that this sect derived its name from Nicolas, one of the primitive deacons; (Marg. Ref.) and such a tradition prevailed early in the church. Yet the name was then so common, and might be given them on so many other accounts, that there is no certainty in it; we read nothing of Nicolas in scripture to warrant so unfavourable an opinion of him; neither Peter nor Jude, who opposed heretics of the same stamp, called them by this name, and it may thence be supposed to have been afterwards given them. Some have noted that Nicolaus, in Greek, signifies the same as Balaam does in Hebrew, namely, "the conqueror of the people," and have thence inferred, that they were so called from the influence which they obtained over men's minds, and the fatal use which they made of it, as Balaam had done before them.—The Lord, however, commanded the church of Pergamos to repent of, and forsake, these corrupt practices and principles, to exclude such scandalous and pernicious persons from their communion, and by every means to show a decided abhorrence of their tenets; otherwise, he would quickly visit them in judgment, and fight against these deceivers with the sword of his mouth, inflict threatened vengeance on them and their adherents, and even deprive the church of their abused privileges.—This city is at present in a very ruinous condition, very few professors of Christianity are found in it, and they are wholly dependent on the church at Smyrna, being in a most abject state, and having scarcely any thing of their religion except the empty name.

V. 17. What the Spirit spake by John, to the church at Pergamos, was meant for the instruction of all who could hear or read it; for whilst judgments impended over the head of the impenitent, blessings were prepared for those who overcame the multiplied temptations to which they were exposed. To each person, who thus adhered to the truth and precepts of Christ, he promised to give "the "hidden manna," or those invigorating and satisfying consolations, which spring from the lively exercise of faith in a crucified Saviour, a steadfast contemplation of the glory of God in him, and communion with the Father and the Son, by the influences of the Holy Spirit. (Notes, John vi. 47—58.) This manna from Heaven, (Notes, Ex. xvi.) is hidden from carnal men, who see neither the source, the nature, the communication, nor the excellency of it; it is placed out of the reach of every enemy, nor can the supplies of it be intercepted: so that it is "the secret "of the LORD, which is with them that fear him."—He also promised to give to every conqueror in this holy war "a white stone." In those times, when any person, accused of crimes against the state, was tried by the suffrage of the citizens, they voted for his acquittal by a white stone, and for his condemnation by a black one; so that Christ, the sole Judge of his people, in promising to give them "a white stone," assured them of their full justification at the great day of account, and of the present comfortable sense that they were pardoned and accepted in him. The name written upon it, is probably that of "children of God," and it represents the inseparable connexion of adoption into his family with forgiveness of sins. This name would be, as it were, inscribed upon the pardon given them, and made legible to the soul by the spirit of adoption. (Note, Rom. viii. 14—17.) But "no "man knoweth it, saving he that receiveth it;" for the ground of this knowledge is laid in his inward consciousness and experience; it arises from "a witness in himself;" the world knoweth not the children of God, (1 John iii. 1, 2.) and even their brethren cannot exactly distinguish them, but sometimes suspect or condemn the upright and think well of specious hypocrites. But when the Holy Spirit illuminates his own work in the believer's soul, this new name, and its real import, become legible and intelligible to him, and he knows himself to be a child and heir of God. The expression may also signify, that the felicity which awaits the children of God, when they shall have obtained a complete victory over all their enemies, can never be understood, but by the enjoyment of it; yet I apprehend that present consolations, as the gracious recompense of victory over particular urgent temptations, were principally, though not exclusively, intended in this passage.

V. 18, 19. Thyatira lay to the south-east of Pergamos, and the epistle, to the church established in that city, was sent in the name of the "Son of God, who hath his eyes "as a flame of fire, &c." (i. 14, 15.) which represented his authority and omniscience, and the steadfastness and righteousness of his appointments and decisions. He also reminded the ruler, pastors, and Christians, at Thyatira, that he knew their works, and observed with approbation their brotherly love and general benevolence, their diligent attention to the various duties by which they were called to serve him and each other in the church and the community, their bold and steadfast profession of his doctrine in genuine faith, the patience with which they endured afflictions and persecutions, and especially that their last works were more abundant than those which they had at first performed.

V. 20—23. Thus far the church seemed in a flourishing condition; yet there was a worm at the root of this prosperity, which would destroy it unless it were removed, but of which they were not sufficiently aware. Notwithstanding all this cause of commendation, Christ had a few things to allege against them; especially their allowance of such as taught those abominable tenets, and perpetrated those evils which Christ hated, for the same heresy is here opposed as in the foregoing epistle. It is not agreed, whether the expression, "that woman Jezebel," is to be understood literally, or figuratively. From the reading in some manuscripts it hath been thought, that the wife of the presiding minister was meant, that she had obtained great influence in the affairs of the church, and made a bad use of it, that she pretended to prophetic gifts, and under that sanction propagated abominable principles, and though her conduct was disapproved by the sounder part of the church, yet no proper decision was used in censuring her, or preventing the mischiefs which she occasioned.—The figurative meaning, however, seems more suited to the style and manner of this book, and in this sense we may understand it to denote a company of persons, of the spirit and character of Jezebel, within the church, under one principal deceiver, as the Roman antichrist is represented by the emblem of an abandoned harlot. Jezebel, a zealous idolater, being married to the king of Israel, contrary to the divine law, used all her influence to seduce the Israelites from the worship of JEHOVAH into idolatry, with which the vilest licentiousness was connected, and this served to increase the temptation. Thus these persons, having, perhaps, through the fault of the pastors and members of the church, found admission among them, and by their artifices and blandishments attached a party to their cause, employed their whole influence to draw men from the pure religion of Christ, into carnal and spiritual fornication and adultery, and to poison their minds with abominable doctrines; yet they had not been duly censured and opposed; and it is probable, that neither the fatal tendency of their opinions, nor the atrociousness of their conduct, had been fully understood, till this epistle was sent. This evil had long been working; and the Lord had, in his long-suffering, given space for repentance to the ringleader, and those that abetted the delusion, but they still persisted in their wickedness. He therefore declared that he would cast the principal offender "into a bed," as visited with some painful and incurable disease, at length to terminate in death, whilst such as had been seduced to join in these abominations, would, unless they repented of their deeds, be thrown into the most grievous afflictions. (Note, 1 Cor. xi. 30—32.) Moreover, Christ purposed to destroy by pestilence, or other tremendous judgments, the whole progeny of these seducers, in order that all the churches might be assured, by the detection and exemplary punishment of such offenders, that he was that glorious Being, who claimed it as his peculiar prerogative to search the reins and hearts of men, to discern all their secret imaginations, purposes, and inclinations, and to render to every one of them according to his works. Here again the peculiar style of Deity is employed by "the Son of God." (Marg. Ref.) It is far more expressive to say, I am he who searcheth the heart, than "I search;" nor can such language be accounted for, on any other ground than the trinitarian doctrine, whatever pains and ingenuity may be employed in the attempt.

V. 24—28. To those who repented, and separated from the evils before-mentioned, and to the rest, who had never received that doctrine, and had no acquaintance with those depths, as they called them, (perhaps avowing that they were peculiarly "the deep things of "God," but which Christ declared to be "the depths of "Satan," the most sagacious, and covert devices of that enemy to dishonour Christ and destroy men's souls,) to such as had kept clear, or had got free, from these mysteries of iniquity, he would give no other command, or injunction, than what they had already received from his ministers; but he exhorted them to hold fast those truths and precepts, till he came to remove them by death, or to judge the world. He also promised to every man, who overcame these perilous temptations, and kept his words in the obedience of faith, that he would grant him the privilege of sharing his victories, and the authority connected with them, as far as this could add to his true honour or felicity; so that he should be an assessor with him in judgment, and concur in the sentence, by which all the nations of his enemies will be dashed in pieces, as the potter's fragile vessel by the blow of an iron rod, (Notes, Ps. ii.) to which all other judgments executed on the nations are preparatory. Thus the victorious believer will receive from Christ, glory, honour, immortality, and an immoveable kingdom, even as he hath received of the Father. Moreover, he promised to give him "the morning-star," which may either mean the earnests of the Spirit, as introductory to the felicity of heaven, as the morning-star to the rising of the sun; (Note, 2 Pet. i. 19.) or the ineffable glory, with which he will invest his victorious disciples, in the presence and enjoyment of him their Lord and Saviour, and in conformity to his glory. (xxii. 16.)

V. 29. This concerned all persons, as much as those to whom it was immediately written. This church is at present wholly extinct, and the city is in a very desolate condition.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1.

The Lord Jesus alone can uphold and prosper his ministers, their light is wholly derived from him and maintained by him, he supports them by his powerful right hand, and disposeth of them in his sovereign wisdom. It therefore behooves all those who are favoured with able and faithful teachers to be thankful for them, to walk in the light thus vouchsafed them, and to be careful not to provoke the Lord to remove it; and all, who sustain that office, should remember their dependence on Christ and their accountableness to him; and be careful that their doctrine and practice be such, as may give them a confidence that he will make their cause his own.—The manifold evils, which abound in every part of the church, in a considerable degree, arise from the misconduct of its rulers and pastors, who ought especially to weigh the import of these epistles of Christ; and frequently they ought to take to themselves a great part of the reproof and warning which they contain. Our Lord is "like a "man, who is gone into a far country, having given to "every servant his work:" but faith realizes him, as "walking in the midst of the golden candlesticks," both in respect of his omnipotent Deity, and his omnipresent and all-pervading Spirit. He observes the conduct of those who have the light of his word and ordinances, and maintains that light, so long as a good use is made of it: but he will not fail to rebuke and correct those that walk inconsistently; and he continues his golden candlestick in one place, and removes it from another, as he sees good; for all second causes are wholly subservient to his will.

V. 2—7.

Our gracious Lord seeth in secret, and is not backward to commend "the work of faith, and labour of love, and "patience of hope" of his servants: he marks and approves their abhorrence of that which is evil, and their separation from the company, and protestation against the misconduct, of those who profess the gospel, but disgrace it by their crimes. (Notes, 2 Thes. iii. 6. 14, 15. 1 Tim. vi. 5. 2 Tim. iii. 5.) Nor does he less approve their conduct in examining the pretensions of such as speak in his name, or claim attention, as immediately inspired by him; that they may detect and condemn those as liars, who contradict the doctrine of his holy word. He also kindly notices the trials and hardships, which his people bear, and the patience with which they endure them; and how for his name's sake they labour, and have not fainted. Thus he sets ministers, parents, masters, and seniors, an example of commending what is right, in those placed under their care; and of thus introducing needful reproof. But he will by no means connive at what is evil, in any kind or degree. Even when believers and churches steadily profess his truth, attend on his ordinances, and outwardly obey his precepts; yet he hath somewhat against them, if they decline from the fervour of their first love; nay, he not only reproves them for those abatements in affection and zeal; but threatens, that unless they remember whence they are fallen, and repent, and do their first works, he will quickly remove their candlestick out of his place.—Not only are the churches of

The epistle of Christ to the church of Sardis; consisting of reproofs, exhortations, warnings, and promises to the pious remnant, 1—6. That to Philadelphia, replete with encouragement, 7—13. That to Laodicea; comprising severe rebukes of their luke-warmness and pride; connected with instruction, counsels, calls to repentance, invitations, and promises, 14—22.

Asia alarming instances of his truth and justice in this respect, but in every age he calls on all, who have eyes to see, and ears to hear, to observe the truth of what the Spirit on this occasion said unto the churches. The state of religion in most places where a reformation from popery took place, and with several descriptions of Christians among us, where once spiritual religion shone most illustriously, manifestly proves, that he still removes the candlestick from those who forsake their first love, and do not repent at his call, even though they hate the deeds of Nicolaitans and Antinomians, which he hateth. This should teach those, who now have the light, to "be zealous "and repent," lest they too should be left in the dark. And surely this single mention in Scripture, of Christians "forsaking their first love," when the context and consequences are well considered, most awfully reproves those numbers who speak of this as a common case; who excuse lukewarmness and sloth, in themselves and others, as a thing of course, by words to this effect, and who, speaking of Christians as "in their first love," mean that this is a low attainment, and that they will grow "less "fervent in spirit, serving the Lord," as they get above the infancy of Christianity! When the majority in any church adopt such notions, it is a certain sign that they will soon provoke Christ to remove their candlestick, unless they repent; nay, it is the natural language of stony-ground hearers, whose joy and affection have subsided, and who, having no root in themselves, are gradually withering away. For, though the aged flourishing Christian may feel less vigour of affection, than he did at some times soon after his conversion, in which novelty and self-love had no small share, yet there is far more constancy and energy in his love, to influence him to habitual self-denying obedience, apart from all selfish motives, than there was before. The former resembles the transient noisy flame of thorns, the latter is like the constant, vehement, penetrating, and efficacious heat of a fire made by substantial fuel. But in the midst of all the stratagems and open assaults of the enemy, which the traitor in the camp so often renders successful, there are some, who, through faith, obtain the victory, and to them Christ will "give to eat of the Tree of life, which is in the "midst of the Paradise of God."

V. 8—17.

As "the First and the Last, who was dead and is "alive," is the believer's Brother and Friend, he must be rich in the deepest poverty, honourable amidst the lowest abasement, and happy under the heaviest tribulations. Indeed, the disciples must expect to be reviled by those who blaspheme their divine Lord, and say that they are Christians, but are not, and whom Christ will one day show to have been "the synagogue of Satan," being combined together by every means to oppose his truth, and vilify and injure his faithful servants. The devil may also prevail to cast them into prison, or otherwise to try them, and they may have tribulation many days; but with such a Friend and Comforter, they ought not to "fear any of "those things which they may suffer;" their trials will only be for a limited season, and for gracious purposes; they will not be hurt by the second death, for their enemies can only kill their bodies; and if they are enabled to be faithful till that event, the Captain of their salvation, who conquered by dying, will give them a crown of eternal life. The Christian, who thus holds fast the Lord's name, and denies not his truth, in those places where Satan peculiarly erects his throne, and at those times when his faithful witnesses are liable to be martyred in his cause, need not fear his sharp sword with two edges, even as the beloved wife is not alarmed at the sword in the hand of her affectionate husband, but would tremble and faint to see it in the hand of an assassin. But this confidence cannot be supported, without steady obedience; for the Lord not only hates the principles and conduct of those who indulge their avarice or sensuality, under the pretence of abounding grace and Christian liberty, and seduce others into the same abominations; but he will come quickly, and fight with the sword of his mouth against those pastors and churches, who countenance them, unless they repent of their connexion with, and sanction to, the most abhorred of his enemies.

V. 18—29.

Even when the Lord knoweth the works of his people to be wrought in love, zeal, faith, and patience, and the last to be more than the first, yet, if his eyes, which are as a flame of fire, observe that they allow among them such as teach licentiousness, and seduce his servants to commit wickedness, or to turn aside to any false worship, he will rebuke, correct, or punish them, without respect of persons, man or woman, high or low, whatever influence they may possess, or however they may be gifted or distinguished. He gives them indeed time to repent; but if they do not avail themselves of his long-suffering, he will surely cast them into great tribulation; and frequently the remarkable sufferings, with the discoveries of the secret wickedness of the actors in such corruptions of the Gospel in this world, show the churches, that Christ is "He who searcheth the "reins and hearts," and establisheth his counsels in wisdom and justice; at least this will be evident, when he shall come to judgment, to give unto every one of us according to our works. Let us then avoid and protest against such perversions of Christianity, and beware of these depths of Satan, of which they that know the least are the most happy. Let us remember, that the yoke of Christ "is easy and his burden light," that he lays nothing on his servants but what is for their good, and authorizes none to add to it, and that he calls upon us to hold fast what we have received until he come. When we are tempted to sin, let us recollect what consolations he hath promised to the victorious combatant; and, looking to him for help, let us aspire to "the hidden manna," "the joy "that a stranger intermeddleth not with," the assurance of acceptance, the Spirit of adoption, and the earnest of eternal glory. And after every victory, may we follow up our advantage against the enemy, that we may overcome, and keep the works of Christ unto the end, and at last have glory, honour, and felicity, beyond all our present conceptions. This should often only be thought of under the animating idea of receiving power and authority from the Son of God, according to what he hath received from the Father, as the fruit of his conflicts and victories, being made partakers of his felicity, abiding for ever in his presence, and having him for our everlasting Light and Glory. Let then every one, who hath ears, attend to what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—3. Sardis lay to the south of Thyatira, and was once the renowned capital of Lydia, the kingdom of Crœsus. The epistle to the presiding pastor, and to the church in that city, was sent, as a message from him "that hath the seven Spirits of God, and the seven "stars," (i. 4.) that is, the divine Saviour, through whom the Holy Spirit, in the variety and abundance of his precious gifts and graces, was communicated to all the churches, and to the seven here mentioned in particular, and who was their sovereign Proprietor and Ruler. This reminded them from whom they must seek grace, for those things to which he called them, and it implied a command to their ministers to "take heed to themselves "and to their doctrine," and to be active and zealous in promoting a revival in the church, especially to the angel, or presiding minister, who, it is probable, had by his misconduct, aided in reducing the church to a very low estate. For Christ "knew their works" not to be such as he could approve. They had indeed "a name to live;" they professed the truth, possessed gifts, and had the ordinances of God regularly administered among them; they were considered by others, and by themselves, as vitally united to Christ; but he knew "that they were dead," numbers of them were wholly hypocrites, and dead in sin, others were in a very torpid, disordered, and lifeless state, and the church in general was rather a dead corpse, or a statue resembling a Christian congregation, than a company of living members of Christ's mystical body. The Lord therefore called on them to awake and look about them, to be vigilant in guarding against the stratagems and assaults of their enemies, to be active and earnest in the duties of their several stations, and to examine carefully into the state of their souls, and into that of the church; that so they might use proper means of "strengthening the things that remained, and were ready "to die," and endeavour, in dependence on the grace of the Holy Spirit, to revive and invigorate the faith, hope, love, and spiritual affections of those who were alive to God, though in a declining state, to bring formalists to repentance and conversion, and to purge out such as were scandalous, and infectious to others. In this manner the lamp that was ready to expire, might be made again to burn more bright, and their church, which seemed like a dying man, might revive, and be restored to a state of spiritual health and vigour. For their heart-searching Lord had "not found their works perfect before "God," or complete, or full. They were radically defective; most of them were formal and hypocritical, and the rest languid, partial, and corrupted by sinister motives and purposes. He could not, therefore, commend them, as he had done the more hearty and complete obedience and services of flourishing Christians; because they were not such before God, whatever they might appear to be in the sight of men. He therefore called on them to remember the favours which they had received, and the truths, precepts, and exhortations which they had heard; that they might hold fast pure and undefiled religion, and repent of their inconsistent and negligent conduct. But if, after this warning, they did not become more vigilant, sober, zealous, and diligent, he assured them that he would come, with some unexpected, surprising, and terrible judgments, on them, without any further intimation of his purpose, till they were suddenly overwhelmed by it. (Marg. Ref. and notes on them.)

V. 4—6. Even at Sardis there were a few Christians, whose names would be at length mentioned with distinguished honour, on account of their holy singularity: as they had not "defiled their garments," or disgraced their profession by the worldly lusts and sinful practices, to which the rest were addicted; and Christ assured them, that they "should walk with him in white," the emblem of perfect purity, triumph, and joy, and so be his accepted, holy, and honoured companions in heavenly felicity: "for they were worthy," or meet and proper persons to be admitted to that glorious and happy state, having approved themselves to be his faithful friends and servants whilst they lived on earth. (Notes, vii. 9. 13—17.) In short, to every conqueror in the spiritual warfare, at a place especially where temptations and bad examples so much abounded, the Lord promised "that he should be clothed "in white raiment," as completely and eternally justified, sanctified, and made glorious in the presence and favour of God. Neither would "he blot the name" of any such person "out of the book of life," in which his chosen and accepted servants are registered, even though the corrupt church to which he belonged should be given up; though numbers of those, who had a name to live, and were deemed heirs of heaven, were left to apostatize, or to be rejected as hypocrites, and though he might often have fears of this kind amidst his conflicts and temptations. On the contrary, Christ would surely confess his name, as one of his friends and brethren, at the last day, before his eternal Father and all his holy angels. All this related to others also, who were placed in similar circumstances. This once flourishing city now lies in ruins; a few persons called Christians are found there, but they are reduced to the most abject slavery, and have neither church nor minister among them.

V. 7. Philadelphia lay to the south-east of Sardis. The epistle to the angel of the church in that city was sent in the name of "Him that is holy," and "that is true," or of "the Holy One, and the true One;" which words contain a very conclusive proof of the Deity of Christ; for what mere creature can with propriety speak of himself in this language? (Is. xxx. 11, 12. 15. lvii. 15.) It was also sent in the name of him "that hath the key of "David." (Notes, Is. xxii. 20—25.) Being the promised Son of David according to the flesh, and the King of the true Israel to all generations, he hath the absolute power to open the gate of mercy to whom he pleaseth; to open the kingdom of heaven to the souls of his people, when removed by death, and to open their graves, and bring forth their bodies glorious and immortal, that they may be re-united to their souls in everlasting felicity; and on the other hand to shut out and exclude from mercy, and from heaven, whom he will, and to shut them up in hell, nor can any resistance be made to his power, or any appeal from his decision. He hath likewise power to open the understanding and the heart, or judicially to close them; to open a door for the preaching of his Gospel, or for the deliverance of his servants out of trouble; and when in these, or any other instances, he opens, no one, either man or angel, can shut; when he shuts, no creature can possibly open.

V. 8, 9. The almighty Sovereign, above described, knew the works of his ministers and disciples at Philadelphia, and they were such as he graciously approved; they might, therefore, observe, for their encouragement, that by his Gospel, and the means of grace afforded them, he had set before them an open door of access into the family and kingdom of God, and to all the present and everlasting privileges of his people, which no creature could shut against them; or, as some explain it, he had set before them an open door of usefulness, in spreading his Gospel, nor could any one prevent the success of their work and labour of love for that purpose. For though they were not so eminent as some other churches, for numbers, and gifts, and ability of every kind, yet they had a little strength, they were upright in their profession of the Gospel, they had some vigour of faith and holy affection, and were using their little influence to promote the success of Christianity. They had also kept the word of Christ, his truths, commands, and institutions, in faith, obedience, and steadfastness; neither had they denied their relations and obligations to him, or acted to the dishonour of his name, notwithstanding fears and dangers. (Note, ii. 9, 10.) For they too were exposed to persecution, from some that professed to be the people of God, but whom he disowned, and declared to be liars and the synagogue of Satan, and whom he promised that he would at length constrain to come and pay court to them in the most submissive manner, prostrating themselves at their feet, and supplicating their favour, as convinced of the Lord's love to them. Perhaps the unexpected success of the Gospel, in Philadelphia, rendered the Christians so powerful, that the Jews and their adherents were glad to seek their protection from the rage of the multitude, by which vast numbers of them were frequently massacred in those turbulent times, and the language leads us to conclude that many of them were converted to Christianity, by means of those events. Some, indeed, think that Judaizing Christians were meant, but it is more natural to understand the word Jews in its ordinary sense, and to consider them as open opposers, rather than as false professors of the Gospel.

V. 10, 11. As the Philadelphians had kept the word of Christ, in that constancy and patience which he had commanded and exemplified, and which he bestowed on his people, who could not stand their ground, unless thus enabled to "deny themselves, take up their cross, and "follow him," he promised to keep them "from the "hour of temptation," or some remarkable season of persecution, heresy, or apostacy, which was about to come on all the churches in the world, especially through the whole Roman empire, to try and prove the sincerity and strength of their faith and love. He would on this occasion shelter them from the fury of the storm, and not let them be so sharply tried or tempted as other churches were, which might in some respects have more strength, but had also more need of correction, and of being proved and purified. This is generally supposed to refer to Trajan's persecution, which was more general and violent than those under Nero and Domitian. But, as this city was the last of all the seven which was taken by the Mahometans, and as there has been a succession of Christians there, in every generation to this time, so some have applied this to their preservation from that delusion, which almost extirpated Christianity in those regions. It is indeed to be feared, that they have at present but little of the power of godliness among them; yet we may hope that Christ hath had a few real disciples in every age, and hath some, even at present, in this city. The Lord next called their attention to the assurance, that he was coming quickly to try his professed people, to deliver such as were faithful, to destroy their enemies, or to judge the world; and he, therefore, commanded them to hold fast the truth which they had received, and to maintain the ground which they had got, that no one might, through any temptation or terror, deprive them of the victor's crown, for which they were contending, or take away that distinguished honour, which this commendation conferred on them, for this could not be preserved without vigilance, diligence, and persevering courage.—'The captivity or ruin of the seven churches of Asia was consummated,' (viz. by the Ottomans, A. D. 1312.) 'and the barbarous lords of Ionia and Lydia still trample on the monuments of classic and Christian antiquity. In the loss of Ephesus, the Christians deplored the fall of the first angel, the extinction of the first candlestick of the revelations; the desolation is complete, and the temple of Diana, or the church of Mary, will equally elude the search of the curious traveller. The circus, and three stately theatres of Laodicea, are now peopled with wolves and foxes; Sardis is reduced to a miserable village; the god of Mahomet, without a rival,—is invoked in the mosques of Thyatira and Pergamos; and the populousness of Smyrna is supported by the foreign trade of the Franks and Armenians. Philadelphia alone has been saved by prophecy, or courage.' (Such is the insidious language of this infidel writer, who sneers at the prophecy, while he records its accomplishment.) 'At a distance from the sea, forgotten by the emperors, encompassed on all sides by the Turks, her valiant sons defended their religion and freedom above fourscore years, and at length capitulated with the proudest of the Ottomans. Among the Greek colonies, and churches of Asia, Philadelphia is still erect, a column in a scene of ruins, a pleasing example that the paths of honour and safety may sometimes be the same.' (Gibbon.)

V. 12, 13. To animate the Christians at Philadelphia, and all others, to the spiritual conflict, our Lord next promised to make every conqueror "a pillar in the temple "of his God," to establish him as an ornamental part of the spiritual edifice, which he, as Mediator, was building to the glory of his God and Father; that being consecrated to him, and placed in the sanctuary above, he might conduce to the beauty, proportion, and magnificence of the whole, and be for ever most honourable and blessed, as "an habitation of God through the Spirit," without any fear of being separated from him, or deprived of his favour and presence. Upon this pillar he promised "to "write the name of his God," that all might know to whom it belonged, and to whose glory it was erected, according to the custom of inscribing, on stately columns, the name and exploits of the person, to whose memory they were dedicated. He would also write on it, "the "name of the city of his God," (whom he, in human nature, worshipped and served,) this is called the new Jerusalem, is of heavenly original, and derives its glory from the presence of God in it. (Notes, xxi.) Thus all would know to what city the Victor belonged, and that he was entitled to all its privileges for evermore. The Lord promised also to write upon him "his own new name," even that of Emmanuel, Jesus, the Redeemer of sinners, which he hath assumed in addition to his former titles, of Creator, Upholder, and Lord of all worlds. Thus he would own him as one of his chosen people, a trophy of his victory over the world, sin, Satan, and death, and a monument erected to the power of his arm, the truth of his word, the efficacy of his atonement and mediation, and the unsearchable riches of his grace.—In these declarations all others are interested, according to the difficulty and completeness of their victory.

V. 14—16. Laodicea lay to the south of Philadelphia, and in the road to Ephesus; for the seven churches were situated in a kind of circle, and the progress from one to the other of them, in rotation, might be made in the order of these epistles.—A flourishing church had been planted here in the time of the apostle Paul; (Marg. Ref.) but it had greatly declined before this epistle was sent thither, in the name of "The AMEN," of Him who is Truth in himself, and who will surely confirm and ratify all his words, which are established, and unchangeable as his own nature. For he is the true and faithful Witness, most exactly testifying the nature, truths, purposes, and will of God to man, and bearing witness most impartially for, or against, the conduct and characters of his professed servants, and of all his creatures. He sent to the Laodiceans also, under the title of "the Beginning of "the creation of God," or the Origin, Author, and Ruler, of the whole universe, who hath authority and power to dispose of all things as he sees good. This glorious Lord of all knew their works to be such, as were utterly unworthy of his approbation; for these manifested, that they were "neither cold nor hot;" they neither wholly cast off all regard to the Gospel, nor yet were they zealous, fervent, and diligent in religion. He therefore declared, "that he would they were cold or hot; he desired that they would either renounce their profession, and cease from the worthless form of attending on his ordinances, or that they would show a becoming earnestness in those things which pertained to his service and glory. For whilst they were called by his name, and reluctantly performed a scanty measure of external duties, with an evident indifference and weariness in them, their evil tempers, unholy actions, and carnal attachment to the world, and to its pleasures, company, and interests, dishonoured him more than their apostacy could do, and in the event it would be equally fatal to their own souls. For, in this manner they would give numbers an unfavourable opinion of Christianity, as if it had been an unholy religion; whilst others would conclude that it could afford no real satisfaction, or its professors would not have been so heartless in it, or so ready to borrow a little pleasure from the world: or that it was not worth much, as they would not give up any thing of supposed value for the sake of it.—In short, such professed Christians are traitors in the camp, who are always more dangerous than open enemies; or wicked servants, who disgrace and rob their masters more than they can do when turned out of the family.—Unless, therefore, they became more "fervent in spirit, "serving the Lord," he was determined to show his contempt and abhorrence of them, by rejecting them, even as a man, whose stomach nauseates water that is lukewarm, will cast it out of his mouth with loathing and disgust.

V. 17. While the state of this church was so lamentably declined, that very few real Christians, and those of small proficiency, remained in it, their spiritual pride and self-confidence had proportionably increased; this gave occasion to the following reproof, instruction, and counsel. They were ready to say within themselves, to each other, and even in a boasting manner to their neighbours, that "they were rich" in spiritual gifts and attainments, that they were "increased in goods," and had obtained a larger measure of every spiritual gift and endowment than they formerly had, when the apostles were with them; (Notes 1 Cor. iv. 8—10. v. 2.) so that they thought they had need of nothing, but were complete in knowledge, wisdom, goodness, strength, and establishment in the privileges and liberty of the Gospel: like poor lunatics, who fancy every house and estate which they see, or hear of, to be their own. Thus they preferred themselves to others, and, being proud in spirit, instead of "poor in "spirit," they could only pray in the Pharisee's manner; (Note, Luke xviii. 10—14.) and were utterly incapable of the life of faith in Christ for all things pertaining to salvation. For they "knew not that they were wretched "and miserable," in a most abject, perilous, and perishing condition, and utterly destitute of wisdom and grace; not only poor, as all natural men are, but poor as professors of the Gospel, being Pharisees upon evangelical principles, and proud of their attainments in Christianity, when in fact they were wholly unconverted. This delusion took place because they were "blind;" they had only that "knowledge which puffeth up," but they had never seen the real glory of God in Christ, the evil of sin, their own vileness, the deceitfulness of their hearts, or the excellency of the Gospel; they, therefore, continued "naked," though they knew it not, being neither covered with the justifying righteousness of Christ, nor adorned by his grace. The original expressions are peculiarly emphatical; for the article is prefixed to the epithets employed, so that the passage may be thus rendered, "Thou art the wretched one, the miserable one, &c;" and they were thus distinguished from all the other churches.

V. 18, 19. The case described in the preceding verse was that of the church in general, and of its pastors and members in particular, by the testimony of Christ himself; and he counselled them "to buy of him," those things, of which they were in such urgent need. They could have them from no other person in the world; and he sold them to the poorest who applied for them, "without money, and without price." (Note, Is. lv. 1—3.) But though even such wretched and indigent sinners as they were might obtain them, yet, as much of what they valued, though worthless in itself, must be renounced, in order to appropriate them, it might properly be called buying them. (Notes, Matt. xiii. 44—46. Phil. iii. 7—9.) They were, therefore, counselled, (and the counsels of Christ are commands, invitations, and promises,) to apply to him for "gold tried in the fire, that they might "be rich." This denotes that true and precious faith and grace, which had in numberless instances endured the hottest fire of persecution without being consumed, and had been rendered more resplendent by the flames, and which would be most advantageous in affliction, in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment. These would make them rich in reality, as they would ensure and evidence their interest in the unsearchable riches of Christ, and in all the promises given through him to his people. He advised them also to buy of him "white raiment, "that they might be clothed, and that the shame of their "nakedness might not appear;" for as their own righteousness was as filthy rags, and their profession of Christianity hypocritical, so they must soon be exposed and put to shame before men and angels, unless they had his righteousness put on them for a robe of salvation, and were made holy by his sanctifying Spirit. (4, 5.) But as their pride and self-confidence had blinded them to the truth of their case and character, and consequently to the value of these blessings, so he directed them to "anoint "their eyes with eye-salve, that they might see;" let them examine themselves by the rule of his word, and seek for the teaching of his Holy Spirit to purge away their pride, prejudices, and worldly lusts; that they might see the nature and preciousness of his salvation, and value it in a more suitable manner. These warnings and exhortations were not given them in indignation, but in mercy, for it was the general rule of his conduct to rebuke and chasten those whom he loved; (Notes, Heb. xii. 5—12.) and they might consider these rebukes as tokens of his favour, for such they would prove, if properly attended to. It behooved them, therefore, to be zealous and earnest, in these most important concerns, especially in repenting, renouncing, cleansing away, and seeking forgiveness of the evils into which they had fallen.

V. 20—22. To encourage the repentance, and excite the earnestness, of the lukewarm Laodiceans, the Lord called on them to notice, with admiration, his condescension, patience, and grace; that whilst they were so wanting in love to him, he stood waiting at the door, and seeking to be re-admitted into the church, and into their hearts, from whence their sins had driven him. He stood without, knocking, by the dispensations of his providence, the warnings and instructions of his word, and the convincing influences of his Spirit, and thus requiring them to receive and entertain him. (Notes, Cant. v. 2—8.) So that, though the church should not admit him, yet, if any individual was willing to open, and give up his heart and affections to him, in order that he might destroy his enemies and rivals, cast out idols, subdue his iniquities, and make all things new, he would certainly enter in, and take such delight in the work of his grace, and communicate such blessings and consolations to the soul of that man, that it might be said, "he supped with him, and "he with him;" such intimate communion should be thenceforth maintained between the redeemed sinner and his most gracious Saviour! In short, to every conqueror, over such temptations as the Laodiceans were exposed to, the Lord promised a blessing proportioned to the difficulty of the conflict, for he engaged to "grant him to sit with "him in his throne," and by an inconceivable union and fellowship with him in all his glory, and an interest in all the benefits of his mediatorial authority and power, to possess an honour and felicity, which can never be explained or conceived, except by those who experience it. For as these victors would be first conformed to Christ in conflict, self-denial, and suffering, so would they at last be conformed to him in victory and exaltation; being seated with him in his throne, even "as he overcame and "hath set down with his Father in his throne." The same inexpressible dignity would also be bestowed on other conquerors in like difficult circumstances; as the warnings and instructions were intended for the benefit of all who heard them, in every age. The ruins of this city show that it once was most magnificent, but at present no human creature dwells there. So that the state of these seven cities, both respecting Christianity and their outward prosperity, exactly accords to the commendation, or rebuke, which were given the churches established there, by the Spirit of prophecy so many centuries ago! which remarkable coincidence contains an instructive lesson, and a solemn warning to all other cities and nations favoured with the Gospel, not to neglect or trifle with so great a blessing. Nothing, in these short epistles, is said, concerning distinct congregations in any of the cities mentioned; though, some time before, there were several elders, (πρεσϐυτεροι, or επισκοποι,) at Ephesus; on the other hand, nothing is introduced, respecting any dependent churches in the neighbouring towns, or villages, as under the authority of the angel, or presiding minister in each of these churches. Hence it appears, that men of discordant sentiments, on the subject of ecclesiastical government, in vain attempt to support their opinions by this part of scripture.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

When he, who hath the fulness of the Spirit, and who rules over all means and instruments, reproves, counsels, or commands; his words imply the promise of all needful assistance to those who obediently attend to them. But how many professed Christians does that heart-searching Judge, who knoweth our works, behold, that have a name to live, and perhaps much celebrity in the church, and yet are dead in trespasses and sins! Alas! it is to be feared, that many religious societies, who have exact forms and notions, and who profess the truths of the Gospel with some reputation, consist almost entirely of such persons, and have very little vital godliness among them. We should, therefore, be very diligent and impartial in examining ourselves by the rules of scripture, very earnest in prayer to the Lord to show us what we are, and very careful not to rest in the opinion of men respecting us. When it is evident that we, or the society to which we belong, have declined, we should spare no pains, and neglect no means, which may "strengthen the things that remain, and yet "are ready to die; for Christ often judges those works, not to be sound and upright before God, which men admire and applaud; and our great concern is with our Judge, not with our fellow-criminals. In seeking a revival in our own souls, or in those of others, it is incumbent on us to remember what we have received and heard, that, by comparing our advantages and profession with our proficiency, we may be humbled and quickened, and so excited to hold fast what we retain, and to repent and do our first works. But if men will despise warnings to watch and pray, Christ will surely come when they do not expect him, and appoint such slothful servants their portion among his enemies. Yet, even in very corrupt churches, he hath commonly a few names, who have not defiled their garments; and if our lot be cast in such a situation, we should be ambitious of this true honour, that, amidst many bad examples and temptations, we may be found "a peculiar people, zealous of good works." At present we may indeed be hated, or derided, for such singularity of conduct, but the Lord will admit us to the honour of walking with him in white, as graciously accounted worthy of so great a felicity, when all unbelievers and formal professors shall have their portion in the blackness of eternal darkness. For whether few, or many, overcome the peculiar temptations of their situation, they, and they only, will be accepted and triumphant at the last, not one of them shall have his name blotted out of the book of life, nor will the divine Saviour refuse to confess the meanest of their names before his Father and all his holy angels.

V. 7—13.

It is incumbent on us to attend to him, who is Holy and True, who hateth sin, yet performeth his largest promises to believing sinners; he reigneth on the throne of David, he openeth the gates of life and death, of heaven and hell, and none can shut them; he shutteth, and none can open. Whether, therefore, he set before us an open door of access to his mercy-seat, or afford us an opportunity of usefulness; no created being can shut us out from them. Even if we have but "little strength," yet, if we have kept his word, and have not denied him, amidst our fears and discouragements, he will not let any enemy prevail against us; and as he hath all hearts in his hands, so he often disposes the opposers of his people to show them respect, to desire their friendship, to own that he has loved them, or gladly to receive the truth from them. (Gen. l. 15—18.) If we would escape those severe corrections and violent temptations, which, from time to time, are permitted to try the churches throughout the earth, we must patiently adhere to the truth and will of Christ, and shrink from no cross that we meet with, when following his example; for an unwatchful conduct makes way for temptation, and unfits men to resist it. Whilst, therefore, we wait for him who "cometh quickly," we should "hold fast the beginning of our confidence "steadfast unto the end," that none may rob us of our crown, or even of the comfortable assurance of obtaining it. For those who overcome in the strength and after the example of Christ, shall be placed by him as pillars in the temple above, to go no more out; and they shall for ever enjoy all the privileges and felicity of the city of God, to the glory of the Father, and that of the eternal Son, who hath redeemed them with his precious blood, that they may for ever show forth his praise, and enjoy his love.

V. 14—22.

While we bow our ear to the encouraging topics of the Gospel, let us advert also to the language of "the "Amen, the true and faithful Witness," the Ruler of "the creation of God," whilst he speaks of the character, and doom, of lukewarm Christians. Alas! how many are there of the Laodicean stamp in every place! Did we suppose these epistles to be prophetical as to the church in general, we might be induced to conclude that the end of the world was nigh; for amidst the abounding of iniquity and infidelity, the love of many waxes cold, and the state of religion, in this highly favoured nation, too much resembles that of this seventh church. The Lord knoweth, that professors at present are "neither cold nor hot," except as their indifference in essential matters is strangely counter-poised, by a hot and fiery spirit of disputation, about things of far inferior moment! No doubt the Laodicean state of the Christian churches, in most parts of the world, is one grand hinderance to the propagation of the Gospel among the nations, who can scarcely conceive that religion to be from heaven, the professors of which are so "earthly, "sensual, and devilish;" and certainly the state of those who hold the truth too often in unrighteousness, and generally in a lukewarm manner, forms one grand objection and prejudice against the Gospel, in the minds of numbers in this land, and gives moral and decent Infidels, Socinians, and Arians, their chief advantage against us. Yet the persons who are chiefly reprehensible, are least likely to regard such admonitions: for whilst the Lord is saying "I would thou wert cold or hot; but because thou "art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue "thee out of my mouth," they are boasting "that they "are rich, and increased with goods, and have need of "nothing!" It is indeed a general rule, that professors of religion grow proud, in proportion as they become carnal and formal; for, like glow-worms, they shine most in the dark, according to their apprehensions of themselves, and their commendations of one another. The Pharisaical spirit is indeed always odious and dangerous; whilst it renders men ignorant of their wretchedness, poverty, nakedness, and blindness, and insensible of the preciousness of Christ and his salvation, yet the legal Pharisee is a hopeful character, compared with those who graft the Pharisee on an evangelical profession, and connect it with an Antinomian laxity of morals. Christ, however, continues to declare to all men their lost estate; and he mercifully counsels even lukewarm and proud professors, as well as others, to come and buy of him unsearchable and never failing treasures, unfading robes of righteousness, and that heavenly unction, which renders the most ignorant wise unto eternal salvation. Happy are they, who take his counsel! for all others must perish in their sins. Even when he enforces his neglected counsels and invitations with sharp rebukes and painful corrections, (which he will do in respect of as many as he loves,) if we are thus made zealous and penitent, we shall deem them additional and most precious favours. May we then hear the voice of his word and his rod, whilst, with infinite compassion and condescension, he continues to stand waiting and knocking at the door of our hearts, that he may enter in, and bring salvation with him. Let us earnestly beseech him to put forth his almighty power, and thus break down all obstacles to his admission, and take entire possession of our whole souls, that we may be ashamed of our folly and ingratitude in allowing any creature to rival him in our affections, or attempting to divide our hearts between him and worldly objects. Then we may hope that he will shed abroad his love in our hearts, and communicate his joy to them; that he will delight over us to do us good, and cause us to glory and rejoice in him; and that, by his help, and under his banner, we shall conquer every enemy, till our blessed experience explains to us that which we cannot possibly before understand, what is meant by our "sitting down with him on his "throne, even as he overcame and is set down with the "Father upon his throne."

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. When the Lord Jesus had dictated to his apostle the preceding epistles, and thus instructed him to write the things which then were; there seems to have been a short interruption of his vision. But afterwards, looking and waiting for further discoveries, he beheld, as it were, a door opened into heaven, the holy habitation of God, and then another vision was introduced, which made way for his being shown "the things which "must be hereafter;" (i. 19.) for this and the following chapter constitute an introduction to the prophetical part of the book, especially to the opening of the seals in the seventh chapter. Whilst he was contemplating the door opened in heaven, he heard a voice, as before, calling him to come up thither, (i. 10.) and immediately he was "in "the Spirit." It hath been heretofore observed, that no external objects seem to have been presented to the senses of the prophets on such occasions; but, the natural use of all their faculties being suspended, their minds were supernaturally impressed with the ideas of such things as were particularly suited to illustrate the subjects which they were employed to reveal. We ought not, therefore, to suppose that the objects afterwards mentioned, have a real existence in heaven; but they were visionary emblems, suited to give proper instructions to the apostle and to his readers, and our chief business is to develope their meaning, and, as it were, to decipher the hieroglyphics. Being in the Spirit, and cast into an ecstacy or trance, we may suppose that John did not well know "whether he "was in the body, or out of the body;" (Notes, 2 Cor. xii. 1—3.) he was, however, as to his own apprehension, admitted into the immediate presence of God, and had the vision of a glorious throne, on which One sat, whom he did not attempt particularly to describe. This was emblematical of the universal, absolute, and eternal dominion of JEHOVAH; and of his exaltation far above all creatures, as their great Creator and sovereign Lord. The visible glory, (which seems to have referred to that above the mercy-seat in the holy of holies, as there is throughout these visions an allusion to the temple, its furniture and services,) being resplendent, like the transparent jasper, might be emblematical of the perfect purity and excellency of the divine nature, and its colour, like the red sardine stone, might represent his awful justice and fiery indignation. The rainbow was a well known emblem of the covenant of grace, and its surrounding the throne denoted, that the holiness and justice of God, and all his dispensations as the Sovereign of all worlds, had respect to his covenant of peace and engagements of love, which he had ratified to his believing people, and harmonized with them. In this rainbow the soft green of the emerald was predominant, which perhaps might imply, that as the green relieves the eye, which some other colours fatigue and dazzle, so the discovery made of the mercy of God, in the covenant of grace, refreshes the believer's mind, which the display of his glorious power, holiness, and justice, would dismay and confound.

V. 4, 5. Round about, at some distance from the exalted throne of God, were placed twenty-four thrones of an inferior order, on which were seated as many elders. These are generally allowed to have been the emblematic representatives of the whole church of God, both under the old and the new dispensation. The thrones on which they sat, their white raiment, and their crowns of gold, implied their acceptance, sanctification, and royal priesthood. For though the church militant was thus represented, as well as the church triumphant, yet the whole was described with relation to the security of their state, their glorious privileges, and the honour to which the Lord purposed to advance them. The number of these elders may refer to the twenty-four courses, into which the priests were divided, or to the twelve patriarchs, and twelve apostles, as the heads of the old and the new Testament-churches. The lightnings, thunders, and voices, which proceeded from the throne, according to the scene exhibited on mount Sinai, might imply, that God was as terrible as ever to the impenitent and unbelieving. The seven lamps of fire, burning before the throne, were emblematical of the seven Spirits of God, or the manifold gifts and graces, communicated to all Christians by the baptism of the Holy Spirit and of fire; (Note, Matt. iii. 11. Marg. Ref.) and the sea of glass, clear as crystal, being perfectly pure and transparent, (perhaps in allusion to the molten sea of brass in the court of the temple,) seems to refer to the "Fountain opened for sin and un-"cleanness," in which all the spiritual priesthood must wash, previously to their acceptable spiritual sacrifices.

V. 6—8. Various opinions have been held concerning "the four beasts," or living creatures, as it ought to have been translated, in order to adhere to the exact meaning of the original, and to preserve the truth of the emblem. The unaccountable notion, that the Trinity of Persons in the Godhead was represented by them, whilst two emblems were given of the Son, because of his incarnation and sacrifice, can have no other support than the names which have sanctioned it; for this plain reason, that these living creatures are throughout represented as the principal worshippers, not as the object of worship. Nor can the more general and plausible opinion, that they were representatives of the angels, as the cherubims in Ezekiel's vision seem to have been, be supported by any sufficient proof, (Note, Ez. i. 10.) not only because angels are personally introduced in the subsequent part of this vision, but especially because these living creatures are spoken of as adoring "the lamb that was slain, who had redeemed "them to God with his blood." (v. 8, 9.) They must therefore undeniably represent some part of the church of redeemed sinners of the human race. Perceiving this, some expositors have supposed them to be representatives of the whole church, and the twenty-four elders of its rulers and pastors; but it is surely far more reasonable to reverse this arrangement, and to conclude that the four living creatures represent a part, the twenty-four elders the whole of the church; and indeed it seems evident that they were emblems of the true ministers of the Gospel, in the different parts of the earth. Ezekiel, being about to predict providential dispensations respecting the nation of Israel, had a vision emblematical of the ministry of angels, by which those events would be accomplished; but John's predictions relating chiefly to the church in the different regions of the earth, and to the affairs of nations only in subserviency to them, he had a vision emblematical of the Gospel ministry, by which the interests of the church would principally be maintained. As the temper of mind and spiritual gifts, which qualify men for this work, accord in great measure to the affections and endowments of angels, it is not at all wonderful to find a coincidence in the hieroglyphics by which they were represented. But each cherub in Ezekiel's vision had four faces, and John's living creatures had the same appearances divided among them; for angels may be supposed to possess singly the several excellencies that are given to many of the most eminent ministers. In various particulars, the emblem teaches what true and able ministers are and do: and thus it serves to instruct and remind them, 9 And [l] when those beasts give glory, and honour, and thanks, to him that sat on the throne, [m] who liveth for ever and ever,

10 The four and twenty elders [n] fall down before him that sat on the throne, [o] and worship him that liveth for ever and ever, [p] and cast their crowns before the throne, saying, of their duties. The lion is the known emblem of courage and magnanimity; the calf or young ox of strength, hardiness, and patient endurance of labour; the human face is the emblem of prudence, benevolence and compassion; and the eagle of penetration, soaring beyond earthly things, contemplation of heavenly objects, and affections fixed on things above. The six wings, (Note, Is. vi. 1—4.) denote alacrity, humility, promptitude, and speed, in the Lord's work. The living creatures were also full of eyes before, behind, and within, which aptly represented vigilance, circumspection, attention to their work and charge, a watchful and cautious observance of the motions and stratagems of their enemies, self-acquaintance, and jealous diligence in searching their own hearts, and taking heed to their own spirits. Their unceasing and unwearied worship of the Lord, day and night, may signify, that, through their instructions, exhortations, example and assistance, converted sinners in every part of the earth were continually blessing and glorifying God, and worshipping at his mercy-seat; and the three-fold repetition of the word holy, (as in the worship of the seraphim in the above-cited passage in Isaiah,) might be an intimation of the Trinity of Persons in the Godhead, to which respect was had, which Person soever was immediately addressed. (i. 4. 8.)

V. 9—11. Whilst these four living creatures ascribed glory and honour, and rendered thanks, to the eternal Jehovah, (in the midst of the circuit of the throne, and nearer than the seats of the elders,) (6.) the latter prostrated themselves before him in humble grateful adoration, and in acknowledgment that all their honour and felicity were bestowed on them of his mere mercy, they cast their crowns before the throne, and declared him to be worthy of all honour and dominion, as the great Creator of all worlds, by whose sovereign will they continued to exist, as they had been originally formed for his glory. (Note, John i. 1—3. Col. i. 15—17.) In the next chapter we shall find the same company worshipping the Son, as the Redeemer of sinners, and joined by the angels in that sacred service.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

The Lord Jesus, 'having overcome the sharpness of 'death, hath opened the gates of heaven to all believers,' and if we look unto him by faith, and obediently attend to his voice, whilst he calls us to set our affections on things above, we shall, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, behold the glory of our reconciled God upon his throne of grace, be encouraged by the engagements of his everlasting covenant, and draw nigh in humble boldness with our worship, notwithstanding the terrors of his justice, and the awful curses of his broken law. For blessed are all they who belong to his church, in heaven, or on earth. Great is the honour and dignity conferred on them, or prepared for them, yea, far greater than all the thrones, sceptres, diadems, or triumphs, which have excited the ambition or envy of mankind in every age and place. If then we are baptized with the illuminating, purifying, and transforming influences of the Holy Spirit, washed in the pure fountain of the Redeemer's blood, and clothed in the sacerdotal robe of his righteousness, we shall soon have done with conflict and suffering, receive the victor's honourable crown, and join in the rapturous worship of heaven.

V. 6—11.

Here on earth the Lord conducts the affairs of his church by his ministers, whom he hath brought nearer to him than their brethren, and who ought to aspire after a proportionable pre-eminence in holiness. Many indeed bear that name, who are far from answering the scriptural character of ministers; and we all may learn by these instructive emblems, what need we have to be humbled, and ashamed of our inconsistent conduct and defective services; for though faithful ministers emulate the obedience of angels, yet they find they "do not the things "which they would." It behooves us, however, to look in this mirrour, that we may learn what manner of persons we ought to be, and are; and may thus know what to pray for, and endeavour after; that we may become more bold, laborious, loving, prudent, spiritual, active, vigilant, attentive to our own hearts, and devoted to the work of our gracious Lord. May he bless, uphold, encourage, and prosper all, who in any measure answer to these characters; may he raise up numbers of such ministers in all the four quarters of the globe, and convert blind teachers into faithful pastors. Thus the worship of the church on earth, under the guidance and instruction of able and spiritual ministers, will become more like that of adoring seraphim; whilst the multitude of his people, in every place, as with one heart and voice, ascribe the whole honour of their redemption and conversion, their present privileges and future hopes, to the eternal and most holy God, who is worthy to receive glory and dominion as the Omnipotent Creator and Sustainer, and the Sovereign Lord of the whole universe. May the name of our heavenly Father be thus hallowed on earth, as it is in heaven. Amen.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—4. The vision still continuing, the apostle next saw a book in the right hand of him who sat upon the throne, which was written within, and "sealed on the outside with seven seals:" for this seems the more obvious meaning. It appeared as a roll consisting of several parchments, according to the custom of those times: and though it was supposed to be written within, yet nothing could be read till the seals were loosed; so that the words "on the backside," probably refer to the sealing, and not to the writing. It was afterwards found to contain seven parchments, or volumes, each of which was separately sealed: but if all the seals had been on the outside, nothing could have been read till they had all been loosed; whereas the loosing of each seal was followed by some discovery of the contents of the roll: yet the appearance on the outside seems to have indicated, that it consisted of seven parts. This was an emblem of the secret decrees and purposes of God, relative to future events, from which all prophecies are, as it were, extracts: but it especially represented those purposes which were about to be revealed, and may, therefore, be considered as the same for substance, with that part of the book which follows. A mighty angel, as the Lord's herald to all creatures, inquired who was "worthy," by his personal dignity or excellency, or the extraordinary services performed by him, to have the honour of opening this book. But there was no one, either angel in heaven, or man on earth, or spirit of man in the separate state, whose body lay under the earth, that could claim so high an honour; or so much as behold and obtain the least insight into the deep things of God which it contained. When this was made known, the apostle, who had gone up thither, with earnest desires and expectations of hearing things, which should come to pass in after times, wept much at his supposed disappointment.

V. 5—7. One of the emblematical representatives of the church seemed to the apostle, in his vision, to notice his grief, and to encourage him with the assurance, that the Lion of the tribe of Judah, had prevailed to open the book; being distinguished from, and honoured far beyond, all creatures. A tradition generally prevailed, that a lion was painted on the standard of Judah, when the nation of Israel encamped in the wilderness, but this is not at all probable. (Note, Num. ii. 2.) Christ, however, was descended from Judah, and had been predicted with reference to this emblem in Jacob's blessing. (Note, Gen. xlix. 9, 10.) He was infinitely superior in dignity and power to all others of the tribe; and he is most terrible to his obstinate enemies, merciful to those who submit to him, and the guardian of his people; so that this title was peculiarly suited to him. He was described as "the Root of David;" in his human nature he was a Branch of renown, sprung up from the decaying root of David's royal family: in respect of his Deity, he was the Root whence David himself sprang; and, as the promised Messiah, he was the great Honour, and the Source of all the dignity and authority of that distinguished race. Whilst the Elder was informing John that Christ had prevailed to open the book, he looked, and saw with astonishment, that near to the throne, and within the circle formed by the living creatures and the elders, (iv. 6.) there stood "a Lamb, "even as it had been slain," with the marks of the mortal wounds upon it, though it had been marvellously restored to life. (Note, John i. 29.) This was a hieroglyphical representation of Christ's High Priesthood before God, in our nature, as risen from the dead, through the merit of his sacrifice, in behalf of all who come to the Father through him; so that it was in consequence of that atonement, which the sacrificing of spotless lambs had prefigured from the beginning, that he prevailed to open the book. The seven horns of this emblematical Lamb represented the power of his providential kingdom to protect his subjects, and annoy his enemies; and his seven eyes may denote his prophetical office, and his personal knowledge of all hearts and all events; but especially the treasures of wisdom laid up in him to be communicated to his church by "the seven Spirits of God, sent forth into

8 And when he had taken the book, [t] the four beasts, and four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, [u] having every one of them harps, [x] golden vials full of * odours, which are [y] the prayers of saints.

9 And they [z] sung a new song, saying, [a] Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: [b] for thou wast slain, [c] and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, [d] out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation;

10 And hast made us unto our God [e] kings and priests: [f] and we shall reign on the earth.

11 And I beheld, and I heard the voice of [g] many angels round about [h] the throne, and the beasts, and the elders: and the number of them [i] was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands;

12 Saying with a loud voice, [k] Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, [l] to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing.

13 And [m] every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and [n] such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, [o] Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto [p] Him that sitteth upon the throne, [q] and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever.

"all the earth;" that is, the Holy Spirit, as given by him to reveal the truth and will of God to apostles and prophets, that they might be written for the instruction of mankind, and as illuminating the understanding, and preparing the hearts of his people to receive that instruction. (Marg. Ref.) Several eminent expositors suppose, that seven superior angels, or arch-angels, are meant; but the texts referred to, and the emblematical style of the book, seem inconsistent with that interpretation. This divine Saviour, however, approached to receive the book from the hand of him who sat on the throne.

V. 8—10. When Christ had received the book, and was preparing to loose the seals, the representatives of the ministers of the church, and the elders, who had before prostrated themselves in adoration of the great Creator, now fell down in like manner to worship the Lamb, or the incarnate Son, as the Saviour of lost sinners, thus rendering him divine honour, even in the presence of the Father's manifested glory. Their harps, with reference to the music and psalmody of the temple, were emblems of their melodious praises and thanksgivings; the golden vials, or small censers full of odours, like the burning of incense at the tabernacle and temple, represented the acceptableness of the prayers of the saints, through the intercession of Christ, and by the influences of his sanctifying Spirit. These were presented by the living creatures and elders, as the prayers of Israel were offered, whilst the priests were burning incense in the sanctuary. For though heaven is the scene of these visions, yet they had continual reference to the temple and its worship, and the state of the church on earth is throughout particularly adverted to. Moreover, they all joined in a song of praise, which was not only most excellent, but it was also new, in respect of the occasion and composition; for the Old Testament church celebrated the praises of Jehovah, their Redeemer from Egypt, and anticipated the coming of their expected Messiah, but the New Testament church adored Christ, as actually come, as having finished his work on earth by his sacrifice on the cross, and as entered into his mediatorial glory. He, therefore, and he alone, was worthy to take the book, and disclose the purposes of God to mankind; for he had become incarnate, and, for the glory of God and the salvation of men, had willingly given himself to be slain as a sacrifice. And thus he had redeemed them to God, by the shedding of his all-atoning blood, that he might bring them, as reconciled and accepted worshippers, into his presence; and he had collected them, by the preaching of the Gospel and the power of his grace, out of the various families, languages, and nations of the world, to be exalted and consecrated, as kings and priests, through their union with him and conformity to him; so that they were assured, that on earth they should acquire the ascendency both over their personal enemies, and those of his church, as well as reign with him for ever in heaven. It is indisputably manifest, that the four living creatures join in, or rather lead, the worship of the Lamb, as having redeemed them to God: and this proves beyond controversy, that part of the redeemed church is meant by this emblem, and not angels, whose worship is next described, but in language evidently different.

V. 11—14. Whilst these adoring praises were rendered, by the representatives of the church of redeemed sinners to their divine Saviour, the apostle heard likewise the voice of many angels, around the throne, and encircling without the living creatures and elders, whose number amounted to many millions, and could not be ascertained; yet they all, in perfect harmony, with a loud voice, declared that "the Lamb, who had been slain" for the redemption of sinful men, was "worthy to receive "power," in his mediatorial character and in human nature, over all creatures in heaven and earth, and "riches," even all the treasures of grace and glory, for the benefit of his people, and that "wisdom, strength, "honour, glory, and blessing," should be vested in him, and ascribed to him, as the Object of universal adoration, praise, gratitude, and love. Thus the innumerable company of angels, though they do not stand related to him as partakers of the same nature, and have no immediate concern in his redemption, are yet represented as beholding such divine excellency and glory in him and his mediatory work, (for into these things they desire to look,) that they adore and honour him with most rapturous ascriptions of praise, rejoice in his exaltation, "far above all principality and power," and seem to vie with redeemed sinners in his worship. In this they were immediately joined by all the inhabitants of heaven and earth, and the souls of those in the separate state, whose bodies were under the earth, or in the sea, or by all creatures in the universe, according to their several capacities, with the exception of none but the determined enemies of God. These indeed the nature of the case and the whole tenour of Scripture, as well as other visions in this book, necessarily exclude, yet they too, though reluctantly, shall bow to Christ, and be put under his feet. All the rest, however, rendered and ascribed "blessing and honour, and "glory to him that sat on the throne, and to the Lamb, "for ever and ever," to which the four living creatures joined a cordial Amen. Thus the whole church, by its representatives, fell down and worshipped the eternal God. (Marg. Ref.) What words could more fully and emphatically declare, that Christ is and ought to be worshipped, equally with the Father, by all creatures, to all eternity! Will any one, after reading this, assert, that he is a mere man, or a created Being; or that it is idolatry to worship him? or will such persons profess to believe that this book is the unerring word of God? Can they disprove the divinity of a book, the prophecies of which have already been so remarkably accomplished? or can any man, who opposes the worship of Christ, or the doctrines of his Deity, atonement, and salvation through faith in his blood, suppose that he can ever enter heaven? or, if he could, that he could join in the work and worship of that blessed world, or even endure it?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

How vain and presumptuous must all man's endeavours be to discover future events, beyond the discernment of a sagacious probable conjecture, as such things are sealed up in impenetrable secrecy, and no creature in heaven, earth, or hell, is able, or worthy, to disclose the least tittle of them, except the incarnate Son of God alone! We need not indeed weep, that we cannot foresee the future events respecting ourselves in this world; as the eager expectation and prospect of distant prosperity would unfit us for present duties and conflicts, and the foresight of future calamities would render our most prosperous days distressing. Yet in this distracted evil world we may properly desire to learn, from the promises and prophecies of Scripture, what will be the final event to believers, and to the church, and in both respects the Incarnate Son hath prevailed to procure us all the information that our circumstances need. May we then value, and study to become acquainted with, every part of that revelation, which he hath given us. What apparently contrary excellencies centre in our Redeemer's character! "The Lion "of the tribe of Judah," is also a meek and spotless Lamb, and a bleeding Sacrifice for sin; and whilst as a Lion he protects his people, even as a Lamb he is most formidable to his obstinate enemies. (vi. 16, 17.) The whole universe could never, in any other instance, show such an union of unsearchable riches and deep poverty, of sovereign authority and willing entire subjection, of divine dignity and immense humiliation and condescension, of majesty and meekness, of holiness and love of sinners, of justice and mercy, of desert of honour and happiness, with patient endurance of most complicated sufferings. In these and various other respects, he is altogether worthy of our admiration, confidence, and imitation, as far as it is possible for us to be placed in similar circumstances. Yet our particular concern with him is in the character of a Redeemer. As the Omnipotent and Omniscient Lord of all, he rules every thing by his universal providence, and the energy of his omnipresent Spirit, in subserviency to his great concern of "redeeming us to God with his "blood." His faithful ministers, therefore, through all the earth, whilst they instruct men to worship the Creator and Governor of the world, will also excite them, by their doctrine and example, most humbly to adore the Lamb that was slain, and to present their loudest sweetest songs of praise to him, in and through whom the prayers of the saints ascend as incense before the throne of God. He is worthy to reveal and to direct the dispensations of Providence, yea, he is entitled to universal adoration; and if all the angels of God with one voice proclaim, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive autho- "rity, riches, wisdom, power, honour, glory, and bless- "ing;" and if all holy and accepted creatures in the whole universe give the same blessing, and honour, and glory, "to him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb, "for ever and ever;" surely they, "whom he hath redeem- "ed to God with his blood, out of every kindred and people "of the earth," should cordially say Amen to it! Can we allow those persons to be his ministers and disciples, who refuse that honour to him, which all obedient creatures render him without one discordant voice? If it were possible for true Christians to refuse these adorations to the eternal Son of the Father, even the very stones would cry out in abhorrence of man's ingratitude to him, who stooped so low for their salvation. We cannot err in adoring him, "whom all the angels of God worship." Thus we shall most acceptably glorify him that liveth for ever and ever, and be trained up for the work and joy of heaven, for which no sinner is qualified, who cannot cordially join the new song of the redeemed, and ascribe "salvation, and "glory, and blessing, to him that sitteth on the throne, and "to the Lamb for evermore." Amen.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1, 2. It is generally agreed that this chapter relates to the events which took place from the time of the vision to the establishment of Constantine the Great upon the Imperial throne, as the first Christian emperor, by which the persecutions of Pagan Rome ceased, and Christianity became the established and favoured religion throughout the empire. When the Lord Jesus, as "the Lamb that had been slain," opened the first seal, the apostle's attention was excited by a voice like thunder from one of the four living creatures, who called on him to come and see what passed. This was the voice of him who was like a lion; and the same took place respecting the other living creatures in their order, after the opening of the three next seals, but the meaning of the emblem does not clearly appear. The apostle then beheld with astonishment, a white horse, on which One was mounted, armed with a bow, as for the battle; to him a crown, denoting royal authority, was given, and he went forth conquering all that opposed him, and still preparing to obtain new victories. They who suppose the apostle to have had this vision in the reign of Nero, about A. D. 68, explain this emblem of the victories gained by Vespasian and Titus, among which the taking and destruction of Jerusalem was most considerable. But it is almost incredible that this most important event should be only obscurely hinted at, if it had been then in futurity, and it is far more likely that the apostle wrote this book some time after that event. Others, therefore, explain this discovery of some victories obtained by the emperor Trajan over the surrounding nations; but these events had no immediate connexion with the affairs of the church, and Trajan, who was a persecutor, however celebrated in other respects, was not aptly described by one mounted on a white horse. This emblem rather denotes righteousness and purity; and the mild beneficent victories of Christ, by his word and Holy Spirit, in the conversion of sinners to the obedience of faith, seem to have been thus predicted. After his advancement to his mediatorial throne, he had gone forth as a merciful and pacific conqueror, and had obtained many victories, but both Jews and Gentiles opposed the progress of his Gospel; yet the opening of this seal showed that he would still go on with his conquests, and more widely than ever extend his spiritual dominion. Accordingly, accurate historians are of opinion, that Christianity spread more rapidly and extensively, among the Gentiles, just after this time, than it had before done. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3, 4. The red horse, which appeared at the opening of the second seal, leads our thoughts to wars and conquests of another nature than those before considered. The Lord Jesus, in his righteous providence, seems to be here represented as commissioning, and employing, the executioners of his vengeance on his obstinate enemies. Accordingly, historians record that insurrections, bloody battles, massacres, and devastations of a most extraordinary kind, took place between A. D. 100, and A. D. 138. Five hundred and eighty thousand Jews are computed to have been slaughtered, in different places, during that period, and even a larger number of the Romans and Greeks seem to have been butchered by them, in the most barbarous manner imaginable. So that the two parties of the enemies of Christ and the Gospel seemed to vie with each other, in executing his righteous vengeance on their competitors. Thus the instruments of his indignation were empowered to take peace from the earth, and to set men on to kill one another, and a great sword of war and slaughter was put into their hand. Some make this period to have lasted longer than is above stated, but such difficult questions cannot be particularly discussed, in this compendious view of these comprehensive prophecies.

V. 5, 6. The black horse, which appeared on the opening of the third seal, was a proper emblem of calamity and mourning; and the balances in the hand of the rider denoted, that, in the times referred to, there would be a great scarcity of provisions, so that men would have their food weighed out to them with great exactness, as it is done when any company are reduced to short allowance. (Lev. xxvi. 26. Lam. v. 4. Ez. iv. 10.) The voice also which proclaimed the price of corn has the same meaning, though to an English reader it seems to denote the contrary. For the measure specified, according to the most accurate calculation, held no more than the usual daily allowance for bread to a labouring man, or even to a slave, and the penny, or denarius, (about seven-pence half-penny,) was commonly his day's wages. If then a poor man could only earn enough to buy a sufficient quantity of bread, without any other necessary of life, to what straits must he be reduced, in endeavouring to sustain a family! The barley indeed was stated to have been much cheaper; but then it is much less serviceable for bread, and the poor could not possibly have obtained more than a bare subsistence on the meanest food. Yet the orders given to the emblematical executioner of this sentence, to spare the oil and the wine, may imply, that there should not be a total failure of the fruits of the earth. This seal is supposed by some expositors to have reached from A. D. 138 to 193, though others state it differently. There is, however, no material disagreement between them; and there are accounts in the history of those years of long continued scarcities, through the whole Roman empire, during which all the care of the emperors and their ministers could only just prevent the horrors of entire famine. This was another method, by which Christ fought against the persecutors of his church.

V. 7, 8. The pale horse, which appeared at the opening of the fourth seal, on which death rode as a terrific conqueror, followed by hell, (or the grave and state of departed souls to seize on the dead,) was an apt emblem of the several divine judgments, which are afterwards enumerated, and through which it is said that power was given to death and hell over the fourth part of the earth, or a large proportion of its inhabitants, especially throughout the whole Roman empire. Some expositors make this seal to reach from A. D. 193, to A. D. 270; others include only 50 years of that time under it. However, within the shorter period, there were more than twenty emperors, who for a time ruled with great power, and most of them with great tyranny and cruelty, as long as their dominion endured; there were also above thirty usurpers in different parts of the empire, who supported their claims by war, and perished, with multitudes of their adherents. Amidst such intestine convulsions, and fierce contests within the several provinces of the empire, death on his pale horse must have killed immense numbers with the sword. This universal war and confusion, by taking men off from the cultivation of the earth, and destroying the fruits of it when produced, naturally made way for famine, which grievously prevailed in every place. The scanty, low, and unwholesome diet, occasioned by hunger, or famine, naturally introduced pestilence, which is often called death by the eastern writers; and the most learned men have declared, that so extensive and destructive a pestilence, as that which during this period wasted the empire for fifteen years together, is not met with in universal history. These desolations must also have given opportunity to wild beasts to increase upon the residue of the inhabitants, and accordingly we read, that they were forced to wage war with wolves, lions, and tigers, and that many were devoured by them. (Notes, Ez. v. 17. xiv. 21. xxxiii. 27.)

V. 9—11. On the opening of the fifth seal, the apostle observed "under the altar," (for there is a continual reference to the appearance of the divine glory in the sanctuary, and to the peculiarities of the Jewish worship,) the souls of those persons who had been slain for believing and obeying the word of God, and for the testimony which they had borne to the truth of the Gospel. These appeared as sacrifices, that had newly been offered, to show their fellowship with Christ in his sufferings, and the acceptableness of their faithfulness unto death, through his propitiatory oblation; for it is probable, that the altar of burnt-offering is intended, though some understand it of the golden altar for incense within the sanctuary. They seem to have represented not only those who had suffered martyrdom before the apostle had this vision, but the whole multitude that were slain previous to the prophetical period referred to, beginning about A. D. 270; and with one consent, and a loud voice, they inquired of the Lord, as holy and faithful, How long he would endure the provocations of the persecutors, before he proceeded to judge their cause, and avenge their blood on the inhabitants of the earth, by the subversion of the persecuting power of Pagan Rome? This was the language of their zeal for the honour of God, and their desire for the prevalence of the Gospel. The white robes given to each of them denoted, that they were immediately admitted into a state of felicity, as accepted and holy; but they were required to rest, and wait a short space for the avenging of their blood, as there were many others of their brethren who would suffer death in the same cause, before the purposes of God respecting the destruction of their persecutors were fulfilled. 'Mr. Lowman observes very well, that this 'representation seems much to favour the immediate happiness of departed saints, and hardly to consist with that 'uncomfortable opinion, the insensible state of departed 'souls till after the resurrection.' (Bp. Newton.) This seems to have been a prediction of the terrible persecution of the church under Dioclesian, which reached much further, and was far more bloody, than any of those that had preceded it. The fury of it lasted for ten years, which was called by Christians, The Æra of martyrs; but this seal is supposed by some expositors to relate to the whole time between A. D. 270 and 304. Here also there are immaterial differences of opinion among learned men; and as so many interesting events are hinted at in a few verses, it can scarcely be supposed that, after many centuries, we should be able to determine such matters with exactness; especially as the historians of those times were remarkably inaccurate and confused in their writings.

V. 12—17. The great earthquake, (or concussion, whether of the earth or the heavens,) which followed the opening of the sixth seal, was the emblem of extraordinary revolutions in the civil and religious state of the world, attended with vast commotions of every kind.—The blackness of the sun, and the moon appearing as blood, denote the extinction, with horror and bloodshed, of the most exalted and conspicuous persons, such as the emperors, and their chief ministers: the falling of the stars, was emblematical of the degradation, or death, of illustrious persons in great numbers, such as magistrates and senators. The departure of the heaven, like the rolling up of a parchment to be laid aside, and the removal of the mountains and islands, seem to have represented the total subversion of the Pagan persecuting dominion, by the victories of Constantine, and by his accession to the imperial throne; and the entire and universal change which took place at that time. 'The great lights of the 'heathen world, the powers civil and ecclesiastical, were 'all eclipsed and obscured, the heathen emperors and 'Cesars were slain, the heathen priests and augurs were 'extirpated, the heathen officers and magistrates were 'removed: the heathen temples were demolished, and 'their revenues were appropriated to better uses.' (Bp. Newton.) (Marg. Ref.) Such bold metaphorical descriptions of great revolutions abound in the prophecies of scripture; for these events are emblems and anticipations of the end of the world, and the day of judgment; nor could any revolution be more properly represented by this language, than the entire subversion of the greatest fabric of Pagan idolatry, tyranny, and persecution, that ever existed on earth. This unexpected change would throw all that party into the utmost consternation and despair: and the apostle in his vision saw them all, even the slaves and free-men, as well as the kings, captains, and great or rich men, endeavouring to shelter themselves in dens and caverns, and wishing to be crushed by rocks and mountains; if that might but cover them from the power of God, and from the wrath of the Lamb, whose gospel they had opposed, and whose servants they had persecuted. For the prevalence of Christianity, and the accession of a Christian emperor, would lead them to conclude with desperation, that Jesus was indeed the Lord; that the time was come when he would take full vengeance on his enemies; and that none could resist him, escape from him, or pacify him. The series of prophetic events requires us to interpret this seal, of the victories and accession of Constantine, &c: when the Christian church gained a complete triumph over the persecuting power of Rome Pagan: but the passage may profitably be accommodated to the day of judgment. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The ministers of the gospel ought to call men's attention to the prophecies of scripture, and the providential works of God as accomplishing them. The victories of our exalted Redeemer, by the preaching of the gospel, in bringing the nations to the obedience of faith, have been and will be progressive, till his cause be universally triumphant: we should, therefore, rejoice to be in any way instrumental in promoting these beneficent conquests: and our prayers, that "he may still go forth, conquering and "to conquer," should continually be presented before the throne of grace. But he fights in another manner against the despisers of his salvation and the opposers of his glory: he can raise up and employ sanguinary potentates, or insurgents, to execute his vengeance on his enemies; and when he gives them power, and leaves them to their own hearts' lusts, they soon excite multitudes to kill one another by the force of the sword. He can also withhold the influences of the heavens, and restrain the earth from yielding its increase; and so visit the nations with distressing scarcity, or destructive famine: and death, when commissioned by him, marches forth on his pale horse, and pestilences sweep away millions; till at length the beasts of the earth seem to acquire the dominion of the desolated lands, and add to the miseries of the few remaining inhabitants. How mad must it then be for the potsherds of the earth to contend against his iron rod!—But let us be thankful for our exemption from these dire calamities, and for our peace, liberty, plenty, and manifold advantages; and let the rich be reminded, even in times of comparative scarcity, to give more liberally to the relief of their poor neighbours. In these temporal judgments, the Lord in wrath remembers mercy. His people also partake of many of the calamities, in addition to the persecutions which they often endure.

V. 9—17.

Vast multitudes have already been slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they constantly held to the truth; and many more will probably be thus killed, before his purposes shall be accomplished. But the Lord himself is the Comforter of his afflicted servants; precious is their blood in his sight; and their patience unto death in his cause, is a sacrifice most honourable, and therefore most acceptable, to him, through Jesus Christ. Their enemies can only kill the body: then the Lord delivereth them out of all their troubles; white robes of joy and triumph are given to every one of them; they enter into immediate rest; and after a short season, "the earth shall "disclose their blood," and the vengeance that is written will be executed on all their impenitent persecutors, by the holy and faithful Lord of all. He hath gained many signal victories over the most powerful enemies of his church; and vast revolutions and convulsions in empires have been effected, in order to the establishment of Christianity, in defiance of opposing princes and nations: yet hitherto the commanders in this contest have rallied their scattered troops, and returned to the desperate charge. But he will shortly gain a more decided, universal, and durable victory, than any which he hath yet obtained; and with more terrible destruction to the armies of the aliens. And if, on such occasions, the most powerful kings, and valiant captains, and all other opposers of his power, are so dismayed, as to hide themselves in dens and caverns: what will the terror of the wicked be at the day of judgment, when the sun and moon shall literally be turned into darkness; when the heavens and earth shall become one common conflagration, till they pass away, and no place is found for them; and when the great day of the wrath of the Lamb will indeed be come, and none of his enemies will be able to abide it! In vain will they then "call to "the rocks and mountains to hide them from Him, that "sitteth upon the throne, and from the wrath of the "Lamb;" from which none will be preserved, except that despised company, who have here believed, loved, and obeyed him. "Heaven and earth shall pass away, "but his words shall not pass away." "Be wise now, "therefore, O ye kings, be instructed, ye judges of the "earth; serve the LORD with fear, and rejoice with "trembling. Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye "perish." (Notes, Ps. ii.) And may all, who look for such things, "be diligent, that they may be found of him, "in peace, without spot, and blameless." (2 Pet. iii. 7. —14.)

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—3. This chapter is a continuation of the sixth seal. (viii. 1.) The four angels, standing on the four corners of the earth, represent the instruments of Providence throughout the nations, in all parts of the earth: and their restraining the winds, that no destructive tempests might be excited by land or sea, is supposed to be an emblem of the tranquillity of the Roman empire, and of all nations subsequent to Constantine's accession to the imperial throne; which was the more delightful, as it succeeded such long-continued and terrible convulsions and desolations. At the same time, "another "Angel came up from the east." This seems to have been an emblem of Christ; for who else could have "the "seal of the living God," even the Holy Spirit, by which his people are "sealed unto the day of redemp"tion?" By his gospel he came from the eastern nations, where his religion was first published; (as the rising sun proceeds from east to west;) and he diffused that heavenly light to the western, or European, provinces of the empire; and accompanied it by his new-creating Spirit; and thus sealed numbers as the servants of God. This great "Angel of the covenant," as one having sovereign authority, called to the other angels, to whom a commission had been given, to bring calamities on mankind by land and sea; ordering them not to execute it, till he and his ministers, as the instruments of his grace, had sealed the servants of God in the forehead; that they might be evidently distinguished from others, and so be preserved during the approaching calamities. This signified, that great numbers would be baptized, and profess themselves disciples of Christ, during the happy tranquillity, which followed Constantine's accession; and that very many would be really converted, and manifest the image of God by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit. The gospel was very extensively preached during this period, and immense multitudes embraced Christianity. The favour indeed, shown to the converts to Christianity, in an indiscri minate and injudicious manner, induced many from secular motives to become Christians, and thus tended greatly to fill the church with hypocrites, which introduced a worldly spirit, and at length caused manifold evils; yet this prophecy fully proves, that real religion was at first greatly promoted by the advancement of a Christian emperor, and that it obtained an establishment in many places, which before had little regarded it.—‘I saw another Angel, even the great Angel of the covenant, Christ Jesus, ascending up from the eastern coast, where Jerusalem stood, who, by virtue of his Mediatorship, had in his hand that Seal, or mark of the living God, which in his eternal decree is set upon his elect, whereby they are sealed both to salvation in the end, and to a gracious protection till then, who did, by the mighty voice of his word, command these four angels,—saying, Hold your bands, &c.’ (Bp. Hall.) (Notes, 2 Cor. i. 20—22. Eph. i. 13, 14. iv. 30.)

V. 4—8. This account of the numbers sealed from twelve tribes cannot be understood in a literal sense; for if we explain it exclusively of Jewish converts, it can hardly be supposed that the same number of each tribe were sealed. But Israel was the ancient church of God, which after a time was incorporated as a nation; and the Christian church, which succeeded to it, had, after a long time supplanted both the Mosaic dispensation, and the idolatry of Pagan Rome, and acquired an establishment upon the ruins of them. As, therefore, the tribes of Israel were numbered after they were formed into a nation, so the numbers added to the church, in consequence of this establishment, were figuratively declared to be one hundred and forty-four thousand, or twelve times twelve thousand, a large definite number being put for an indefinite: and this being divided into twelve parts, one of them was assigned to each of the tribes of Israel; intimating that these persons succeeded to their privileges and occupied their place; for I apprehend that the Gentile as well as the Jewish converts were intended. (Note, 9—12.)—The tribes are here arranged differently than elsewhere; Judah is placed first, in honour of Christ who sprang from him; Dan is wholly omitted, perhaps because idolatry was first publicly established by that tribe. (Notes, Judg. xviii.) Others, however, think, that the tribe of Dan had long before become nearly extinct; and, indeed, it is not mentioned in the genealogies contained in the first of Chronicles. Levi is numbered with the rest, and Joseph is placed instead of Ephraim, whilst Manasseh is likewise continued. The order of primogeniture is neglected; nor is any regard shown to the children of the free-women above those of the bond-women, as both are alike in Christ.

V. 9—12. Many expositors have supposed that the preceding verses relate exclusively to the Jewish converts, at this time added to the church, and that these refer to the Gentiles who then embraced the Gospel; and others explain them of the peace and prosperity of the church during those days. But it appears to me far more probable that the happy estate of those, who had adhered to Christ during the preceding calamities, and had been faithful unto death, was intended; for though they had been slain, or had otherwise been removed, before the favourable change took place, yet they were no losers, but the contrary. A multitude, so large that no man could number them, collected from the several nations of the earth known in those days, appeared to stand before the throne, as accepted worshippers of God, and “before the “Lamb,” as his redeemed people. This view and interpretation gives us enlarged conceptions of the success of the Gospel during the three first centuries, and may encourage the hope, that vast numbers lived by obedient faith, and died in Christ, unknown to history; notwithstanding the lamentable account given us of the heresies, contentions and abuses, which prevailed at that early period.—Every one of this company was clothed with white robes, as perfectly justified, sanctified, and made happy in heaven. They had also been engaged in war; as victors they carried the well known emblem of palm-branches; and having obtained complete salvation, in respect of their souls, they ascribed it in no degree to themselves, or to their own wisdom, strength. labours, services, sufferings, or martyrdom; but gave the whole glory of it to their God and Father, who was seated on the throne, as being the effect of his special love and grace; "and unto the Lamb," as it was bestowed on them through his atonement and mediation. Whilst these redeemed sinners stood next to the throne, and led the worship of heaven, in virtue of their union with, and relation to, the incarnate Son of God, the angels, (free from the least emotion of envy, and rejoicing in their exaltation, and the glory of God in it,) stood without the circle made by the emblematical representatives of the church and its ministers, and in prostrate adoration added their cordial Amen to the praises rendered to God and the Lamb. They then showed their delight in that solemn and rapturous worship, by ascribing blessing and glory to their God and Portion, as the Fountain of all excellency and felicity, celebrating his manifold wisdom in these surprising events, joining their thanksgivings to those of redeemed sinners, rendering him the honour of all his wonderful works, and rejoicing that power and might belonged to him for ever and ever. This, being connected with their consent to the praises rendered to God and the Lamb, clearly intimated that "they honoured "the Son, even as they honoured the eternal Father."

V. 13—17. The scene, thus presented to the apostle's mind, related to events which did not occur till above two hundred years afterwards, namely in the time of Constantine: as he was, therefore, receiving prophetical information, one of the representatives of the universal church inquired of him, whether he knew who they were, thus arrayed in white robes, or whence they came. And the apostle having respectfully replied, that he was persuaded the elder well knew, thus intimating his desire of instruction, he was shown, that "they were persons "who had come out of great tribulation."—This could not be meant of the Gentiles, converted to Christianity after the accession of Constantine, for the church then enjoyed great peace; and though it might be accommodated to the state of the church at large in those peaceful days, which had succeeded to a season of extreme tribulation, yet it far more aptly and emphatically represented the case of those multitudes, who had been faithful unto death, amidst the harassing persecutions of the foregoing ages. They had not made their robes white by their own services or sufferings, nor had they been originally white; but they had washed them from the guilt aud pollution, which had contaminated them, in the blood of the Lamb, by faith in his atoning Sacrifice and prevailing intercession, and by trusting in his name for the mercy and grace, which he died to procure for sinners. Therefore they had found acceptance with God and admission into heaven, and stood before the throne, where, with unceasing, yea, augmented pleasure, they served and worshipped God day and night, whilst he graciously dwelt among them as their Father and Friend, overshadowing them with his presence, and filling them with ineffable and rapturous joy. Thus, by his love, and the displays of his glory, all their thirstings after him and holiness were fully satisfied, nor were they troubled with one desire of any other or greater happiness than they securely enjoyed. Neither were they exposed to any affliction, temptation, fear, or persecution, (like the heat of the noon-day sun,) as all these were finally passed away. For the Lamb, who redeemed them to God with his blood, and who, in consequence of his victory, was seated with his Father upon his throne, employed all his power and authority in satisfying and anticipating all their wants, and conducting them to the inexhaustible Fountain-head of unalloyed felicity, whilst the eternal Father, as delighting over them to do them good, wiped away all their tears from their eyes, and turned their former sorrows into the fulness of eternal joy. Nothing on earth can answer to such language as this, and indeed the prosperity of the church at that time very soon terminated as a dream, and cannot be reasonably considered as exclusively, or primarily, intended by this most energetic and rapturous language. But such a view of the immediate felicity of those who followed Christ faithfully in the predicted season of persecution, was very proper to reconcile the minds of Christians to their trials, and to animate them to face death in its most terrifying forms. Accordingly, the church, during these times, seems to have studied this book more, and even to have understood this first part of it far better, than Christians in succeeding generations have done.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The intervals of peace on earth are caused by a positive divine interposition, to restrain the furious passions of men, and the agency of Satan, which at all other times naturally tend to confusion, discord, mischief, and misery. When the Lord Jesus sees good to grant his church seasons of rest, and to raise up men, endued with authority, to countenance and concur in promoting the Gospel, he commonly seals many by his converting grace unto the day of redemption, though human depravity and the artifices of Satan often pervert such prosperous days into an occasion of negligence and hypocritical profession, and this makes way for his ministering angels, being commissioned to bring calamities upon the earth. Nothing, however, can finally hurt those, who are sealed by the Spirit; nor let it be deemed futile to observe, that this seal must be on the forehead, visible both to friends and foes, but not to the believer himself, except as he looks steadfastly in the glass of God's word. (Notes, &c. Ez. ix.) It is encouraging to those, who are decidedly on the Lord's part in this evil world, to hear of the increase of the true Israel of God, and they will pray him to add to their numbers a hundred fold more, how many soever they be; and, though they be not spared to witness this blessed change, they must exult to recollect what multitudes are gone before them to heaven, and what accessions are daily making to them from all the nations of the earth.

V. 9—17.

The few believers, who are scattered abroad in this world, seem a solitary and singular remnant, and as such are generally despised; yet have they innumerable friends and coadjutors, with whom they will shortly, and for ever, be united. The whole multitude, who now stand before the throne of God, (with all that ever shall be saved,) were once dead in sin, and exposed to wrath; but they were taught their guilt and danger, and led to trust in the Lamb of God; thus they began to fight the good fight of faith, against Satan, the world, and sin, amidst many fears, sorrows, and temptations; at length they obtained the garments of joy, and the palm of victory; and now they ascribe their salvation to God, and to the Lamb, whilst adoring angels delight to swell the chorus of their joyful thanksgivings. Could we ascend into heaven, and inquire who they were that are arrayed in white robes, and whence they came, amidst ten thousand differences in other matters, we should learn that every one of them had come out of sorrow, and out of sin, that they had all been in conflict and tribulation, and that they had all "washed their robes, and made them white in the blood "of the Lamb." Not one discordant voice will be heard in heaven for ever, nor could those, who expect salvation in any other way, join the praises of that blessed world, or even say Amen to them. As all the redeemed owe their felicity wholly to the sovereign mercy of the Father, through the atonement of the Son, and by the sealing and new creation of the Holy Spirit; so the work and worship of God their Saviour is their element, and his presence and favour complete their felicity, nor can they conceive of any other joy. Let us then inquire whether we have, in our judgment, experience, and affections, "the meetness "for this inheritance of the saints in light." All who are admitted to the marriage-supper of the Lamb, previously seek and obtain the wedding-garment; none will ever join this company before the throne, who have not on earth learned to lisp their song, and to anticipate their felicity. If this be our privilege, let us bless God for his mercy, and patiently endure our season and measure of tribulation, expecting shortly "to hunger no more, and "thirst no more;" to have no more sin, temptation, or sorrow; to be with our beloved Saviour, enjoying the fulness of his love, drinking ineffable delights from the living fountains of waters, to which he will lead us, and to have all tears for ever wiped from our eyes. "I have waited for "thy salvation, O LORD."

7 The first angel sounded, and there followed [q] hail and fire mingled with blood, and they were [r] cast upon the earth: and [s] the third part of trees were burnt up, and all green grass was burnt up.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—6. The last of the seven seals contains under it far more than all the others, as it introduces, and seems indeed to include, that period which fell under the seven trumpets. When it was opened, there was silence in heaven for about half an hour, which either intimated that the peace of the church and the empire would be of a very short continuance, or it was expressive of the solemn expectation excited on this occasion. During this interval, the apostle saw "the seven "angels who stood before God," having been appointed to this service, and of whom we shall read more afterwards; and to each of them was given a trumpet, that they might in succession sound an alarm to the nations. (Marg. Ref.) At the same time another Angel appeared as a Priest standing before the altar of incense. The appearance of a Lamb, was emblematical of Christ "our "Passover, sacrificed for us," and this Angel represented him in his priestly character, offering up the prayers of all his saints before God, accompanied by his all-prevailing intercession. This being done, the Angel filled the censer with fire from the altar. There was no fire on the golden altar except that in the censer, which was taken from the altar of burnt-offering; the fire, here spoken of, must have come from thence. This the Angel cast on the earth, which occasioned voices, thunderings, and lightnings; this denoted, that the approaching calamities would be the effect of God's displeasure with men, for their opposition to the Gospel of his Son, and their injurious and cruel treatment of his people, and so in fact be inflicted as an answer to their prayers for deliverance, through the intercession of Christ. After this, the seven angels prepared to sound their trumpets. 'The great 'Angel of the covenant came and stood, as the High 'Priest of his church, before the altar of heaven, and 'many holy and effectual prayers were offered unto him, 'that he might by his merciful mediation present them to 'God the Father.' (Bp. Hall.) 'The placing of this 'circumstance immediately before the sounding of the 'trumpets suggests, that the subject of these prayers was 'the occasion of something to be called for by these trumpets, and what could this be, but that of the destruction 'of the Roman Empire? It is plainly suggested, that 'the petition for some delay would be accepted; yet all 'further applications on that head are discouraged by a 'most significant emblem, the censer being cast away.' (Whitaker.)

V. 7. The emblematical predictions following the four first trumpets principally related to the gradual and complete subversion of the Roman empire, in the western part of the world, though this was connected with multiplied calamities in the eastern provinces, which are also implied. Constantine the Great built Constantinople, and made it his residence and the metropolis of the empire, and, by a concurrence of circumstances, some time after his death, that vast fabric was divided into two parts, governed by two distinct successions of emperors. But though the western and eastern empires were thus separated, yet they were not wholly unconnected; so that the ruin of the western empire was attended by great convulsions in the eastern, and the subsequent subversion of the latter occasioned manifold evils in the countries which had constituted the former. As therefore the events, that related to the two divisions of the empire, were thus involved with one another, it was proper that the predictions of them should be so likewise; yet the residue of the chapter primarily predicts the subversion of the western, and the next chapter that of the eastern empire. The calm which followed Constantine's accession to the throne did not last long; even the latter part of his life was far from being undisturbed, and after his death many bloody wars were waged within the empire, by his sons, and other competitors for the imperial authority; whilst the church was disturbed by various descriptions of heretics, and unnatural persecutions were raised by men who called themselves Christians. These and other evils weakened both the church and the state, and, after a time, the Huns and Goths from the northern regions of Europe broke in upon the distracted empire, and made terrible ravages in many of its provinces. The latter events seem to have been intended by the storm, "of hail and fire mingled "with blood," by which a third part of the productions of the earth were destroyed, that is, multitudes were killed, both high and low, grown persons and infants, through the whole Roman empire, which might be deemed a third part of the earth, as discovered at that time. (Ex. ix. 22—35.) This period is supposed by some approved expositors to reach from A. D. 338 to 412; but others explain it principally of the incursions of the Goths under Alaric, who entered the empire, A. D. 395, and after spreading desolation by fire and sword through the provinces, A. D. 410, he took and plundered Rome, with circumstances of barbarity very correspondent to these emblems, as contemporary writers have testified; especially in that he slew, without distinction, princes, nobles, priests, and people, and showed no mercy even to the tender infants, thus destroying "the trees and the green "grass together." 'The first four trumpets describe the 'removal of that power, which, in the days of Paul, 'prevented the developement of "the man of sin;" 'namely, the western imperial dignity of Rome. On the 'decease of Theodosius, that great prince, A. D. 395, 'the northern cloud, which had been so long gathering, 'discharged itself. He died in the month of January; 'and before the end of the same year the Gothic nation 'was in arms. The barriers of the Danube were thrown 'open, the savage warriors of Scythia issued from their 'forests, and the uncommon severity of the winter, (the 'season in which natural hail and snow are generated,) 'allowed the poet to remark, that they rolled their ponderous waggons over the broad and icy back of the indignant river. The fertile fields of Phocis and Beotia were 'covered with a deluge of barbarians, who massacred the 'males of an age to bear arms, and drove away the bear-

'tiful females, with the spoil and cattle of the flaming 'villages.'—'I have adopted the language of the historian. Unconscious that he was bearing his testimony 'to the truth of prophecy, he has used the same allegorical language as that employed by St. John. The correspondence of nations,' says he, 'was in that age so 'imperfect and precarious, that the revolutions of the 'north might escape the knowledge of the court of Ravenna, till the dark cloud, which was collected along 'the coasts of the Baltic, burst in thunder upon the 'banks of the upper Danube.' (Faber, and Gibbon in Faber.)—The nature of this publication must exclude most of the quotations which might be made from Gibbon, the elegant and infidel historian of these times; but he has certainly, without intending it, shown the exact completion of these prophecies in many instances. Different opinions also prevail, as to the duration of the events, predicted by the sounding of the first trumpet, but it cannot be expected that these topics, which, after all, very slightly affect the main subject, should be here particularly noticed. Some think that all the calamities brought on the empire by the northern invaders, and especially those of Attila, mentioned in the ensuing note, were intended by the general language of this verse, though other eminent expositors place a part of them under the second trumpet.

V. 8, 9. A great burning mountain is an emblem of a mighty destructive warrior, and has been so used by the most celebrated poets. The Roman empire, with its multitude of people and nations, might be aptly compared to the sea. (xvii. 15.) This great burning mountain, therefore, being cast into the sea, with the effects produced by it, represented most emphatically the irruption of the barbarous nations, under ferocious leaders, into the Roman empire, and their shedding the blood of immense multitudes, and destroying the cities, or desolating the country with fire and sword. After Alaric, with his Goths, had finished his depredation, Attila, at the head of a vast army of Huns, ravaged the empire during the space of fourteen years, massacreing, plundering, and destroying all before him, in the most barbarous manner that can be conceived. He even called himself "the scourge of God, and the "terror of mankind," and perhaps no man ever better merited that title. He was indeed a burning mountain cast into the sea, and turning it into blood; for he drenched the countries with the blood of the inhabitants, and destroyed every thing that came in his way, nor did any part of the empire wholly escape his fury. These events seem to have been principally intended, but we may include under this trumpet the various calamities, which befel the empire from A. D. 412 to 450. If these devastations under Attila from the north belong to the first trumpet, those under Genserick, king of the Vandals, from Africa to the south, must be here intended. (Note, 10, 11.)—But, whether Attila or Genserick were meant, it is manifest, that the third part of the sea turned into blood is the emblem of the Roman empire, supposed to contain a third part of the world, and the burning mountain must consequently mean the conqueror who produced these effects, and not the conquered; else there are two emblems in the same verse of the latter, and none of the former.

V. 10, 11. The great star falling from heaven is explained by some expositors of the Arian and Pelagian heresies, and the contests and persecutions connected with them. No doubt such events might very aptly be represented by the falling of a star, and its embittering and poisoning the waters, to the destruction of those who drank of them; and the church was doubtless miserably corrupted, and deformed by heresy, during that period. Yet the series of the prophecy favours the interpretation of those, who explain it of the continuation of those calamities which subverted the empire. An eminent prince suddenly appearing in the heart of the empire, and conspicuous even in the mischiefs which he occasioned, might be aptly represented by a star, or luminous meteor, shooting from heaven, and burning as a lamp. The name Wormwood, and the effect of its falling upon the waters, denoted the further desolations of the empire, and the ruin of the remaining comforts which were left to the relics of the miserable inhabitants, who were so harassed and afflicted, that they could not seek for the necessary support of life, without exposing themselves to the fury of the invaders. Thus the embittering and poisoning of the rivers and fountains completed the former judgment of turning the sea into blood. Accordingly, very soon after Attila's retreat, Genserick unexpectedly invaded the empire with three hundred thousand Vandals and Moors from Africa, besieged and took Rome, and abandoned that city to the cruelty and avarice of his troops; and by this success he so weakened the empire, that it was soon after subverted; and as this assault was made at the very source of its power and prosperity, it might on this account also be represented as poisoning the rivers and fountains of waters. He was also a bigoted Arian, and a cruel persecutor of the orthodox Christians, and in this sense too he poisoned the fountains. These events occurred between A. D. 450 and 456.

13 And I beheld, and heard an angel [g] flying through the midst of heaven, saying, with a loud voice, [h] Woe, woe, woe, to the inhabiters of the earth, by reason of the other voices of the trumpet of the three angels, which are yet to sound!

V. 12. Under the fourth trumpet, the sun, moon, and stars, or the great luminaries of the Roman empire, were eclipsed and darkened; for the third part, though spoken of the luminaries, or the time of their shining, seems still to refer to the extent of the empire, as containing one third of the then known world. Whilst the splendour of the eastern empire was greatly tarnished, and it shone but with a feeble and almost expiring light, that of the western was gradually extinguished. 'Genserick left it 'in a weak and desperate condition; it struggled hard, 'and, as it were, gasped for breath during eight short and 'turbulent reigns, for the space of twenty years, till at 'length it expired, A. D. 476, under Momyllus, who 'was in derision called Augustulus, or the diminutive 'Augustus.' (Bp. Newton.) Still, however, though the Roman sun was extinguished, its subordinate luminaries faintly shone whilst the senate and consuls continued. But after some other changes, A. D. 566, the whole form of the ancient government was subverted, and Rome itself was reduced, from being the empress of the world, to be a poor dukedom, tributary to the Exarch of Ravenna.—The events of above two hundred years are here predicted in six verses, events peculiarly important in themselves, and in their consequences, yet recorded by historians in the most disorderly and intricate manner. However, therefore, it may suit the design of those, who confine their labour to this one part of scripture, to enter into particulars, or to argue in behalf of this, or against that, interpretation, it cannot fall in with the design of a practical exposition of the whole word of God. The author observes, with satisfaction, that the interpreters agree in the grand outline; and even the testimony of infidels, when writing the history of these times, demonstrates the exact accomplishment of the prophecy.—'I have now accom-'plished the laborious narrative of the decline and fall of 'the Roman empire, from the fortunate age of Trajan 'and the Antonines, to its utter extinction in the west, 'about five centuries after the Christian era. At that 'unhappy period, the Saxons fiercely struggled with the 'natives for the possession of Britain; Gaul and Spain 'were divided between the powerful monarchies of the 'Franks and the Visigoths, and the dependent kingdoms 'of the Suevi and Burgundians; Africa was exposed to 'the cruel persecution of the Vandals, and to the savage 'insults of the Moors; Rome and Italy, as far as the 'banks of the Danube, were afflicted by an army of 'barbarian mercenaries, whose lawless tyranny was suc-'ceeded by the reign of Theodorick the Ostrogoth. All 'the subjects of the empire, who, by the use of the Latin 'language more particularly deserved the name and pri-'vileges of Romans, were oppressed by the disgrace and 'calamities of foreign conquest, and the victorious nations 'of Germany established a new system of manners and 'government in the western countries of Europe.' (Gibbon.)—Can there now be the shadow of a doubt concerning the exact accomplishment of these compendious prophecies, some hundreds of years after they were written? And who can then hesitate to say, that St. John wrote by the inspiration of that God, who sees the end from the beginning?

V. 13. This angel flying through the midst of heaven, to denounce a threefold wo on the inhabitants of the earth, under the three remaining trumpets, was an emblem intended to excite the greater attention, and to intimate that evils still greater, more extensive, and durable, would come on mankind in the subsequent ages, the events of which were about to be predicted.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The intervals of peace which the church hath hitherto enjoyed, have commonly been of short continuance, Amidst the confusion occasioned by the vices of mankind, we should rejoice that "the LORD reigneth," and that the prayers of all true believers, being presented through the meritorious intercession of our great High Priest, will surely be accepted and answered. All created angels are ministering spirits, for the benefit of the heirs of salvation, even when they are employed to visit nations with terrible calamities; nay, the fire from the altar, being cast on the earth, (the vengeance inflicted for men's contempt of the sacrifice and salvation of Christ, and the injuries done to his people,) causes the most terrible desolations that are made on earth. Whilst the present wrath of God and of the Lamb, through those executioners of vengeance who mean not so, fills countries with misery, destroys the wretched inhabitants, and embitters and poisons all the comforts of life, till the greatest prosperity be totally darkened and extinguished; the messengers of the Lord are ordered to proclaim aloud in all the world, that still more dreadful woes are in reserve for the impenitent workers of iniquity, for what are all temporal evils, compared with the destruction of body and soul in hell? Let sinners then take warning to flee from the wrath to come; let believers learn to value, and be thankful for, their privileges, and let them "patiently continue in well-"doing," and so "look for the mercy of our Lord Jesus "Christ unto eternal life."

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1, 2. There can scarcely remain a reasonable doubt in the mind of an attentive inquirer, who has competent information on the subject, but that these verses predict the rise and progress of Mahommed and his successors, as ruling over the Arabians or Saracens. Early in the seventh century, (about A. D. 606, or 608,) Mahommed began to pretend to a very extraordinary intercourse with God, declaring that he had been in heaven, and there had learned a religion which he was to propagate in the world, being an improvement of Christianity as at first delivered, and a reformation of it from subsequent corruptions. These pretences were here described by "a "star falling from the heaven to the earth," especially as he shone with a very conspicuous, though pestiferous light. A key given to him to "open the bottomless pit," or the abyss of hell, was a very suitable emblem of the power and influence which God was pleased to permit him to acquire, for the propagation of his satanical delusions, as if hell itself had been opened by him, and its destructive exhalations allowed to obscure the sun and infect the air. For this most artful, politic, and prosperous impostor gradually acquired such ascendency among the Arabians, or Saracens, to whom he belonged, that they not only received his religious system, but enlisted under his banner as their captain and ruler, and he led them forth to conquest, that they might by this method compel the nations to receive his doctrine. In this enterprise he and his successors were so prosperous, that the light of Christianity was obscured, and many nations, where once it had shone in the clearest manner, were almost totally darkened, and infected with this smoke from the abyss. Mahommed had never been a star, as that emblem marks out the ministers of Christianity, and he emerged from obscurity, acquired eminence and celebrity, and never declined from it. It has therefore been reasonably questioned, whether he could properly be denoted under the emblem of "a falling star," or rather, according to the original, "a star which had fallen, from heaven unto the "earth." An apostate Nestorian monk, called Sergius, or Baheira, has therefore been considered as this star, because he assisted Mahommed in forging his imposture, and was in many ways subservient to his designs. Thus he is supposed to have opened the abyss, and let forth the locusts and their king. (2. 11.) But it may be doubted, whether so important a part, according to the general style and manner of prophecy, would be assigned to so comparatively obscure an individual, whose name few, except those who have particularly studied Mahommed's history, have so much as heard of. If the falling star then means some agent distinct from Mahommed, who was his forerunner, (as I conceive it does,) I should fix upon the western corrupter of Christianity, whose mystery of wickedness had been long working, but burst forth almost at the same time with the imposture of Mahommed. The worship of images, saints, and angels, prayers for the dead, and many other of the corruptions of popery, had, at this time, made very great progress in Christendom. These corruptions, of which the bishop and church of Rome were the source, centre, or principal support, evidently prepared the way for Mahommed, in connexion with the wickedness of the professors and ministers of Christianity, and furnished him with his most plausible pretexts, and so the "fallen star," the western Antichrist, (if that name may, for brevity's sake, be used,) opened the door for Mahommed and his imposture, that is, for the eastern Antichrist. It appears clearly that not an individual, no not Mahommed, as considered apart from the Caliphs his successors, is meant either by the fallen star, or the angel of the abyss, but a succession of men, or associated bodies of men, carrying on from generation to generation the same design. And, as the corrupters of Christianity made way for the imposture of Mahommed, and the apostacy which it occasioned, who can more properly be designated by "the star fallen from heaven to earth," and "opening the abyss," than they? (See Faber, Vol. ii. 29—33.)

V. 3—5. Out of this smoke above-mentioned, came locusts; that is, vast armies of Saracens were raised, by means of Mahommed's imposture, to spread desolations through the nations. They resembled locusts in their numbers, and they came from the same regions whence the largest swarms of these destructive insects have in all ages arisen. Locusts are said to be bred in pits and caverns, and these proceeded from the smoke that came out of the bottomless pit. Yet at the same time they also resembled scorpions, whose sting gives extreme pain, and often proves mortal; and, whilst locusts destroy the fruits of the earth, yet do not hurt the bodies of men; these mystical locusts were commanded not to hurt the grass, or other vegetable productions, but only those men, who had not the seal of God upon their foreheads: and it is remarkable, that the Saracen armies were expressly laid under a similar injunction. 'When Yezed was marching with 'his army to invade Syria, Abubeker charged him with 'this, among other orders, Destroy no palm-trees, nor 'burn any fields of corn; cut down no fruit-trees, nor 'do any mischief to cattle, only such as you kill to eat.' (Bp. Newton.) Corrupt and hypocritical professors of Christianity were meant by "those men who had not the "seal of God in their foreheads;" which fully proves, that something distinct from outward baptism, and exclusively belonging to true Christians, is denoted by that emblem. (Note, vii. 1—3.) Now it is well known, that the Saracens extended their conquests principally in those countries where the worship of angels, and other corruptions of Christianity prevailed; whilst the places where religion was preserved more pure, were sheltered from their fury: and no doubt God permitted the scourge to come on the nations where his Gospel was perverted, for their correction or punishment. It was also predicted, that they would be restrained from killing those whom they were commissioned to torment; yet, no doubt, immense multitudes were slain by such cruel victors: this, therefore, evidently means that they would be empowered durably to ravage, harass, and disturb the nations, and the church; but not utterly to destroy them. 'They might kill them 'as individuals; but still they should not kill them as a 'political body, as a state, or empire.' (Bp. Newton.) Accordingly, they miserably desolated and oppressed both the Greek and Latin churches, but they could not totally extirpate them; they repeatedly besieged Constantinople, but were always repulsed; they even plundered Rome, but they could not make themselves masters of it; they took from the eastern empire many of its richest provinces, but they could not utterly subvert it. Moreover, it was predicted that they should distress and torment mankind during five months; according to the term of life which naturalists assign to locusts. (10.) These months of thirty days, each day denoting a year, amount to one hundred and fifty years: and Mohammed first opened the abyss, and began publicly to propagate his imposture, A. D. 612; and A. D. 762, (just one hundred and fifty years afterwards,) the city of Bagdad was builded, the Saracens ceased from their ravages and became a settled people, they made no more rapid conquests, and obtained no further accession to their power, which thenceforth began to decline. They then ceased to be locusts; though this wo trumpet continued much longer, as will presently be seen. These invaders speedily conquered Palestine, Syria, Armenia, almost all Asia-Minor, Persia, India, Egypt, Numidia, Barbary, Spain, Portugal, part of Italy, and the principal Islands in the Mediterranean Sea.

V. 6. It was also foretold, that these tremendous conquerors would cause such extreme calamities and miseries to the inhabitants of the countries which they ravaged, by giving the utmost license to the cruelty, rapacity, and lust of the soldiers, that death must appear to numbers more desirable than life; and they would have been more merciful, if they had dispatched the wretched victims of their unbridled passions, than by constraining them to drag on an unwilling life, and so prolonging those miseries which they ardently wished for death to terminate.

V. 7—10. The shape of these figurative locusts was next described; they resembled horses, as locusts do, especially in their heads: now the Arabians were remarkable for their skill in horsemanship, and their chief force lay in cavalry. (Note, Joel ii. 4—6.) The "crowns on their "heads like gold," may denote the turbans which the Arabians have always worn, or it may refer to the many kingdoms which they subjected to their dominion. They had beards on their faces, like men, but they wore their hair like women, plaited, or flowing down their backs, and the Arabians are known to have done this. The teeth, as of lions, which are ascribed to them, represented their strength and fury to destroy; whilst their breast-plates of iron showed their care to protect themselves by defensive armour, that is, by the most effectual public measures. The sound of their wings prefigured the fury with which they assaulted their enemies, and the rapidity of their conquests. But though they devoured and caused desolations, like locusts, yet the principal mischief which they did was effected by their tails, in which they had stings like those of scorpions; for wherever they extended their conquests, they left behind them the poison of their abominable religion, so that the consequences of their victories were more mischievous than the slaughter made by them.

signify their Caliphs in succession, who were the chief priests of their religion, the commanders of their armies, and their emperors. The name of this king, even "the "destroyer," (for so the word means in both languages,) was peculiarly suitable to a succession of rulers, who murdered both the bodies and souls of men by the same malignant expeditions, as they seemed to be Satan, the first murderer's, vicegerents and visible representatives upon earth. Every circumstance of this emblematical prediction so exactly accords to the Saracens, and so little suits the church or hierarchy of Rome, or any of their religious orders, (who gained their advantage by priestcraft, not by arms,) that there can be no propriety in attempting to explain it of them, especially as they are described with sufficient precision in what follows. Prophecies have a determinate meaning, and by giving loose to a lively imagination, to find distant resemblances, we are more likely to perplex, than to satisfy the inquirer.

V. 12. After the apostle had seen these things, he was informed, that one wo was past, and two others were coming. 'This is added, not only to distinguish the woes, 'and to mark more strongly each period, but also to 'suggest, that some time will elapse, between this first 'wo of the Arabian locusts, and the next of the Euphratean 'horsemen.' (Bp. Newton.)

V. 13—15. The voice of the angel from the horns of the altar, on which incense used to be burned, strongly indicated, that the judgments about to be predicted, were appointed to punish men for corrupting the Gospel, and so turning it into the savour of death and condemnation.—After the sixth angel had sounded his trumpet, he was ordered to loose the four angels, who had been bound near the Euphrates, which was done accordingly. This is explained, by the most approved interpreters, to be a prediction of the conquests of the Turks, or Othmans; and the only material objection to this is drawn from the distance of time that intervened, between the events before predicted and the ravages of the Turks. But this is readily answered, by observing that the three wo trumpets must take in all the space between the subversion of the western empire and the destruction of the beast, which is yet to be expected. (xi. 14, 15.) The Saracens also possessed, though they did not extend, their dominions, till the Turks supplanted them. Indeed we cannot find any other events satisfactorily correspondent to the discoveries made after this trumpet, or any other, which will not leave a far greater distance between the second and third wo trumpets, than this interpretation leaves between the first and second. The Turks, pouring into Persia, and the regions bordering on the Euphrates, in the eleventh century, established four sultanies or kingdoms in those parts; but they were prevented from making further conquests, especially by the Croisades, or religious wars, waged in that and the two following centuries by the western Christians, who wanted to wrest Palestine out of the hands of the infidels. But when these ruinous projects were finally abandoned, the four angels which were bound in the Euphrates, who were emblems of these four sultanies, were loosed. Then the Turks uniting began their ravages and victories, and made great havoc among the inhabitants of that part of the world which had constituted the Roman empire, and which we have often read of, as "the third part of men." The western empire had been broken to pieces under the four first trumpets, the eastern had been nearly ruined under the fifth, and under the sixth it was finally subverted. The Turks conquered all the countries that had belonged to it; A. D. 1453 they took Constantinople, and thus brought to a final end the whole Imperial power which originally belonged to Rome. These powers were prepared for a certain fixed time, which being computed by a day for each year, according to the prophetic manner, and twelve months of thirty days each being allowed to the year here mentioned, that is, 360 days, or years, thirty more being added for the month, and one for the day, the whole amounts to 391 years and fifteen days. Now the first conquest of the Turks over the Christians took place, A. D. 1281; and the last success, by which they extended their dominions, was A. D. 1672, being exactly 391 years from the one to the other. So that one of their historians, (Prince Cantemir,) here divides the narrative, calling the former part "The growth of the Othman empire," the latter, "The decay of the Othman empire." Since that period, they have had little success in any of their wars, and their power is so much weakened and cramped at present by the rival power of Russia, that it is not at all probable they will ever recover their ascendency or renew their conquests. Had we records of these events sufficiently exact, we should no doubt find, that the half-hour, or fifteen days, was fixed with the same punctuality by the Spirit of prophecy. Though the term of their "slaying the third part "of men," or that during which they would extend their ravages and conquests, was predicted, yet that of the duration of their empire was not, but it will end after the sounding of the third wo trumpet. (xi. 14.) 'Dr. 'Lloyd, bishop of Worcester, who has now for above 'twenty years been studying the Revelations, with an 'amazing diligence and exactness, had, long before this 'year, said, The peace between the Turks and the papal 'Christians was certainly to be made in the year 1698, 'which he made out thus; the four angels, mentioned in 'Revelations, that were bound in the river Euphrates, 'which he expounds to be the captains of the Turkish 'forces, that till then were subject to the sultan at Ba‘bylon, were to be loosed, and freed from that yoke, and set up for themselves. And these were prepared to slay the third part of men, for an hour, a day, a month, and a year. He reckons the year in St. John as the Julian year of three hundred and sixty-five days, a month is thirty of these days, and a day makes one, which added to the former number makes three hundred and ninety six. Now he proves from historians, that Ottoman came, and began his conquests at Prouse, in the year 1302, to which the former number, in which they were to slay the third part of men, being added, it must end in the year 1698. And though the historians do not mark the hour, or the twelfth part of a day, or year, yet he is confident, if that ever is known, that the prophecy will be found even in that to be punctually accomplished. After this, he thinks, their time of hurting the papal Christians is at an end. They may indeed still do mischief to the Muscovites, or persecute their own Christian subjects, but they can do no more hurt to the papalins.” (Bp. Burnet's History of his own time.) In several subordinate particulars this statement differs from that above given, which seems to be the most exact, both as to the beginning of the Othman's successes, and the close of them, and also of the method by which the time should be computed. Yet the grand outline of interpretation is the same; and considering the date of bishop Lloyd's conclusions, which preceded the final successes of the Othmans, but which have, for substance, been verified for much above a hundred years, they may justly be considered as extraordinary, and an important proof of the true meaning of the prophecy, and of its exact accomplishment.

V. 16—19. The number of the army of horsemen was declared to be 200,000,000; that is, an immense multitude, a large definite number being put for an indefinite. Accordingly the Turks brought vast armies into the field, often to the amount of four, five, six, or seven hundred thousand men, chiefly cavalry; and when the whole multitude is considered, who were employed in this manner during the conquests of 391 years, we shall see the propriety of the apostle's strong prophetical language. He also saw both the horses and their riders, in his vision, as having breast-plates of fire, hyacinth, and brimstone, which may be considered as representing the scarlet, blue, and yellow colours, for which they have always been remarkable; the horses' heads like those of lions, denoted their strength, courage, and fierceness; and “the fire, “smoke, and brimstone, which issued out of their “mouths, and killed the third part of men,” is an evident and most astonishing prediction of the invention of gunpowder and artillery, which were first invented at this period, and which the Turks used, with great success, in their wars, especially in the siege of Constantinople, when immensely large guns were employed, so that one of them is said to have carried a stone of three hundred pounds weight. By these the walls of that city were at length battered down, which made way for the final destruction of that empire. These tremendous conquerors, before whom desolation marched, and from whose mouths fire, and smoke, and brimstone, issued, not only slew men in battle, when they faced them, but they had tails like serpents, with heads upon them, with which they hurt men, as by an envenomed bite; that is, the Turks left behind them, wherever they went, the same poisonous and ruinous religion, which the Saracens had done before them, and this proved more durably mischievous than their most bloody conquests; so that the remains of the Greek church and of Christianity, in those countries, was almost wholly extirpated, and Mahometism became universally prevalent in that part of the world, in which the Gospel was for a long time most signally successful.

V. 20, 21. The rest of men, who were not destroyed, or compelled to become Mahometans by the above-mentioned calamities, did not repent of their evil works. The Latin, or Roman, church, which escaped this destruction, still persisted in the idolatrous worship of demons, or angels and departed saints, by which devils are virtually worshipped, in their stupid adoration of senseless images, for which they have no better plea to use than the pagans had; in their murders, massacres, bloody wars with heretics, so called, inquisitions, and persecutions, in their sorceries, or pretended revelations and miracles; and in “their “fornication,” forbidding marriage, yet conniving at concubinage in the clergy, binding numbers by vows to a single life, and yet licensing brothels by public authority of the pope, in Rome itself; and in “their thefts,” or those exactions and impositions, by which they fraudulently, oppressively, and iniquitously, drew immense treasures from the nations. So that the eastern church, in which many corruptions first prevailed, was punished by the first wo of the Saracens; and as this did not bring them to repentance, the second wo of the Turks completed its ruin. But the western church, not repenting of her abominations, will at length be overwhelmed with the third wo. For the reformation from popery, and all that hath hitherto taken place in these western regions, hath but amounted to the two witnesses, (xi. 3,) protesting against the prevailing abominations; and the prevalence of infidelity, skepticism, and heresy, in proportion to the gradual decline of popery and superstition, gives no just room to suppose, that matters are very much improved in the western church. In this skeptical, profane, licentious, and superficial age, indeed, Satan hath evidently changed his ground, but the Scriptural Christian will readily perceive, that he hath hitherto in a great measure maintained it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The Lord frequently sees good to punish the abuse of spiritual advantages by spiritual judgments, leaving "the "sun and the air to be darkened with the smoke of the "infernal pit," and the word of the Gospel to be withdrawn or corrupted by the artifices of Satan, because men would not walk in the light whilst they enjoyed it. A fallen star, some apostate endued with abilities and possessed of influence, often proves Satan's instrument in blinding and deceiving mankind. This judgment, however, would for the present be little regarded, if other visitations were not connected with it; but, sooner or later, devouring locusts and tormenting scorpions will come out of this baleful smoke, and the prevalence of false religion against the truth of Christ will make way for such calamities on guilty nations, as may render life itself a burden, and death the apparent and desired relief. And in the future world, all the wicked will be tormented, but not killed; they will desire in vain to sink into non-existence; in this sense death shall flee from them, and they shall never overtake it. As we ought to fear him, who is able to destroy both body and soul in hell, more than them that can only kill the body, so those destroyers are most to be dreaded, who act as "angels of the bottomless pit," and vicegerents of Satan, by diffusing pernicious heresies and impostures, contrary to the pure doctrine of Christ; for that grand deceiver, when "transformed into an Angel of "light," and his ministers, when they pretend to be teachers of righteousness, do far more mischief to mankind, than the most barbarous and successful warriors could ever accomplish: but he who murders at once both the souls and bodies of men, most completely merits the title of Abaddon, Apollyon, the Destroyer.

V. 12—22.

We may rejoice that the Lord hath a hook in the nose, and a bridle in the mouth of every boasting enemy, by whatever method he threatens to subvert his cause. He gives deceivers or destroyers power, till his own purposes of judgment or correction are accomplished; and then he cuts them off, or lays them aside, at his pleasure. Thus one wo comes after another on hypocrites and corrupt churches, but they "who have the seal of God in their "foreheads" cannot be hurt; for the Lord binds and looses, limits or enlarges, increases or diminishes nations and their rulers, according to the counsel of his own will. The attentive reader of scripture and of history may, therefore, find his faith and hope increased by those events, which in other respects fill his heart with horror and anguish, and suffuse his cheeks with floods of tears, whilst he contemplates men's ingenuity and indefatigable industry in the work of destruction, and in extending misery amongst their fellow-creatures; and whilst he observes that the rest of men, who escape these plagues, repent not of their evil works, but go on with their idolatries, impiety, infidelity, iniquity, oppression, cruelty, and licentiousness, till wrath come upon them also to the uttermost.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1, 2. In the conclusion of the former chapter, the apostle had received some intimations of the corruptions of the western church, during the period of the two preceding trumpets; but before he was made acquainted with the events, which would follow the sounding of the seventh trumpet, he was shown something more of the state of it. This information was introduced by a most august and consolatory vision: he appeared to himself to be on earth, and to see a mighty Angel come down from heaven, clothed with a cloud, to veil the splendour of his appearance; and as an emblem of the darkness of the dispensations which were predicted, a rainbow, signifying the covenant of grace, surrounded his head, his face shone like the sun, and his legs were as pillars of fire.

(Note, i. 12—20.) This mighty Angel must be either Christ himself, or an emblematical display of his glory.—He held in his hand a little open book, as containing the Revelation of the purposes of God, which he was about to communicate to his servant. This was distinct from the larger book before mentioned, (v. 1,) being a kind of appendix, or codicil, to it. Indeed some respectable interpreters suppose this little book to have contained all the following parts of the Revelation, and thus they make it much greater than the book, of which Christ opened the seals! This is an objection to that arrangement, to which I could never find a satisfactory answer: besides, the great book would end abruptly in the middle of the sixth trumpet, and the same subject would be as abruptly taken up in the little book. I apprehend, therefore, that this little book contained no more than the former part of the next chapter, (1—14.) which was an important appendix to the ninth chapter, as it gives an account of the state of the western church during the period of the fifth and sixth trumpets. Then the former subject proceeds, the seventh trumpet is sounded, and a compendious view is given of the subsequent events to the end of the world. After this the second part of the book proceeds; and the apostle is shown a great variety of events, tending to explain those which had before been predicted in a more summary manner, but chiefly relative to the state of the church, as the former part had been to those which concerned the empire. This arrangement, which is nearly the same with that adopted by Bishop Newton, makes no material alteration in the plan of the celebrated Mr. Mede, and those who have followed him; whilst it avoids the difficulty of making the little book by far the largest, and the necessity of dividing the sixth trumpet between the two books. Still every event is referred to the times, to which, according to the synchronisms of that able writer, it belongs, and which are evidently deduced, not from vague hypothesis, but from the internal construction of the prophecy. And the observation of another learned writer, (Dr. Hurd,) stands equally good; 'The knowledge of this order is a great 'restraint on the fancy of an expositor; who is not now 'at liberty to apply the prophecies to events of any time 'to which they may appear to suit: but to events only 'falling within that time to which they belong, in the 'course of this pre-determined method; and if to this 'restriction we add another, which arises from the neces'sity of applying not one, but many prophecies, to the 'same time, we can hardly conceive how an interpreta'tion should keep clear of all these impediments, and 'make its way through so many interfering checks, un'less it were the true One. Just as when a lock, (to use 'Mr. Mede's allusion,) is composed of many and intricate 'wards, the key that easily turns within them, and opens 'the lock, can only be that which properly belongs to it.'—Since I first wrote these remarks, expositors have arisen, (especially the pious and learned Mr. Faber,) who suppose that the little book contained the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth chapters of Revelation. But, after much consideration, I feel constrained to dissent from this opinion, however respectably supported. First, because it makes the little book, or codicil, bear a too great proportion to the whole prophecy. The prophetical chapters, properly speaking, are only twelve, namely, the sixth, eighth, ninth, eleventh, to the fourteenth inclusive, and the sixteenth to the twentieth inclusive: for the seventh, tenth, and fifteenth contain not much explicit prediction, and the two last chapters, succeeding the day of judgment, are rather, as it will appear, destructive of the heavenly state, than prophetical, in the ordinary sense of the word. Now the four chapters, assigned to the little book, not being very short, yet crowded with most important predictions, contain at least a third of the whole prophecy, which is more than can properly be assigned to the little book. Secondly, the eleventh chapter evidently carries on the prediction, in a general manner, to the Millennium, and indeed to the end of the world. (xv. 15—18.) Now, the succeeding chapters to the twentieth plainly treat of times previous to the Millennium. The prophet must therefore somewhere go back, to take a more particular view of his subject than he at first gave: but no place can be assigned for this, so rationally, as the close of the eleventh chapter. The course of predicted events cannot be successive, in those chapters, therefore some of them must be coincident. Thirdly, no interpretation of the former verses of the twelfth chapter gives me the least satisfaction, except that which recals the reader's attention to the events which took place when pagan persecution terminated, the Roman emperors professed Christianity, and further corruptions, calamities, and persecutions, sprang from that very source, which seemed to promise far happier days. I therefore still think, that the little book contains only the first fourteen verses of the next chapter to the close of the sixth trumpet, being coincident, as to the state of things in the west, with that of the eastern empire, as predicted in the ninth chapter. I am not, however, unwilling to concede, that the following verses, to the close of the eighteenth, may be assigned to it, as a general pre-intimation of the final success of that cause, which had so long been trampled under foot.—Several objections to this interpretation will be obviated, as we proceed.

V. 3, 4. The mighty Angel, above described, sat his right foot on the sea, and his left on the dry land, to denote his sovereign authority over the whole earth, and perhaps intimating his determination of spreading the Gospel through every part of it; and he demanded attention, with a voice like the roaring of a lion, to show the power and terror of his word to his obstinate enemies. After which seven thunders were heard, that in the most majestic manner uttered intelligible voices; these either related to matters proper for the apostle to know, but not to be published, or else they are coincident with some things which are afterwards more clearly revealed. They upon the sea and upon the earth, [n] lifted up his hand to heaven, were, however, ordered to be sealed up, and it does not become us to inquire any further concerning them.

V. 5—7. The apostle next saw the angel lift up his hand to heaven, as was customary when solemn oaths were taken, and heard him swear, by the self-existent eternal Creator of all things, "that there should be time "no longer," or, as it may be rendered, that the time should not be yet, that is, the time of those glorious things, with which the mystery of God would be finished, but that further delays must be expected; till at length in the days of the seventh angel, after he had begun to sound his trumpet, that would be accomplished, according to the predictions of former prophets, in the destruction of every antichristian power, and the universal prevalence of true religion, which would continue, with little interruption, to the consummation of all things, and so issue in the eternal state. But before those events began to take place, other preparatory transactions must occur, and this solemn declaration seems to have been intended to teach Christians in the intervening ages, to wait with patience, and to expect a happy event of the calamities of the church, though the time of it seem long delayed. If we adhere to our translation, the meaning must be, that all the subsequent events, to the end of time, would fall under the period of the seventh trumpet.

V. 8—11. (Note, Ez. iii. 1—3.) The apostle's eating the book was an emblem of his duly considering and understanding it, and his making it his own, as it were, to the purposes for which he received it. The knowledge of future events was at first very sweet to him, as honey to the taste, but when he had more fully understood them, they occasioned him subsequent grief and anguish of heart. By publishing the contents of this little book, and the rest of the predictions which he was about to receive, he hath indeed "prophesied before many peoples, and nations, and "tongues, and kings," and doth so to this day.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Surety of the new covenant, who purchased the blessings of it by his blood, manages all things in heaven and earth with uncontrollable authority. His power and his word are most terrible to his enemies, but the believer need not fear his unchangeable Friend, for he will communicate those discoveries and consolations to him, which are kept secret from all others. The final salvation of the righteous, and the final prevalence of true religion on earth, are engaged for, by the same unfailing word of the Lord; and, though "the time shall not be yet," we have solid ground to conclude, that the sounding of the seventh trumpet has either already taken place, or is just at hand, when glorious scenes will be exhibited. Very soon, however, to us, "time shall be no longer;" but if we are believers, a happy eternity will follow, and we shall look down from heaven, to behold and rejoice in the triumphs of Christ and his cause on earth. Let us then rely on the immutable word and oath of the Lord, for strong consolation amidst all our trials; let us attend to and obey the voice from heaven, which calls us from the attractions of things present, that we may consider the things which shall be hereafter; let us seek our instructions from Christ, and obey his orders, daily meditating on and digesting his word, turning it into nourishment to our own souls, and declaring it to those around us, according to the duties of our several stations. Indeed the sweetness of such contemplations will often be mingled, or followed, with bitterness, whilst we compare the scriptures with the state of the world and the church, or even with that of our own hearts. Yet, if we are interested in the salvation of Christ, and are employed in any measure for the good of others, we should not so much regard our present feelings, as the glory of God in our eternal happiness, and that of those with whom we are connected.

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1, 2. It has before been supposed, that the former part of this chapter exhibits the contents of the little book, (Note, x. 1—4.) which represents the state of the western church, during the two preceding wo trumpets, and before the sounding of the seventh trumpet, (15,) and this precisely fixes the chronology of it. The discoveries of this little book are related under emblematical appearances and actions as before. The scene is the temple; and a reed, like a measuring rod, being given to the apostle, he was ordered to measure the temple, the altar, and the worshippers in the inner court. (Note, Ez. xl—xlvi.) This denoted, that in the predicted period there would be a small number, whose doctrine, worship, and behaviour, would bear measuring by the word of God, and that these only would be acceptable interior worshippers; whereas the outer court, being left unmeasured, and given to the Gentiles, emphatically showed that the greatest number of professed Christians would be idolaters and wicked men. The holy city also, being trodden under foot by them, implied that the church at large, and its most lucrative and eminent places, would be filled with idolaters, infidels, and hypocrites, and that true Christians would be oppressed in a grievous manner. The duration of these evil times was fixed to forty-two months, or twelve hundred and sixty days, which by prophetical computation are so many years. (Notes, Dan. vii. 25. viii. 9—14. xii. 7—12.) The whole of Daniel's prophecies should be compared with the subsequent parts of this book, as the same events and dates are intended in both, when they are properly explained, and this gives a measure of certainty to the interpretation. Daniel also fixes these events to the remains of the fourth monarchy, after it was broken to pieces, and formed ten kingdoms, (Notes, Dan. vii;) and this determines the geography of them to the western empire, which was properly the seat of that monarchy. So that the outlines both of the time and place to which these prophecies belonged are unalterably determined, by the prophets themselves; nor can the accomplishment of them be referred to other times or places, without doing the most manifest violence to them in both respects. Indeed, the prophecies of Daniel and those of the apostle, when properly explained, and compared with each other and their accomplishment, constitute the fullest imaginable demonstration of the truth of the scripture. But demonstration itself cannot convince those, who will not bestow pains to examine it. The beginning of these twelve hundred and sixty years must be placed subsequent to the four first trumpets on the subversion of the western empire, which was completed A. D. 566. This made way for the pope, in process of time, to acquire a vast accession of ecclesiastical dominion. He became universal bishop, A. D. 606, and was fully established as a temporal prince, A. D. 756. Did we know exactly at what time to begin the twelve hundred and sixty years, we might show with certainty when they would terminate; but this would not consist with that wise obscurity, which always in some respects rests on prophecies, before they are fulfilled. Till the event, therefore, shall explain this matter, it must be left undetermined; but, perhaps, the beginning of the rise and of the fall of this antichristian tyranny, and the completion of them, may both be at the distance of twelve hundred and sixty years from each other, as in more than one way the Babylonish captivity lasted seventy years. The beginning, however, of these years cannot well be fixed sooner than A. D. 606, or later than A. D. 756.—'Measuring the servants of God is equivalent to sealing 'them. The unmeasured tenants of the outer court, and 'the unsealed men throughout the Roman empire, are 'alike the votaries of the apostacy; while they that were 'measured, and they that were sealed, are the saints who 'refused to be partakers of his abominations.' (Faber.)

V. 3—6. It would be tedious even to mention the conjectural explications, which have been given of this prophecy concerning the witnesses, but they generally violate the apostle's rule, (2 Pet. i. 20, 21;) not proceeding upon a large and comprehensive view of the subject, but confining the interpretation to private, and comparatively little events. A king, in prophetical language, commonly means a succession of Monarchs; a witness, therefore, must be explained by the same rule, and not the prophecy of individuals, but of a succession of men, who, during the period referred to, bore testimony to the truth, must be intended. Two witnesses were mentioned, 7 And [u] when they shall have finished their testimony, [x] the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit shall make war against them, and shall overcome them, and kill them.

8 And [y] their dead bodies shall lie in the street of [z] the great city, which spiritually is called [a] Sodom, and [b] Egypt, where also [c] our Lord was crucified.

9 And they of [d] the people, and kindreds, and tongues, and nations shall see their dead bodies [e] three days and an half, [f] and shall not suffer their dead bodies to be put in graves.

because one was insufficient for the legal proof of any fact; and these witnesses were as few as could suffice to attest the true Gospel, and to enter a public protest against the antichristian perversions of it; though perhaps Moses and Aaron, Elijah and Elisha, and the apostles and seventy disciples, sent forth two and two, might be alluded to. All real Christians, who boldly professed their religion, may be considered as uniting in this testimony; yet ministers, and especially bold and zealous men who attempted reformation, were the witnesses primarily intended. The angel before-mentioned, even the Lord Jesus, declared that he would give them power, or authority, to prophesy, during the assigned time; yet this must be done in sackcloth, as expressive of their afflicted persecuted state, and of their deep concern and sorrow of heart, on account of the abominations against which they protested. It hath been shown by many writers, that during the darkest ages of popery men were raised up, who bore a decided testimony against the prevailing corruptions of the Roman church, and for the leading doctrines of the Gospel.—It was indeed the interest, and the constant practice, of their opponents to silence their testimony, to blacken their characters, or to destroy them as heretics; yet, after all their endeavours to suppress, misrepresent, and mutilate their writings, enough remains to show, that Christ had a remnant of faithful witnesses and disciples, through all the ages here referred to. From the eighth to the eleventh century, inclusive, we find accounts of individuals or collective bodies, who under the brand of heresy, and in the face of persecution, evidently held, and openly professed, the great doctrines of salvation by faith in Christ, and through his mediation, merits, and grace, and protested against the abuses of popery; and these, who just prevented the total darkness of that gloomy period, could by no means be extirpated. On the contrary, they continued to increase in many places; in the valleys of Piedmont, especially, vast multitudes were collected, and called Waldenses and Albigenses, who were evidently moderate Calvinists, (to speak in modern language,) and their lives were generally exemplary, as some of the Papists themselves have allowed.—These subsisted during the twelfth, thirteenth, and following centuries, though they were persecuted with such unrelenting fury, and pursued with such cruel and destructive wars, that, in France alone, a million of them are computed to have been slain, for the sole crime of protesting against the tyranny of the Pope, and the corruptions of the church of Rome. They, however, continued to "prophesy in sackcloth;" and when driven from Piedmont, they settled in other places, propagated their religion, and prepared the way for the reformation. Connected with them, and agreed in their leading doctrines and in opposition to the church of Rome, were the Lollards in England, and the Bohemians, from among whom arose John Huss and Jerom of Prague, who were burnt in the fifteenth century by the council of Constance. Multitudes embraced the doctrines of the Gospel in many places during those times, and professed or preached it at the hazard of their lives; and great numbers were burnt, or put to death in the most cruel manner, for so doing. At length Luther arose, and the reformation took place, since which time, the same testimony for the truth of Christ, and against the errors of antichrist, hath been maintained. Nor is the term yet expired; the witnesses are not indeed at present exposed to such terrible sufferings as in former times; but those scenes will probably be re-acted before long, and they have abundant cause to prophesy in sackcloth, on account of the state of religion even in the protestant churches. However, though men despised and hated the witnesses, they were, in reality, "the two olive-"trees," endued with spiritual gifts and grace, that, through their instrumentality, others also might receive the unction from the Holy one, and "the two candlesticks," to hold forth the light of divine truth in this benighted world; they stood to minister with acceptance, "before "the God of the earth," the Proprietor and Governor of all mankind, and were the champions, as it were, of his cause, and the heralds of his glory, in the countries where they lived. (Notes, Zech. iv.) Moreover, if any man, being enraged by their testimony, and emboldened by their apparent weakness, should dare to injure them; "fire "proceeding from their mouths, to devour their enemies, "would certainly slay them:" that is, the Lord would certainly plead and avenge their cause, and resent the injuries done to them, as done against himself. Their warnings and instructions would tend to the condemnation of those who hated them on that account; the denunciations of divine vengeance uttered by them, would certainly be accomplished; and even their prayers would be answered in judgments on those who persisted in their enmity. For, in this respect, they would have power, like Elijah, to shut heaven, and to restrain the rain from falling, during the three years and a half of their prophesying, (James v. 17;) or to prevent blessings coming from above on those, who rejected their testimony and persecuted them for it: as well as to turn the waters into blood, or to inflict all others plagues at their pleasure; as Moses did upon the Egyptians. That is, they would have as great an interest in heaven, as the most eminent of the prophets; and God would as surely punish those nations, princes, or other persons, who injured them, as he did those that had formerly oppressed his people, or murdered his messengers.

10 And they that [g] dwell upon the earth shall [h] rejoice over them, and [i] make merry, and shall send gifts one to another; because [k] these two prophets tormented them that dwelt on the earth.

11 And after [l] three days and an half, [m] the Spirit of life from God entered into them, and they stood upon their feet; [n] and great fear fell upon them which saw them.

12 And they heard a great voice from heaven, saying unto them, [o] Come up hither. [p] And they ascended up to heaven in a cloud; [q] and their enemies beheld them.

V. 7—12. When these witnesses "shall have finished," or, shall be about to finish, their testimony; the beast, that cometh out of the bottomless pit, (that is, the persecuting power, which will afterwards be more fully described,) shall fight against them, and kill them. Many private interpretations, (for so they appear to me,) have been given of this passage, as if it related to the martyrdom of individuals, or partial persecutions in past times; and some imagine, that it only denotes the constant persecution of true Christians, through the whole period of twelve hundred and sixty years: I cannot, however, but think, that it relates to events yet future: and that it will be fulfilled about the time of the sounding of the seventh trumpet.—The great city, in the street of which the dead bodies of the witnesses shall lie unburied, seems not to mean either Rome, or Jerusalem, literally; but Jerusalem mystically; that is, the professing Church of God, as possessed by Gentiles, (2;) and so become the rival of Sodom in lewdness; of Egypt in cruelty to the children of God; and of Jerusalem at the time when Christ was there crucified, in general enmity to him and his cause. Yet the arrangement of the prophecy, in other respects, shows that the countries, which belonged to the church of Rome, when at the height of its power, and most prosperous in its rage, "for crucifying our Lord" afresh in his people, were principally, or wholly intended: and indeed, though our Lord personally was crucified at Jerusalem, it was by the authority of the Roman emperor, when Judea was a province of that empire. Present appearances indeed, favour the opinion, that this general and successful war of the beast against the witnesses of Christ, will be conducted under another form, and other pretences, and perhaps by other instruments and means, than former assaults have been. Papal persecutors were often concealed infidels; and infidels concealed under any other mask, and so opposing vital Christianity within the same district, may equally answer to the prediction: for the peculiar opinions of this antichristian power are not here specified, and the apostle elsewhere speaks of antichrist as one, who opposes the doctrine, the authority, or glory of Christ. (Notes, 1 John ii. 18—24. iv. 3.) The prevalence of infidelity in different forms, throughout Europe, and the zeal with which principles of that tendency are every where propagated: when contrasted with the declining state of popish superstition, renders it not very improbable, that the beast may change his ground and method of attack, before he thus prevails against the witnesses; for that time approacheth. It likewise appears from the prediction, that the temporary victory of this enemy over the truth, will be so entire, throughout the extent of the western church, that there will be scarcely any open profession or preaching of the true Gospel, or steady opposition to the prevailing antichristianity, in all that part of the world; so that the different nations of Europe, and others as connected with them, will have nothing to do, but to contemplate and insult over the dead bodies of the witnesses, which they will not suffer to be buried. This may signify, that they will revile and deride all those, who before had professed and preached the truth, and thus preserve them from oblivion, by exposing them to ignominy. At the same time, they will use the customary methods of mutual congratulation on an event which they deem so joyful; supposing that they have at last finally extirpated a race of men, whose examples, doctrines, warnings, and reproofs, alarmed and disquieted their minds, and prevented them from proceeding without disturbance in their ungodliness and iniquity. But the triumphing of these wicked men shall be short; for after three days and a half, prophetically computed, the witnesses shall rise again from the dead, to the great consternation of their insulting murderers; that is, the Lord will raise up a competent number of witnesses, to stand up for his pure Gospel, to the terror of its opposers, who hoped it was finally extirpated. Nay, these witnesses will be called, by a voice from heaven, to ascend thither, which they will accordingly do, in the sight of their enemies. That is, the apparent extirpation of genuine Christianity in the western church, (the bounds of which are considered in their largest dimensions, for all true protestants are only witnesses for the truth, within the dominions of the beast,) will make way for better times, when the ministers and professors of the Gospel shall be far more zealous, honoured, and prospered, than before, even as the ascension of Christ to glory was subsequent to his death and resurrection. The above is the substance of what the first edition of this work contained; and since that time the author has had abundant opportunity of re-considering his interpretation, and of comparing it with those of many other commentators, and with events which have occurred in Providence. He must, however, still avow his full conviction, that the transactions, predicted under the emblems of these verses, have not hitherto taken place. It is generally agreed, that this chapter coincides in time with the ninth, and that the state of the church, and of the nations in the western empire, is here predicted, as that of the eastern empire had before been. The whole testimony, therefore, against idolatry and popery, in the ten kingdoms, during the twelve hundred and sixty years, must be intended; and till that testimony is generally suppressed, the witnesses are not slain. The triumphs of the persecutors, in Germany, Bohemia, Spain, or Italy, do not amount to any thing, which can be called "the slaying of the wit“nesses,” so long as a public testimony against papal corruptions, and for the true Gospel, is borne in any other parts of the western empire. However we explain the expression, “when they shall have finished their testimony,” we must make it agree with this part of the prediction, “they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and sixty days, clothed in sackcloth.” Now, if the witnesses were slain at the council of Constance, or by the total ruin of the league at Smalcald, or at any of the times which different expositors fix upon, they prophesied one, two, or three hundred days, less than the predicted period. Except any will say, that they prophesied in sackcloth after their resurrection and ascension into heaven. The different opinions of eminently learned and able men on the subject, and the extreme difficulty which they all seem to find, in making one part of their interpretations consistent with the others, are powerful arguments in my mind, that they have not fact and truth to bear them out. The fulfilment of the prophecy seems to me indispensably to require the following particulars. 1st. The general suppression of the public testimony for the truth, and against the perversions of Christianity, throughout all the kingdoms of the western empire; but no such general suppression has taken place, especially in the later ages of the period in question. 2dly. The open, avowed, and general triumph of enemies, however distinguished, as if the hated cause of true Christianity were finally ruined. 3dly. The very speedy, and unexpected revival of the witnesses, and the immediate, general, and extraordinary triumphs of the Gospel in all those countries, where it was supposed to be extirpated. Whether this will be, as some with much probability think, the last persecution before the Millennium, the event must determine; but the war of the beast against the witnesses is a widely different thing from the war of Christ against the persecutors, which, I apprehend, is meant by the pouring out of the vials, at the opening of the seventh trumpet. During the former, the enemy triumphs, and the witnesses prophesy in sackcloth, till slain; during the latter, the witnesses and their cause triumph, and their enemies are destroyed by tremendous judgments. Yet these distinct events have, by some respectable expositors, been apparently confounded. If “the slaying of the witnesses” be future, it is of vast importance that Christians should be aware of it, and act accordingly. It does not follow, from the suppression of the public testimony, viz. the general silencing of faithful ministers, and inhibiting the public administration of ordinances through the ten kingdoms, that there will be no true Christianity in those kingdoms. Nay, it is not improbable, that the prevalence of true Christianity will provoke this persecution; that there will be thousands, and tens of thousands, who secretly, at the hazard of their lives, meet together, for the worship of God; that books, previously circulated, containing clear and practical religious instruction, will in a very great degree supply the want of public ordinances, during this short interruption; that the persecution itself, and the suppression of the testimony, will so show the odiousness of the persecutors, and the excellency of true Christians, as, by the divine blessing, exceedingly to multiply real believers, during the interdiction: and, in short, that the means previously used, nay, the seed which we are now sowing, may be exceedingly prospered, in bringing forward the glorious times which shall succeed. The term of three years and a half, according to the prophetical calculation of the days in which the testimony shall be suppressed, and the efficacy with which it shall then burst forth, from the ashes under which it had been smothered, and this through all the ten kingdoms, appear to me to give an astonishing interest to this view of the subject, as well as most animating motives now to sow to the utmost that seed, which will then produce the glorious harvest. In many other cases, we should “rejoice with trembling;” but in this, while we cannot but tremble at the prospect before us, we should tremble with rejoicing. Like the believer's death, it will be a dark and painful entrance on scenes inexpressibly delightful; and the approach of it, if perceived, will assure the intelligent Christian, that the final triumphs of the church are at hand, even at the door. In what way the accomplishment will take place, the event must show, and it is vain to argue against the improbability of it: for the dispensations of Providence commonly subvert all our preconceptions of probability. This exceedingly low state of real Christianity seems only to relate to the western church; and probably in America, in Africa, in the East Indies, or other parts of Asia, there may be very flourishing churches at the same time.

V. 13, 14. Immediately after the events, intended by the resurrection and ascension of the witnesses, some terrible judgment will befall a large part of this antichristian city, especially some one of the ten kingdoms, which will destroy a great number of persons, and so alarm others, as to tend to their conversion, and to the glory of God in it. The original expression, “seven thousand names of men,” induces many to think that this refers to the degradation and destruction of the most renowned and powerful supporters of Antichrist; but the event alone can determine the precise meaning of this. Thus the second wo, or the sixth trumpet, will terminate, and behold the third wo will speedily approach. Whether the revolutions and desolations in France and on the continent, during the last twenty years, are specially meant, (as some expositors confidently decide,) our descendants will be more competent to determine than we are. At least, I dare not venture an opinion, but am rather disposed to think that the whole is yet future.

V. 15—18. The little book hath been shown to contain such important predictions, as abundantly to account for the solemnity with which it was delivered to the apostle. He therefore next proceeds with the subject of the ninth chapter. When the seventh angel had sounded his trumpet, there were great voices in heaven, all the blessed inhabitants rejoicing with admiring gratitude, because "the kingdoms of this world," which had so long lain under the wicked one, were become willingly subject to JEHOVAH, and to his anointed King, who would reign over them for ever, as his kingdom on earth would continue to the end of time, and in heaven to eternity. Then the emblematical representatives of the whole church were seen to prostrate themselves, in adoring worship, praising, and rendering thanks to him, as the self-existent, omnipotent, and eternal Lord God, because he had taken to him the power over the nations, which was his by right at all times, and who had now established his kingdom throughout the earth. If this be not addressed to Christ personally, as some think, it must be allowed to include him, as One with the Father, and the Holy Spirit, in the unity of the Godhead. What follows is explained by some persons, to relate to the execution of the wrath of God on the nations before the Millennium, for the rage and enmity against his people whom they had slain, but who were figuratively raised from the dead, in the revival and final prevalence of the Gospel, and rewarded in the exceeding prosperity of the Church; whilst they who destroyed the earth, were exterminated; but others suppose it to refer to the temporary opposition raised against the Gospel after the Millennium, and just before the general resurrection, and the final judgment. (Note, xx. 7—15.) The account, however, in this place is very brief; for it will be explained, and dilated on afterwards, in several chapters: and perhaps both events are compendiously hinted at. 'Thus we are arrived at the consum'mation of all things, through a series of prophecies, 'extending from the apostle's days to the end of the 'world. This series has been the clue to conduct us in 'our interpretation of these prophecies: and though some 'of them may be dark and obscure, considered in them'selves; yet they receive light and illustration from others 'preceding and following. Altogether they are, as it 'were, a chain of prophecies, whereof one link depends 'on and supports another. If any parts remain yet 'obscure and unsatisfactory, they may perhaps be cleared 'up, by what the apostle has added by way of explanation.' (Newton.)

V. 19. This verse introduces a new subject, and should have been placed at the beginning of the next chapter. (iv. 1; 2. Is. vi. 1—3.) The scene of the vision was laid at the temple, which was so far opened, that the ark of the covenant became visible: this denoted that further discoveries were about to be made relating to the interior parts of religion: for the preceding chapter chiefly referred to the affairs of the empire, and the external concerns of the church. "The lightnings, and voices, and "thunderings," were tokens of the divine presence; and emblems of the terrible judgments, which were about to be revealed. The next chapter seems to go back to the primitive ages of the church: and we must pass a second time through many of the same succeeding periods as before; though principally with relation to the times of the three last wo trumpets.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The Lord measures his professed worshippers by the rule of his word, and weighs them in his balance: his ministers must also use the same standard; and they, who would be approved as inner-court worshippers, must try themselves by the same unerring touchstone. For mere nominal professors are accounted Gentiles before God; and yet the holy city hath frequently been trodden under foot by such enemies of the Lord, in the habit of worshippers! Indeed, for many ages, a small number of witnesses, prophesying in sackcloth, have appeared on the part of Christ and the truth; whilst multitudes, in splendour and power, have been ranked on the side of antichrist, in one form or another. But it is a most honourable employment to unite with these witnesses, how few, despised, or persecuted soever they may be; and to enter a public protest, connected with a holy and exemplary conduct, against the prevailing corruptions of the age and place in which we live. They who do this, are green olive trees in the house of God, and shining lights in the dark places of the earth: but we cannot obtain this honour, without courage, self-denial, and patience. Christians of this description are harmless, and they appear to be helpless and friendless; but it is safer to meet a roaring lion, or to face a battery of cannon, than to injure them, for the Lord will plead their cause, "and spoil the souls of those that spoil them:" and their pious instructions, friendly warnings, and benevolent prayers, will be as fire to consume their inveterate enemies. Indeed, the wrath of God against persecutors of his saints will either stop the current of his bounty, or turn their comforts into curses, or bring the heaviest plagues on offending nations.

V. 7—12.

Neither Satan, nor any of his emissaries, can cut off the Lord's ministers, till they have finished their testimony, and be ripe for glory. The cruelties and outrages of persecutors on the living or on the dead, as if they would carry their revenge into another world, cannot hinder the immediate felicity of their souls, the glorious resurrection of their bodies, or their final admission into heavenly mansions. But by such impious barbarities Christ is crucified afresh, and Jerusalem is turned into Sodom and Egypt; and the external homage paid to Christ by men of this character, (as the papists adore the crucifix,) seems even to crucify him again in effigy, after the example of those who builded the sepulchres of the prophets, and murdered the incarnate Son of God.—Determined rebels against the light rejoice, as on some most happy event, when they can drive away or destroy the faithful servants of Christ, whose doctrine and conduct are a torment to them; but this joy is soon turned into terror and anguish; for the servants of God will rise again, to be swift witnesses against them; then they will behold those ascending to the glory of their Lord, whilst more terrible vengeance awaits their enemies, than earthquakes, or death in its most terrific form, can so much as shadow forth.

V. 13—19.

Many woes await the impenitent in this world, but the most dreadful wo will, as it were, cause all the rest to be forgotten, and it will arrive quickly. For the seventh angel shall sound, and the inhabitants of heaven will rejoice, because "the kingdoms of the earth shall become "the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ," and he shall "reign for ever." At present, prayer for that blessed revolution in the state of the world, is the duty of all real Christians; but shortly they will be called to join in songs of loud thanksgiving and humble adoration "to "the Lord God almighty, who is, and was, and is to "come." (i. 4. 8. 11.) Oh, may the name of our heavenly Father be thus hallowed, may his kingdom thus come, and may his "will be done on earth, as it is in heaven," for his "is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, "for ever, Amen."—The anger of the nations against his righteous authority will bring on the great day of his wrath: the time of the dead, when they shall be judged, will soon come; then shall his faithful servants and friends, both great and small, be most munificently rewarded, and they who have destroyed the earth shall be themselves destroyed. In the mean time, we, through the rended veil, may see the ark of the covenant, and our God upon a mercy-seat; and if we humbly approach him in this new and living Way, the most tremendous threatenings of his word, and the most awful judgments of his hand, will do us no harm, and should cause us no consternation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1—6. The prophecies of this book, (as it appears to me,) naturally divide themselves into two parts, the second of which begins with the last verse of the preceding chapter. So that we are here brought back to the primitive ages of the church, though they are more briefly mentioned than those which followed. Inattention to this circumstance has created much perplexity in many attempts to explain these predictions; for if we do not keep hold of the clue, what hath properly been called the internal geography and chronology of the book, imagination will rove at large, and supposed allusions to detached events, in different ages and places, will r 1 Kings xvii 3—6. 9—16. xix 4—8. disjoint the interpretation, and render the whole ambiguous and suspicious. The church, under the common emblem of a woman, the mother of individual believers, deriving its original from heaven, and being destined to return thither, was beheld by the apostle, in vision, in heaven, with such attire and circumstances, as rendered the appearance peculiarly wonderful, and denoted that it was significant of some great events. She was clothed with the sun, as an emblem of her being justified, sanctified, and irradiated, by virtue of union with Christ, "the Sun of "righteousness;" she had the moon under her feet, to denote her superiority to the reflected and feebler light of the Mosaic dispensation, and to the love of all sublunary objects; her crown, with twelve stars, represented her honourable maintenance of the doctrine of the twelve apostles. Her pregnancy and travailing pains seem to be an emblem of the afflicted state of the church in the three first centuries, during which time, amidst many hardships and persecutions, with fervent prayers and earnest labours, she sought deliverance from her oppression, and an increase of her family, and waited the appointed term, which was to bring a happy crisis to these her sorrows. (Gal. iv. 19.) At the same time another marvellous sight was seen in heaven, even "a great red "dragon." A dragon was a known emblem of Satan, and of his principal agents or vicegerents on earth. (Marg. Ref.) Purple or scarlet was the distinguishing colour of the Roman emperors, consuls, and generals, even as it hath been since of the popes and cardinals. The seven heads of the dragon signify the seven hills on which Rome was built, and the seven forms of government which successively prevailed there; (Marg. Ref.) the ten horns marked out the ten kingdoms, into which the western empire was at length divided; (Notes, Dan. ii. 31—48. vii. 23—27;) but "the seven crowns on the dragon's "heads," and not ten crowns on his horns, showed, that the whole power was yet vested in the emperors and senate at Rome; and not as afterwards in the monarchs of the kingdoms. And this circumstance, which many have not observed, precisely fixes the date of the prophecy, and undeniably proves that it related to the pagan emperors, and not to the antichristian power afterwards mentioned. (xiii. 1.) The tail of the dragon, drawing a third part of the stars, represented the power of the Romans, which had cast down the princes of one third part of the earth, and reduced their countries to subjection. This monster appeared to watch the woman, being prepared to devour her offspring, as Pharaoh destroyed the male children of Israel, or as Herod sought the life of Christ. Thus the Roman emperors and magistrates jealously watched the progress of Christianity from the first, and harassed the church with constant persecutions. But at length the woman was delivered of a male child. During the time of the persecuting emperors, the church was greatly increased; at length one sprang from her, who ascended the imperial throne, being appointed to be the vicegerent of Christ, in ruling the nations, and crushing the enemies of the Gospel, as with a rod of iron. (Notes, ii. 26, 27. vi. 12—17. Ps. ii. 9.) Thus the offspring of the church, even Christians in general, and Constantine in particular, with the Christian emperors who succeeded him, escaped the rage of the red dragon, and the latter was exalted to very great honour and authority, under the immediate protection, and by the special favour, of God. New trials, however, awaited the church, which at length drove her into the wilderness, or rendered her desolate and distressed. For the termination of pagan persecution made way for those events which at length terminated in the antichristian power, the continuance of which was fixed to one thousand two hundred and sixty years. (Notes, xi. 1—14.) But God had provided a place where he would sustain her when the time arrived; and her flight into the wilderness is here mentioned by way of anticipation. This interpretation has been objected to, because the sixth verse is supposed to be introduced by anticipation; but, in fact, it is manifest that the apostle thus introduces it; else, why does he resume it, after several verses, predicting most important events, (14) with some additional circumstances? Yet even then, the church is represented only as prepared to fly, not as yet actually fled. The author has before shown his decided opinion, and stated his reasons for it, that "the little book" contained no more than part of the eleventh chapter, that the slaying of the witnesses is yet future, and that the concluding part of the preceding chapter, to the end of the eighteenth verse, brings the series of predicted events to the Millennium, and indeed to the end of the world. If, then, this and the following chapters relate, as undoubtedly they do, to events preceding the Millennium, the sacred writer must in some place go back, and resume his subject; and no part can be selected, in which this can so naturally be fixed, as the last verse of the preceding chapter, which introduces the beginning of this. 'We would also divide the Revelation 'into two parts, or rather the book so divides itself. For 'the former part proceeds, as we have seen, in a regular 'and successive series, from the apostle's days to the con'summation of all things. Nothing can be added, but it 'must fall somewhere or other, within the compass of 'this period; it must be a resumption of the same sub'jects, and this latter part may most properly be con'sidered as an enlargement and illustration of the former. 'Several things, which before were only touched upon, 'require to be more copiously handled, and placed in a 'stronger light.' It was said, that "the beast should make "war against the witnesses, and overcome them;" 'but 'who, or what, the beast is, we may reasonably conjec'ture, but the apostle himself will more surely explain. 'The transactions of the seventh trumpet are all summed 'up and comprised in a few verses, but we shall see the 'particulars branched out and enlarged on into as many 'chapters. In short, this latter part is designed as a 'supplement to the former, to complete what was de'ficient, to explain what was dubious, to illustrate what 'was obscure; and as the former described more the des'tinies of the Roman empire, so this latter relates to the 'fates of the Christian church.' (Bp. Newton.) Nothing more fully confirms my opinion, that bishop Newton's outline is the true interpretation, than the dissatisfaction which permanently rests on my mind, after carefully considering those expositions which have been substituted in the place of it. While objections are stated, I hesitate, not at once perceiving how they can be answered: but when the interpretation, substituted in its place, has excited my attention, still more insuperable objections crowd on my mind. 'The man-child is the mystic word of God, 'which is described as the Son of the church, because it 'is the incorruptible seed, from which all true believers 'are born.' (Faber.) This mystic word is, then, rather the parent, than the son, of the church; but, waiving this, if the respectable writer here cited could not make out his system, without having recourse to so indefinite and allegorical an interpretation of an event, evidently of primary importance in the prophecy, I cannot but conclude, that his plan of interpretation is, in this respect, erroneous; and though, all things considered, it is with great regret, I must give that of bishop Newton the decided preference. Certainly the subversion of the Pagan persecuting Roman empire, and that of the ancient system of idolatry, as supported by all the genius, influence, and power of Greece and Rome, was no inconsiderable event, in the prophetical history of the Christian church: and had it not been specially and prominently marked, it might have been thought an extraordinary omission. Whatever the character of Constantine, or that of his successors, was, the revolution was wonderful: the whole Pagan system was cast down from its heaven, its authority and persecuting domination, and the ruler or rulers of the nations professed Christianity, and protected the church. Subsequent corruptions, terminating in still more dire and destructive persecutions, indeed followed, and are particularly foretold: but surely it is natural to suppose, that the prophet, if indeed he resumed his subject to give a more particular account of the periods which he had compendiously mentioned, should go back to the first ages, and in few words mark the deliverance of the church from Pagan pesecution, the revolution in the empire from Pagan to Christian. I by no means think, with bishop Newton, that Galerius, or any personal enemy to Constantine, is meant by the red, or fiery, dragon; but the whole Pagan authority and influence, instigated by the devil, (as the papal power and influence afterwards was,) and seeking the destruction of Christianity, and of the Christian rulers and princes who supported it. So that we may understand, as literally as we choose, the language concerning "the old dragon; only remembering that he "works in" and by "the children of disobedience." Christians are spoken of, as exercising the authority of Christ, and ruling the nations with a rod of iron: (ii. 27:) it can therefore be no objection, that the same allusion is made in respect of the first Christian emperors, under whom the most entire revolution, from persecuting idolatry, in full domination, to the establishment of Christianity, as the religion of the Roman empire, took place. Some commentators, indeed, would interpret this man child to be Christ himself; but this cannot be meant, for he was born of the Jewish, not of the Christian church; and the apostle spake as a prophet, not as an historian; events future to him must then, exclusively, be intended.

V. 7—12. The events, here foretold, preceded, and made way for, the church's flight into the wilderness. The strenuous efforts of the Pagans against the establishment of Christianity, and the destruction of their idolatrous worship, was, as I apprehend, represented by the dragon and his angels maintaining war in heaven against Michael and his angels; perhaps with some reference to the expulsion of Satan and his adherents from heaven, on their original apostacy. Michael may represent Christ; and the devil, or Satan, the old slanderer, adversary, and murderer of mankind, was the invisible commander of the opposite army. The former employed as his instruments Christian magistrates, faithful ministers, and believers, as well as angels; the latter fought by persecuting emperors, idolatrous priests, and heathen philosophers. The conflict was long and sharp; but it ended in the total defeat of Satan's army, in the deposing of idolaters from all rule and authority, and in their reduction to the most abject condition. This was represented by the devil's being cast out of heaven: for, by the power of idolatrous emperors and magistrates, he had maintained that false religion, by which he had deceived all the world, and seduced them to be his subjects and worshippers; but, by the subversion of that authority, and the subsequent demolition of idolatry, he was cast down from his dignity, as god and prince of this world, for a time, and in a measure. (Luke x. 18.) When the pagan emperors were dethroned, Satan's angels were cast out with him; for both the instruments and ministers of idolatry were laid aside; and even their very idols were destroyed with contempt and execration.—It is remarkable, that Constantine himself, and others of his time, describe these events under the same image of the dethroning of the dragon. 'Moreover, a picture of Constantine was set up over the palace-gate, with a cross over his head, and under his feet the great enemy of mankind, (who persecuted the church by means of impious tyrants,) in the form of a dragon, transfixed with a dart through the midst of its body, and falling headlong into the depth of the sea.' (Newton.) This shows how Christians then understood the prophecy; and no doubt they rightly interpreted it.—Upon this great victory, the apostle heard songs of praise in heaven, because salvation and strength were come; the church was delivered from persecution, and its friends advanced to authority; the kingdom of God was openly established, and the power of his anointed Son most gloriously displayed. For the accuser of the brethren was cast out of his dominion, and deprived of his influence; so that he could no longer lay grievous crimes to the charge of the Christians, for which to put them to death; as Satan had accused Job before God himself, and was ready to accuse others continually night and day. (Marg. Ref.) But this victory was not ascribed to the sword of war, which was only a subordinate means, when matters were brought to a crisis; for it was acquired through the merit and efficacy of the atoning sacrifice of Christ, by faith in his blood, and a bold and holy profession of his Gospel; together with "the word of their testimony," who went forth every where preaching the doctrine of salvation; and "who loved not their lives unto the death," but readily sealed their testimony with blood, when called to it. These were the warriors and the weapons, by which Christianity undermined and subverted the power of the idolatrous empire, and acquired an entire ascendency over their pagan enemies: and if Christians had continued to fight with these weapons, or such as these, their victories would have been more numerous and glorious, and the effects of them more durable. The heavens were, therefore, called upon to rejoice, with all the inhabitants of them, or all who were on the Lord's side in this contest. But at the same time a wo was denounced upon the inhabitants of the earth and the sea, or the nations in general; because the devil and his dethroned agents would not rest in their disgraced condition: though idolatry was suppressed, it was not destroyed, and its partizans would surely excite fresh commotions. Nay, the devil would be the more furious in his opposition to the Gospel, to the ruin of numbers of souls, and to the great distraction of the empire; as he would know that his time was short, that Pagan idolatry would soon be totally crushed, and that the Seed of the woman would at length bruise his head: he would, therefore, take his opportunity of doing all possible mischief to mankind, whilst he had it in his power.

V. 13—17. Whilst the idolatrous party, who were the agents of the devil, were constrained to submti to the power of Christian rulers, they still persisted in their persecuting enmity to the church, and tried various methods of re-establishing their ancient worship. Several attempts were made of this kind, during the reign of Constantine. Julian the apostate left no method untried, by which he hoped to effect it: he endeavoured to hinder the liberal education of the Christians, that their ignorance might expose them to contempt, and render them incapable of defending or propagating their religion; he employed writers, of great learning and ingenuity, to ridicule, revile, and reason against Christianity; he excited Arian princes to persecute their orthodox subjects; and in many other ways he attempted to undermine the cause of Christ. At the same time, the devil and his agents prevailed to corrupt the church with manifold heresies, to deform it with various scandals, and to rend it in pieces with fierce contentions; and these evils grew worse and worse, during the period of the first four trumpets. (Notes, viii.) Thus the way was preparing for the erection of another idolatrous persecuting power, which will be shortly considered. In the mean time, two wings, as of a great eagle, were given to the woman, that she might be ready to flee to her place in the wilderness, when the time came. (Ex. xix. 4.) These are supposed by some writers to refer to the eastern and western empires, whose standard was an eagle, and whose protection was the means of preservation to the church, till the prefixed time of her obscurity arrived. In the midst of the preceding convulsions and heresies, the church was, as it were, preparing to flee away to her retreat, from the fury of her opposers; where she was at length to be nourished, "for a time, and times, and half a time," or for three years and a half, forty-two months, or one thousand two hundred and sixty days; but her flight was not completed till the establishment of the antichristian power spoken of in the next chapter. (Note, xi. 1, 2.) To prevent her escape, the dragon cast out of his mouth a flood of water, to carry her away. This is explained, with great propriety, of the inundation of the Huns, Goths, Vandals, and other barbarous nations, by which the western empire was overwhelmed; for it is known that the strenuous adherents to paganism encouraged these irruptions, in hopes of subverting Christianity by their means; and no doubt Satan expected to overwhelm the church, when idolaters overturned the empire. But the event proved entirely contrary to all their expectations. "The earth helped the woman, and swallowed "up the flood;" the victorious barbarians united themselves to the vanquished Romans, and formed one people with them, in the several provinces of the empire; they even embraced, in form at least, the Christian religion. Ungodly men of various descriptions, from regard to their secular interests, protected the church, amidst these convulsions: and the subversion and dismembering of the western empire did not at all help the cause of idolatry, nay, it rather tended to the propagation of Christianity. But the dragon, being disappointed in this attempt, was the more enraged, and took another method of making war against true Christians, as the seed of the church.—These were but a remnant, for superstitions and heresies, of various kinds, had long before this increased exceedingly, which afforded the enemy his opportunity for the assault and success predicted in the next chapter. If the plan of interpretation, before laid down, be well grounded, these verses must, as has been stated, predict the events, which made way for the establishment of the persecuting domination of nominal Christians, the flight of the church into the wilderness, and the prophesying of the witnesses in sackcloth, during one thousand two hundred and sixty days. The particulars of these latter events are recorded in the two following chapters, with several things relating to the approach and earnests of the church's delivery, and the destruction of her grand enemy. In the fifteenth chapter there is a solemn pause, as introductory to the subsequent events, and then the prediction proceeds, in regular order, to the Millennium, the day of judgment, and the heavenly world. Thus, from the beginning of this chapter, where the prophet resumes his subject, a series of events, succeeding to each other, is predicted and every part casts light on all that precedes or follows. But if the predictions of these verses be referred to any part of the twelve hundred and sixty years, or to the end of them, this order is, as it appears to me, without necessity, and without proof, disturbed; and indeed an entire new interpretation of the subsequent chapters, as relating to future events, seems indispensably necessary, to preserve the consistency of the interpretation. As I am fully persuaded that the transactions, predicted in the two next chapters, (the concluding part of the fourteenth alone excepted,) are already fulfilled, I must adhere to the outlines of bishop Newton's interpretation, and that of those with whom he coincides, in preference to latter systems of interpretation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

True Christians, being of heavenly birth, and expecting a heavenly felicity, have put on Christ, are clothed in his righteousness, irradiated by his light, beautified by his image, and taught to put earthly things beneath their feet; and they deem it their honour to profess, adorn, and recommend, the doctrine of the holy apostles. All who are thus minded should pray fervently, and labour diligently, in their several places, for the increase, prosperity, and purity of the church; and ministers should especially abound in these things. For the devil and his instruments are vigilant, united, bold, and unwearied, in their efforts to destroy the religion of Christ, and too generally the kingdoms of the world have been seduced into their service: surely, then, the servants of God ought not to be timid, heartless, or negligent, in opposing their designs!—It is a striking proof of the wretched state of this apostate world, that so large a proportion of its inhabitants have generally been subjected to men, eminent only for tyranny and cruelty; and it is a great mystery in Providence, that these are left to attempt so many things against his church. They cannot, however, prevent the conversion of sinners, or the final salvation of believers; nor can they withstand him, who is exalted to the throne of God, to rule over all nations with a rod of iron; or overcome those who are invested with authority and armed with power by him, for the benefit of his church, and to crush those who persecute it. The Lord does not indeed generally work by the arm of the magistrate; but when he is pleased to raise up rulers, to protect his people, and by scriptural means to promote his cause, we should be thankful for them, and avail ourselves of their countenance and assistance, though the church has her place prepared, and her sustenance given her, far more frequently in a wilderness, than in an imperial palace.

V. 7—17.

Whilst Michael our Prince, his angels, and his servants, fight against the dragon and his angels, we need not fear the final prevalence of any enemy, either against the church, or any true believer; the "great dragon, even "the old serpent called the devil, and Satan," while he deceives and rules over all the rest of the world, will as surely be prevented from hurting the true church, as he and his angels were cast out of heaven at first. For "salvation and strength, the kingdom of our God, and the "power of his Christ," will renewedly come, from time to time, till the dominion of every enemy be destroyed, and the mouth of every "accuser of the brethren," be stopped. But victory in this holy war can be obtained only "by "the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of the testi"mony" of his servants. Faith, prayer, a holy life, patient continuance in well-doing, and a willingness to venture, or suffer, even unto death, have been the weapons by which the saints have always conquered; and we must go forth with the same armour, and fight in the same manner, if we would share their triumphs. Over such victories all heaven rejoices, and all that love the kingdom of Christ. But Satan and his agents, however degraded and baffled, will proceed to bring woes on the inhabitants of the earth; they rage the more, when their plots are defeated, and multitudes are by them deceived and destroyed. Yet the church still maintains its ground on earth, and believers continually enter heaven; when dangers seem to overtake them, they are furnished with eagles' wings, to fly away and be at rest; when heresies, infidelity, or tribulation, appear ready to overwhelm them, the earth opens and swallows up the flood. Even worldly men give assistance to the church, when the Lord is pleased to make use of them, and she will be preserved for ever, with all the remnant of her seed "who keep the com"mandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus "Christ."

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1. The apostle, standing on the shore, saw a savage beast rise out of the sea, or a tyrannical, idolatrous, and persecuting power springing up out of the commotions which took place in the world. (Notes, Dan. vii.) All interpreters agree, that the Roman empire, in some form or other, was here intended; and Papists, continuing such, must contend, though against the most conclusive evidence, that Pagan Rome was meant. Daniel in vision saw the rise of the Babylonian empire, as well as that of the others, though the rise of it preceded his prophecy; (Dan. vii. 3—7:) so that the circumstance of John's seeing the rise of this beast, is not alone conclusive in the argument; but the reign of the beast, during twelve hundred and sixty years, from whatever period it be dated, must be so; for the Pagan Roman empire, properly speaking, did not continue three hundred years from the time when this prophecy was delivered, and the very last remains of it were subverted in about four hundred years. Indeed, from the building of Rome to the time of Constantine, the first Christian emperor, was considerably less than eleven hundred years, and even to Augustulus, the last emperor, A. D. 476, that is, from its birth to its death, it lasted at the most only twelve hundred and twenty-eight years; and for the first five or six hundred years of this term, the Romans had not the smallest concern in any thing which respected the church of God. It is, therefore, absolutely certain, that the Roman power, as professing Christianity, and not that of Pagan Rome, is meant. The dragon before-mentioned had "seven crowns on his "heads," but this beast hath "ten crowns on his horns," which plainly showed that a revolution would take place before the time referred to, that the dominion would be removed from the imperial city, and divided among ten kingdoms. The seven heads had indeed lost their crowns, but they had preserved, or acquired, a name, or names, of blasphemy. Imperial Rome was often called The eternal city, and The goddess of the earth, with other blasphemous titles; and altars, temples, and sacrifices, were assigned to her, as a deity: and it will appear in the sequel, how antichristian Rome, after the loss of the royal dignity, obtained, or resumed, similar names of blasphemy.

V. 2—4. This beast was without a name, like the fourth in Daniel's prophecy, (Notes, Dan. vii;) but it resembled in divers respects the other three beasts, which that prophet had seen, and thus united the fierceness, cruelty, and terror, of all the rest. It was indeed the same with Daniel's fourth beast, the same empire, but in one special form; for the dragon had now given his power, throne, and great authority, to the beast. The dragon may here mean, either the devil, or the devil's vicegerent, the idolatrous Roman empire; so that when another idolatrous persecuting power had succeeded to that of the heathen emperors, then the dragon had transferred his dominion to the beast, or the devil had appointed another vicegerent; and all the world knows, that this accords to the history of the Roman empire, Pagan and Papal. The project of re-establishing the old idolatry failing, a new species was invented; saints and angels succeeded to gods and demigods, and persecution was the means employed for supporting it. The head of the beast, which was wounded to death, represented the entire subversion of the imperial authority in the time of Augustulus, or when Rome became a dukedom to the Exarchate of Ravenna. (Note, viii. 12.) Five of the heads of the beast, or the dragon, (for in this respect they are the same,) were superseded, before the apostle's time, (xvii. 10,) namely, kings, consuls, dictators, decemvirs, and military tribunes, but at the time above-mentioned, the sixth received a deadly wound. It was, however, afterwards healed, by the revival of the imperial name and dignity, in the person of Charles the Great, who was proclaimed Augustus, A. D. 800; and this head hath subsisted ever since in the emperors of Germany, or of the holy Roman empire. After this, the temporal and ecclesiastical rulers mutually strengthening each other, the Roman power became again formidable, and all the world was astonished to behold that empire revived, which seemed to be totally extinct: so that a superstitious and idolatrous obedience was rendered to this temporal authority, as engaged to support the ecclesiastical tyranny of the Romish church. Thus they virtually worshipped the dragon, who gave his power to the beast, by submitting without reserve to the same idolatrous persecuting power as before, only in another form; and they worshipped the beast as one who never had his equal on earth, and who would surely crush all that presumed to oppose him. So that the old idolatry was fully re-established, with new names; and the worship of idols, or creatures, is in effect worshipping the devil. Some explain "the deadly wound," inflicted on one head of the beast, to mean the revolution which took place, when Christian emperors succeeded the Pagan persecuting emperors; and the healing of this deadly wound, of the subsequent establishment of another idolatrous persecuting power, bearing the Christian name. The two interpretations agree in the grand outline; and the nature of this work precludes the particular consideration of subordinate questions.

V. 5—7. To this monstrous beast "was given a "mouth, speaking great things and blasphemies." It will soon be stated, that the ecclesiastical power of Rome was the agent, and the Pope the speaking image of the beast; (11—15.) and every one knows what blasphemous and enormous claims of His holiness, Infallibility, Sovereign of kings and kingdoms, Christ's vicegerent on earth, yea, God upon earth," have been spoken by this mouth of the beast. Power also, or the secular empire, was given him to continue, or rather to practise, or to prosper in his undertakings, for forty-two months, or twelve hundred and sixty years. He would during this period "open his mouth in blasphemies against God," combining with the ecclesiastical power in its usurpations, and in entrenching upon the Lord's peculiar honours and prerogatives. "He would blaspheme the name of God," by requiring all men, at the instigation of the ecclesiastical power, to render that worship to creatures, which belonged to him only, "and his tabernacle," or true Christians, by stigmatizing, anathematizing, and murdering them as heretics, "and them that dwell in heaven," by scandalizing angels and departed saints, as if they sacrilegiously sought, and were pleased with, the worship paid to them, and by ascribing to the latter a variety of ridiculous actions which they never did. It was also given "to the beast to wage war against, and overcome, the "saints;" and no computation can reach the numbers who have been put to death, in different ways, on account of their maintaining the profession of the Gospel, and opposing the corruptions of the church of Rome.' A million of the poor Waldenses perished in France; nine hundred thousand orthodox Christians were slain in less than thirty years after the institution of the Jesuits; the duke of Alva boasted of having put thirty-six thousand to death in the Netherlands, by the hands of the common executioner, during the space of a few years; the inquisition destroyed by various tortures one hundred and fifty thousands Christians, within thirty years; these are a few specimens, and but a few, of those which history hath recorded; but the total amount will never be known, till "the earth shall disclose her blood, and shall no more "cover her slain." These were put to death by the secular arm, by that power, of which the empire was the head, and which subsisted in ten kingdoms. Mr. Faber has here very justly pointed out an inaccuracy in bishop Newton, who seems to confound this beast, or the secular empire in all the ten kingdoms, with the little horn predicted by Daniel, which accords to the second beast, afterwards mentioned. Yet, as the secular power executed the persecuting decrees of the ecclesiastical, and gave its power to that beast, the things stated by bishop Newton, as accomplishments of this prophecy, were evidently such, though he has not, with his usual accuracy, marked the manner in which this took place.

V. 8—10. By the means above-mentioned, the beast maintained his dominion over all the inhabitants of the western world, who all worshipped him, by the most abject submission of body, soul, and conscience, except "the remnant according to the election of grace," "whose "names were written in the book of life," belonging to "the Lamb that had been slain from the foundation of "the world." It is not quite clear whether Christ be here said to "have been slain from the foundation of the "world," in the purpose of God, and the efficacy of his blood to the salvation of all believers; or whether the names of the persons spoken of were written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, as the elect of God; but both amount to the same thing. This prophecy was of that importance to the encouragement and direction of believers, during the reign of the beast, as well as for the due understanding of the greatest part of this book, that the attention of every one was especially called to it. For though the persecutors would assuredly be destroyed, in the same manner as they had destroyed others, yet here would be the trial of the faith and patience of the saints, to bear up under such complicated dangers and sufferings, and of so long continuance, beyond the example of all former times, and to persevere in faith and obedience through them.

V. 11, 12. This second beast did not come up out of the sea, or from wars and tumults, as the first did, but out of the earth, silently and gradually, as plants spring up, (2 Pet. ii. 1.) and it had two horns like a lamb, denoting that it was a spiritual dominion, professedly derived from Christ, and exercised in a gentle manner. This beast was, therefore, the emblem of the Roman hierarchy, and his two horns have, very probably, been supposed to signify the regular and secular clergy of that church; as the other beast was of the temporal authority exercised in the ten kingdoms of the empire, in support of that spiritual tyranny. The second beast is elsewhere called "the false prophet." (xvi. 13. xix. 20.) which abundantly confirms this interpretation. 'In the 'language of symbols, horns are kingdoms, consequently 'the horns of an ecclesiastical beast must be ecclesiastical 'kingdoms. Now I know not what idea we can annex 'to an ecclesiastical kingdom, subservient to the head of 'an ecclesiastical empire, except that of a regularly organ'ized body of ecclesiastics, subject primarily to their 'own immediate superior, and ultimately to the head of 'the whole empire.' (Faber.) Thus the regular clergy, or the different orders of monks, are subject to the principal of their order, who himself is subject to the church and bishop of Rome; and, in like manner, the secular clergy, or parochial ministers, and others connected with them, are subject primarily to their ordinary, or diocesan bishop, he to the archbishop, primate, metropolitan, or patriarch, but all to the church and bishop of Rome.—And as they are enjoined celibacy, this subjection, and their devotedness to the common cause of that church, are most entire and efficacious. But though the beast had horns as a lamb, yet he spake as a dragon, or with all the tyranny and cruelty of the persecuting Roman emperors; and the high claims of authority, and the peremptory commands, menaces, and decisions of the Roman hierarchy, are well known. The second beast is likewise the minister, adviser, or agent of the first beast, and "exerciseth all his "power before him;" accordingly, the different orders of monks, as well as the secular clergy of Rome, have always possessed immense influence in the affairs of the kings and nations belonging to that communion; their principal ministers of state have generally been cardinals, or other ecclesiastics; the magistrate has been engaged to use his sword to enforce their decrees, or execute their sentences against heretics, and bloody wars without number have been waged in support of their antichristian dominion. In return for these services, they "cause the earth to worship "the first beast;" they have always been the enemies of civil liberty, and the supporters of tyranny, and even of the unlawful commands of those princes who supported their authority, which is a kind of idolatry, as it exalts the will of man above that of God. So that tyranny upholds them, and they uphold tyranny; they enslave men's consciences, and help kings to enslave their persons; and in both respects enforce idolatry. The ecclesiastical power 'is the common centre and cement, which unites 'all the distinct kingdoms of the Roman empire, and, by 'joining with them, procures them a blind obedience from 'their subjects, and so it is the occasion of the preserva'tion of the old Roman empire, in some kind of unity, 'and name, and strength.' (Whiston.) Implicit obedience, however, to the authority of the beast, as supporting idolatry, and requiring men to worship creatures and images, under heavy penalties, must be especially meant. 'Here we have a plain prediction of some spi'ritual power, which should arrogate to itself universal 'or catholic authority in religious matters, which should 'co-exist upon the most friendly terms with the ten-horned 'temporal empire, instigating it to persecute, during the 'space of forty-two prophetic months, all such as 'should dare to dispute its usurped domination, and which 'in short should solve the symbolical problem of two con'temporary beasts, by exhibiting to the world the singular 'spectacle of a complete empire within an empire. 'Where we are to look for this power, since the great 'Roman beast was divided into ten horns, let the im'partial voice of history determine.' 'Daniel, who fully 'delineates the character of the little horn, is entirely 'silent respecting the two-horned beast. John, who as 'fully delineates the character of the two-horned beast, is 'entirely silent respecting the little horn. The little horn 'and the two-horned beast, act precisely in the same 'capacity; each exercising the power of the first beast 'before him, and each perishing in one common destruc'tion with him.' (Faber.) (Notes, Dan. vii.)

V. 13—17. The second beast maintains his power by “doing great wonders, &c.” (Notes, 2 Thes. ii. 1—9.) These, whether they be human impostures, or wrought by the agency of Satan, he doeth in the sight of men to deceive them, and in the sight of the first beast to serve him; but they are neither performed by the power, nor for the glory of God. The fire may allude to the miracles wrought by Elijah, (Marg. Ref.) and predict the vain pretences of the beast to miracles of the same kind; but some interpret it thus: ‘Heaven is a symbol of the church, and the earth of the Roman empire. The darting forth of fire out of the church upon the secular empire must mean solemn interdicts and excommunications, pronounced against those who dared to oppose the authority of the beast.’ (Faber.) Thus the miracles, of which the advocates for popery boast as certain marks of a true church, are here shown to be the distinguishing stigma of antichrist; that is, such ambiguous and suspicious miracles, or indeed any miracles, if wrought in support of idolatry, in opposition to the doctrines of scripture, and to justify the persecuting cruelty of those who profess them. (Notes, Deut. xiii.) By these means the two-horned beast, or the regular and secular clergy, deceived the inhabitants of the earth to make an image of the first beast, or the temporal authority of the empire, as it formerly subsisted in the reigning emperor at Rome. This image has indeed been variously interpreted. But is not the pope, as a temporal prince, the very image of the ancient emperors? Is he not, as the pretended infallible head of the church, the great idol of all zealous papists? and is he not, in both respects, the representative of the whole antichristian tyranny? Can we then doubt who this image is? Or can we help being amazed at this exact and circumstantial prediction of such improbable events, so many hundred years before they took place? The two-horned beast, or the Roman clergy, as represented by the consistory of cardinals, which assembles at the death of a pope, makes the image, when they elect a private person to that exalted station; and, by putting him in possession of the supreme authority, they give life to him as the image of the ten-horned beast, and enable him to speak, by uttering his bulls and mandates, as well as to use the names of blasphemy before-mentioned. But before this, they robe and crown the image which they have made, they place him on an altar, and kiss his feet, and they call this ceremony adoration! Like other idolaters, they make their idol, and then worship him; and an ancient medal, struck on that occasion, has this motto, Quem creant, adorant, ‘Whom they create, they adore!’ Then they use all their power and influence to support his authority through all the nations of their communion; and concur in persecuting even unto death all those, who will not join in the same idolatrous observance of it. ‘The pope is the principle of unity to the ten kingdoms of the beast, and he causeth, as far as he is able, all who will not acknowledge his supremacy to be put to death. In short, he is the most perfect resemblance of the ancient Roman emperors, is as great a tyrant in the Christian, as they were in the heathen world, presides in the same city, usurps the same powers, affects the same titles, and requires the same homage and adoration. So that the prophecy descends more and more into particulars, from the Roman state, or the ten kingdoms in general, to the Roman clergy in particular, and then to the pope, the head of the state, as well as of the church, the king of kings, as well as the bishop of bishops.’ (Newton.) The second beast likewise performeth other offices to the first beast, by excommunicating all those who refuse subjection to its usurped dominion, and conformity to the established worship, and thus exposing them to various temporal incapacities and punishments, as outlawed persons; so that, of whatever rank they be, they must either be marked in their right hands and their foreheads, with the mark, name, and number of the beast, as slaves and cattle are branded and numbered; that is, they must openly profess the religion of the church of Rome, and conform to its idolatries and superstitions, as the bond slaves of the beast and his image, in body, soul, and conscience, (and so be marked with the name of the beast,) or they must be inhibited from all commercial dealings, and even excluded from the most needful intercourse with mankind. Many instances of this sort are recorded in history. Thus the second beast, though, appearing as a lamb, spake like a dragon. By the mark of the beast, some understand the sign of the cross, which is used, not only in a most superstitious, but even an idolatrous manner, continually, as discriminating, and as required by authority in the church of Rome. Some explain the making of the image to mean the establishment of image-worship, and the various impostures, by which the deluded votaries were induced to suppose that the images lived, and moved, and spake. But whoever consults the marginal references will perceive such a contrast between this image, and all others mentioned in scripture, (and doubtless other priests have possessed ingenuity, and bestowed pains, in deluding the people,) that he will hesitate at a conclusion, which makes this image, in no respect, essentially different from the others. If, however, life and speaking might be interpreted to mean the priestcraft, which made the people think the images lived and spake, surely what follows must be interpreted in a most unnatural manner, when the occasion taken by the priests to persecute, is spoken of in this language; “and the image of the beast shall both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast, should be killed, &c.” It is indeed argued, that the original g i.3. xvii 9. should be rendered, "made an image to the beast, or, for " his use," and not of him; but instances may be brought from the Greek writers of exactly similar expressions, where the meaning is indisputably according to our translation of this passage. Indeed, if a literal image, or literal images, be meant, and yet the beasts are not supposed to be literal beasts, or the horns to be literal horns, this blending of the literal with the figurative, in the same prophecy, is not only contrary to the rules of sound interpretation, but a direct violation of that laid down by the respectable writer who has adopted this interpretation. 'The whole book, excepting those few passages, 'which are avowedly descriptive, must be understood 'either literally throughout, or figuratively throughout; 'otherwise it will be impossible to ascertain the meaning 'designed to be conveyed.' (Faber.) But if the pope be really this image, the language is both natural, and extremely expressive; and it has been literally verified in numerous instances, by papal interdicts, excommunications, and similar measures. I own, that the objections brought against this interpretation only lead me to perceive, that, if preceding expositors could have foreseen what their successors would have objected to their statement, they would have expressed themselves more cautiously and accurately. It is true, that the pope may be considered as in some sense the head also of the two-horned beast; yet the beast continues to exist, when there is no pope; and the cardinals, as representing the whole ecclesiastical power, are, during that vacancy, the head of the beast, and in that character they create the pope, to be the image, both of the secular and the ecclesiastical, idolatrous, persecuting power, the representative of the whole. He does not derive his dominion from any hereditary right, or from popular election, or from regal appointment; but he is the creature of the Romish clergy; yet, being created by them, he is the object of their worship, and exercises, or at least claims a right to exercise, absolute authority over both them and the kings of the earth. Indeed this claim was long generally admitted by the ten horns of the beast, though in some instances it was disputed. (xvii. 12—18.) This seems sufficient for the purpose, and, amidst so many emblems, it could hardly be supposed that no shadow of coincidence should appear. —'It may be observed, that when the first, or secular, 'beast is represented as making war with the saints and 'overcoming them, it is no where said, that the second, 'or ecclesiastical, beast should do more than cause them 'to be killed. The little horn has always worn out the 'saints, by delivering them over to the secular arm, not 'by slaying them itself. The inquisitors, with a disgusting affectation of lamb-like meekness, are wont to 'beseech the civil magistrates to show mercy to those 'unfortunate victims, whom they themselves have given 'up to be consigned to the flames.' (Faber.) (Note, 5—7.) There are various other interpretations, by different writers, of several things in these chapters, chiefly explaining them of recent events in France; but not judging any of them either well grounded, or even supported by probable arguments, I did not think it needful to introduce them in this work. The books, written expressly on the subject, must be referred to; and, in general, the writers succeed better in attempting to refute each other's interpretation, than in establishing their own, where they materially differ from the expositors, who wrote before these late transactions.

V. 18. Mention having been made of the number of the beast, or that of his name, the apostle next proposed to men's consideration the number itself; introducing it by saying, "Here is wisdom:" or intimating that the discovery of the name of the beast, from the number, would be a proof of a man's discernment; let such, therefore, as had understanding, count the number of the beast; and who then shall censure or ridicule those who attempt to do it? For it was the number of a man, either such a number as men use, or a number implying in it the name, title, or distinguishing characteristic, of a man. Now the Greek word Lateinos signifies the Latin man, or the man of Latium, from which place the Romans derived their original and their language; and this word, according to the genuine orthography, contains, in numerical letters, exactly the number six hundred and sixty-six. The church of Rome is properly the Latin church, and they use the Latin language in every thing; and so the beast, or the authority exercised through the ten kingdoms in support of that church, of which the pope is the living image, may well be called Lateinos. But though the apostle wrote in Greek, he yet used some Hebrew names in this book; so we may perhaps think he alluded to a name in that language; and it is most astonishing that the word Romiith in Hebrew, which answers to Lateinos, signifies Roman, contains in numeral letters exactly six hundred and sixty-six. Nor can any other two words be produced, from two different languages, which so nearly coincide together in meaning, and exacly stand for, the same number in numerical letters; the coincidence is really most surprising. As John could only refer to the Greek or the Hebrew language in this matter, and as the number of the name of the Latin man, or the Roman, in both languages is exactly the number of the beast, so I see no occasion to doubt any more, either about the beast or his number, especially as Ireneus in the second century put the same construction on it. Romiith is indeed feminine; but it may signify either the Roman church, or kingdom, the Hebrew words for both which are feminine. The word Latinus, or Lateinos, is, however, in all respects the most satisfactory, notwithstanding this coincidence. 'No name, 'though it may possibly comprehend the number six hundred and sixty-six, can be the name of the beast, unless 'it equally answers in all other particulars to the prophetic description of that name. Lateinos is at once 'the name of a man, (the ancient king of Latium, whence 'Rome had its origin,) the title of an empire; and the 'distinguishing appellation of every individual in that 'empire; and when the sum of its numerical letters is 'taken in the Greek language, it amounts to six hundred 'and sixty-six. On these grounds, then, I do not hesitate

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The enemies of the church carry on their designs under a variety of odious and terrifying forms, and they often unite, or divide among them, the fierceness and cruelty of savage beasts, with the subtlety and poison of serpents; and, if it will answer their purpose better, they appear as gentle lambs, in order that, when they have opportunity, they may speak as dragons, and "lord it over God's heritage" with cruel tyranny. They have commonly possessed great power; and when any of the heads of this Leviathan have seemed to be broken in pieces, they have been again healed, and in another form they even to this day return to the combat. Indeed, they have much encouragement from the world, for men are far more disposed to wonder, and to celebrate the praises of these monsters of iniquity, (as if none were like them, or could stand before them,) than to hear the word of God from his faithful witnesses, or even to adore and submit to the Son of God himself! But the mouths, even of those who open them in blasphemy, were given by that God whom they thus affront, and that power is derived from him, which men use in making war against his saints; nor can men of any description reign over the nations, or practise against the church, further than he sees good to permit. All will, in one way or other, be deceived, whose names are not written in the "book of life of the Lamb that was slain," "according to the eternal purpose which he hath purposed "in himself." The vengeance that is written will surely be executed on all persecutors and wicked oppressors, but the saints need much faith and patience, when their lot is cast in evil times, and they should cry unto God continually, that they may be faithful unto death, and so receive the crown of life. Ungodly priests and tyrannical rulers support each other's usurpations, iniquities, exactions, and oppressions; whilst the one, by war, or cruel executions, destroy all opposers, and the other deceive or terrify men by lying miracles, false doctrines, anathemas, and ecclesiastical censures. But all these evils should be considered as illustrative of the deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the human heart, and as endearing to us the love of God in Christ Jesus. The review ought also to make us thankful for our civil and religious liberties. We are exposed to no interdicts, no prisons, no cruel tortures or death, for not worshipping after the manner, or at the dictate, of either prince or priest; nor are we tempted, by circumstances of danger, to profess and subscribe what we do not believe, or conform to what we do not approve, though, alas! numbers choose to do it, "for filthy lucre's sake!" We shall therefore be doubly inexcusable, if we do not embrace and profess the truth of Christ and worship the Father according to his appointed ordinances; or if we do not pray for the peace of those, under whose mild government we enjoy so many privileges, observing the rule of the wise man, to "fear "God and the king, and not to meddle with those that "are given to change." But he, that hath wisdom and understanding in these things, will see that all the enemies of God are numbered and marked out to destruction, that the term of their power will soon expire, and that all nations shall at length submit to our "King of righteous-"ness and peace."

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1—5. The apostle having been shown the foregoing particulars concerning Papal Rome, with its idolatry and tyranny, had next a vision of the true church in the wilderness, during the same period, with special reference to the darkest times, previous to the dawning of the reformation. and of heaven itself, and with him were a hundred and forty-four thousand persons. (Notes, vii. 1—8.) This seems a mystical number, the twelve patriarchs multiplied by the twelve apostles, and both multiplied by a thousand, as if the hundred and forty-four were leaders of thousands; so that there was a considerable number of true Israelites, and of those who held the apostle's doctrine, and marched under their banner, in the most degenerate times; being the successors of that remnant, which was found in the first three centuries, during the persecutions of the heathen emperors. As the worshippers of the beast were marked with his name and seal, so these disciples of Christ had the name of his Father written in legible characters on their foreheads; they were his worshippers, they bore his image, they avowed and evidently showed that they belonged to him. (xiii. 8.) It is evident from history that there were such persons, in the darkest times, who ventured, nay, laid down their lives, for the truth and worship of the Gospel; for these were the same as the two witnesses during the times in which they lived, only represented under another emblem. This multitude were singing a new song before the throne, with a voice loud as that of mighty rushing waters, or that of thunder, yet exquisitely melodious, and accompanied with the music of harpers of consummate skill. No doubt the new song which they sang was the same for substance with that which has been already considered, (v. 9—14. vii. 9—12.) This was sung in the presence of the emblematic representatives of the church and its ministers, and none could learn it but the redeemed. For, as it related immediately to redemption, the proud, the impenitent, the unbelieving, and the carnal, could not understand the nature or the glory of this subject, nor could angels join in it, not being redeemed to God by the blood of the Lamb, though they unite in worshipping him, as worthy to receive all honour and blessing. The antichristian church soon discouraged and reviled marriage, enjoined celibacy on priests, immured numbers of both sexes in convents, extolled virginity as almost essential to piety and purity, and ranked its virgins with the saints and martyrs of the primitive times. (Note, 1 Tim. iv. 1—3.) But these unnatural restrictions, and attempts to introduce a kind of life on earth, which in general only suits the inhabitants of heaven, made way, not only for exorbitant spiritual pride, but also for the most unnatural and detestable licentiousness, and for crimes too horrid to be specified; and at the same time the church was polluted with the most manifest and abominable idolatry, or spiritual fornication. But, says the apostle by the Spirit of prophecy, these true Christians are they, who are not defiled with women; "marriage being honourable in all, and the bed undefiled," the clause may be understood even in the literal sense. For, says he, "they are virgins," even such as the scripture commends, who are espoused to and love Christ, who are faithful and obedient to him, and deeming themselves his alone and wholly, wait for the completion of their sacred union with him, and in the mean time prefer suffering and death to the spiritual fornication and adultery, to which all others are given up. (Note, 2 Cor. xi. 1—3.) They, therefore, followed him, whithersoever he went, through persecutions and tribulations, into obscurity, or into prisons, with self-denial, obedient faith, and patient hope, taking up their cross, and copying his example of meekness, purity, and love. These were the persons who had been redeemed from among men, being actually interested in the atonement of Christ, and they were consecrated to God as first fruits, (for whose sake he spared others,) and to the Lamb, "as purified unto him, to be his peculiar people, zealous of good works." They were not hypocrites, but upright in their repentance, faith, and love, and they held, professed, and preached the true doctrine of Christ, so that they were accepted and sanctified persons, against whom no charge could be alleged before the throne of God. 'The hundred and forty-four thousand appeared to the apostle as standing on the mount Sion, or in the true church, because they constituted the persecuted church in the wilderness; (Rev. xii. 6—14.) and as the followers of the beast have the mark and name of the beast, so have these the seal of God impressed, (Rev. vii. 3.) and the name of God written on their foreheads. They alone are able to learn the new song of the heavenly harpers, because they alone are the worshippers of the one true God, through the one true mediator Jesus Christ, the adherents of the apostacy offering up their devotions to other objects, and through other mediators. They are virgins, undefiled with women, inasmuch as they are free from the pollutions of idolatry, which is spiritual whoredom and adultery. They follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, resolutely adhering to the religion of Christ in troublesome times, as well as in prosperous ones, and fleeing into sequestered valleys and wild deserts, rather than relinquish their profession of the Gospel. They are redeemed from among men, being rescued by the almighty power of divine grace from the corruptions and abominations of Babylon; and they are consecrated as the first-fruits of Christianity, unto God and the Lamb, an earnest and assurance of a more plentiful harvest; first, at the era of the reformation, and afterwards at the yet more glorious era of the Millennium. In their mouth was found no guile; inasmuch as they handle not the word of God deceitfully, like popish venders of indulgences, and preachers of purgatory, human merit, and idolatry; but faithfully and simply declare the way of everlasting life. And they are without fault before the throne of God, having washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, God not imputing their trespasses unto them, but accounting them as if they had never sinned, through the imputed righteousness of Christ, who was "made sin for them," in order that they might "be made the righteousness of God in him." By these hundred and forty-four thousand, I understand peculiarly the depressed church in the wilderness, previous to the time of the Reformation; for history sufficiently demonstrates, that there have been in every age some faithful worshippers, who consented not to the general apostacy, but who prophesied, although in sackcloth, against its abominations.' V. 6, 7. It is generally admitted by the best interpreters, that the three angels, in these and the following verses, were emblematical heralds of the progressive reformation from popery. When, therefore, the extent and prevalence of the power of the beast, at its full height, had been predicted in the foregoing chapter, the diminution and weakening of it, as introductory to the destruction, is intimated in this. Some explain the proclamation of the first angel, of the ninth, tenth, or eleventh centuries; and no doubt there were then both princes, bishops, and councils, who struggled against the worship of images, and other abominations of the church of Rome. Yet they generally concurred in supporting the dominion of the beast, though they wanted to have it exercised in a different manner as to some particulars. Such, however, as were real Christians, and entered a proper protest against the prevailing corruptions of the church, whether in the imperial palace, or in the conclave, (if that was ever done,) may properly be ranked in the number mentioned in the former verses; for these evidently relate to a more public and general protestation. But others seem to fix the time of their accomplishment too late, and so leave a large gap in the series of predicted events, and then crowd too many into the remaining periods. We may, therefore, I apprehend, interpret this first angel, or herald, of those who first publicly erected the standard of reformation, and who contended for the everlasting Gospel of Christ, in opposition to all the innovations and usurpations of the beast, his image, and the false prophet. This honour seems to belong to the Waldenses and Albigenses, who had the true Gospel among them, avowed its everlasting obligation and excellency, opposed it to the authority of popes, councils, and persecuting princes, declared the pope to be antichrist, propagated their doctrines with zeal and success, and multiplied into a vast number of churches; and after immense slaughter had been made of them by persecutions and bloody wars, they still retained their tenets, and being dispersed into other countries, they rapidly carried the everlasting Gospel with them; (as an angel, a messenger of peace to men, flying through the midst of heaven;) so that the Lollards in England, and the Bohemians, and many others in different places, seem to have principally learned the Gospel from them; and the reformation itself appears to have sprung from the seed which they sowed, and watered with rivers of their blood. So exact was the prophecy, that they had the everlasting Gospel to preach to the inhabitants of the earth; and that they loudly called on men to fear and glorify God, as the hour of his judgment was at hand; and to worship the Creator of all things, as revealed in the Gospel, by refusing to join in the worship of idols, and that of the beast and his image. Some respectable commentators explain these verses of Luther, almost exclusively, and suppose that many things, in his situation, character, and testimony, remarkably answered to it. I cannot, however, think that the previous public testimonies against the beast are wholly passed over, or that an individual occupies so conspicuous a station in this concise prophecy. Nor am I convinced that more modern events, or the present zeal for missions is meant, because the testimony of the angel, or messenger, was evidently borne against popery, not heathen idolatry. Everlasting, &c. (6.) 'It is styled, "The everlasting Gospel;" 'being, like its divine Author, "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever;" 'in opposition to the doctrines of the beast, and the false prophet, 'which shall be "rooted up, as not of the heavenly "Father's planting." (Matt. xv. 13.) (Bp. Newton.)

V. 8. If we explain the first angel as the herald of the dawning of the reformation, in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries, we may properly explain this of the Bohemians and others in the fifteenth, who were their genuine offspring and successors. Some of these persons, with still greater confidence and vehemence than the Albigenses, declared Rome to be mystical Babylon, and the pope and church there to be antichrist: and they endured severe persecutions for these protestations, and for their profession of the Gospel. John Huss and Jerom of Prague, especially, were perfidiously and cruelly burned by the council of Constance, which council was in fact the united power of the whole antichristian beast. These heralds announced the fall of mystical Babylon, as the ancient prophet had done that of literal Babylon, long before the event; (Marg. Ref.) nor was this doom more certain than it would be just, as she had corrupted and intoxicated the nations, not only with her love-potions, as a seducing harlot, but by the wine of the wrath of her fornications, terrifying men into idolatry by fierce persecutions. As Rome was mentioned under the name and emblem of a Gentile city, so her idolatry was called fornication, rather than adultery, as it generally was, when committed by the professed worshippers of God. (xvii. 2.) Bishop Newton explains this verse of the Waldenses, and the foregoing verses of more ancient events; on the contrary, Mr. Faber interprets those verses of Luther, and this of Calvin and his associates. This, however, seems to me to render individuals too prominent in this concise prophecy. Nor should I have mentioned the names of John Huss and Jerom of Prague, except as they were the mouth, or voice, of a very large body of men, delivering its testimony in the most public manner conceivable, and sealing it by their martyrdom. Still I observe that the grand outlines are clear, and commentators in general are agreed

9 And [l] the third angel followed them, saying, with a loud voice, [m] If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand,

10 The same shall [n] drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture [o] into the cup of his indignation; and he shall [p] be tormented with fire and brimstone [q] in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb:

about them; so that the subordinate differences of opinion do not affect the main argument. Some indeed would explain this verse of future times, because Babylon is not yet totally fallen; but this deranges the whole plan of interpretation adopted by the ablest expositors, which is the only clue that can lead us through its mazes, and so introduces perplexity and uncertainty. Nothing is more common in prophecy, than for future events, as absolutely determined, to be spoken of in the present or past time. (Marg. Ref.) 'The clue that has principally conducted me through both parts of the Revelation is, following the series of history, and the successive order of events. After the description of the two beasts, secular and ecclesiastical, whose power was established according to my hypothesis in the eighth century, but, according to most commentators, much sooner, there would be a very large chasm, without the prediction of any memorable event, if these prophecies relate to the time immediately preceding the fall of Antichrist, and the Millennium. What a long interval would there be without any prophecy, and how thick would the events follow afterwards! For all the particulars to the end of the nineteenth chapter, must be fulfilled before the Millennium.' (Bp. Newton.) It is also worthy of notice, that, about the era above-mentioned, the opinion began to be publicly avowed by several persons, that the church, court, and city of Rome, were Babylon, and so inevitably doomed to destruction.

V. 9—11. This third angel and his proclamation, may be explained of Luther, and his loud, rough, and vehement protestation against the idolatries of the church and bishop of Rome, and that whole antichristian fabric; yet we must also take in all his coadjutors and successors, and all the effects of this combined and persevering protestation to this day, and even beyond it. His voice, and that of those who were raised up in divers countries to join him, and to follow up the assault, was indeed very loud. They attacked the beast with far more vehemence than any that went before had done: they not only declared him to be antichrist, but they carried their researches into the idolatries, iniquities and impostures of the whole system, and showed that it was utterly incompatible with the religion of the Scriptures, and founded in ignorance, usurpation, avarice, and hypocrisy; and they insisted on the necessity of separating from so corrupt a church, boldly retorting the charge of heresy and schism, and fully proving it. Thus they induced whole nations to cast off all regard to the church of Rome, and engaged vast multitudes to protest against popery as a damnable religion, not only in the persecuting tyrants who imposed, but in all who, even from dread of persecution, or from still worse motives, conformed to it; and this was exactly the purport of the third angel's proclamation. They loudly insisted upon it, that all who adhered, with a blind and devoted attachment, to the beast and his image, professing their abominable doctrines, conforming to their idolatries, concurring in their cruelties, and reducing their principles to practice, (being intoxicated with "the wine of the wrath of her "fornication,") would drink of the unmingled wine of God's wrath, from the cup of his indignation; yea, that they would be tormented with fire and brimstone, or be cast into hell, to be tormented in that flame; that this would be in the presence of the holy angels, who would applaud the justice of their punishment; and in the presence of the Lamb, who would pronounce and execute the sentence upon them, for their opposition to his Gospel, and for giving his mediatorial glory to saints and angels; and "that the smoke of their torment would ascend up for "ever and ever." The words translated "for ever and "ever," are the most energetic that are found in the whole Greek language to signify eternity, and seem incapable of any other meaning. The passage, therefore, evidently predicts the clear and strong manner, in which the reformers protested and argued against purgatory, and insisted upon it that the wicked would be tormented in hell for ever; and a subsequent verse evidently opposes the same doctrine, by showing the immediate happiness of believers after death. (13.) Every one that is at all conversant with the writings of the reformers, and their successors, knows that they generally declared, without hesitation, that popery was a damnable religion. Mr. Hooker, in Queen Elizabeth's time, brought himself into suspicion, and was engaged in a dispute, because he asserted, with much caution, and many distinctions, that papists might be saved; and, whatever contempt may be cast on their bigotry, in this day of false candour, liberality, and disregard to the Scriptures, it is worthy of serious consideration, whether this passage does not warrant most of what these reformers advanced on that subject, though they might not always properly distinguish between those who hated the light, and those whose eyes were too weak to endure its effulgence, when it broke in upon them all at once. To explain this most energetic passage, which beyond doubt predicts a general and most awful protestation against the leading tenets of popery as damnable, in all who embrace and adhere to them, as well as in the inventors and imposers of them, to signify any testimony, or protest, made in a single kingdom, (as for instance, in England,) seems to me a departure from the grand scale, on which these prophecies should be interpreted; and as totally inadmissible.

V. 12, 13. When the doctrines above-mentioned began to be openly propagated, terrible persecutions were raised: it was therefore added, "Here is the patience of the "saints." They would have abundant need to exercise patience, in obeying God and holding the true doctrine of Christ, amidst the bloody race of inquisitors and persecutors, who kindled fires on earth to torture and burn them, though they called in vain for fire from heaven to destroy them; (xiii. 13;) and who, by such cruelties, together with wars and massacres, destroyed incredible multitudes, in opposing the progress of the reformation. To encourage the saints to patience, in suffering for the truth even unto death, the apostle showed, that he heard a voice from heaven, ordering him to write, "Blessed are the "dead which die in the Lord," or in the true faith and hope of the Gospel; even "from henceforth." This verse hath much perplexed commentators, in respect of its prophetical meaning and connexion: but upon the plan which we are pursuing nothing can be more obvious. The doctrine of purgatory, with indulgences, human merits to be sold by the church, masses, and prayers for the dead; was one principal source of wealth, influence, and authority to the clergy of the church of Rome. This also first stirred up the spirit of Luther, who began his attack by protesting against these abuses: and, by examining the scriptures, he and his followers established it, as a certain truth, in the judgment of vast multitudes, that there was no such place as purgatory; but that the wicked when they die go directly to hell, and believers immediately enter heaven. Now what words could more aptly predict this change in men's sentiments, than these do? It is most evident, from the internal chronology of the book, and from the series of predicted events, that the reformation was here intended; and the apostle was ordered to write, just in this place, (probably he knew not on what account,) "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, from hence-"forth;" that is, from this period believers would generally understand that encouraging truth; and not have to encounter the fears of purgatory, or to apprehend a delay of their felicity, when seized with the agonies of death, or called to suffer martyrdom for Christ's sake. And in fact the expectation of immediate happiness, was the joy and support of those numbers, who were burned alive, or otherwise cruelly martyred, during those times. This voice from heaven was attested by an internal impulse of the Holy Spirit, who assured the apostle, that believers rested after death from all their labours and sufferings, and had no purgatory to fear; and that their works followed them, to prove the sincerity of their faith, and to ensure a gracious reward.

V. 14—20. Thus far we have generally proceeded by the guidance of past events, and have obtained considerable satisfaction in explaining these prophecies; but here, I apprehend, that direction almost wholly fails us. This supposition is confirmed by the evident inability of expositors to make any regular and consistent application of the subsequent chapters, except as coincident with those things which have been already considered. (xiv.) Under this persuasion, of which further reasons will be afterwards assigned, I shall not obtrude mere conjectures on the reader, nor attempt to pry into things not seen as yet. Hitherto, in general, the ground hath seemed good, and the road plain; and I have felt some confidence, as well as used caution, in the progress: but caution must be almost my only companion and monitor in what now remains; for the country is unknown, and no guide is to be found, who understands any thing certainly of the road. The exact and surprising fulfilment of many, and complicated

CHAP. XV.

A vision of seven angels, prepared to execute judgments; with the triumphant song of the church on that occasion, 1—4. Seven vials given to the angels for that purpose, and the temple is filled with smoke, 5—8.

predictions, through the course of seventeen hundred years, has been shown, which is a real demonstration of the truth of the Scriptures; but we must bequeath to posterity the satisfaction of understanding, and being filled with adoring wonder at witnessing the accomplishment of the rest. The prophecy hath been evidently traced down to the reformation, and this may include all that has intervened to this day, or shall intervene, till the slaying of the witnesses and their resurrection. (Notes, xi. 7—14.) Whether the events here predicted precede, or follow, the sounding of the seventh, or third, wo trumpet, I cannot absolutely determine; but they seem evidently to relate to the fall of popery, and perhaps give a succinct intimation of what is more fully predicted in the next and following chapters. The preceding events not having produced a voluntary and effectual reformation in the kingdom of the beast, the iniquity of those nations will be filled up, and they will become ripe for judgments, which are emblematically described as a harvest and a vintage; and as the latter succeeds to the former in the course of nature, so it is subsequent to it in the prophecy, and will be far more terrible. Christ appeared to the apostle in vision, like to the Son of Man in human nature, upon a white cloud, the emblem of his holy, righteous, and mysterious dispensations; his golden crown signified his super-eminent authority, and his sharp sickle his terrible vengeance on his enemies. The angel out of the temple, may signify the ministers of the Gospel, as employed to announce the approach of these judgments; and the second angel coming out of the temple, to reap the vintage, may represent some executioner, or succession of executioners, of the wrath of Christ on the opposers of his authority; whilst the third angel from the altar, who had power over fire, giving orders to the second angel to reap the vintage, implies that these judgments would render a sacrifice to divine justice, and consume, as with fire, those who had despised or abused the atoning sacrifice of Christ. The casting of the vintage into the wine-press of God's wrath, and the treading of it without the city, (as being no part of the true Church,) can only be explained by the event. But it is remarkable, that sixteen hundred furlongs, or two hundred miles, is exactly the length of the papal dominions in Italy, and probably these will be deluged with blood, in a most awful manner, which is represented by language most tremendously hyperbolical. Some expositors, who have written since this interpretation was first made, decide, with confidence, that the bloody scenes lately exhibited in France and on the continent, are the fulfilment of the prophecy concerning "the harvest," though the vintage is yet future; nor do I at all doubt, but that posterity will clearly see that these events began to accomplish the prediction. I cannot, however, think, either that, at so early a stage, we are capable of determining on the subject, or that a more general and almost universal display of divine vengeance, on all the kingdoms of the beast, (those only excepted who have fully and decidedly cast off its dominion,) is intended by the harvest.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The Lord reserves a remnant to himself in the worst of times, who dissent from the prevailing idolatries and abominations; who profess his truth and bear his image; who sing the praises of redeeming grace, in strains which none else can learn; who cordially love and devotedly cleave to him; who follow the Lamb, whithersoever he goeth, being the first fruits of the earth; who are Israelites indeed, in whose mouth is found no guile; and who are without fault, being fully accepted, and really sanctified before the throne of God. May it be our prayer, our endeavour, yea, our ambition, to be found in this honourable company! If we have a good hope that we are thus distinguished, we ought to do every thing in our power, as well as to beseech the Lord continually, that faithful ministers, like beneficent angels, "flying through the midst of heaven," may carry "the everlasting Gospel," and preach it to all people, nations, and languages; that so sinners may fear and glorify God, and turn from all their idols and iniquities, to worship the great Creator, and to wait for his Son from heaven, who shall speedily come to be our Judge. These events faith anticipates, as if they were already accomplished.

V. 9—20.

Crafty deceivers, and they who have been betrayed into their delusions by pride, unbelief, a carnal mind, love of sin, and fear of man, will ere long drink together of the wine of God's wrath, from the cup of his indignation; and, however men may flatter or excuse themselves, in conforming to corrupt and sinful customs or impositions, they will find at last that the Lord abhors such prevarication.—Let, therefore, such as fear the reproach or the wrath of men, and are tempted to disobey God, remember that awful torment, the smoke of which ascendeth up for ever and ever. For the modern quietus of a purgatory, after the day of judgment, is as destitute of scriptural foundation, as the purgatory before that awful season, as maintained by the Church of Rome; and they who die in their sins, will too late find that the punishment of hell will endure for ever and ever. Here then is the patience of the saints to venture or suffer any thing, in obeying God's commandments, and professing the faith of Jesus; may God bestow this patience upon us, that we may be ready, should times of persecution overtake us! We have the best reasons in the world for this conduct; as a voice from heaven, attested by the Holy Spirit, assures us, that "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, that they "immediately rest from their labours, and that their works "follow them," to ascertain their title to, and the degree of, their unspeakable felicity; whilst their persecutors, and all wicked men, are ripening for the harvest and vintage of divine vengeance, and will soon be cast into the wine-press of the wrath of God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 1—4. This chapter introduces the seven vials, all of which fall under the seventh trumpet, as the seven trumpets were included under the seventh seal: for they contain the seven last plagues, in which the wrath of God is filled up, or accomplished, on the persecuting idolatrous power, assuming and disgracing, beyond expression, the sacred name of CHRISTIAN. These plagues must therefore be coincident with the last wo trumpet; in great measure at least. The second part of this prophecy has been traced from the latter part of the sixth trumpet to the reformation, nay, to the present æra; and to go back into former ages, to find out events which may answer to the subsequent predictions, deranges the whole plan of the book, and reduces things to ambiguity and uncertainty. Our key has hitherto opened the most intricate wards of these predictions without violence; that is, as far as to the latter part of the sixth trumpet: but no writer has succeeded in what follows; for the commencement of it is, precisely, the time in which we live; as is evident from a due consideration of the twelve hundred and sixty years of the reign of the beast. Different computations indeed have been made of the period when these years will end: but none, as it appears to me, suppose that they will terminate sooner than A. D. 1866, while many think they will not end till A. D. 2000. But, whether sooner or later, it seems evident that the time is not yet arrived; and, therefore, that the pouring out of the vials has not yet begun. The apostle had mentioned great woes, which would come under the three last trumpets: (viii. 13. x. 7. xiv. 19:) yet, when the seventh trumpet was sounded, he mentioned, almost exclusively, the happy effects of it to the end of time, without speaking particularly about the woes. But he here resumes that subject, and prophetically shows what woes would follow the sounding of that trumpet. Nothing seems more important, in explaining prophecies, than to determine, as far as we can, which events are past, and which are to come: under this conviction, I must proceed to consider what follows, in general, as yet in futurity; and shall, therefore, not detail any of the interpretations, or conjectures, that have been made of them, with relation to past events; because I cannot myself find any satisfaction from them. The great and marvellous sign which the apostle saw in heaven, the scene of his visions, implied that very interesting and extraordinary events were about to be revealed: for seven angels appeared, who had it in charge to inflict the seven last plagues. But before he saw the effects of their ministry, he records an introductory vision, representing the joy and triumph which the church would express on that occasion. The sea of glass, mingled with fire, (iv. 6.) is very differently explained; but as the persons referred to stood upon it, we cannot well understand it of the Fountain, in which they had washed away their sins; perhaps it was emblematical of the tempestuous times, during which believers then lived, the slippery and fragile nature of their standing considered in itself, and the fiery trials which they endured. They, however, who were conquerors over the beast, who had cleaved to the truth and will of God, and had refused subjection to the spiritual tyranny of antichrist, or to be branded as his slaves, stood on this brittle, slippery, sea of glass mingled with fire, unhurt and undismayed; as the children of Israel passed through the Red Sea, or, standing on its shore, saw their enemies dead before them. Feeling, therefore, a holy assurance of their own safety, and a triumphant joy in the prospect of the destruction of their persecutors, they sang the song of Moses, the servant of God; they praised the Lord for their deliverance, as Israel by orders from Moses had done; and they sang the song of the Lamb, the new song before mentioned. (Marg. Ref.) Thus they celebrated the great and marvellous works of God, the almighty Lord of all; and his justice and faithfulness, as in Christ Jesus, the King of saints, the Protector, Comforter, Ruler, and Portion, of all his redeemed people.—In this view, they inquired, who would not, or ought not, to fear, adore, and glorify the name of JEHOVAH, seeing he only was holy; and neither the worship of idols, nor the names of blasphemy used by the beast and his image, were to be endured: for the time was arrived, in which all should come and worship before the Lord, as his judgments were then about to be made manifest? (Marg. Ref.)

7 And [b] one of the four beasts gave unto the seven angels, [c] seven golden vials full of the wrath of God, [d] who liveth for ever and ever.

8 And [e] the temple was filled with smoke [f] from the glory of God, and from his power; and [g] no man was able to enter into the temple, [h] till the seven plagues of the seven angels were fulfilled.

CHAP. XVI.

The first angel pours out his vial on the earth; and the worshippers of the beast are plagued with a noisome sore, 1, 2: the second, on the sea, which becomes blood, 3: the third, on the rivers and fountains, which also become blood; and the angel of the waters celebrates the justice of God, in thus visiting bloody persecutors, which is confirmed by one from the altar, 4—7. The fourth angel pours his vial on the sun; and men scorched with fire blaspheme God, 8, 9: the fifth on the seat of the beast, with the miseries caused, and the blasphemies excited, 10, 11. The sixth angel pours his vial on the Euphrates, to prepare the way of eastern kings, 12. Three unclean frogs, from the mouth of the beast, stir up kings to war against God, 13, 14. A warning to Christians, 15. The seventh angel pours his vial into the air, and the last plagues are tremendously finished on Babylon, &c. 16—21.

AND [a] I heard a great voice out of the temple, saying to [b] the seven angels, Go your ways, [c] and pour out the vials of the wrath of God upon the earth.

2 And the first went, and poured out his vial [d] upon the earth: and there fell [e] a noisome and grievous sore upon the men [f] which had the mark of the beast, and upon them which worshipped his image.

V. 5—8. (xi. 19.) The appearance of glory above the mercy-seat in the most holy place, the tabernacle of God in the temple, was an emblem of his appearance in heaven, as reconciled to sinners through Jesus Christ: the seven angels, coming forth from thence, showed, that these judgments would be executed on the enemies of the church, in mercy to God's people: while their white clothing and golden girdles represented their holiness, and the righteousness and excellency of these awful dispensations. The living creature, an emblem of the Gospel-ministry, giving the vials to the angels, implied, that the preaching of the truth would be instrumental in bringing the judgments which were written upon antichristian opposers; and the temple being filled with smoke, showed the darkness of these dispensations, and the horror which would envelope the enemies of God, whilst these plagues were executing. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The many plagues which the wrath of God inflicts on the wicked, contain things great and marvellous; but none can fully understand them, till they have passed through the waves and fiery trials of this evil world, and are made victors over all their adversaries. Yet, whilst we stand upon "the sea of glass mingled with fire," we should anticipate the triumphs which await our final deliverance, and attempt the song of Moses, and of the Lamb: and new mercies continually demand new hymns of praise.—The fuller knowledge we acquire, concerning the wonderful works of God, the more zealously we shall celebrate his infinite greatness and excellency, as the Lord God almighty, the Creator and Ruler of all worlds; but his title of Emmanuel, the King of saints, will peculiarly endear him to us. Who, that considers the power of his wrath, the value of his favour, or the glory of his holiness, would refuse to fear and honour him alone? For his praise is above heaven and earth. May all nations, therefore, come and worship before him, and accept of his salvation! This prayer will be answered, when his tabernacle shall be opened, the instruments of his vengeance on obstinate rebels commissioned, and the seven vials poured out. In the mean time, let us adore his justice and truth, and not dare to object to his deep designs: for when we shall witness the completion of the whole, we shall see him perfectly glorious, both in mercy and in judgment.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1, 2. The angels were ordered, by a voice from the temple, to pour out the contents of the vials, censers or cups, that they had received, which were emblems of the wrath of God to be poured out on the antichristian empire, and all who adhered to it. As the four first trumpets were so many stages in the destruction of the western empire, and the fifth and sixth showed the extinction of the eastern empire, so these vials marked the gradual desolation of the Roman church; the one being the pagan idolatrous persecuting power, the other the papal idolatrous persecuting power; the beasts to whom the dragon had given his seat and empire. This circumstance occasions a similarity of some of the vials to the trumpets. A resemblance also is found between these vials and several of the plagues of Egypt, to which Rome may be compared for tyranny, cruelty, and enmity to the people of God. (xi. 8.) Whether the sores, produced by the pouring out of the first vial, are to be understood literally, with respect to terrible pestilences, or in a figurative meaning, the event must determine. But they will be peculiar to the avowed and devoted adherents of the beast and his image; which seems to be intended of the others, 3 ¶ And the second angel poured out his vial [g] upon the sea; and [h] it became as the blood of a dead man: [i] and every living soul died in the sea.

4 ¶ And the third angel poured out his vial [k] upon the rivers and fountains of waters; [l] and they became blood.

5 And I heard [m] the angel of the waters say, [n] Thou art righteous, O Lord, [o] which art, and wast, and shalt be, because thou hast judged thus.

6 For [p] they have shed the blood of saints and prophets, and thou hast given them blood to drink; [q] for they are worthy.

7 And I heard another [r] out of the altar say, [t] Even so, Lord God almighty, true and righteous are thy judgments.

8 ¶ And the fourth angel poured out his vial [u] upon the sun: [x] and power was given unto him to scorch men with fire.

though not so expressly mentioned. (Marg. Ref.) Mr. Faber, without hesitation, interprets this plague of the atheistical spirit, which has long secretly pervaded the nations adhering to the Roman church, and which has broken out so extensively and fatally in these late years. I am by no means disposed to object to this interpretation; yet I am not able to adopt it, without great hesitation, even as a probable opinion, if indeed the pouring out of the vials may, in the order of the predicted events, be allowed to begin at so early a period.

V. 3—7. (viii. 8—10.) Seas and rivers turned into congealed blood, are proper emblems of vast slaughter and devastation. Yet the angel of the waters, who was appointed to preside over them, or to be a ministering spirit in these dispensations, celebrated the justice of the eternal Lord, who had determined to punish with such calamities the blood-thirsty murderers of saints and prophets, and in appointing them, as it were, blood to drink. And another angel, from under the altar, (vi. 9.) as speaking in the name of the holy martyrs, concurred in these praises, and also declared the truth of the Lord God almighty, in thus fulfilling his ancient predictions, and his promises to his church. If the events here predicted, be still future, the fulfilment of the prophecy alone can fully explain it. Mr. Faber, however, interprets the whole passage of the bloody transactions in France and on the Continent, which have occurred during these last eighteen or twenty years. I confess myself incompetent to decide, whether his opinion be well grounded or not; yet I hesitate for these reasons. 1st. The stage, on which these tragedies have been acted, seems not large enough for the completion of the prophecy. France, and the countries connected with it, form only part of the kingdom of the beast, and several countries belonging to it have hitherto been little affected by these sanguinary measures, though perhaps they may ere long be involved in them. 2dly. The term, since the commencement of the French revolution, seems too short to answer to the idea excited by this prophecy, of the judgments to be inflicted, when it is considered in how few verses the most interesting events of two or three hundred years are comprehended; yet, very probably, succeeding transactions may remove this objection. 3dly. I have some doubt, whether the time for the pouring out of the vials is arrived, and whether it will arrive till towards the close of this century. I am, however, by no means confident in my opinion.

V. 8, 9. (viii. 12.) Whether burning seasons, producing drought and famine, or some other judgment thus figuratively described, be intended, the event must show. But the extreme distress of the sufferers, instead of inducing them to glorify God, by confessing, repenting of, and forsaking their sins, will irritate them to blaspheme the name of God, and so tend to the increase of their guilt and final condemnation. (Marg. Ref.) These verses are interpreted, by Mr. Faber, to mean the present tyranny of the ruler of France over that nation, and the other kingdoms of the beast, on the Continent. I am not disposed to controvert this interpretation, nor yet to subscribe to it. I again observe, that in my view, our posterity, at the end of this century, will be more competent judges of this subject than we can be.

V. 10, 11. This predicts some great calamity to Rome itself, yet of such a nature as will darken the whole antichristian empire. But it will only excite the sufferers to horrid blasphemies, and more desperate defiance of God. Commentators in general allow, that this vial is not yet poured out; and this is a sufficient reason why a commentator should decline giving any conjecture, in what manner so compendious and so obscure a prediction will be fulfilled; but, when fulfilled, it will cease to be obscure.

14 For they are [q] the spirits of devils, [r] working miracles, [s] which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of [t] the whole world, [u] to gather them to the battle of that great day of [x] God almighty.

15 Behold, [y] I come as a thief. [z] Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, [a] lest he walk naked, and they see his shame.

16 And [b] he gathered them together into a place, called in [c] the Hebrew tongue, [d] Armageddon.

17 ¶ And the seventh angel poured out his vial [e] into the air: and [f] there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, [g] It is done.

18 And there [h] were voices, and thunders, and lightnings; and there was [i] a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, and so great.

19 And [k] the great city was divided into three parts, and the cities of the nations fell: and [l] great Babylon came [m] in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath.

20 And [n] every island fled away, and the mountains were not found.

21 And [o] there fell upon men a great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent: and men [p] blasphemed God because of the plague of the hail; for the plague thereof was exceeding great.

V. 12—16. If the river Euphrates is here to be understood literally, some eastern nation or nations may be expected to invade Europe, as the executioner of the Lord's vengeance on the kingdom of the beast. But as Rome is mystical Babylon, which stood on the river Euphrates, and was both enriched and protected by it, perhaps we may understand, by the drying up of the Euphrates, such deductions from the power and resources of Rome, as shall embolden and excite other nations to attack her. These events, however, will threaten the destruction of that whole interest; so that three unclean spirits, like frogs, will come out of the mouth of the dragon, as representing Satan, who gave his power to the beast; out of the mouth of the beast or antichristian empire; and out of that of the false prophet, or the antichristian church and clergy. That is, emissaries, commissioned by them, and instigated by unclean spirits, being loathsome, and croaking, and intruding themselves into every place, to the mischief of all, (Ex. viii. 1—3.) will go forth to promote idolatry, pretending to work miracles in support of their doctrine, and to collect the kings of the earth, and of the whole world, even all in every place who favour that design, that they may make one united effort against the cause of God; and thus they will be gathered for battle against the great day, in which the almighty God intends to destroy them. Some have imagined these three mystical frogs to be the Dominicans, Franciscans, and Jesuits, and the description given of them would agree well enough with that of those Janizaries of the church of Rome; but the predicted events must fall much later than the founding of those orders, and Satan will no doubt be able to excite men of the same stamp to similar services with those performed by them in former ages. These will be times of great temptation, and therefore Christ, by his apostle, called on his professed servants to expect his sudden coming, and to watch, that they might retain, and be found in, the garments of salvation, and not appear naked, and so be put to shame, as apostates or hypocrites; for the blessing would belong only to the watchful. This parenthesis interrupts the prediction; but that proceeds to show, that He, even the Lord, gathered together the kings of the earth, in his righteous providence, to a place called Armageddon, or the mountain of destruction, with reference to Megiddo. (Judg. v. 19. 2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30.)

V. 17—21. Satan is called "the prince of the power of "the air," and this last vial will be poured into the seat of his empire; for after it, his cause in every place without, as well as within, the dominions of the beast, will be ruined. A proclamation was therefore made, that it was done, or finished, as under the seventh trumpet the mystery of God was to be finished. (x. 7.) Terrible calamities, awful displays of the divine presence, intestine distractions, and the revolt or destruction of cities and nations, &c. will make way for great Babylon to drink of the wine of the fierceness of God's wrath; and the concurrent judgments are described in the strongest language; especially by hail stones of above a hundred pounds weight each, which must dash in pieces all persons and things whatsoever on which they fall. But how this is to be understood, the event must show. It would be very easy to give an opinion, or to quote from those who have done this; but, as conjectures about the future fulfilment of prophecies is no part of the plan of this publication, the author must decline the attempt, and refer the reader to those who have purposely written on the subject, among whom he allows that Mr. Faber has supported his opinions with more probable arguments from other prophecies, than others whom he has consulted. But as doubts remain on his mind in several particulars, he does not think himself authorized to adopt any of Mr. Faber's conclusions. Posterity will be more competent than we are, to determine on such questions. It is, however, clear, beyond doubt, that convulsions, revolutions, and the wreck of nations, to a degree and extent never hitherto witnessed, or recorded, are yet to be expected, before the mystery of God is finished. The opinion, also, that the land of Canaan will be the stage, on which the last grand conflict shall be decided, is highly probable: but whether that country, or the papal dominions, be meant, by the six hundred furlongs to be drenched with blood, he will not presume to decide. (Note, xiv. 18—20.) The dimension may suit either one or the other: and it is not certain, whether particular dreadful judgments on the immediate seat of the beast, or tremendous vengeance on all his remaining adherents, be there foretold. It may be observed, that I have not at all noticed the interpretations of those, who consider several of these vials as long since poured out. This has resulted from a full conviction, that these interpretations are absolutely inconsistent with the chronology of the prophecy, and the whole clue which must direct us in expounding it; and that they are altogether unsatisfactory, even as insulated accommodations. Whether the opinion of those, who explain the former of the vials of recent events which have occurred within these last twenty years, be well founded, will be known ere long; at least they are not apparently inconsistent with the chronology of the book. The grand question to be decided, in this respect, relates to the sounding of the seventh trumpet. If that event be past, the vials have begun to be poured out; if it be future, none of them have been poured out. For it seems to me clear, that as the seventh seal includes all the seven trumpets, so the seventh trumpet includes all the seven vials. Nor do I think it possible for human sagacity to determine, till some considerable time has elapsed, at what precise period events of such immense magnitude, as those here predicted, began to be accomplished.

CHAP. XVII.

An angel shows John the persecuting idolatrous power which was to be destroyed; under the emblem of an infamous, but splendid, harlot, riding on a scarlet-coloured beast, with a golden cup in her hand, her name inscribed on her forehead, and drunk with the blood of the saints, 1—6. He explains the vision to him, 7—18.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

How infatuated must men be, to set at defiance the power of God, who can fight against them by such varied means, and with such irresistible weapons! especially as he continues to beseech his enemies to be reconciled to him, and share his omnipotent and everlasting favour! No wonder that angels, who witness or execute his vengeance on such implacable haters of God, of Christ, and of holiness, loudly celebrate the praises of his justice and truth, and adore his awful dispensations, when he brings upon bloody persecutors the tortures, which they had inflicted on his saints and prophets. But the heart of man is so desperately wicked, that the most complicated miseries will never induce them to repentance, without special grace; nay, if men are left to themselves, they will blaspheme the name of God, even in the intervals of gnawing their tongues with pain! It is vain, therefore, to expect that purgatory, or hell-fire, will ever bring men to glorify God in true repentance, or in any sense purge away their sins. Even hell is filled with blasphemies, determined and horrid, in proportion to the degree of its torments: and they are as ignorant of the history of human nature, as of the Bible and of their own hearts, who do not know, that the more men suffer, and the more plainly they see the hand of God in their sufferings, the more furiously they often rage against him. Let then sinners now seek repentance from Christ, and the grace of the Holy Spirit; or they will hereafter have the anguish and horror of an unhumbled, impenitent, and desperate heart, burning with enmity against God, as well as tortured by the fire of his indignation, and thus augmenting guilt and misery to all eternity. Whilst Satan and wicked men, by every artifice and with all their power, excite numbers to combine against the cause of God, they are in fact gathered by him, that he may execute judgment upon them. But many of those, who are professedly the friends of God, will have their portion with avowed unbelievers; and, being found destitute of the robe of salvation, will be put to shame, and perish. May we then remember that Christ cometh suddenly, that we may watch, and "give diligence to be found of him in peace, "without spot and blameless."

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1, 2. This chapter digresses from the subject, to show more precisely what was meant by great Babylon, the ruins of which had been predicted. One of the angels, who had poured out the vials, conversed in vision with John, and bade him come to him, and he would show him the judgment of that corrupt Church, or kingdom, which might be emphatically called "the great whore;" because it had exceeded all other churches or societies, in seducing men to commit idolatry, and abominations of every kind. The many waters, on which this dignified harlot, who was illustrious in her infamy, sat enthroned as a queen, are afterwards explained. (15.) No one can doubt but Rome is meant in this chapter; nay, the most zealous papists allow it: and indeed it would not have been made so undeniable, by being expressly named, as it is by this description. The only question then is, whether Rome Pagan, or Rome Papal, is meant? But Pagan Rome never seduced the kings of the earth to join in her idolatries; she never intoxicated the inhabitants with the wine of her fornication; she subdued and ruled them with an iron rod, and not by artifices and blandishments; she left them in general to their ancient usages and worship; nay, she imported the idols and vices of the conquered nations, and thus became fatally corrupted: and when the Roman emperors persecuted the Christians, they did it rather from a desire of crushing innovations, which threatened as they supposed the peace of the state, than from zeal for any particular form of idolatry. On the other hand, it is well known by what subtle insinuations, and politic management, "with all "the deceivableness of unrighteousness," Rome Papal, without any adequate temporal force, hath obtained and preserved an ascendency over kings and nations, attaching them to her usurped dominion in blind submission, and inducing them to conform to her idolatries, and corruptions of Christianity. So that the authority of powerful kings, and the forces of mighty nations, have repeatedly been employed in defence of her tyranny: and multitudes have been intoxicated and infuriated, by their zeal for that church, to murder their unoffending neighbours, by tens of thousands, and to enslave, weaken, and impoverish themselves!

V. 3—5. The angel then carried John "in the spirit;" (that is, being under the influence of the prophetic Spirit, he seemed to be conveyed into the wilderness; for the antichristian tyranny and seductions had reduced the church into a most desolate state, and made it like a desert;) and he there saw a woman seated on a scarlet-coloured beast. (Marg. Ref.) This woman was the emblem of the church of Rome, and the beast of the temporal power, by which it hath been supported; and the latter was full of names of blasphemy, which we have had repeated occasions to mention. The seven heads and ten horns are afterwards explained. The woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet colour: for these have always been the distinguishing colours of popes and cardinals, as well as of the Roman emperors and senators: nay, by a kind of infatuation, the mules and horses on which they rode, have been covered with scarlet cloth; as if they were determined to answer this description, and even literally to ride on a scarlet-coloured beast! The woman was also most superbly decorated with gold and jewels: and who can sufficiently describe the pride, grandeur, and magnificence of the church of Rome, in her vestments and ornaments of every kind? Even papists have gloried in the superiority of their church, in this magnificence, to ancient Rome when at the height of her prosperity. 'This appears in all things relating to their public worship, and in the papal court, even beyond what can be conceived: and external pomp attaches carnal men to a religion which interests and gratifies them, whilst they despise the simplicity of spiritual worship. 'This 'is beyond description, and as much surpassed my expect'ation, as other sights have generally fallen short of it. 'Silver can scarce find an admittance, and gold itself 'looks but poorly, among such an incredible number of 'precious stones.' (Addison.) In the woman's hand likewise there "was a golden cup full of abominations:" this alludes to the practice of harlots in inflaming their paramours with love potions; and represents the various fascinating allurements, the impostures, delusions, promises of impunity, indulgences, absolutions, with hopes of worldly interest and preferment, by which that church hath obtained and preserved her influence, and seduced men to join in her spiritual fornication, the other abominations of her corrupt worship, and the unholiness connected with it. (Marg. Ref.) To distinguish this notorious harlot from all others, her name was inscribed on her forehead; as prostitutes of old sometimes made themselves known, by a label on the forehead with their name upon it. This was "Mystery, Babylon the Great." Her religion was "a mystery of iniquity," (2 Thes. ii. 7,) and she herself was mystically Babylon. Now there was nothing in Pagan Rome, to which this title was more proper than to any other city; nor would it have been any thing mysterious to have substituted one Pagan city for another: but it was indeed a great mystery, that the professed metropolis of the Christian church should be another Babylon, in idolatry, iniquity, and cruelty to the people of God: and therefore her title of 'the Roman Catholic, 'or universal church,' entitles her to the name of "Mys"tery, Babylon the Great." She affects indeed the character of 'our holy mother the church;' but she is in fact "the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth;" the inventress, source, promoter, and principal example of idolatries, and all kinds of abominable abuses and perversions of Christianity, with which the nations of the earth have been corrupted. It is asserted by writers of good authority, that, before the reformation, the word mystery was written in letters of gold, upon the front of the Pope's mitre: but the fact has been controverted, and therefore, though the affirmative evidence vastly preponderates, we cannot be absolutely certain of it.

V. 6. The woman was as notorious for cruelty and persecution, as for idolatry and profligacy; and the apostle saw her intoxicated with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus. In this respect Rome Pagan and Rome Papal were both criminal; but the latter has probably slain more thousands, than the former did individuals: and the apostle would not have been so greatly astonished to see a heathen city persecuting Christians; (having wit-

7 And the angel said unto me, Wherefore didst thou marvel? [a] I will tell thee the mystery of the woman, and of the beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and ten horns.

9 And [h] here is the mind which hath wisdom. [i] The seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth.

10 And there are seven kings: five are fallen, and one is, and the other is not yet come; and when he cometh, he must continue a short space.

11 And the beast [k] that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth into perdition.

12 And [l] the ten horns which thou sawest, are ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet; but receive power as kings one hour with the beast.

13 These have [m] one mind, and [n] shall give their power and strength unto the beast.

14 These [o] shall make war with the Lamb, and [p] the Lamb shall overcome them: for he is [q] Lord of lords, and King of kings: [r] and they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful.

nessed and experienced such persecutions previously to this vision;) but that a city, professedly Christian, and the metropolis of the Christian church, should thus wanton and riot in the blood of the saints, might well excite his highest amazement. ‘All this is very plain: but papists wonder by what figure of speech heretics are called saints, and rebels against the Pope, martyrs of Jesus.’ (Bp. Hurd.)

V. 7, 8. The reader might have been well satisfied about the meaning of those emblems, if he had received no further information: but, lest he should mistake or hesitate, the angel became the interpreter of the vision. As the apostle had seen and heard very much on the same subject before, the angel inquired into the reason of his excessive amazement: and he then showed to him the mystery of the woman riding on the beast. A beast is the emblem of an idolatrous and oppressive empire: the Roman empire was the beast under the Pagan emperors: it ceased to be so, when it became Christian, with reference to which the angel says, by way of anticipation, “It is not.” Yet it would afterwards “ascend out of the abyss;” that is, when the antichristian empire became idolatrous and persecuting, and the dragon gave his power to the beast, it seemed to arise out of the sea, the tempestuous state of the nations; but it was in fact from hell, being Satan’s grand scheme for opposing the Gospel, (Note, xiii. 1, 2:) and therefore after a time it would go into perdition, and be destroyed finally and for ever. ‘The empire was idolatrous under the heathen emperors; and then ceased to be so under the Christian emperors; and then became idolatrous again under the Roman pontiffs, and hath so continued ever since. But in this last form it shall go into perdition: it shall not, as it did before, cease for a time, and revive again, but shall be destroyed for ever.’ (Bp. Newton.) In the mean while, however, it would deceive, into a stupid admiration and blind submission, all the inhabitants of the earth, within the sphere of its influence, except the remnant of the elect. (Note, xiii. 8.) Here then was a proper trial and exercise of a man’s wisdom, to discover what was meant by the beast, that had been, was not, and yet was; being the same in a different form.

V. 9—14. To assist the reader in this inquiry, the angel observed, that the seven heads of this symbolical beast represented seven mountains, on which the woman was enthroned; being especially the seat of that spiritual authority, by which the power of the beast is supported. This is the known situation of Rome; and though Constantinople is also built on seven hills, they are comparatively obscure, and no other mark of the beast answers to it. For the seven heads of the beast had another enigmatical meaning, and signified seven forms of government, or successions of rulers, according to the usual prophetical meaning of the word kings. They all appeared in vision at once upon the beast; but in fact five of them were fallen, at the time when the apostle had the vision; namely, kings, consuls, dictators, decemvirs, and military tribunes; one of them then subsisted, even that of emperors; and another was not yet come, which when he came would endure only for a short time. Some explain this of the Christian emperors; but their power must either be included in the sixth head; or it could not be a head of the beast at all, not being idolatrous. Others explain it of the Exarch of Ravenna, who for some years ruled over Rome; and others, of the usurpations of the pope, before he became a temporal prince, or the prescribed twelve hundred and sixty years of the reign of the beast had entered. Many other interpretations have been given, and especially the dominion of Charlemagne and his successors, during some generations, has been fixed upon; but, at last, no great certainty seems to attach to this interpretation; and the very words of the prophecy intimate that it would be differently explained. In general, however, it related to the intervening space between the subversion of the empire and the establishment of papal tyranny; during which time Rome was under the temporal jurisdiction of the Exarch of Ravenna, and the spiritual rule of the Pope, who had already introduced the worship of saints and images, and many other gross abuses. If this be reckoned a distinct form of government, then the beast, as it subsisted when the woman sat on it, was the eighth; but if it is deemed too inconsiderable to be reckoned a distinct head, "He was one of the seven;" but whether the seventh or the eighth, he would be the last form of government in that idolatrous empire, and would go into perdition. 'The beast, therefore, on which the woman rideth, 'is the Roman government in its last form: and this, all 'must acknowledge, is papal, not imperial.' (Bp. Newton.) For the last head was the only one which was referred to, when the woman sat on the beast, and was therefore spoken of as the beast itself. The ten horns, (which seem to have all grown on the last head,) were ten kings, or successions of kings, who had received no kingdom when John had this vision: but they would receive power as kings, one hour with the beast, or at the same time, and for the same period. This points out the division of the Roman empire into ten distinct kingdoms, yet all united in one design, to support the idolatry of the church of Rome. They might be kings; but they were not horns of the beast, till they embraced that religion, and both stengthened the hands of the pope and church of Rome, and were strengthened by them. (Note, Dan. vii. 7, 8.) These were contemporary, not successive, princes; and therefore they were of one mind, to give their power to the beast: implicitly submitting to that idolatrous religion, defending its tyranny and usurpations, enduring its exorbitant exactions, and obeying its mandates to make war, in opposing the cause of Christ, and in order to extirpate his disciples. But it was predicted, that they would all be finally defeated in that war by the Lamb of God; as he "is Lord of lords, and King of kings:" and his followers are effectually called to enlist under his standard, in consequence of his special choice of them; and therefore they are true believers, faithful to his cause, and to their own engagements.

16 And [u] the ten horns which thou sawest upon the beast, [x] these shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate, [y] and naked, and shall [z] eat her flesh, [a] and burn her with fire.

17 For [b] God hath [c] put in their hearts [d] to fulfil his will, and to agree, and give their kingdom unto the beast, [e] until the words of God shall be fulfilled.

18 And [f] the woman which thou sawest is that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth.

V. 15—18. The angel next explained to the apostle "the many waters, on which the woman sat" in regal dignity. So many words, all in the plural number, aptly describe the extensive dominion of the church of Rome, not only over those within the territories belonging to the papacy, but over all the kingdoms of that communion: nay, the pope hath claimed the right over all nations, to dispose of crowns and depose princes at his pleasure, as if he were lord of lords, and king of kings! and the very titles of universal bishop, and the Roman catholic church, fully accord to this description. This, however, will not always be the case; for the ten horns, or kingdoms, that once exalted and supported the ecclesiastical tyranny, will at length hate, desolate, strip, devour, and destroy it. Most of them will be the principal instruments in the destruction of popery, and the ruin of Rome itself; though some will lament over these events. How far some late revolutions may lead to this crisis, we cannot tell; but present appearances render it not improbable, that the last victory of the beast over the witnesses of Christ will be obtained in some other way than by papal delusions.—(Note, xi. 1—9.) God had so influenced the hearts of these kings, by his power over them, and by the dispensations of his Providence, that they fulfilled his will, or did those things, without intending it, which he had purposed and predicted: (Marg. Ref.) so that they agreed together, to give their power to the beast, to make him, as it were, their liege lord, and only to reign over others, in order to render them subservient to him. But they will at length better understand their own interest, and their duty to God and their subjects, than thus any longer to prostitute their power. To terminate the description of the woman that sat on this symbolical beast, she was declared to be that city, which reigned over the kings of the earth when John had this vision: and every body must know Rome to be that city. Indeed, this was the avowed object, aim, and ambition of Rome, from its foundation; and, in different ways, it has accomplished its purpose, with little interruption, even to this present time.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord takes pleasure in satisfying his people, concerning the reasons and equity of his judgments on his enemies, that they may not be intimidated by the severity of them, or fail to adore and praise him on that account.—Great prosperity, pomp, and splendour, commonly feed the pride and lusts of the human heart, and they can never form any security against divine vengeance. They, who allure or tempt others to sin, must expect more aggravated punishment, in proportion to the degree of the mischief done by them. The worst abominations, idolatries, filthiness, cruelties, and blasphemies, have been perpetrated within the professing church; and a magnificent religion, adorned with purple, and decked with gold and jewels, is generally antichristian. Indeed, every attempt to accommodate the truth or worship of God to the taste of carnal minds must mar its simplicity, and corrupt its purity. But the golden cup in the hand of Babylon and her daughters will reconcile most men to the mysteries of iniquity connected with it, and make them willingly swallow down the wine of their fornications; and even induce them to join in making themselves drunken with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus. Let all then beware of a splendid, a lucrative, or a fashionable religion; let us avoid the mysteries of iniquity, and study diligently the great mystery of godliness, that we may learn humility, simplicity, self-denial, and gratitude, in the stable at Bethlehem, in the carpenter's shop at Nazareth, by the side of the well at Sychar, in the garden, and on mount Golgotha: for the more we resemble Christ, the less shall we be liable to be deceived by antichrist. We cannot but wonder at the oceans, as it were, of Christian blood, which have been shed by men called Christians; but our wonder will abate, when we consider these prophecies, and the awful fact will turn to us for a testimony of the truth of the Gospel. Whatever enemies at any time make war against the Lamb of God must surely be overcome by him; though hand join in hand, such wicked men shall not be unpunished, even if all the kings and nations of the earth should agree in opposing him: for he is "Lord of lords, "and King of kings;" and his called, chosen, and faithful followers are on the strongest side. May we approve ourselves to be of that number! And then we shall be received to his glory, when wicked men will be destroyed in a most tremendous manner, and when their concurrence together in sin will be turned into the bitterest hatred and rage, and they will assist in tormenting each other. But "the LORD's Portion is his people;" "his counsel shall "stand, and he will do all his pleasure."

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 1—3. (Note, xvi. 19.) After the apostle had been certified who Babylon the Great was, and what she had done, he had the vision of her destruction continued. Another angel, distinct from those who poured out the vials, came down from heaven, possessing great power, and illuminating the earth with his glory: this was either Christ himself, or an emblematical representation of his coming to destroy his enemies, and to diffuse the light of his Gospel through all nations; to which events the language naturally directs our thoughts. He therefore repeatedly proclaimed in a loud voice, which all might hear, and which implied great power and authority, that "Babylon the Great was fallen," totally and finally; and that it was become not only desolate, but a kind of hell upon earth. Some think that the words may refer to the discoveries which will then be made of the diabolical ambition, impostures, lies, murder, and horrible uncleanness, with which the city is filled, under the mask of religion; but the expressions are figurative and borrowed from the Old Testament. (Notes, &c. Is. xiii. 19—22. xxxiv. Jer. l. 39.) No destruction of Rome has hitherto left it in this condition; unless any choose to say, that it "hath been the habitation of devils, and the hold of every "foul spirit, and the cage of every unclean and hateful "bird," ever since popes and cardinals have made it their residence. To the reasons before assigned for the ruin of this city, it is here added, that "the merchants of "the earth are waxed rich, through the abundance of her "delicacies:" her outward magnificence, luxury, and excess, have proved a source of immense wealth to vast multitudes; and the various arts, trades, manufactures, and species of commerce, which flourish by means of her pompous religion, have always helped to support it; for "by that craft many have their wealth." But the spiritual merchandise, by which unnumbered multitudes have wickedly lived in affluence, and enjoyed abundant delicacies, by the sins and follies of mankind, seem principally intended.

V. 4—8. As Lot was called forth out of Sodom, before it was destroyed by fire and brimstone, so the people of God are directed, by a voice from heaven, to come out of Babylon before her fall. (Note, Is. lii. 11.) This summons concerns all persons in every age; they who believe in Christ, and worship God in the Spirit, should separate from so corrupt a church, and from all others that copy her example of idolatry, persecution, cruelty, and tyranny, and avoid "being partakers of her sins," even if they have renounced her communion; or else they may expect to be involved in her plagues. As her crimes, her daring, presumptuous, and atrocious wickedness, resembled mountains reaching to heaven, so God had remembered her iniquities, though his forbearance had been mistaken for disregard. And, therefore, the persons, or nations, who had been persecuted by her, were called on to retaliate upon her as a condemned criminal, and to give her a double measure of the wine of his wrath, from the cup of his indignation, according to the atrociousness of her sins, and the cruel treatment which they had received at her hands; that torture and anguish might be rendered to her, proportionable to her former ostentation, splendour, and luxury, and to the pride and presumption, with which she had set these predictions at defiance, declaring that "she sat as a queen, was no" bereaved destitute "widow, "and should see no sorrow," whatever the word of God had threatened. (Notes, Is. xlvii.) Therefore all the plagues that had been denounced against her, would surely come on her in one day, suddenly and unexpectedly; death, in every dreadful form, would fill the city with mourning, and famine would attend the other desolations, till she should utterly be burned with fire, and then she would know that the Lord, who had judged and condemned her, was strong, and fully able to execute the tremendous sentence. As Rome has never hitherto been "utterly burned "with fire," it is undeniable that events yet in futurity are predicted.

V. 9, 10. Some of the kings, who had previously supported the church of Rome, will adhere to her, even when the rest of them will unite in destroying her; (Note, xvii. 16.) and they will lament her fall, having been bigoted to her idolatries, and lived in more abundant luxury and magnificence, through their alliance with her. They will, therefore, bewail at a distance the smoke of her burning and torment, without being able to quench the one, or relieve the other; so that they must either renounce her at last, or share her doom. In this situation, they will say, alas! alas! Or "wo, wo," for this will be the third wo before-mentioned; (xi. 14.) not that the fall of Rome will terminate that wo, (though it will end with the seventh vial,) for the events predicted in the following chapter will form a considerable part of it. Nor is there any proof, though it hath generally been supposed, that the second wo trumpet will end in the destruction of the Othman empire. (ix. 13—21.) On the contrary, it may perhaps subsist, in an enfeebled state, till after the fall of the western antichrist; this may be the grand means of the conversion of the Jews; and their restoration to their own land may produce the subversion of the Othman empire, the destruction of the Mahometan delusion, and the calling of the other Gentiles. (Notes, Ez. xxxviii. xxxix. Dan. xi. 40—45.) We should not indeed be confident in such matters; yet the arrangement of this and the two following chapters seems to favour the supposition; as the destruction of all Christ's implacable enemics, the conversion of the nations, and the binding of Satan, are predicted, in order, after the fall of Rome.

smoke of her burning, saying, [u] What city is like unto this great city!

19 And [x] they cast dust on their heads, and cried, [y] weeping and wailing, saying, Alas, alas! that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ships in the sea, by reason of her costliness! for in one hour is she made desolate.

20 [z] Rejoice over her, thou heaven, [a] and ye holy apostles and prophets; for [b] God hath avenged you on her.

V. 11—20. (Note, Ez. xxvi. xxvii.) This lamentation of these merchants coincides with that of the merchants over Tyre. The various articles of commerce, here enumerated, do not require a particular consideration; the whole tends to give us a deep impression of the splendour, luxury, excess, and self-indulgence of all kinds, which fill that antichristian licentious city, and which have always enriched immense multitudes, in different ways, by impoverishing the nations belonging to her communion. Neither need we accommodate the various particulars to the several kinds of spiritual merchandise, by which the popes, cardinals, bishops, abbots, priests, and other retainers, have been enriched, at the expense of the people. These are indeed evidently alluded to, when not only slaves, but "the souls of men," are mentioned as articles of commerce, which is the most infamous of all traffics that the demon of avarice ever devised, but by no means the most uncommon. The sale of indulgences, dispensations, absolutions, masses, and bulls, hath greatly enriched the clergy and their dependents, to the deceiving and destroying of the souls of millions; and thus "by feigned words "they made merchandise of them;" nor has the management of church-preferments, and many other things, been any better than trafficing in souls; and it would be gratifying, if we could say, that this merchandise has been peculiar to the Roman antichrist. In general, however, all this will at length come to nothing, and no man will buy of the merchandise of Rome any more; but all who have shared the gains of her commerce, temporal or spiritual, will stand afar off, for fear of her torment, and behold the smoke of her burning, as that of Sodom was seen at a distance. (Gen. xix. 28.) Probably the destruction of Rome will be finished by some immediate judgment of God; and the nature of the soil in the vicinity, the frequent eruptions of subterraneous fires, and the terrible earthquakes which have occurred, seem to point out the method; the combustibles are provided, and the train is already laid; there only wants the "breath of the "Almighty to kindle it." But whilst others, whose hopes of further gains will be gone, shall lament the fall of Rome, the inhabitants of heaven, and especially the holy apostles and prophets, are called on to rejoice over it, as God had revenged them on that idolatrous persecuting city, as well as made way for the preaching of his Gospel to all nations. It is peculiarly worthy of observation, that the apostles, who are idolatrously honoured at Rome, and daily worshipped, should be specially mentioned as rejoicing in her fall, as if it avenged them on her for the dishonour cast on their characters, while it vindicated the glory of God. There could be no reason why the Christian should rejoice in the judgments inflicted on ancient Rome by the Huns, Goths, Vandals, and other idolatrous nations; for they, (the Christians,) were peculiarly sufferers in those calamities; the judgments, therefore, on papal Rome, must be exclusively intended.

V. 21—24. (Note, Jer. li. 63, 64.) As a stone was tied to a book, and cast into the Euphrates by Seraiah, in token of literal Babylon's fall, so a mighty angel here cast a millstone into the sea, to represent the violence of mystical Babylon's fall, and to show that she would never rise again. This event is further illustrated by expressions taken from the prophets. (Marg. Ref.) 'But Rome is 'still standing and flourishing, and is honoured by many 'nations as the metropolis of the Christian world; she still 'resounds with singers and musicians; she still excels in 'arts, which serve to pomp and luxury; she still abounds 'with candles, and lamps, and torches, burning even by 'day as well as by night, and consequently this prophecy 'hath not been, but remains yet to be fulfilled.' (Bp. Newton.) Her merchants being said to be "the great "men of the earth," in connexion with "all nations being "deceived by her sorceries," plainly refers to the infamous traffic before mentioned.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

When collective bodies are ripe for vengeance, their sins will be punished in this world, but individuals are reserved unto the wrath to come. Impunity, and prosperity in wickedness, constitute the most fatal incentive to further crimes; and, as the day of punishment will come, they may be accounted the most dire calamities. When the Lord shall come in his great power, to lighten the earth with his glory, he will cast down the proudest cities, which are filled with iniquity, and oppose his cause; the magnificence of wicked kings, or the riches of ungodly merchants, will then avail nothing, except to augment, and render more intolerable, the vengeance to be inflicted; and surely the contempt and torment of hell will be more dreadful to those, who have glorified themselves and lived deliciously, than to other sinners!

V. 9—19.

No allies or helpers can deliver those against whom the Lord God, as a strong Judge and Avenger, is pleased to contend; they can only lament the victims of his indignation, and tremble for themselves. The prosperous merchants and traders in great commercial cities should learn, from these prophecies, "to buy the truth," "to get "wisdom, and with all their getting to get" spiritual "understanding;" to sell all, and purchase the "Pearl of great "price;" to ensure "the unsearchable riches of Christ," and to be "faithful stewards in the unrighteous mam"mon;" otherwise, even in this life, they may lament, that "no man buyeth their merchandise any more;" and that "all the fruits that their souls lusted after are depart"ed from them." Death, however, will soon terminate their commerce, and in that one hour all the riches of the ungodly will come to nought, and all "their purple and "fine linen" will be exchanged, not only for the coffin and the worm, but for the fire that never shall be quenched. (Notes, Luke xvi.) And, alas! too often, injustice, oppression, fraud, avarice, or excessive indulgence, are connected with extensive commerce; and to number "the "persons of men," with beasts, sheep, and horses, as the stock of a farm, or with bales of goods, as the cargo of a ship, is no doubt a most detestable and antichristian practice, fit only for Babylon the Great. Yet even this, cruel, unrighteous, and hateful as it is, must not be considered as the worst traffic, even of this our land; for the souls of men are traded for by those who take the cure of them for the sake of the emolument, and the abundance of the delicacies obtained by it, and then either leave them to perish in ignorance, or poison them by heresy, or lead them on the road to hell by a profligate example. How fervently should we then pray, that God would raise up reformers, who may contend as firmly, perseveringly, and successfully, against this vile merchandise, as some honourable and philanthropic persons have against the accursed slave-trade! For, when Christ shall again come to drive the buyers and sellers out of the temple, he will have much to do in other places besides Rome; many of these spiritual wickednesses, and this merchandise of souls, by feigned words, equivocating subscriptions and declarations, nay, worshipping God in expressions, which are avowedly deemed false by those who use them, and all this for filthy lucre's sake, will be found, under different forms, even in the protestant churches; and perhaps no denomination is quite free from the guilt of rendering religious profession and sacred functions subservient to worldly interest, credit, ease, and indulgence. These are the remains of the anti-Christianity derived from Rome, which most need protesting against and removing; in these things we ought to come out and separate from Babylon, if we would not partake of her plagues. Compared with such evils, a posture, a garb, or a ceremony, though perhaps inconvenient in itself, and derived from Rome, are scarcely worth noticing; yet bigotry exerts itself principally much the other way, and externals are decried against with great warmth; whilst the spiritual pride, avarice, worldly indulgence, and intolerance of Rome, are not so much disliked! But the vengeance of heaven is coming upon Rome, not for gestures, garbs, and ceremonies, though multiplied, ridiculous, and of bad consequence in themselves; but for idolatry, ambition, oppression, cruelty to the people of God, imposture, avarice, licentiousness, and spiritual tyranny. These are the sins which have reached to the heavens, the iniquities that God remembers, and the evils for which we must stand aloof from her communion, and that of all others who resemble her, or we shall be involved in their destruction. But we must needs go out of the world, and the Church too, if we renounce every religious sect, because some of the members or leaders of it are criminal in such matters.

V. 20—24.

When the world rejoices, Christ's disciples often mourn, but they are called to rejoice, when the world is filled with lamentation. It is of little consequence what becomes of all the riches, magnificence, and costliness of the earth, if Christ's kingdom be but promoted, and his enemies either converted or deprived of the power to do mischief. Apostles and prophets rejoice in heaven on such occasions, and we ought to rejoice on earth, even though they be connected with the fall of mighty cities and empires, to rise no more for ever. But let sinners take warning by the judgments executed on others, to tremble and flee from the wrath to come; and let us all take occasion, from the view given us of the changeable nature of earthly things, to "set "our affections on things above, where Christ sitteth at the "right hand of God."

2 For [e] true and righteous are his judgments: for he hath [f] judged the great whore, which did corrupt the earth with her fornication, [g] and hath avenged the blood of his servants at her hand.

3 And again they said, [h] Alleluia. [i] And her smoke rose up for ever and ever.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 1—6. When the apostle had witnessed the destruction of mystical Babylon, he heard the voice of much people in heaven, singing the praises of God, and ascribing to him their own salvation and that of his church; and adoring his glorious perfections, as displayed in these, and all his wonderful works; and his sovereign and everlasting dominion. For his truth and justice had been alike conspicuous, in the judgments which had been executed on that corrupt and persecuting church and city: and again they cried Alleluia, or praise the Lord; whilst the smoke of the city arose up perpetually, and was an emblem of the final and eternal misery of the wicked inhabitants, who had been cut off in their sins.—(Note, xiv. 10, 11.) In these praises, the emblematical representatives of the church and her ministers most cordially united; and a voice from the throne of God, or from some One who was very near it, called on all the servants of the Lord, in heaven and earth, great and small, even all his worshippers, all who feared God, without distinction, to praise him; which was followed by the acclamations of a multitude, like the rushing of a cataract, or the roaring of the sea, who joined in praising the Lord, because by his omnipotence he had taken the throne, and would reign in and by his Son all over the earth. The repeated use of the word Alleluia, or Hallelujah, which is Hebrew, is supposed by some persons to be an intimation that the Jews will be converted about the time of the destruction of Rome; and, whatever may be thought of this, it is exceedingly probable that the accomplishment of the New Testament-prophecies, in this respect, will be one principal means of effecting that happy change.

V. 7, 8. The whole company, before-mentioned, next call on each other to rejoice, and give glory to the Lord, because "the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his "bride hath made herself ready." Christ is the Bridegroom of his ransomed church; this sacred union will be fully completed in heaven; but the beginning of the glorious Millennium may be considered as a most remarkable celebration of his espousals on earth: all that has hitherto been done seems to be merely an introduction to that happy æra, when innumerable multitudes will be converted, and the state of the church on earth will greatly resemble heaven itself. Then the marriage of the Lamb will come, and his espoused church, being purified from heresies, divisions, and antichristian abuses, will be made ready, and meet to be publicly owned by him, as his delight and his beloved. Then to her it will be granted to be arrayed in fine linen, "clean and white, which is the righteousness "of the saints." The word is plural, and some would render it, "the righteous acts of the saints;" but the word raiment, in this meaning, seems generally to signify, either the righteousness of Christ imputed to them, or the image of Christ renewed in them by the sanctification of the Spirit, of which their righteous acts are effects and evidences; and both these senses may here be intended.—'That is, those good works, which are the certain evidences of a living faith.' (Beza.)

V. 9, 10. An angel, (either he from whom the voice is supposed to have come (5,) or rather the angel who interpreted the foregoing vision,) (xvii. 7,) informed the apostle on this occasion, that those persons would be happy, in a peculiar manner and degree, who were invited to the marriage-supper of the Lamb. This seems especially to refer to the more abundant grace and consolation, which Christians will receive in those happy days that are coming. This will render their lives on earth far more blessed than ours are at present, and make them meet for a more exalted felicity in heaven. The church collectively is the spouse of Christ; believers are often individually spoken of as invited guests to the marriage-feast, which may relate both to their present joy in the Lord, and to the perfect happiness of heaven; and the angel further assured John, that these were the true sayings of God; thus attesting the whole of the prophecies and promises. Upon which the glorious presence of the angel, and the rapturous prospect of these happy times, threw the apostle's mind into such an agitation, that he fell prostrate to worship him. But the angel charged him by no means to do it, as he was not his Creator, or Lord, or in any respect an object of adoration, but a fellow-servant to him, and to his brethren, who had been employed to bear testimony to the Lord Jesus; and he ought to worship God, and not a creature and a servant: for he, (the angel,) was only a prophet of superior order, being inspired by the Spirit to bear testimony to Jesus, as the common Lord of men and angels. Indeed, the testimony of Jesus was, from the beginning, the great subject of the Spirit of prophecy to whomsoever he was given; as all the revelations and predictions of Scripture were intended to make the Saviour known, in his personal and mediatorial glory, to make way for and announce his coming, to lead the attention of men to him, or to prove the doctrines revealed concerning him. 'Thither, as to that one and certain scope or 'object, all the prophecies tend: whence it is effected, that, 'at last, the true Spirit of prophecy, to which we must 'hearken, is that which leads us unto Jesus.' (Beza.)—Christ never declined such honour as John was forbidden to render to the angel; nay, he always showed his approbation of it: but the angel was a servant, and no more: Jesus is "the King of Glory." and "the Lord of all," "God "blessed for evermore." (Marg. Ref.) It should also be remembered, that the worship of creatures, or demons, under the names of saints and angels, forms the prominent part of that corruption of Christianity by idolatry, which has extended its baleful influence through so many populous nations, and continued during so many revolving ages; and against which the apostle was, in this book, to bear a most decided prophetical testimony. Now, nothing could give more energy to this protest than the repeated injunction laid on him, not to pay any homage, at all resembling adoration, to a most glorious benevolent angel, when visibly present, and acting the part of an instructor to him. Surely, then, no invisible, and, (most probably,) no absent creatures can be worshipped, without giving to them the glory which belongs exclusively to Jehovah.

V. 11—16. (Note, vi. 1, 2.) Having noted the rejoicings of the universal church, and of all the servants of God, over the destruction of Rome, the apostle saw heaven opened, as an indication of further visions: and he beheld a white horse, the emblem of justice and holiness; and One sat on it, who was "called faithful and true," fulfilling his promises to his people, and executing threatened vengeance on his enemies. He was indeed about to judge and to wage war against those who refused submission to him; yet he was unlike those warriors, whose ambition, rapacity, or malignant passions, have in every age made the earth a field of blood; for he conducted both his judicial proceedings, and his military expeditions, by the most perfect rules of righteousness. Yet none could deceive him, or elude his detection, for "his eyes were as a flame "of fire." (i. 14.) The many crowns worn by him denoted the extent of his authority, as Creator of the world, and "Head over all things to his church;" and the multitude of his victories. "He had a name written, "that no man knew but he himself;" for, as the eternal Son of God, his perfections and nature are incomprehensible. (Marg. Ref.) His vesture, dipped in blood, implied, either the atonement of his own blood, as the ground of his mediatorial authority, or, rather, that he was come from the slaughter of his enemies, and had stained his garments with their blood. (Notes, Is. lxiii. 1—6.) But though none could fully comprehend his perfections and counsels, yet he was known in his church by the name of "the Word of God," as declaring the mysterious perfections, and holy truth and will of God, to fallen men. (Note, John i. 1—3.) He was also followed by the armies of heaven, even his redeemed and converted people, who rode on white horses, to denote their conformity to him, and their concurrence and agency in his victories; and they were clothed in fine linen (8,) as accepted in him, and renewed by him. To illustrate the nature of his conquests still more fully, "out of his mouth "went a sharp sword," (i. 16.) implying that he powerfully executed the denunciations of his word, and smote the opposing nations. (Notes, Ps. ii.) Thus he trode the wine-press of the wrath of God; (Note, xiv. 14—20.) crushing all other obstinate enemies, as he had done the mystical Babylon. He had also inscribed "on his vesture, "and on his thigh," (the part of his garments where the sword is worn,) another name or title, implying his universal and absolute dominion, as "King of kings, and "Lord of lords;" (xvii. 14;) which carried in it a warning to the most powerful princes to submit to him, or they must fall before him. These verses and the context seem to predict the progress of the Gospel, subsequent to the fall of Rome, in the destruction of the remains of the antichristian empire, the purifying of the visible Church, the conversion of the Jews, the termination of Mahomedism, and the bringing in of the fulness of the Gentiles; and they more fully declare most important transactions, before briefly intimated, and also foretold by the ancient prophets. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17—21. The angel, standing in the sun, emblematically denoted, that the predicted judgments would be conspicuous to all the world; and his proclamation showed the immense slaughter which would be made of the enemies of God. To this place may be referred Ezekiel's prophecy of Gog and Magog, as the subsequent visions seem to relate to the Millennium: (Notes, Ez. xxxviii—xlviii:) for the total ruin of the eastern antichrist, and of all the opposers of the Gospel in Asia, seems to be immediately connected with the fall of the western antichrist. Though Rome was destroyed, yet the beast is supposed still to subsist: for the spirit of antichrist will survive that antichristian city; and probably the adherents of the party will unite with other enemies of the Gospel, in different parts of the world. (Marg. Ref.) The beast, however, or the idolatrous persecuting power, whose chief seat had been at Rome, will form a confederacy with the kings of the earth, that with combined forces they may fight against Christ and his servants; but in the event, the antichristian tyranny, and the corrupt clergy, who deceived men by lying miracles to support it, will be seized on and dreadfully destroyed, by being cast into the lake of fire, &c. and then all the remnant of their adherents will be cut off, according to the words of Christ; so that all opposition to his pure religion will then cease, till after the Millennium.—"The false "prophet," evidently denotes the same power before designated as "the two-horned beast;" and this effectually confirms the interpretation before given of that great enemy of God and his Church. (Notes, xiii. 11—18. Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

All heaven resounds with the high praises of God, whenever he executes his true and righteous judgments on those who corrupt the earth with pernicious principles and ungodly practices, and when he avenges the blood of his servants upon their persecutors. Though the smoke of their torment shall arise up for ever and ever, the whole company of redeemed sinners, and all the servants and worshippers of God in heaven and earth, will concur in these acclamations, and say, Amen, Hallelujah. Who then are they that will throw out insinuations, or openly speak of cruelty and tyranny, on hearing of these righteous judgments, but rebels, who blasphemously take part with the enemies of God, and plead against his dealings towards them? Let all beware of every approach to such impiety and presumption; for "the Lord God omnipotent reigneth." As justice and judgment are the basis of his throne, the earth hath cause to tremble; but, as it is established in mercy also, the penitent may rejoice in hope. Thousands of thousands, who once were rebels, are now singing "salvation, and glory, and honour, and power, be unto the Lord "our God." Let us then be glad in him, and give honour to him; and, whilst we view "the Lamb that was slain," espousing redeemed sinners unto himself, let us remember that we are invited to share the blessedness of the marriage-supper; that the wedding-garment is given to all who properly seek for it; that now is the time to be made ready for those sacred joys; and that all the felicity which the world can boast is not worthy to be compared with this unfading crown of glory and happiness. These are the true sayings of God; let none then say, "I pray thee "have me excused." If even created angels are so glorious, as to surprise the apostle into a purposed adoration, how glorious must the Lord of angels be! And if the highest of holy creatures so greatly fear, and decidedly refuse undue honour, how humbly should we sinful worms of the earth behave ourselves! And yet we may and ought to aspire at being made equal to angels, and the children of God, by faith in Christ Jesus. We should then beware of a voluntary humility, and not degrade ourselves, or dishonour our Head, by worshipping angels, or any mere creature, by calling men masters upon earth, or by the grovelling pursuit of worldly things.

V. 11—21.

The blessed Jesus is the Lord of all; but angels, apostles, and other Christians, are fellow-servants: he is "God "over all," and therefore to be worshipped, as one with the Father and the Holy Spirit; and all Revelation is the testimony of the Father, by the Spirit, to the Redeemer's personal and mediatorial glory; the whole centres in him, and his salvation and kingdom. May he then go forth, in faithfulness and righteousness, to extend his spiritual conquests, till "all kings fall down before him, and all nations do him "service!" May his armies be increased in number, and made more like unto him, being "clothed in fine linen, "clean and white, which is the righteousness of saints." (Ps. cxlix.) We cannot indeed know his whole glory, or his immeasurable love; but let let us endeavour to be more acquainted with him, as THE WORD OF GOD; and, accepting of his Salvation, may we be glad in him, who is "the King of kings, and Lord of lords!" for he will surely smite his proudest and stoutest enemies with the rod of his mouth, and "with the breath of his lips will he "slay the wicked," till he hath crushed them all in the wine-press of the fierceness and wrath of almighty God. It behooves us then to rejoice, and praise the Lord, when opposing tyrants are crushed, and false prophets are put to silence in darkness; and we should not scruple to add, "So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord." Nevertheless, it is our part to aim at more peaceful and gentle victories; and by our prayers, example, and improvement of talents, to seek the conversion of sinners, and the salvation of the souls even of our most cruel enemies and persecutors; whilst we constantly declare, that, "except they re-"pent, they will all likewise perish."

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1—3. The foregoing chapter predicted the termination of all open opposition to the Gospel; and the dreadful punishment of all those who had introduced, supported, or concurred in, the idolatrous corruptions of the Gospel, before predicted. But, while the instruments of mischief had been cut off, the great agent was still at liberty; and he would surely excite fresh disturbances, or produce new delusions, if not prevented.—The apostle had therefore a vision, emblematical of the restraints which would be laid on Satan himself. An angel from heaven, with the key of the abyss, (ix. 1—3,) and a great chain, seized on him, bound him, and cast him into the abyss, and there shut him up, to prevent his deceiving the nations, as he had before done; and this imprisonment continued during one thousand years. (xii. 7—9.) In some places, "the dragon" signifies the persecuting power of idolatrous emperors, who were vicegerents of the devil, and bore his name and style: but here Satan himself is evidently meant; and it is implied that Christ, with omnipotence and absolute authority, will restrain the devil, and all his legions of evil spirits, from deceiving mankind in general, or any part of them, into idolatry, impiety, heresy, and wickedness, as he hath hitherto done: for though human nature is prone to all evil, and averse to all good, yet the agency and influence of fallen angels has immense effect in counteracting the Gospel, in exciting men to atrocious crimes and cruel persecutions, and in devising and propagating ingenious, but fatal, delusions. When, therefore, this roaring lion, or subtle poisonous old serpent, shall be completely restrained, the Gospel will be rendered effectual, to purify the church and convert the nations; the Christian religion, in all its purity and glory, will become universal; and the true "Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the "world with fruit." Then the first petitions of the Lord's prayer will be wonderfully answered; (Notes, Matt. vi. 9, 10.) and piety, peace, righteousness, and purity, will fill the earth, till Satan shall again for a short space be loosed. V. 4—6. The apostle next saw thrones, and persons sitting on them. These represented the honourable and prosperous state of believers in those happy days, for they appeared to reign as kings on the earth. "And "judgment was given to them;" they were Christ's assessors, as it were, in the judgment executed on the beast, the false prophet, and the devil; even as all believers will be, when he shall judge the world. And he "saw "the souls" of the martyrs, confessors, and other eminent Christians of the preceding periods, living and reigning with Christ a thousand years. It hath long been disputed, and by disputants of various descriptions, whether this should be understood literally, or figuratively; and when prophecies are evidently unfulfilled, modesty and caution are very requisite. Yet it is necessary here to give an opinion, with the reasons of it. I am, therefore, induced to understand it figuratively, by the following considerations: 1st. The whole book is enigmatical, and full of emblems; so that a literal exposition would often imply absurdity, and the interpreter's business and skill consist principally in decyphering hieroglyphics. A succession of kings is constantly spoken of, as if they were individually the same persons; the two witnesses, that were slain, were "raised again, and ascended into heaven," when others were sent forth of the same spirit, and to bear the same testimony with greater encouragement and success. Rome is called Egypt, Sodom, Jerusalem, Babylon; and, in short, this is the style and manner of the whole prophecy, which no man could possibly explain upon any other principle. As therefore the Jews expected Elijah to come personally, and knew him not when he came mystically, in John Baptist, so, I apprehend, many Christians, and men of the utmost respectability for piety and learning, have fallen into the same mistake, in expecting a literal and personal resurrection of the martyrs, at the opening of the Millennium; and they would not know them at first, when they arose, (as the witnesses did,) in a numerous race of Christians, resembling them as to all their eminent graces. 2dly. It is unaccountable, that the souls of the persons raised should be exclusively mentioned, if the literal resurrection of their bodies was meant; for this rather implies, according to the enigmatical style of the book, that their souls reanimated other bodies; that is, they appeared to live again in Christians of the same spirit, (vi. 9.) 3dly. Some have imagined, that the resurrection of all the righteous will precede the Millennium, because "the dead in Christ will rise first;" but what do they suppose the state of the earth will be during that period? Will none live on earth but the risen saints? Or will all the rest be wicked? Or, being righteous, will they not die? Or, if they die, will there be three resurrections; one of the righteous before the Millennium, and another of the righteous after it, and one of the wicked? These questions are not easily resolved on that hypothesis. The resurrection is always spoken of as one grand event, occurring nearly at the same time; except, that the righteous will be first raised, and so be prepared to sit with Christ in judgment on the wicked: and it is implied, in every one of those declarations, that all the dead in Christ will rise together, before the living shall be changed. 4thly. We cannot conceive that it could add to the felicity of those who, being "absent from the body," are "present "with the Lord," to come again to dwell on earth, which must be in some degree a scene of pain, suffering, imperfection, and death, till the present state of things is fully ended; and this will not be till the general resurrection, as it sufficiently appears from the loosing of Satan, and the effects of it, after the Millennium. 5thly. This is the only place, in which any thing like such a literal resurrection, previous to the end of the world, is intimated; whereas there are numerous prophecies of an universal prevalence and triumph of true religion throughout the earth. (Marg. Ref.) Now, is it most reasonable to interpret so many plain predictions by one expression in this enigmatical book, or to explain that one expression by the many clear predictions which give another view of it? Or why should the literal sense be here insisted on, when in so many places it must be departed from? Indeed, I cannot see that the resurrection of souls can literally mean the resurrection of bodies. But if the resurrection, here spoken of, be not a literal, but a figurative resurrection, the same reasons lead us to conclude that Christ will not come down from heaven personally, to reign on earth; but that he will reign spiritually, in the prevalence of his Gospel, and by his Holy Spirit in the hearts of men in general. The Scriptures constantly speak of his sitting on the right hand of God in heaven, till he shall come the second time to judge the world: the expressions concerning his coming to destroy Jerusalem, (Matt. xxiv. 27—30. Mark xiii. 24—30.) and those that relate to his presence with, and coming to, his people, are stronger than any here used; yet no good expositor interprets them of his personal presence as man, in the primary meaning of them. (Notes, John xiv. 18—23.) Multitudes of believers will be raised up, as if animated by the souls of those who had been martyred for Christ, or had protested against antichrist: even as the witnesses were raised again after three days and a half. These excellent persons will live and reign on earth, in victory, honour, holiness, and joy, being happy in the gracious presence of Christ with their souls, and in their assemblies; and without any enemies, or false teachers to harass, corrupt, or divide them; but the rest of the dead will not live till the thousand years be ended. 'There is 'mention made in this prophecy of two sorts of dead 'persons; those who were slain for the witness of Jesus, 'and those who were slain by the sword of him that sat 'on the horse. The former were raised to life, and lived 'and reigned with Christ a thousand years; but the others 'lived not again till the thousand years were finished; 'they had no successors of the same wicked and persecuting spirit, till the devil was let loose after the Millennium.' (Guise.) This interpretation suits the style of the book, and is to me perfectly satisfactory. The expression itself intimated a figurative resurrection, and therefore it was carefully distinguished from the literal resurrection of the dead. (John v. 25—29.) It is moreover an instance of that wise and proper obscurity, which we always find in prophecies, previous to their accomplishment. This is the first resurrection, a spiritual and mystical resurrection; and they who shall partake of it, living in those happy times, will be holy and blessed, (xix. 9.) even more than Christians in other ages. When it is added, that the second death shall have no power over them, it seems implied, that they must enter heaven by passing through the first death: nor is there any thing different in what follows from the language used concerning believers of other times, (Marg. Ref.) except, that they shall "reign "with Christ a thousand years;" which naturally signifies, that a succession of such triumphant Christians, made honourable and happy by the Lord's special presence with them, shall continue through the Millennium, even as the two witnesses prophesied in sackcloth, through the whole term of the reign of Antichrist. Some would compute the thousand years after the same manner as the three years and a half, or twelve hundred and sixty days, have been reckoned, each day to signify a year; which would extend this happy period to 360,000 years at least: this, however, seems so much beyond all proportion, and so different from all the views elsewhere given of the speedy approach of the day of judgment, that it is not generally regarded. So that, upon the whole, we may expect that a thousand years will follow the final destruction of all the antichristian, idolatrous, persecuting powers, during which pure Christianity, in doctrine, worship, and universal holiness, will be diffused all over the earth, and that all idolatry, infidelity, impiety, superstition, heresy, false religion, injustice, fraud, oppression, cruelty, war, murder, intemperance, licentiousness, with all other evils, which now harass and desolate the earth, will be restrained by the omnipotent operation of the Holy Spirit; and that godliness, righteousness, peace, truth, purity, and love, will render the earth in some measure like heaven itself. Hitherto the depravity of human nature, and the malignant agency of apostate angels, have been illustrated and displayed in the state of the world; and the inefficacy of all human inventions, and even of the word of truth, without the new-creating Spirit of truth, to remedy these evils, hath been demonstrated, in opposition to man's proud reasonings. The event of the trial hath shown that nothing but the power of God himself can prevent men from listening to the temptations of fallen angels, or from despising, opposing, neglecting, corrupting, or perverting, the Gospel of salvation itself. But at length the Lord will arise; by the almighty power of his providence he will confine fallen angels; and by the operation of his Spirit he will new-create fallen men, generally, all over the earth; and then repentance, faith, and holiness, will as certainly prevail, as impenitence, unbelief, and unholiness, now do. Still, however, Christianity will be the religion of sinners, and there will be defects and sins in believers; and doubtless some unconverted persons, for a short part of their lives at least, for men will be made holy by regeneration, not born holy; and therefore they will still continue liable to many natural evils, and to death. Yet that measure of righteousness, which such a prevalence of true Christianity must produce, will immensely lessen the quantity of natural evil. We may easily perceive what a variety of dreadful pains, diseases, and other grievous calamities, must cease, were all men true Christians: all the evils of public and private contention would be terminated: domestic, relative, and social felicity must be exceedingly enhanced. Industry in useful things, with frugality and temperance, would prevent that pinching poverty and distress, which now render multitudes wretched; and a greater fertility of the earth may reasonably be expected, according to the former fruitfulness of Canaan, contrasted with its present sterility. Every man will then try to alleviate, instead of adding to, the unavoidable sorrows of all around him; nor "shall they hurt or destroy in all the holy "mountain" of God. The hope of glory, the prospects of a happy meeting in heaven, and the abundant consolations of the Holy Spirit, will render sickness, death, and the loss of beloved friends, far more easy than at present; while communion with God, and the communion of the saints, all being of one heart in the worship and service of God, will render religion a constant feast to their souls, and inferior to heavenly felicity, only because it will not be absolutely perfect. Every one must likewise perceive how immensely the human species would be increased, if wars, destructive employments, and intemperance, were put an end to, and God's ordinance of marriage were generally substituted, instead of that compound of licentiousness and selfishness, which constitute a vicious celibacy, at least till the prime of life is past, or that forced and prudential celibacy, which comparative or real poverty, united with distrust of Providence, often occasions; things that exceedingly tend to corrupt the morals of the human species, and to destroy the lives of both sexes in youth, almost as much as war itself. We may therefore readily allow, that the number of persons who shall live on earth, during the Millennium, may be immensely greater than the whole multitude of all the preceding ages; and consequently, that far more of the human race may yet be saved than shall perish, even though we do not agree to the computations which have been made concerning it. The wild notions and extravagant practices grafted on the belief of a Millennium, have rendered the name of it contemptible or hateful to numbers; yet we have as just grounds to expect such a happy event, as the Jews had to look for a Messiah: but they, who suppose it will be a carnal Millennium, are as much mistaken, as the Jews were in waiting for a temporal Deliverer. It is our duty to pray for the promised glorious days, and to do every thing, in our private or public situations, which can be instrumental in preparing the way for them; even as David made abundant provision for the temple which Solomon was to build. Whether the general opinion, that this thousand years will be the seventh thousand from the creation, or the sabbatical millenary, the event must determine: it is evident, however, that the dawn of this glorious day cannot be very distant. The rest of, &c. (5.) 'It is 'only the rest that were slain, (xix. 21,) that "lived not "again." 'It is only those, who had no share in the first 'resurrection, and so were neither blessed nor holy, (6;)

‘nor had their names written in the book of life; and, consequently, those on whom the second death had place; which death they suffered, when “fire came down from heaven and devoured them,” ‘and “they were cast into the lake of fire with the devil.” (10. 15.) ‘And that “the rest” ‘should signify the same persons cannot seem strange, if we consider that only four verses intervene betwixt them. And that they must be the same persons is evident from the connexion of the words;’ “The rest of the dead lived not, till the thousand years” ‘of Satan's binding, and the saints' reign were ended. The dead church lives again in the same metaphorical sense, in which the rest of the dead, the enemies of the Church, live again, at the end of the thousand years, when Satan is loosed, and gathers them to battle against the Church. The souls of them, who were slain for the testimony of Jesus, and for the word of God, are those Christians, who were slain in the time of the ten persecutions; (Note, vi. 9—11;) and the souls of them, who worshipped not the beast, are those Christians, who chose rather to die, than to be guilty of Romish idolatry: and they are said to live again; as the beast, who had received the wound of death lived again, in the succession of the antichristian beast, who exercised the power of the heathen emperors over the earth, and revived the idolatry of the heathen empire; and as the two witnesses, when slain, are said to live again, because a succession of men of the same faith, and the same opposition to the beast, revive and flourish, after they are slain.’ (Whitby.)—(Notes, Is. xxvi. 19. Ez. xxxvii. 1—14.) It appears to me undoubted, that the fathers, or early writers of the Christian Church, in general expected a Millennium; and several of them, a Millennium not materially differing from that above described. But others, gradually following the impulse of imagination, speculation, and carnal passions, advanced sentiments on the subject so extravagant, so ridiculous, and even so licentious, that sober, yet injudicious, men became ashamed of the general doctrine. Thus it was disgraced, and almost forgotten, during many centuries: but, about the æra of the reformation, it was again revived, and again still more deeply disgraced, by the wild reveries and practical atrocities of those who maintained it, and rendered it subservient to rebellions, insurrections, and every abomination. But for some considerable time past, the question concerning a Millennium has been brought forward, and discussed, in a more sober and holy manner; and, notwithstanding that some still maintain the doctrine of a literal resurrection, and a personal visible reign of Christ on earth, and others favour the view above given, yet it is evident that the doctrine itself gains, more and more, general credence; is supported, or allowed, by writers of widely discordant theological opinions; and has lost by far the greater part of that odium and contempt, which formerly attached to it. Nor can I doubt but that, in proportion as the Scriptures are diligently and impartially searched and understood, the more generally and unreservedly will the persuasion prevail, that there shall be a Millennium; that it is at hand, even at the door; and that we ought to advert to it, and to those things which may prepare the way for it, in all our studies and writings, and in the improvement of our several talents. How far the restoration of the Jews to their own land, and the rebuilding of Jerusalem, are implied in the general doctrine, the event must show: but many things, taken from the concluding chapters of this book, and connected with the opinion of the Millennium, either as directing our expectations respecting it, or as forming objections to it, will, I trust, be proved to relate exclusively to the heavenly world, and the state of the redeemed, subsequent to the day of judgment. It may, however, be reasonably conjectured, that the restoration to purity and peace of the Christian church will make way for the conversion of the Jews, as a nation, and probably their reinstatement in their own land; and that this will introduce the conversion of the nations, in which the converted Jews will be most diligent and successful instruments. This seems to be intimated in many prophecies already considered; yet the event alone can fully show whether the conjecture is well-grounded.

V. 7—10. At the end of the Millennium, God will remove Satan's restraint, for reasons which we are not competent to understand; perhaps, among others, to show that the long continued happy estate of the world was not the effect of any melioration of human nature, as to itself, but of an immediate divine influence on men's minds, “to the praise of the glory of his grace.” Being loosed out of prison, this great deceiver will again exert himself, and excite his agents, with all earnestness, subtlety, and sagacity, to corrupt the Gospel, and to seduce men into apostacy, idolatry, heresy, infidelity, or vice; and thus, the old generation of believers dying, the succeeding race, through many nations in the four quarters of the earth, will be deceived by him: and, having themselves departed from the faith, they will be instigated to hate and persecute such as adhere to it; and thus the spirit of antichrist will rise again, after the thousand years are expired, (Note, 4—6.) Then religious wars will be undertaken, and at success of the Gospel will make in the state of the world, supply us with an unanswerable argument of its divine original and authority, even previous to the fulfilment of those prophecies, which relate to it. Can that doctrine come from any other than God, which wants but to be universally received with obedient faith, to remedy all the evils that fill the earth; and to render men as much like holy and happy angels, as most of them at present are like deceitful, malignant, ambitious, and apostate spirits? The need that the world stands in of such a remedy; the suitableness of it; its evident tendency; and its efficacy, as far as men actually make use of it, proclaim its divinity in the most decisive manner; even apart from miracles, fulfilments of prophecy, and all other external arguments whatsoever; yea, in language distinct from, though connected with, that "witness in himself," which is the principal source of assurance to the experienced believer's heart.

V. 8—15.

Whenever the Lord takes off the restraint from Satan, he is both active and able to deceive the nations, and to propagate lies and mischief among men: and then persecution again lifts up its horrid front, and stalks abroad to revel upon the blood of the saints.—We may even learn profitable lessons from the devil and his angels: for if the servants and ministers of Christ were as united, active, vigilant, and persevering in doing good, as these enemies are in doing mischief; we might hope for better times. Nor shall we do amiss in taking the hint from them, not to think the least opportunity of good beneath our notice; whilst we aspire and aim at the most extensive and important usefulness; for our enemies, when forming horrid plans to destroy, if it were possible, the whole church at once, do not neglect to deceive one soul; or even to defile, mislead, or harass the meanest of those whom they cannot destroy. But no weapons formed against the church can prosper; and all that fight against her shall perish, with the devil, the beast, and the false prophet, and be tormented day and night for ever and ever. May we then firmly believe, that 'Christ shall come to be our Judge.' and daily prepare to stand before his awful tribunal, when "heaven and earth shall flee from his face, and no place "shall be found for them." Let us frequently reflect on the opening of the books, the bringing to light of the hidden things of darkness, and the discovery of all characters and actions in their proper colours, which will take place, when the Judge shall render to every one according to his works. Then all the dead shall be raised; all distinctions swallowed up, except that between the righteous and the wicked; and all will be cast into the lake of fire, prepared for the devil and his angels, except the believing and obedient followers of Christ, whose names are written in the book of life. "Let no man, therefore, deceive himself "with vain words; for the wrath of God will come on all "the children of disobedience," how many soever they be. "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the "kingdom of their Father:" and "death shall be swallowed up in victory." "He that hath an ear, let him "hear what the Spirit saith to the churches."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1—4. Some interpreters, (especially among those who hold a literal resurrection at the beginning of the Millennium, and the personal reign of Christ on earth during it,) understand these chapters principally of the state of the church on earth at that time. But they come in order subsequent to the account of the general judgment; and we can never attain to a satisfactory understanding of prophecy, if imagination, or conjecture, be allowed to carry us backward, or forward, without any fixed principles. The method that we should take, of clearing up the evidence of the divine authority of scripture from the accomplishment of prophecy; (and this is no doubt one principal weapon, with which to defend Christianity against all kinds of infidels;) must be, by showing, that there is order and arrangement in the predictions, and a coincidence between them and known facts; and that a regular series of events is foretold, some of which are already fulfilled, and the rest cannot be so, because the order of the prophecy shows them to be yet future. But, in order to this, we must carefully adhere to the proposed arrangement in our interpretations, not deviating even from the appearance of it without evident reason. For example, there was a necessity of returning, at the beginning of the twelfth chapter, to the primitive times of Christianity; because another regular series of predictions is there evidently begun, after the other had been completed. This creates a proper degree of prophetical obscurity; and when the key is found, it adds to the consistency, energy, and beauty of the whole. But, having now traced both parts of the book to the end of the world; it must introduce perplexity, and occasion an appearance of uncertainty and ambiguity, to return back, without any necessity, to the preceding Millennium. As many ages of persecution and tribulation had been predicted; and as this book was in a good measure written for the support and encouragement of believers, during those afflicting scenes; so we might naturally expect to hear towards the conclusion of it, some account of their happy state in heaven, as well as of the prosperous times of the church on earth: but if these chapters do not relate to that subject, we hear indeed of the punishment of the wicked, but nothing concerning the felicity of the righteous. Many of the expressions also are such, as cannot apply to any state, where the least remains of sin or sorrow are to be found, or any return of them to be expected: and those which seem of another nature are emblematical, according to the style of the whole book; which differs from all others in the New Testament, though it resembles many of the prophecies of Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and Zechariah. These reasons induce me to explain what follows of the heavenly state exclusively; except as the reader's thoughts are naturally called off, in some places, to other subjects. The emblem of a new heaven hath several times occurred, in different senses. (Notes, &c. Is. lxv. 17. lxvi. 22.) Some think that Peter wrote after the book of Revelation was published, and alluded to it; (Note, 2 Pet. iii. 10—14;) but the Holy Spirit might lead both the sacred writers to the same views and images. It is obvious, however, that Peter spake of the heavenly state; which is an additional argument to prove that John did the same; and indeed this must be so; for the "first heaven and earth were passed "away." (xx. 11.) In this new world, "there was no "sea;" which aptly represents an entire freedom from polluting and conflicting passions, distressing temptations, tempestuous troubles, changes, and alarms; and from whatever can divide, or interrupt, the communion of saints with each other: some think it implies, also, that there is abundance of room in that blessed world; as a large proportion of the earth is now covered with the sea. The apostle likewise saw the holy city, coming down from heaven; the whole church triumphant was shown to him under this emblem, that he might perceive, and report something of its glory and felicity, according to man's capacity of apprehending heavenly things: and he thus learned, that its blessedness came wholly from God, and depended on him. It seems to have appeared in the air just before him, that he might contemplate and examine it: and he perceived that it was prepared as a bride adorned for her nuptials; (xix. 7, 8;) which was another emblem, denoting the mutual love between Christ and his triumphant church; their union and communion, and delight in each other; and the glory and felicity thus bestowed upon believers in heaven. Thus two emblems, which apparently are not very compatible, concur in giving some instructive ideas of this interesting but inconceivable subject. He then heard a voice from heaven, proclaiming, with astonishment at the divine condescension, that the tabernacle of God was placed with men, and that he would dwell among them as their reconciled Father, notwithstanding all their rebellions! (Ps. lxviii. 18. John i. 14.) They would, therefore, be his people, devoted to his service and glory, and he would be with them, as their all-sufficient and eternal portion. (Marg. Ref.) This has a partial accomplishment, in the present consolations of true believers; but here it must refer to the perfect enjoyment of God in the beatific vision: for "He will then wipe "away all tears from their eyes," like a tender Father, who comforteth his mourning children, (vii. 17.) and they will never weep again, either for sin or trouble; as death, and every cause of grief, shall be no more, and the former things will be passed away. Can these expressions relate to any thing less than the heavenly state? There was no sea. (1.) 'It is evident from hence, that this new heaven 'and new earth are not designed to take place, till after the 'general judgment: for at the general judgment, "the sea "gave up the dead which were in it." (xx. 13.) 'Gog 'and Magog, the nations in the four corners of the earth 'are deceived by Satan, after the expiration of the Mil'lennium: but Gog and Magog are not inhabiters of the 'new heaven and the new earth. The church of Christ 'shall be glorious upon earth during the Millennium; and 'it shall be more glorious still in the new earth, after the 'Millennium, to all eternity.' (Bp. Newton.)

V. 5—8. "He that sat on the throne," generally, in this book, denotes the Father personally, as distinguished from "the Lamb that was slain:" but as Christ will appear on the throne of judgment, (xx. 11,) so we may understand it of him in this place; and the language employed best accords to him in his mediatorial character. The Lord Jesus, therefore, declared, in the apostle's hearing, that "He made all things new:" (Marg. Ref.) he brings sinners into a new state, and creates them anew to holiness; and he will make all things new, respecting their situation and manner of living, when he hath brought them, perfected both in body and soul, to his glorious felicity. This John was commanded to write, for the encouragement of the church in all its afflictions, conflicts, and temptations; for these were true and faithful sayings, on which the most entire dependence might be placed. He also added, "It is done:" the whole counsel of the love of God will be then completed, and the redemption, which the incarnate Son finished on the cross, will be perfectly applied. For, being "Alpha and Omega, the "Beginning and the End," he will surely bring the work he had begun to a glorious conclusion. (Notes, &c. i. 8. 11. 18. ii. 8.) If any man in any age or place, were athirst for the blessings of salvation; if any one were so sensible of his perishing need of them, and had such a view of their preciousness, as to be earnest in using means for obtaining them, and would not be satisfied with any thing else, Christ would surely give him "of the Foun-"tain of the water of life freely." (Marg. Ref. and notes on the texts referred to.) The sin and folly of men consist in "forsaking the Fountain of living water, to "hew out broken cisterns, that can hold no waters;" his happiness must begin with returning to this Fountain, as opened through the mediation of Christ. Sensual and sinful pleasures are muddy and poisoned waters; the best earthly comforts are like the scanty stagnating supplies of a cistern; when idolized, they become broken cisterns, and yield only vanity, disappointment, and vexation; and all our labour about them, resembles "hewing out broken "cisterns, that can hold no water." But the joys of true religion are like the springing waters from a fountain. pure, refreshing, overflowing, always satisfying, never satiating, abundant, and eternal. The sanctifying consolations of the Holy Spirit, being the preparation for heavenly felicity, and the antepast of it, are the streams from this Fountain, which flow for us in the wilderness. To those, who thirst for them, Christ will give of these waters, freely, without any price paid for them, even supplies adequate to their largest desires; these shall be furnished from time to time, when they come and ask for them, to be their solace in life, and at the approach of death; and then he will bring them to the Fountain-head, that they may drink for ever full draughts of these holy and glorious joys. All this he gives freely; though he purchased them by the shedding of his blood upon the cross for their sins. (xxii. 1. 17.) Indeed, they, who draw waters from these wells of salvation, have many enemies to encounter: but the Lord assures them, that every conqueror shall "inherit all things," for He will be his God, and he shall be his son, and thus be the heir of all things in him. (1 Cor. iii. 21—23.) On the other hand, "the fearful," who dared not profess, or who renounced the gospel, from the dread of reproach and suffering; the cowardly soldiers, who feared the enemy more than their Captain, and so "turned back in the day of battle;" and "infidels" or "unbelievers" of all descriptions; (not the weak in faith, but such as had no faith;) "the abomi-"nable," or those who were guilty of unnatural practices; murderers of themselves or others, in duels, wars, persecutions, perversion of justice, and oppression; "for-"nicators;" adulterers, and lewd persons of every kind: "sorcerers;" the devil's prophets, real or pretended, to which company pretenders to new revelations belong; "idolaters, and all liars," hypocrites, deceivers, false teachers; all, who lie for gain, or from malice, who thus cheat or slander others: yea, all liars, though they only divert themselves or others by breaking God's commandments; all these shall have their portion in the lake of fire, with the devil and his angels. V. 9.—21. An angel having called John to accompany him, that he might show him the bride, (Note, xix. 7, 8.) or the church triumphant, after the completion of the sacred union between Christ and his purchased people, in the glory of heaven, he was, to his own apprehension, (being under the influence of the prophetic Spirit) carried to an exceedingly high mountain, and shown a city immensely great, descending out of heaven from God. (2, 3.) This interchange of emblems from "the Bride, the Lamb's wife," to "the holy Jerusalem," shows, that we are only to take general ideas from them, but not to enter minutely into particulars, in which there is seldom much agreement: and that our complex view of such subjects must be deduced from the whole of them compared together. This city was illuminated, beautified, and rendered illustrious beyond expression, by the glory of God beaming full upon it; which shows that the happiness of heaven consists in immediate communications from God, and in conformity to him. Thus the light, that shone on the city, was like the refulgency of the most admired jewels: the whole, as it appeared pendent in the air, shone with surprising lustre and beauty, and was transparent as crystal: which may intimate, that our knowledge in heaven will be intuitive, certain, and productive of the most satisfying delight. The great wall of jasper of one hundred and forty-four cubits in height, or thickness, (according to the measure of a man, from his elbow to the end of his middle finger, (17,) being the number of the twelve tribes multiplied by that of the twelve apostles, may denote the entire security of that residence, which the almighty God hath prepared for the whole increase of both the Old and the New Testament churches, when collected together in heaven; where no enemy can approach to annoy or alarm them for ever. Twelve gates, guarded by twelve angels, and inscribed with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, implied, that this holy city was open on every side for the admission of the true Israel of God, even all his believing servants, and for none else: and that angels rejoiced in their security and felicity in heaven, as well as readily ministered to them during their progress thither. The twelve foundations, inscribed with the names of the twelve apostles, and formed of twelve precious stones, (which John in vision saw, in the same manner as he did the rest,) might show that all, who belonged to that holy city, obtained their citizenship, by receiving and obeying the doctrine of the apostles respecting Christ and his salvation, as "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world:" the whole city rests on that foundation primarily, and in a subordinate sense on those that published and attested that doctrine, who will be honoured there in a peculiar manner: nor will any person enter thither, who does not hold the doctrine of the apostles, in its grand outlines: for thus it hath been believed by the church, ever since the first promise to fallen man. The precious stones may denote, that all earthly splendour is mean and paltry compared with that of heaven; and that all possible excellency and glory will there combine, abound and centre for ever. (Notes, Is. liv. 11, 12. Eph. ii. 19—22.) The vast dimensions of the city, being an exact square, fifteen hundred miles on each side, might be emblematical of magnificence, and of room for any number of inhabitants which should ever enter it. As it is inconceivable how a city could be fifteen hundred miles high; so, when it is said that the length, breadth, and height were equal, some conclude that no more is meant, than that the height was proportionable to the other dimensions. As, however, the whole is enigmatical, and as a cube seems a kind of perfect form, perhaps the language is to be understood according to its obvious meaning: and then we may consider it as an intimation, that the reader is not to form any gross conceptions of the city in his imagination, but to deduce instruction from it, as an emblem: and it may imply the stability, proportion, and uniformity of heavenly things, and the inconceivable nature and glory of them. (Eph. iii. 18.)—The city, and the street of it, being "of pure gold, like unto clear glass," may be an emblem of the union in heaven of those excellencies, which seem here to be incompatible. 'They will be splendid, and durable as the purest gold; clear and transparent as the finest glass. In that happy world, the beauties and advantages, which here are divided and incompatible, will unite and agree. Our glass is clear, but brittle; our gold is shining and solid, but it is opaque, and discovers only a surface. And thus it is with our minds. The powers of the imagination are lively and extensive, but transient and uncertain. The powers of the understanding are more solid and regular, but at the same time more slow and limited, and confined to the outside properties of the few objects around us. But when we arrive within the veil, the perfections of the glass and gold will be combined, and the imperfections of each will entirely cease. Then we shall know more than we can now imagine. The glass will be all gold. And then we shall apprehend truth in its relations and consequences, not (as at present,) by that tedious and fallible process which we call reasoning, but by a single glance of thought, as the sight pierces in an instant through the largest transparent body. The gold will be all glass.' (Newton's Cardiphonia.)—The twelve gates, made of so many vast pearls, denoted, that every thing will be superlatively glorious, beyond all comparison with any thing seen on earth.—The marginal references will show the reader, in a manner suited to excite a peculiar interest, that even in those things, which are stated as the glory of the antichristian harlot, the true spouse of Christ immensely exceeds her.

V. 22—27. The temple was essential to the literal Jerusalem, as its great ornament and honour; and it made a prominent part in Ezekiel's vision of the church, during the Millennium, under the emblem of the holy city (Notes, Ez. xl—xlviii:) but there was no temple in the mystical city which John saw; which is a demonstration, that the heavenly state was exclusively meant. In heaven there will be no need of external symbols of the Lord's presence; when he shall be fully manifested in his essential glory, as far as creatures can perceive and know him. He will be evidently among them, to communicate unalloyed felicity, and to receive their adorations; and the eternal Son, in human nature, as the Lamb that was slain, will be a Temple, in which "all the fulness of the Godhead dwelling "bodily" will be made manifest to the glorified bodies of the saints, whilst the perfections of the divine nature will be contemplated with open face, by the exercise of their intellectual powers.—Nor will this holy city need the sun or moon to lighten it, or any of the things which outwardly contribute to our comfort and are suited to our state on earth; for the glory of God will lighten it, yea, the Lamb will be the light and felicity of it. (Notes, Is. lx. 19, 20.) What words can more fully express the mysterious union and coequality of the Son with the Father in the God-head?—The inhabitants of this city will not only be numerous, above those of other cities; but even nations, many nations of those, whom Jesus hath saved, will dwell in it, and walk in the light of God and the Lamb, perpetually and eternally. If all the kings of the earth had concurred to bring the whole of their wealth, magnificence, and glory, into one place; it could not have borne any comparison with this holy city: thus those kings, who belonged to the church on earth, though they have left all their outward grandeur behind them, will yet bring all their real honour into it, and all other glory will be swallowed up in it. The gates not shut by day, and there being no night there, emblematically show the liberty, peace, security, and uninterrupted enjoyment of that blessed state: and as believers are the excellent of the earth, and enter thither from every nation; so it may literally be said, that "they bring the glory and honour of the nations into "it;" as well as figuratively, in respect of its incomparable splendour and excellency. Moreover, nothing sinful or unclean can at all find admission into it. All the inhabitants are absolutely perfected in holiness; and all increase, rejoice in, and participate each other's felicity, being all excellent, loving, and lovely, beyond expression or imagination.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

"There remaineth a rest for the people of God:" and when the idolized objects of carnal men's affections and pursuits shall pass away, and be no more for ever, believers shall enter "the new heaven and the new earth," in which dwelleth righteousness, and where no tumultuous passions, anxious cares, or changing dispensations, shall disturb their repose to all eternity. "But will God indeed "dwell with man," and receive man to dwell with him in heavenly felicity? What then should for a single moment divert us from seeking so vast a blessing? Or what words can suffice to express our admiring gratitude? May we seek the adorning and beauty of holiness, and still desire to be found accepted in the righteousness of the Redeemer, and adorned with the beauties of holiness; and then the heavenly bridegroom will find us prepared, and will rejoice over us to do us good for ever. (Zeph. iii. 17.) Tears may indeed now furrow our cheeks, and anguish may sometimes distract our hearts, because of sin within us and around us, and because of its distressing effects; but speedily our God will wipe away all our tears, and we shall feel and see no more of death, of sorrow, of crying, or of pain, for ever. Let us then pray for patience, that, "having done the will of God, we may inherit the promise." If we are willing and desirous that the gracious Redeemer should make all things new in our hearts and nature, by whatever means he sees good, we need not fear, but that he will make all things new, in respect of our situation, till he hath brought us to the enjoyment of complete felicity: for he is Alpha and Omega; his work is perfect; and when he begins to save he will never leave or forsake those who partake of his grace, and who are the objects of his everlasting love. If, in bringing us to thirst for the waters of life, he causes us to pass through humiliating dispensations and experiences, we ought not to complain, as this thirst is the preparation for all the blessings of time and eternity, and he will give to "every one that is athirst "of the Fountain of the water of life freely." Did we come to him for this blessing more frequently, and pray for it more earnestly, we should be enabled in the sharpest trials to realize the Christian paradox, "as sorrowful, yet "always rejoicing:" but we are too apt to go to broken cisterns; and no wonder in this case that we go mourning all the day long. Let then those, who are engaged in the combat, have recourse to this never-failing cordial; that, by its exhilarating and invigorating efficacy, their strength may be renewed, till they have won the victory, and are owned as children and heirs of God in Christ Jesus, and possess all things in him.—But, surely, the curse is also set before us in this scripture, as well as the blessing: and most loudly doth Christ say to all that hear his word, "not to fear them, who can kill the body, but after that "have no more that they can do;" when such cowards,

A further description of the heavenly state, 1—5. The angel attests these things, and again forbids John to worship him, 6—9. Christ himself shows the apostle, that the state of men would soon be fixed, by his coming to judgment, 10—12: he declares who would enter heaven, and who would be excluded, 13—15; invites all that were willing, to accept of his salvation; and denounces plagues on all who add to, or take away from this prophecy, 16—19. The apostle desires the speedy advent of Christ; and concludes with a benediction on his readers, 20, 21.

as dare not own Christ on earth, are ranked with the most abominable sinners, as heirs of the lake of fire and brimstone. If the Lord should speak in thunder from heaven, and protest to sinners, by name, that they were in the way to hell, it could not be more manifest than it is at present, if men would but notice it: for whilst they live in infidelity, impiety, or any of the sins here or elsewhere enumerated, does not God say expressly to them, "Except "ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish?" But blessed be his name, he says also to the worst, "Repent, and be "converted, that your sins may be blotted out." "Believe "in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

V. 9—27.

The angels who pour out vials of wrath, and inflict plagues on ungodly men, take pleasure in helping the joy of believers: and the mystical espousals of Christ and his church excite their attention, admiration, and rejoicing praises. But the way in which the Lord teaches us the nature of heavenly glories, implies that we are poor ignorant children, too apt to be pleased with trifles and externals, who must be spoken to in our own language, not being capable of knowing things as they are, or of fully relishing the pure and spiritual felicity of the celestial world. Yet, if any thing draw off our affections from earthly objects to seek a treasure in heaven, and a permanent mansion in that blessed world, it will be well.—Glorious things are indeed here spoken of the city of God; and the whole is well suited to raise our expectations, and enlarge our conceptions of its security, peace, splendour, its purity and felicity: but in proportion to our spirituality, we shall be more and more led to contemplate heaven, as filled with the glory of God, and enlightened by the presence of the Lord Jesus, the Sun of Righteousness, and the Redeemer of lost sinners: knowing, that in "his "presence is fulness of joy, and pleasures at his right "hand for evermore." As nothing unclean can enter thither, let us be stirred up, by these glimpses of heavenly things, in giving diligence to "cleanse ourselves from all "filthiness of flesh and spirit, and to perfect holiness, in "the fear of God," that we may be approved as "Israelites "indeed, in whom there is no guile," and have a sure evidence that we are written in the "book of life of the "Lamb, that was slain from the foundation of the world."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1. The angel next made known to the apostle the source and current of heavenly blessings, for "he showed him a pure River of water of life:" this implied the holy nature and tendency of those unalloyed pleasures, which flow, without interruption or end, for the full satisfaction of all the saints in glory. (Ps. xlvi. 4.) It was also "clear," or transparent, "as crystal;" which may intimate that the happiness of heaven greatly consists in a full, exact, and certain knowledge of God, and his glorious perfections and works, exciting all holy and delightful affections in the heart. This river "proceeded "out of the throne of God and of the Lamb," as from its fountain; which showed, that all felicity comes from God, as the all-sufficient Source of life, light, holiness, and joy; and that it is communicated according to his wise and holy sovereignty. But the throne of God was the throne of the Lamb also; (iii. 21;) for the river flows to sinful men, through the Person of Emmanuel, and his atonement and mediation. This especially points to the quickening and sanctifying influences and consolations of the Holy Spirit, as given to sinners through Jesus Christ, to be the author of spiritual and eternal life to their souls. (Marg. Ref. and notes on the texts referred to.) This interpretation, which coincides with so many other scriptures, gives a peculiarly interesting view of the sacred Trinity; the Father, who sent his only begotten Son to be our Saviour; the Son, who, having finished his work on earth, rose and ascended, and sat down with the Father on his throne, and ever liveth, as Emmanuel, our divine, our incarnate Mediator; and the Holy Spirit, as proceeding from the Father and the Son, to apply, by his creating love and power. this salvation to our souls: that 'Glory may 'be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; 'as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, 'world without end.'

V. 2--5. In the midst of the street, or principal place of concourse of the city, and on each side of the river, was "the Tree of life:" which seems not to mean a single tree, but a species of trees, that grew in the places of public resort, for the common benefit of all the inhabitants. On earth some fruits ripen at one season, and some at another: but this Tree bore twelve kinds of fruit; that every month in the year might be supplied, and abundance be united with perpetuity and variety. This was an emblem of Christ, and all the blessings of his salvation, as communicated constantly and perfectly to all his redeemed people in heaven, by his own presence with them, and love to them. The leaves of the Tree, being appointed for the healing of the nations, implied, that the favour and presence of Christ would remove and prevent all evil, as well as communicate all good, to the inhabitants of that blessed world. So that "no more curse would be "there," no sickness, pain, sorrow, wrath, or death: for Adam sinned in the garden of Eden, and so fell with his posterity under the curse; but this will never befall the redeemed; as the same sovereignty and omnipotence, which have saved them, will confirm them for ever. (Note, Ez. xlvii. 12.) For the throne of God, and of the Lamb, being established there, his servants shall serve and worship him for ever, which is their great desire and delight; "and "they shall see his face," behold his glory, be assured of his love, and enjoy the fulness of felicity in his presence. "And his name shall be in their foreheads;" that is, all shall know that they belong to him, and perceive that they bear his holy image. It is remarkable, that "God and the "Lamb" are here spoken of as One, in such a manner, that we cannot determine to which of them the singular personal pronoun belongs. In that world of light and glory there will be no night, no affliction, dejection, no intermission of service and enjoyment: they will need no candle; no diversions or pleasures, of man's devising, will there be at all wanted; and even the outward comforts, which God hath provided, suited to our state in this world, will no longer be requisite. (xxi. 23, 24.) How very different from a Mahommedan heaven, which could only please gross, sensual, and carnal men, if it were real! but indeed this, and various notions of heavenly happiness, springing up, as new revelations, from time to time, without excepting even the hope of philosophers, of enjoying the pleasure of learned society, an increasing knowledge of nature, and discoveries in science, beyond expression many and great; are mere delusions of the enemy; to soothe men into the opinion, that they may be happy, without submission to the gospel, and without holiness: till the event awfully convince them of the fatal delusion.

V. 6, 7. (xxi. 5.) The angel's declaration in this passage, that the Lord God had sent him, compared with what follows, (16,) has been adduced as a conclusive proof of Christ's Deity: but indeed we meet with this doctrine, in one form or other, continually; and there is no way of avoiding it; but by rejecting, wholly, or in part, the divine inspiration of those books, in which it is so undeniably contained.—The Lord Jesus next spake by the angel, and declared that "He was coming quickly," to fulfil these prophecies, to punish his enemies, to deliver his servants, and to take their souls to heaven; but especially to raise the dead and judge the world: and he added a blessing on all, who observed, understood, remembered, believed, and obeyed, the sayings contained in this prophecy: (i. 4:) as they could not fail, to increase their faith, hope, patience, steadfastness, and propriety of behaviour, in the church, and in the world.----'Good Vitringa devoutly wisheth; May the Lord bestow this 'grace and favour on us, who have employed some time 'and pains, in the study and explication of this book; 'that some part of this blessing also may descend to us.' (Bp. Newton.)

V. 8, 9. (See on, xix. 10, 11.) Whilst we are surprised, that the apostle should again fall into his former mistake, and need repeatedly the same admonition: we may observe the great wisdom of God in leaving him to do so. It has been remarked that the idolatrous worship of saints and angels was one great abomination of that antichristian system, against which this prophecy is principally levelled: and here all palliations of that enormity are answered at once; for the most exalted and beneficent creature, when visibly present, would not allow the least appearance of adoration to be rendered to him: whereas the papists worship creatures, when not visibly present, and thus ascribe omnipresence and omniscience to them, as well as other divine honours! It also shows the weakness of the Socinian way of accounting for Stephen's adoration of Christ; because, say they, he was visibly present: but if he had not been also truly God, the martyr would nevertheless have been an idolater: yet Christ neither reproved him, nor any other person, for showing him this kind of honour, or any other; but the contrary.

V. 10—12. The Lord Jesus is undoubtedly the Speaker in these verses; but some think that he spake by the angel, as his ambassador: or commanded him to proclaim these words in his name, and immediately from him. 'It was not thought sufficient to represent the angel, speaking in the person of Christ; but Christ himself also is introduced, speaking in his own person, and confirming the divine authority of this book, and attesting it to be properly his revelation.' (Bp. Newton.) Yet this does not seem satisfactory. (16.) It is therefore far more probable, that Christ again appeared in vision to his apostle, to close the prophecy, as he had done at the opening of it. (Notes, i. 10—20.) He directed the apostle not to seal the sayings of this prophecy, but to publish them for the use of the church: (x. 4. Dan. xii. 4:) for the time was at hand, when they would begin to be accomplished, nay, they would indeed soon be completed. As therefore, after all these revelations of the will of God, and the way of salvation, obstinate sinners would be left to their perverse choice, without further means being used for their conviction; and believers should be exhorted and encouraged to perseverance in well-doing; so the time would speedily arrive, when the unjust and filthy, the unpardoned and unregenerate, would be irreversibly fixed in such a state, that they would be unjust and filthy still, and for ever, without hope or remedy; and the justified and sanctified believer would be confirmed for ever in righteousness, holiness, and felicity. And, behold, Christ was coming quickly, bringing his recompense with him, both for his enemies and his people. (Note, xx. 11—15.)

V. 13. (Notes, i. 9—11. 17, 18. Marg. Ref.)

V. 14, 15. (Note, xxi. 5—8.) They, who do the commandments, as delivered to sinners in the Gospel, by repentance, faith in Christ, attendance on the means of grace, and renewed unreserved obedience from evangelical motives, are blessed; and they have a right, or privilege, derived from grace, to all the blessings of salvation by Christ, and to admission into heaven, that they may there have fellowship with God and his holy angels, for ever and ever. (Matt. xii. 50.) The word, translated right, is the same which is rendered power, in another remarkable declaration; (Note, John i. 11—13;) which shows the entire coincidence of these texts. (Marg. Ref.) But without the city, even in the lake of fire, (for there is no middle place, or condition,) "are dogs," or selfish, greedy, fierce, and sensual persons, or apostates, with others of a hateful character; especially those, who loved a carnal flattering lie better than the holy and humbling truth of God, and who invented and propagated lies for their own selfish purposes: all other liars may also be included. (Marg. Ref.) As idolaters are mentioned separately, that abomination cannot, with propriety, be considered as specially intended. But the whole prophecy being, in a peculiar manner, directed against the delusions, or lies, with which the devil, by means of the beast and the false prophet, and others, deceived all the nations; and the idolatry of the church of Rome being only a part of her "deceivableness of unrighteousness:" it may fairly be supposed, that they, who thus "spake lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron," were particularly, though not exclusively, meant, by those "who loved and made a lie."

V. 16, 17. The Saviour, in his divine nature, was the Root from whom David sprang, and his promised Seed as Man. He was also "the bright and morning Star." 'His rising up in his incarnation introduced the Gospel-day: his rising in power introduced the millennial day; his rising in the saving influences of his Spirit introduceth the spiritual day of grace and comfort; and his appearance to judge the world will introduce the eternal day of light, purity and joy.' (Brown.) Some understand the former part of the next verse, of the church's desire for Christ's second coming; but the context plainly directs us to another interpretation. "The Spirit," by the sacred Word, and by his convictions and influence in the sinner's conscience, says, "Come," to Christ for salvation; "the Bride," or the whole church militant and triumphant, says "Come," and share our felicity. It therefore behooves every man, that hears the invitation, to call on others to "come;" and, in fine, "let ever many," throughout the earth, who "thirsts," for salvation, come to Christ. Nay, lest any should hesitate, as not able to determine whether their thirst be spiritual or not, "Let "whosoever is willing come, and take of the waters of "life freely," as he would take water from a well, which belonged in common to him and to all his neighbours: nor ought he to think of paying for these blessings; except as he throws away his poison to receive food, or his dross to receive gold. (Marg. Ref. and notes on the texts referred to.)

V. 18—21. The Lord Jesus concluded this address, and indeed the whole of his word, by testifying, (as "the "Amen, the true and faithful Witness,") to every one who heard that prophecy, that if any man added any thing to what was contained in it, as of divine authority, God should add to, or heap on him, the plagues that were written in the book; and, on the other hand, if any one should presume to take any thing away from it, God would take away from him his part of the blessings, which he appeared, or thought himself, to be entitled to, or which he otherwise might have obtained. This seems primarily meant of the book of Revelation; with which as much liberty has been taken as with any part of scripture: but as the Lord doubtless intended this for the conclusion of the sacred Canon, so it may be applied to the whole of the written word: (Marg. Ref.) and it warns every man, in the most awful manner, to add nothing to, and take nothing from, what God hath revealed, of doctrine, ordinance, or commandment; the standard of truth, the way of acceptance, the evidence of conversion, or the rule of duty. Enthusiasts, pretenders to new revelations, bigoted sectaries, and imposing churchmen, on the one hand; with infidels and skeptics, on the other, who reject the whole or part of scripture, or aver that it is of no consequence what men believe, (which takes away all doctrinal truth at once,) have abundant cause to tremble at this warning. Critics, who are continually proposing conjectural alterations, or expunging from, and adding to, the text of scripture, are in no small danger: and expositors have abundant cause to be cautious and humble. Indeed, I am ready to tremble when I write upon this testimony of Christ, and think of the work in which I have been, during so many years, engaged. But the merciful Saviour will no more condemn unintentional mistakes in the honest writer, who desires to help men to understand his word, and proceeds in simple humble dependence on his teaching, than he will the honest preacher: and I trust this effort to explain his holy scriptures, though feeble and defective, has been conducted from proper motives, and in dependence on the Lord. I can confidently appeal to my heart-searching Judge, that I have, as far as I know, written, word for word, what I supposed he would have me write; without adding to, altering, or keeping back the sense of any passage, willingly, to serve any personal end, or party-interest: and that whatever mistakes have been made were involuntary, the effects of ignorance, and not design. —After this most solemn warning, our Lord declared, that he was coming quickly, and the apostle in his own name, and that of the church, added, "Amen, Even so, come, "Lord Jesus;" and then concluded with the usual benediction on his readers in general, or on the seven churches of Asia in particular. (Note, Mal. iv. 6. Marg. Ref.)— 'Men are sometimes apt to think, that if they could but 'see a miracle wrought in favour of religion, they would 'readily resign all their scruples, believe without doubt, 'and obey without reserve. The very thing that you 'desire you have. You have the greatest and most striking 'of miracles, in the series of scripture-prophecies accom'plished: accomplished, as we see, in the present state of 'almost all nations, the Africans, the Egyptians, the 'Arabians, the Turks, the Jews, the Papists, the Pro'testants; Nineveh, Babylon, Tyre; the seven churches 'of Asia, Jerusalem, and Rome. And this is not a 'transient miracle, ceasing almost as soon as performed; 'but is permanent, and protracted through the course of 'many generations. It is not a miracle delivered upon 'the report of others, but is subject to your own inspec'tion and examination. It is not a miracle, exhibited 'only before a certain number of witnesses; but is open 'to the observation and contemplation of all mankind; 'and, after so many ages, is still growing, still improving, 'to future ages. What stronger miracle therefore can 'you require for your conviction? Or, what will avail, 'if this be found ineffectual? Alas! if you reject the evi'dence of prophecy, "neither would you be persuaded, "though one rose from the dead." 'What can be 'plainer? You see, or may see, with your own eyes, the 'scripture-prophecies accomplished; and if the scripture'prophecies are accomplished, the scripture must be the 'word of God: and if the scripture is the word of God, the 'Christian religion must be true.' (Bp. Newton.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

May the Lord show to us the streams of "the pure River 'of the water of life, which proceed out of the throne of 'God, and of the Lamb;" that, receiving the precious gift of the life-giving Spirit, we may be made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light. All other streams are polluted, or will soon dry up; but this will flow, clear as crystal, without alloy or interruption, for evermore. They who drink of this water, and eat of the fruit of the Tree of Life, shall hunger and thirst no more: they will soon arrive where sin and sickness shall be known no more; for the leaves of the tree are for the healing of the nations: no curse will there be found; but blessing only and eternally, from the throne of God and the Lamb, in the service and presence of their beloved Lord, and in bearing his image, and being filled with all his fulness. No more complaints will then be heard of darkness, desertion, or temptation; and there will be no need of worldly pleasures or amusements, as "the Lord God giveth them "light, and they shall reign for ever and ever." These are true and faithful sayings; but they are so vast, that we need to pray continually, "Lord, increase our faith," or we shall not be able to receive them, however attested to us. We should give due honour to the instruments of good to our souls; but we must worship God only; for angels, apostles, prophets, and all believers, are fellow-servants, or brethren, and Christ is the Lord of all.

V. 10—21.

Soon will our Saviour and Judge come to determine our eternal state; but how dreadful will it be to the impenitent and polluted sinner, to be consigned to eternal unrighteousness and filthiness; and to be left without, among dogs and sorcerers, whoremongers, murderers, idolaters, and all liars! Oh, may we be found righteous and holy, and be confirmed in his holy favour and service, as our eternal and unchangeable felicity, when he shall come to render to every man as his work shall be! Never let us think that a dead or disobedient faith will save us; when the "Alpha and Omega, the First and the Last," hath declared them alone blessed, who "do his commandments," and thus prove their "right to the Tree of Life, and to "enter in by the gates into the holy city." These things he hath abundantly testified by his messengers to the churches; and in this manner we may hope to have him dwell in our hearts, as the bright and morning Star, ushering in the eternal day. But if sinners be alarmed, and begin to desire his salvation, let them remember, "that "the Spirit and the bride say, come;" and all that hear should say to every one of their relations, friends, and neighbours, Come; yea, whoever "will, let him come, and "take of the water of life freely." Ought not then the ministers and professors of the Gospel to beware of adding any thing, as a restriction on these large and open invitations, or of deducting any thing from them? or of altering in any way the terms of a sinner's acceptance and salvation: God alone is the Judge of men's motives and intentions; but we should keep at the greatest distance from the brink of that tremendous precipice, which is here pointed out to every man, who heareth the words of this prophecy; and down which multitudes, in every age, without doubt, rush headlong into destruction. The Lord deliver us from this condemnation: and may the writer, and all the readers, of these observations, have a well grounded confidence in Christ, and be of that number, who love and long for his appearing, saying, "Amen, even so come, Lord Jesus." The God of all mercy and grace be pleased to pardon all that is erroneous and faulty in this publication; and to his holy name be all the praise of whatever is true and profitable! Thanks be to God, for having given the writer health, strength, and ability, to bring it at length to a conclusion. May numbers have as much cause to be thankful for benefit derived from the perusal of it, as he has for the advantage he hath found in writing it: that so, 'Glory 'may be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy 'Ghost: as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever 'shall be, world without end.' And "may the grace of "our Lord Jesus Christ be with us all, now, and for "ever. Amen."

A Retrospective View of the Predictions contained in the Revelation of St. John.

THE intention of this retrospect is, merely to collect, and to place before the reader in one view, the outline of the interpretation of the book, which has, not without many interruptions of the subject, been adopted in this publication. The introductory chapters do not seem to require such a retrospect: the prophetical part, properly so called, begins with the opening of the seals, in the sixth chapter; which, containing six of the seven seals, has been interpreted to predict, first the progress of the Gospel during the period intended; and then the gradual undermining of the Pagan persecuting Roman empire, by several successive judgments, till that was terminated by the conversion of the emperors to Christianity. The seventh chapter has been explained as predicting, in the former part of it, the enlargement of the church, in consequence of the revolution above-mentioned: and in the latter part of it, as describing the blessedness enjoyed with Christ by the martyrs and suffering Christians, who had lived during the Pagan persecutions.

In the eighth chapter, under the seventh seal, the sounding of seven trumpets is announced, all of which fall under this last seal: but the sounding of four only is here mentioned, with an awful denunciation of wo on the inhabitants of the earth, when the other three trumpets should be sounded: which, from this circumstance, are generally called, 'The three wo-trumpets.' The four trumpets, the sounding of which is mentioned in this chapter, are interpreted to predict the gradual subversion of the Roman empire, by the Goths, Huns, Moors, and Vandals; till the whole fabric seemed completely demolished by the death of the last feeble and obscure emperor, called Momyllus, or contemptuously Augustulus.

The sounding of the fifth and sixth trumpets, or the two first wo-trumpets, in the ninth chapter, with the events recorded under each, is interpreted to predict the Mahommedan imposture, and its most destructive success, especially in the east, first under the Saracens, headed by Mahommed and his successors; and then under the Othmans or Turks, the effects of which remain to this present day.

The tenth chapter is considered as the introduction, by a solemn vision of a little book, a kind of appendix, or codicil, to the book with the seven seals; attended by some other intimations, which are afterwards more particularly elucidated.

The eleventh chapter, which (exclusive of the concluding verses, relating to the sounding of the seventh trumpet) is here supposed to be this little book, or appendix, is interpreted to predict the state of the church in the western regions, during the term of the fifth and sixth trumpets, while Mahommedism made such tremendous ravages in the east, or during the period of twelve hundred and sixty years. This prediction shows the extremely corrupt state of the nominal Christian church; which yet is supplied, during the whole term, with a competent number of suffering witnesses for the truth, who protest against these corruptions; till at length they are slain, their testimony is silenced, and their enemies triumph: but only for a very short time, after which the witnesses arise, ascend into heaven, and tremendous judgments on their enemies make way for the sounding of the seventh trumpet, and the final and universal triumph of the Redeemer's cause, or are connected with these events. These latter particulars are here considered as future; though many eminent expositors are of another opinion, respecting the slaying and rising again of the witnesses, and the sounding of the seventh trumpet.

The concluding verse of the eleventh chapter is here considered as introducing the prophecy of the twelfth chapter, in which the apostle is supposed to resume his subject from the close of the sixth or seventh chapter, or the revolution, by which the Roman empire became professedly Christian, under Constantine the Great; in order to give a more detailed prediction of those events, especially relating to the western world, which had before been very compendiously intimated. Satan, by his agents and vicegerents, the pagan persecuting emperors, having in vain endeavoured to prevent this revolution; and being, with all their coadjutors, cast out, degraded from authority, and deprived of power to do mischief, in the same way as formerly, have recourse, with great zeal, to other measures. And the Devil, having failed of success as a roaring lion, appears as a dragon, a deceiver, yet a destroyer. The Church, however, and her seed, before the new projects are ripe, has a place provided in the wilderness, to which she flees at the appointed time, and is secured, during the period of twelve hundred and sixty years; which is repeatedly mentioned both by the apostle and the prophet Daniel.

The thirteenth chapter is interpreted to predict the rise, establishment, and dominion of the papal persecuting Roman empire, as the ten horned beast; of the popish clergy, as the two horned beast; and of the Pope, as the image of the beast; with the mark and number of the beast; and the persecutions and cruelties which would be perpetrated by this antichristian power.

The fourteenth chapter is interpreted, as predicting the opposition made by the remnant of true believers, to this antichristian power; and their protest against its abominations, under the name of Babylon the Great; and the several stages of that reformation, which was at length effected in the protestant and reformed churches: with a general intimation of those tremendous judgments, by which, at last, the whole papal persecuting empire will be destroyed, under the image of a harvest and a vintage. The fifteenth chapter contains a vision of seven angels, having seven vials, containing the seven last plagues, which were about to be poured out, and in which the wrath of God would be fulfilled. The pouring out of all these vials is here supposed to take place, under the seventh trumpet; as all the seven trumpets fall under the seventh seal.

The sixteenth chapter records the pouring out of the seven vials, which is interpreted to predict the succession of judgments by which the papal persecuting empire and church, and Rome itself, the metropolis and centre of both, will be utterly desolated. The whole of this prophecy, however, is here considered as yet unfulfilled; though some interpret the pouring out of the three first vials, to predict the late events on the continent. The seventeenth chapter gives a figurative, but most intelligible description of the beasts, both the ten horned beast, and two horned beast, with the extent and seat of their empire. The eighteenth is interpreted, by all protestant expositors, as a prophecy of the utter desolation of Rome, for all her abominations; with the terror, distress, and ruin of all her adherents, and the exulting joy of the true church of Christ. In the nineteenth chapter, after a still more animated description of the joy and praise of all the servants of God on account of these events, and the glorious and blessed effects which will follow; is a prophecy of the subsequent efforts against true Christianity, made by the remains of the antichristian party, under the conduct of the beast; and the false prophet, or the two horned beast; and of the final victory obtained over them, ending in their entire destruction, and the casting of the beast and the false prophet into the lake of fire burning with brimstone.

Still, however, Satan himself, the grand deceiver of all nations, remains at liberty; and ready to make further efforts against the cause of Christ: but the twentieth chapter opens with a prediction of his being bound, and cast into the bottomless pit, for a thousand years. Then the Millennium, or triumphant reign of Christ, for a thousand years takes place: at the close of which, Satan being again liberated, successfully renews his efforts; and impels those whom he has deceived, and drawn into apostacy from God, to levy war with tremendous force and violence, against the remnant of believers. But at that crisis, fire from heaven consumes the assailants, the devil is finally consigned to the place of torment; the general judgment immediately succeeds; and all the wicked being cast into the lake of fire, the state of the righteous in heaven is described in the two concluding chapters, with many coincident instructions and exhortations.

This is the scheme of interpretation adopted in this publication: and it is, at least, the result of much study and reflection on the subject. One thing further remains to be noticed: Some modern expositors, especially Mr. Faber, suppose another persecuting power to arise towards the end of the twelve hundred and sixty years, distinct from the ten horned, and the two horned beasts; which is properly to be considered as ANTICHRIST, as an infidel king, an atheistical, and not popish, domination. The author's comment on Daniel had been reprinted, before he saw this interpretation; and should his life be spared, it may hereafter come in his way, to consider how far Daniel's prophecies confirm this sentiment. He indeed purposed to give an opinion on the subject, in his exposition of Revelation; but he really found no convenient place, in the body of the work, for introducing it. For, though, by no means decided against the sentiment, or averse to it; nay, allowing that modern events countenance the supposition; he could find no such third power distinctly mentioned by St. John. So that proceeding to the close of the book, without finding a proper opening for the subject; he saw no better way, than to mention this circumstance at the close of it. In respect to the word ANTICHRIST, and the character of Antichrist, he must refer the reader to the notes on the first epistle of St. John. (1 John ii. 18—23. iv. 1—4.)

TABLES of MEASURES, &c. mentioned in SCRIPTURE.

Measures of Length.

	Yds.	Ft	In
A finger-breadth, about	0	0	0 3-4
A hand-breadth, rather more than	0	0	3 1-2
A span, or half cubit, about	0	0	10
A cubit, the length of a full sized man's arm, from the elbow to the extremity of the middle finger	0	1	8

	Ft.	In.
N. B. Some compute the cubit to be	1	9
And others only	1	6

The computation here selected is, probably, rather too large. There seems no sufficient ground, in scripture, for supposing different kinds of cubits; the only text, which appears to imply this, being capable of another interpretation. (Notes, Ez. xl. 5. xliii. 13.)

	Yds.	Ft	In
A fathom, 4 cubits	2	0	8
Ezekiel's Reed, by some computed to be	3	1	2
A stadium, or furlong, 400 cubits	222	0	8
A mile, 10 furlongs, being about one fifth longer, than an English mile	2,220	6	8

Measures of capacity, for Corn or Liquids.

	Wine Gal.	Qts.	Pts.
The Log 1-72 of an Ephah	0	0	0 3-4
The Cab 1-18 of an Ephah	0	1	1 1-2
The Omer 1-10 of an Ephah (about)	0	3	0 1-4
The Hin 1-6 of an Ephah (about)	1	1	0
The Ephah, or Bath (about)	7	2	0 1-2
The Chomer, or Homer, 10 Ephas	75	2	1
This should carefully be distinguished from the Omer, which is only a hundredth part of it.
The firkin, as mentioned John ii. 6. is differently computed. Some think it contained	0	3	1 1-4
The measure, or Cheenix, mentioned Rev. vi. 6. seems to have been the daily allowance made of corn to a slave, perhaps rather more than	0	1	0
That mentioned 2 Kings vii. 1. is supposed to have contained about	2	0	0

A Table of Weights and Money.

By Troy Weight.

	lb	oz.	pen.	grs.
The Gerah 1-20 of a Shekel	0	0	0	12
The Bekah 1-2 a Shekel	0	0	5	0
The Shekel	0	0	10	0
The Maneh, 60 Shekels	2	6	0	0
The Talent, 3000 Shekels	125	0	0	0

N. B. Some make the Shekel, according to which all the other weights are computed, rather less than in this table; and others rather more.

Money, in Value.

This is a subject of a very difficult nature: for money is mere relative property; and its value consists in the quantity of things useful to life, which it will purchase. Now it is certain, that the same weight, either of brass, silver or gold, will at one time, and in one place, purchase far more of these things than in another time and place: and, probably, an ounce of silver, in any of the times, of which the scripture treats, would purchase as much as three, or four, or five ounces now would. All, therefore, that can be attempted on this head is, to show the relative value of the money mentioned in scripture, as computed in the money of this age and nation. An ounce of silver is generally, I believe, coined into something more than five shillings: but as minute exactness is not the object in this place, the computation will be made at that price.

	l.	s.	d.
The Drachma	0	0	7 1-2
The Beka, or Didrachma	0	1	3
The Shekel	0	2	6
The Maneh, or pound	7	10	0
A Talent of gold, (at 16 of silver to one of gold)	6000	0	0

N. B. Some learned men compute each of these lower, and some higher. But this appears to be about the mean, between discordant opinions.

Roman Money mentioned in the New Testament.

	l.	s.	d.	far.
A Mite	0	0	0	0 3-4
A Farthing (about)	0	0	0	1 1-2
A Penny, or Denarius	0	0	7	0 1-2
A pound, Mina	3	2	6	0

A Table of Time.

Learned men state the names of the months, and their relation to the months into which we divide the year, as follows: but all the names mentioned are not found in scripture. Of those which are, a reference to some text, in which it is named, will be annexed.

1 Nisan, (Neh. ii. 1.) or, Abib (Ex. xiii. 4.)	March, April.
2 Zif, (1 Kings vi. 1.) or Jyar	April, May.
3 Sivan, (Esth. viii. 9.)	May, June.
4 Tamuz, or Thamuz	June, July.
5 Ab	July, August.
6 Elul, (Neh. vi. 15.)	August, September.
7 Ethanim, (1 Kings viii. 2.) or Tifri,	September, October.
8 Bul, (1 Kings vi. 38.) or Maicheswan	October, November.
9 Cisleu, or Chisleu (Neh. i. 1.)	November, December.
10 Tebeth, (Esth. ii. 16.)	December, January.
11 Shebar	January, February.
12 Adar, (Ezra vi. 15.)	February, March.
13 Ve adar, or the second Adar.

This month was added, or intercalated, from time to time; when the twelve lunar months, falling considerably short of a solar year, introduced such an irregularity in the seasons, as was inconsistent with the observance of the sacred festivals at the proper time. This month being, on those occasions, added, between the end of Adar, the twelfth month, and the beginning of Nisan, the first month, brought back the computation of the year to some degree of regularity. It answered the purpose, in some measure, which the 29th of February, every fourth year, does in our days: viz. to preserve a coincidence between the twelve months which constitute the year, and the actual yearly revolution of the earth round the sun. But the intercalated month by no means settled the calculations of the Israelites, in that degree of exactness, to which astronomers have at present reduced it. The months of Israel, as here stated, are supposed to answer, each to the closing half of the former, and the first part of the latter of our months, as annexed to them: but these intercalatory months, and especially the absolute necessity which there was for them, must considerably deduct from accuracy in all these calculations. They are, however, sufficiently exact for all useful purposes.

The days of the week were numbered by the Israelites in their order, the first, the second, &c.; the seventh, or last day of the week being the sabbath; but it does not appear that they had any names affixed to them.

Their days were generally reckoned from the setting of the sun to the next setting of the sun, according to the original arrangement; "The evening and the morning were the first day."

Both the night, from sun-set to sun-rise, and the day, from sun-rise to sun-set, were divided into twelve hours; which must have been unequal in their length, at different seasons of the year. It should, however, be remembered, that the land of promise being situated much nearer the Equator, the difference in the length of the days, in summer and winter, and of the nights, during winter, in proportion to the days, was much less than in this country.—Some, however, think, with much probability, that the division of time into hours was introduced by the Romans. The word hour, as used in some places of the Old Testament, seems not to denote a measure of time, but merely the coincidence of events.

The night likewise, from sun-set to sun-rise, was, among the Israelites, divided into four watches.—Supposing the sun to set at six o'clock, according to our computation, the first watch reached from 6 to 9; the second, from 9 to 12; the third, from 12 to 3; and the fourth, from 3 to 6, or sun-rising.

A Table of some of the States, Offices, and Descriptions of Men, as mentioned in the Canonical Scriptures.

Patriarchs; fathers and heads of families, who eventually became renowned and celebrated in Israel; as the twelve sons of Jacob; and David the ancestor of the kings of Judah.

Judges. In the common use of the word, magistrates in general are intended, whether superior or inferior: but it frequently marks out those temporary supreme rulers, whom God raised up, to reform religion and deliver his people, before he placed kings in hereditary succession over them; that is, from the death of Joshua, to the nomination of Saul to be king, or rather of David, as substituted in Saul's place.

Elders. This word is used with great latitude in scripture; but it more especially denotes the seventy persons constituting the council, or sanhedrim, of Israel; and after the establishment of Christianity, the stated pastors and teachers of the Christian church.

Kings. The kings of David's race were especially appointed to that office, in hereditary succession, by God himself: but for Solomon's sin, ten tribes were taken from his family, and given to Jeroboam.—Thus the kings of Judah, of David's race, and the kings of Israel, or the ten tribes of several families, reigned separately, till the days of Hezekiah; when Israel or the kingdom of the ten tribes was finally carried captive.

Israelites. This is the proper name of the whole nation, as descended from Jacob or Israel; and became appropriate to the ten tribes only, after their revolt from David's family.

Jews, or Judeans. The decendants of Judah, with the Levites, Benjamites, and others, who joined themselves to Judah, after the division of the kingdom, are meant by this name.—It is therefore manifestly improper, though very common, to call the nation in general Jews, at any period of their history, till about the time of the Babylonish captivity; when the ten tribes being dispersed, all the remains of the nation gradually received this name, and are known by it to this day.

A Hebrew of the Hebrews. A lineal descendant from Heber and Abraham, and not one who had been proselyted, or whose ancestors had been proselyted.

A Proselyte. A person, from another nation, who was incorporated into the church of Israel, by receiving circumcision, and becoming obedient to the law of Moses. Learned men distinguished between different kinds of proselytes; but the scripture does not.

High Priest. The priest of Aaron's race, who was allowed to enter into the most holy place, constituted chief ruler of the church of Israel, and the special type of Christ.

Second Priest. He, as it is generally supposed, who was appointed to officiate for the high priest, in case he was disqualified.

Chief Priests. The principal persons of the twenty-four orders, into which the sons of Aaron were divided by David, that they might serve in rotation.

Levites. The descendants of Levi, by Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, who were not of Aaron's race; but, in many respects, servants to the priests; yet often teachers and magistrates in Israel.

Nethinims. Servants to the priests and Levites, for the meaner and more laborious offices; being the descendants of the Gibeonites, and of others, who were voluntarily devoted to these services.

Prophets, or Seers. Extraordinary ministers of religion, whom God raised up to reveal his will to mankind, to reform Israel; and to predict future events, especially the coming of the Messiah, his sufferings, and the glory that should follow.

Sons of the Prophets. Persons educated in the schools of the prophets, from the days of Samuel, who instituted them; from whom God frequently called men to the prophetical office; and who, on many occasions, were extraordinary teachers of true religion, when the priests and Levites neglected their duty.

Scribes. Learned men, whose professed object was to expound, and enforce, the law of God, from the days of Ezra, to those of our Lord.—The word scribe in the history of Israel, under regal government, generally means secretary; that is, to the king.

Rabbies, Doctors, Lawyers. Scribes, who had attained to certain degrees of eminency, or reputation, in their profession; and who were distinguished in a manner, not wholly unlike the academical honours conferred by modern universities.

Tirshatha. The governor of the Jews, appointed by the Persian kings, after the captivity.

Tetrarchs. Persons, each of whom were appointed by the Romans to govern a fourth part of that district, which had formed the kingdom of Herod the great; and which, at his death, was divided into four governments. (Note, Luke iii. 1.)

Centurions. Officers in the Roman army, commanding a hundred men.

Publicans. Tax-gatherers, under the Romans. The principal publicans farmed large districts, at an annual rent; and were aided by the Roman armies in exacting their demands from individuals; and the inferior publicans rented smaller tracts of them, or were their servants.

Pharisees. A sect among the Jews, in the days of Christ (having sprung up some time before,) which under the profession of extraordinary strictness and sanctity, was remarkable for hypocrisy, pride, censoriousness, and covetousness. They, however, maintained the true doctrine concerning the resurrection, and received all the books of the Old Testament, as divinely inspired, as the oracles of God.

Sadducees. A sect of infidels among the Jews, who, professing indeed some regard to certain parts of the scriptures, denied the resurrection, disbelieved a future state, and the existence of angels and spirits.

Herodians. Sadducees, who shaped their religion to outward circumstances, and specially paid court to Herod. Some say they professed to believe that king Herod was the Messiah.

Samaritans. The descendants of the nations whom the kings of Assyria settled in the country, from which they dispossessed the ten tribes; united with some Israelites, and apostate Jews, and Jewish priests; who established a schismatical religion in Samaria, which produced the most determined reciprocal enmity and antipathy between them and the Jews.

Nazarene. A name by which the Christians were at first distinguished; but afterwards applied to a heretical sect.

Stoics. A sect of heathen philosophers, who prided themselves in apathy, or an affected indifference to pleasure or pain; who considered virtue as its own reward; and who maintained that all events were determined by fate, as superior to the will of the gods, even of the supreme God.

Epicureans. A sect of heathen philosophers, who ascribed all things to chance; and considered pleasure as the chief good.

Apostles. Persons selected by Jesus Christ, to be the witnesses of his life, death, and resurrection, to mankind; the repositories of his holy doctrine, from whom it should be communicated to the nations, and to all future ages; and who, by their preaching and writings, should make known his holy religion; so that to the end of the world their doctrine must be appealed to, as the standard of truth and duty.

Evangelists. For many ages, this word has marked out the writers of the four narratives which have been transmitted to us, as of divine authority, concerning the miracles, life, death, and resurrection, of our blessed Saviour: but in the New Testament, it signifies simply preachers of the gospel; yet with a special designation of certain persons, who, under the authority and direction of the apostles, (the principal missionaries of Christ to mankind,) were sent forth to establish and regulate the churches planted by the apostles, and to plant new churches. They seem to have been distinguished from stated pastors, in nearly the same manner as modern missionaries are from resident ministers.

Bishops. The same persons are in many places called both bishops and elders; but it is generally, and with great probability, supposed, that after a time the bishops became the superintendants and overseers, not only of the churches, but of the pastors also, each in a limited district.

Deacons. Persons appointed, by the counsel and direction of the apostles, to take care of the poor, and the secular concerns of the churches; from whom, however, it seems evident that elders and evangelists were frequently chosen, and sent forth.

Nicolaitans. A corrupt company of heretics, answering in many respects to the Antinomians of modern times. There is, however, no proof that they were the disciples of Nicolas, one of the first deacons; indeed the supposition is, in the highest degree, improbable.

THE END.
